of the Admiralty has become most unsatisfactory. That was contradicted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), who issued that Order in Council. The right hon. Gentleman said that it was perfectly satisfactory, because it throws individual responsibility on Naval Lords of the Admiralty, and he emphasized that fact by saying that he made each Lord of the Admiralty sign the Estimates, in order to show that he was directly responsible for his own Department. The next thing which happened was that my noble and gallant Friend the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford), who is so distinguished an ornament of the Admiralty and the Naval Profession, stated that he had refused to sign the Estimates because he knew nothing about them, and had not had time to study them. Now, I do not think it is right that the House and the country should not be able to attach some responsibility to particular men for particular failures; and I cannot see how that provision is to be made while the civil element—what I may call the clerical element—controls. I cannot conceive how it is possible to say, in regard to the defence of this great Empire, involving as it does many critical questions, which only experts can deal with, that you should spend so much larger a sum every year in the clerical department of the Admiralty than on the expert staff. I cannot conceive anything more adverse to the establishment of a better state of things in regard to the naval administration. So long as naval officers are few at the Admiralty, and until you organize your Admiralty into departments under responsible naval men, with adequate naval staff, kept there long enough to know their business, I cannot see how you can get that business efficiently done. We must also have the guarantee which is provided by the American system—that not only shall the Admiralty and the naval administration be divided into departments, but that there shall be a Naval Lord at the head of each department. Unless that is done, you will never have that proper consideration devoted to the wider questions of policy which is necessary in order to secure the due administration of the Navy. I want to see the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty, if the Navy for the Estimates, how it is that they did not sign the Memorandum; how is it that it comes as a Memorandum of the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty alone, while the Naval Estimates, which are necessary in order to carry out his policy, are signed by a majority of the Naval Lords? If the noble Lord, and the other Lords, are responsible for the Naval Estimates, they should be responsible for the policy that is involved in them; and, therefore, they should have been called upon to sign this Memorandum. I trust I may be allowed to express a hope that the next Memorandum will be a Report from each Naval Lord at the head of each department, stating that he is satisfied that the Estimates are sufficient and necessary for the department with which he is connected, and then let the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty sign generally for himself that the Estimates are correct. That is a question of some importance, because if, under the Order of 1869, each Lord is responsible for his department, I cannot understand why the Memorandum appears as if it were the sole production of the First Lord. There is not one single word, from beginning to end, in that Memorandum as to the requirements of our coaling stations. I know the noble Lord will tell me that that is not in his Department; but I think it is a monstrous thing that the safety of the coals for the Navy in a time of war should not be vested in the Board of Admiralty, instead of resting with the War Department. It can easily be understood that the Navy will be helpless and powerless unless adequate stores of coal are secured, and yet there is not one word about the coaling stations in this Memorandum. If the noble Lord cannot guarantee an adequate provision for the coaling stations, I maintain that there is little use in spending money on ships. There is another point in connection with this Memorandum which has surprised me still more. Hon. Members will have read a very interesting paragraph about the personnel of the Fleet; but I think it is somewhat astounding that in these days the noble Lord should have omitted to mention the 10,500 Marine Infantry and 2,500 Marine Artillery under his control. It is astonishing to me that so large an Infantry and Artillery Force should be regarded as so minor a detail in the defence of the country as not to be worthy of mention in this Memorandum. Who is responsible for this omission? Still less can I make out why, in these circumstances, we should have the House of Commons dissatisfied, and the country agitated, because the Secretary of State for War proposes to break up five batteries of Horse Artillery in order to provide garrisons for the purpose of protecting the coals required by the Navy in different parts of the world. I cannot conceive why it should be considered at all necessary to break up five batteries of Horse Artillery in order to meet naval requirements, and to provide Artillery for garrisoning naval stations. But it will be found that the Board of Admiralty, or, at all events, the Naval Departments, have 2,500 Marine Artillery placed absolutely at their disposal. Nevertheless, the noble Lord has not even considered it necessary to mention them in this Memorandum. As an officer who has spent 15 or 16 years of his life in that Force, I think I ought to know something about its value. Yet my opinion is that, although the country is spending a great sum of money in order to secure an efficient body of Artillery, the Admiralty are misusing and misapplying it. I challenge contradiction to that assertion. I find that there is a mention of the Marine Service in the Memorandum; but it is only this—that a certain number of Marines are about to be turned into butchers and bakers. I admit that that may be right; but I do not know why we should break up a number of batteries of Horse Artillery, while it is proposed to turn the Marine Artillery into butchers and bakers. I think our naval defences in a time of war is too serious a matter to be trifled with in that manner. I should like to know whether there has been any communication whatever between the War Office and the Board of Admiralty as to the application of the Marines and the Marine Artillery to the defence of the coaling stations? There is not one word about that matter in the Memorandum, nor any allusion whatever to the employment of the Marines, except as butchers and bakers. What I want to know is, whether the question of defending the coaling stations under the Admiralty with a Marine Force has ever been put by the Admiralty to the War Office? If that had been done, the whole matter could have been fairly inquired into, and the defence of these coaling stations would have been carried out at a cost infinitely less and in a far more efficient and satisfactory manner. The noble Lord must admit that when the Horse Artillery is broken up, the War Office will come to the Admiralty and call upon them to provide transport for the Artillery and their stores to coal depôts all over the world, backwards and forwards, and the country will have to pay for it. Marine Artillery would go out as supernumeraries in warships, and transport expense would thus be saved. There is another interesting point touched upon in this Memorandum. I am sure that the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone is the last person to give credit to any Department which does not deserve it. One of the most interesting portions of the Memorandum is the statement with regard to the Naval Intelligence Department. I most cordially approve, and I warmly thank the present Board of Admiralty for, the step they have taken. It has been too long deferred already, and I think that the promotion and extension of that Intelligence Department is the wisest step the Admiralty have ever taken in its history in modern times. But I am sorry to say that I cannot give the Board any credit for the idea of this Naval Intelligence Department. The facts are these. The Naval Intelligence Department appears first in the Estimates of 1884 for the sum of £500. Lord Northbrook does not deserve credit for that, nor does Lord Northbrook's Administration. It was a totally inadequate Estimate, and merely a sop towards satisfying public opinion. The present Board of Admiralty are taking a further step in this direction, and I believe they are pursuing a wise policy—one of the wisest, indeed, which has distinguished the Admiralty for many years. More than 20 years ago I pointed to the necessity of establishing a Naval Intelligence Department; and I remember having had a bad time of it, on one occasion, at the hands of a Naval Lord of the Admiralty, because I dared to advocate certain views. At length the United Service Institution asked me to put all my arguments together and deliver a lecture upon the subject. I remember talking to a distinguished friend of mine —who has since left the Admiralty—upon the matter, and he implored me not to deliver the lecture, because the Admiralty did not want such a Department. My lecture, however, was given in 1881, and Lord Northbrook came down afterwards and said that it was very interesting, and that something should be done in the matter. Nevertheless, it was not until 1884 that Lord Northbrook produced the Vote for £500; and he might just as well have asked for 500 pence for all the good a sum like that was calculated to do. My estimate was, and still is, that the Naval Intelligence Department should cost at least £20,000 a-year. It has leaked out how this question of the Naval Intelligence Department has been dealt with in an Admiralty Minute; but it is somewhat like the performance of the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out. There is not a single word in the Admiralty Minute which requires the Naval Intelligence Department to make itself acquainted with the vast and complicated operations of sea commerce. It is supposed that our commerce is, to a certain extent, always the same on the ocean, and there is not a single word said about the naval arrangements for the protection of that commerce, to the variations and tendencies of which these arrangements must conform. The natural laws which influence commerce are the keys to our ocean defence, and therefore I feel emboldened to ask the noble Lord what is to be the policy of the Admiralty in the event of war? Are we ready to maintain a blockade, and, if so, is the Admiralty prepared to keep up a force sufficient for blockading all the war ports of probable enemies, so as to prevent their iron-clads from getting out? In addition, to watch the great commercial ports of the enemy, are they in a position to guard the 13 great junctions of our commerce on the ocean? Are we prepared to maintain a sufficient naval force to hold those 13 junctions?—because, if we are not, we might just as well try to keep possession of the line of railway from the Victoria Station to Dover, and allow the enemy to take possession of Clapham Junction. Have we an adequate force for this purpose? Have we an adequate force to watch neutral ports so as to deny the enemy coal? The whole question of naval warfare is the coaling of our own cruisers, and the position we may be in to deny coal to the enemy. I am satisfied, and I challenge contradiction, that the Admiralty are not prepared and have not a sufficient force at command to do these things; and I want to know what is to become of the commerce of this country in the case of war; if you are not? I hope the noble Lord will understand that in speaking strongly on this matter I am not saying that he is to blame, or that the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone is to blame, or even Lord Northbrook. I blame no individual; but I say that the system is to blame, and I contend that you are imperilling the whole of your commerce by continuing to pursue this absurd course. Just one word more. It is important for this House and the country to have some standard by which it is to measure its naval requirements. It is of no use to say that we are equal in ships to three Foreign Powers, and, therefore, we need spend no more. That would be just as reasonable as to say that Sir Charles Warren has got more police than burglars, and therefore the Estimates for the Metropolitan Police ought to be cut down. In this Metropolis do you measure the strength of your police by the number of criminals? Do you not increase your police in proportion to the growth of wealth and the area over which it is spread? We are told that the growth of the Metropolis necessitates the increase of the Police Force by 150 police constables annually. So also in the Navy—it is not a question of money primarily, but of the necessities of the case. There ought to be some standard by which the requirements of the case can be measured. Abstract comparisons with the Naval Force of other countries are worthless. Our Naval Force must be measured by our requirements, and it certainly seems to me that the strength of our Navy has not been developed in the same ratio as our responsibilities. It may be quite true that the number of Her Majesty's ships in commission may exceed those in commission of any three other Naval Powers. That, however, means nothing. I trust that in connection with the next Naval Memorandum we shall have a map issued showing by ocean districts the amount of British commerce compared with that of France, Russia,

Germany, and other Foreign Powers; also the number of ships and guns which England has on each ocean, and the number of ships and guns which foreign nations have. That would probably educate Parliament and the country as to the extent of our responsibilities, and the task which is imposed upon the Navy of this country. Abstract comparisons do nothing but blind people. The question of coal is all-important in these days, and it is regrettable to hear that Singapore is not adequately defended. I can say that the same statement applies to the Cape, notwithstanding the fact that the Cape is to us of the very utmost importance as a coaling station. Foreign fleets can coal at Madeira and at St. Vincent; and the moment a war breaks out, unless you have a sufficient squadron off these places to stop vessels from going in there to get supplies of coal, you would find it impossible to maintain the ocean routes for your commerce to the other side of the world, and your commerce would be absolutely paralyzed. Thus the neglect of the War Office as regards coaling stations increases Admiralty responsibilities. If that happens, who are you to hang? The noble Lord says—"I will not be hanged; I have nothing to do with the coals; they are not in my Department." I trust that in next year's Memorandum the noble Lord will not almost apologize for the expense, and hold out hopes of a reduction. I myself hope to see a greater increase of efficiency, and also a still larger expenditure. I cannot help thinking that it is nothing but moonshine to see your commerce grow and grow, and to expect to cut down your expenditure. At Singapore, for instance, where you import annually 300,000 tons of coal, the station is inadequately defended; and unless it is properly defended and maintained in time of war it would mean the stoppage of nearly the whole of your Mercantile Marine. Surely it is most unsatisfactory that a station like that should be left without proper defence, especially when we know that in that very Port of Singapore a greater average amount of tonnage is cleared and entered annually than in the whole of the Ports of the United Kingdom during the year Her Majesty commenced her Reign. We are told to cut down our Expenditure; but perhaps the Committee will allow me to mention the fact that when Her Majesty began her Reign the total sea commerce of the Empire was only one-fifth of what it is now. The tonnage entering and clearing British Ports is now ten times as great, whereas our Naval Estimates are not three times as great as at that time. Take the tonnage of the National Mercantile Marine entering and clearing the national ports, and compare the Naval Expenditure of this country with that of the other great Naval Powers. It will be found that Germany spends 7s. upon her Navy per ton of national tonnage entering and clearing national ports; Italy pays 15s. per ton for Italian ships entering and clearing Italian ports; Russia £2 10s. per ton for ships entering and clearing Russian ports; and France £1 1s. for her ships entering and clearing French ports. Thus you have Germany paying 7s., Italy 15s., Russia £2 10s., and France £1 1s., while the British Empire pays 2½d.

MR. PULESTON (Devonport): I have not risen for the purpose of making any comments upon the able speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down (Captain Colomb), but rather to answer some of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), especially where he referred to the policy of Lord Northbrook while at the Board of Admiralty. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that what the right hon. Gentlemen said as to the pressure brought to bear upon the Admiralty was quite true. It must not, however, be forgotten that before that pressure of public opinion was placed upon Lord Northbrook, the noble Lord had stated that if the £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 which was then asked for was granted by Parliament, he would not know how to use it, or what to do with it. I think I am very nearly quoting the actual words of Lord Northbrook at the time. The noble Lord found it necessary, subsequently, to give in to the public opinion of the nation at large, and that public opinion was not certainly always in accord with that of the right hon. Member for Central Bradford. Both the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman came round to it, however, very quickly at last, and they passed Votes for the purpose of putting the Navy in a proper state of efficiency. Lord Northbrook, in the speech which he made on that occasion, declared his readiness to reverse his previous decision, and said that the money might be used with great advantage to the Navy and to the country. Therefore, I think that to quote what was said and done under the administration of Lord Northbrook is not saying very much, when we take these inconsistencies into consideration. I am sorry that any reference at all has been made to Lord Northbrook's administration, because I believe that the question ought to be discussed on its own merits, and in a manner befitting the importance and efficiency of the Navy, as well as the great interests of the country. The right hon. Gentleman devoted a large portion of his speech to the political side of the question, and to some views expressed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford should have devoted so large a portion of his speech to a political retrospect instead of discussing the real merits of the question. I do not desire to give any credit to one Party more than another for the steps which have been taken to reorganize the naval administration of the country; and the Memorandum of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) ascribes no credit either to a Conservative or a Liberal Government, but decidedly and emphatically refers to the desirability of the policy of continuity. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the regret expressed by Lord Northbrook that the hon. Member for the Govan Division of Lanarkshire (Mr. Pearce) was placed on the recent Committee over which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) presided, on account of the fact that the firm with which he is connected had tendered for the construction of the ships which were to form the subject of inquiry. I have nothing to say about that; but the country either requires technical knowledge to be brought to bear upon an inquiry into these subjects, or it does not. For my own part, I think it was of the highest consequence to have such knowledge as Friend possesses, just as it was the knowledge which Mr.

opposite (Mr. Sutherland) possesses as the head of one of the largest Steamship Companies of the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Govan has great experience in the building of large ships; and what we want and must have is the experience which he and gentlemen like himself can bring to bear upon these technical questions. Such experience, however, it would be impossible to obtain if we are to rule out every person who has an interest in the actual work. We must either adopt the one principle or the other; and if we say that we require the knowledge in these matters which a shipbuilder alone possesses, then the argument of Lord Northbrook which the right hon. Gentleman quoted falls entirely to the ground. The right hon. Gentleman has referred, in connection with the improvement and the reorganization of the Dockyards, to the difficulty of finding good men. I do not think that that is a difficulty which really exists, or that the present Board of Admiralty has found to exist. I question whether the right hon. Gentleman, when he was Secretary to the Admiralty, discovered that it was difficult to find good men. I think it is always possible to find good men in the Dockyards, and if necessary to find good men who will be willing to go there when they are wanted. I was surprised, therefore, that such a statement should have been made by the right hon. Gentleman, seeing that he has himself had considerable experience at the Board of Admiralty, and that he has always taken a deep interest in these matters. Nor can I agree with the further statement which the right hon. Gentleman made, that we should practically disestablish all the naval control in the Dockyards, and establish in its place a civil control.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I did not say that. I said that the business should be under Naval Superintendents, with a complete civil control.

MR. PULESTON: That is just the same thing, and we have gone as far as that in the arrangements made by the present Board of Admiralty. I quite concur that £1,000 a-year is a large salary to give to a civil assistant, and I have said that I could not concur in having an officer so largely salaried for doing the work which is now performed by the Naval Superintendent's civil assistant in the Dockyards. But I think it would be carrying the principle to a grievous excess indeed in the wrong direction, if we were to give greater power to this gentleman, and place him practically over both the Admiral Superintendent and the Chief Constructor. I admit that the position he now occupies is a very anomalous one, because he has, in reality, no power whatever; and, worse than that, he takes away a considerable amount of responsibility from the Chief Constructor, the Admiral Superintendent, and others upon whom the real responsibility ought to rest. Now, I think that is a serious consequence arising from the appointment of civil assistants. I trust that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, when he rises to take part in the debate, will reply to some of the remarks which I felt it my duty to make on a previous evening. In addition, I hope to get some information from the hon. Gentleman about the Naval Barracks. I think it is necessary to understand what is the use they are to be put to. Some £70,000 or £80,000 has been spent upon them, and I understand that only about £3,000 or £4,000 is necessary to complete them. It would appear that their non-completion is due to a desire to put off the matter, because only about £1,000 is appropriated for these barracks this year. It has been stated that the Marines are to occupy them when complete, and that the Marine Barracks at Stonehouse are to be sold to the Railway Company; but I believe there is no foundation for that assertion. It is a very valuable property, and I think it will be of some interest to know what the real facts of the case are. Therefore, I hope the noble Lord, or the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, will give the Committee such information in reference to these matters as happens to be in their possession at the present moment. There is one item to which I now desire to call the attention of the Committee—namely, the sum of £12,000 for armour-piercing projectiles paid by the Admiralty this last year. That seems to me to be a mixing up in these Estimates of what ought to be paid by the War Office. I do not understand why this item should be in the Naval Estimates of last year, and I think that such an arrangement will lead, or rather, has led, to confusion in the accounts. I hope the day is not far distant when the Admiralty will have full control over its own expenditure; because I believe that is a matter of importance, so far as the efficiency of the Navy is concerned; and because I believe that much of the delay and difficulty which have taken place would have been avoided if the Navy Departments had the control of their own armaments. With reference to the reorganization of the Admiralty in respect to Dockyards, to which reference has been made, I cannot help referring incidentally, before I sit down, to the fact that every reorganization in the arrangements of the Dockyards, and in the Department of the Admiralty, necessarily entails great expenditure. It is, no doubt, quite necessary that a number of clerks and others should be pensioned off, and that the pay of men who take their place should have increased the charge by £8,000 for the coming year; but I want to impress on the Admiralty that, while we are making economies in the Dockyards, and cutting down the wages of men and discharging men too, we must not forget that a keen interest is taken by these people, by their friends, and the country generally, in the figures which show an increase in the higher Departments, and that economies, if they are to produce contentment, should provide for reduction at the top as well as at the bottom.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I think it is desirable that I should dispose of the questions which have been raised by hon. Members who have already spoken, and I trust my hon. Friends who wish to speak on the Estimates will pardon me for intervening at this stage of the discussion. My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) has pointed out that there is a certain charge for armour-piercing projectiles, and he asked why that item is included in the Navy Estimates. The simple explanation is that the Vote for which the War Office is responsible was already so high that it was thought impossible to include this sum; and, for that reason, and rather than leave out a provision for these projectiles, we have included the charge in the Navy Estimates. In the same way, with regard to the armaments on which these projectiles are to be tried, although, under the present system, the War Office must provide the great bulk of the money necessary for the armament of the Navy, yet I hold, undoubtedly, that it is the right of the Navy, if they cannot get sufficient Supplies from the War Department, to get it under their own Vote. My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport also spoke of the Dockyard reorganization, and seemed to doubt the necessity of discharging a certain number of men from those establishments. We found last year that it was necessary to make a change which placed upon us the unpleasant task of having to discharge, at different times, a certain number of men; but a review of all the considerations brought home to the minds of the Board the absolute necessity for this. It was said at the time that it was our duty to find work for these men; but that doctrine is one to which I cannot assent, because it must be borne in mind that the Dockyards exist for the Navy of the country, and not for the men who are employed in them; and it is the duty of the Admiralty, therefore, to administer the Naval Department as efficiently and economically as possible, even though it may happen, and as, I fear in certain cases, it has entailed more or less hardship on individuals and distress upon localities. It is the desire of the Admiralty to put the Dockyards in a firm and impregnable position, so far as their work is concerned; but when, under the various alterations and reforms which are being pressed forward, the Dockyards become more efficient, and as soon as they are able to hold their own with private yards, there will be no opposition to asking that the great bulk of the work required by the Navy shall be done in them. With regard to the relations of the Admiralty Superintendent and the civil assistant, the principle on which we have endeavoured to proceed with regard to the Dockyards and the different Departments, is to make one man responsible for all that goes on there. If he wants more assistance we are willing that he should have it; but I am convinced that many of the undoubted blunders which have occurred in the past were owing to the system under which no one man was held thoroughly responsible for what occurred in a Department. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) says that he approves of this appointment of civil assistant; but, if so, I think it is unfortunate that he should have spoken of his work as that of a spy. The right hon. Gentleman has made use of a most unfortunate epithet; it is one which I think is not calculated to assist that officer in the difficult work which he has to do in the Dockyards. How is it possible that any man can discharge the duty of supervising labour at the Dockyards if a distinguished Liberal, one of the Members of this House, characterizes his work as that of a spy? The very word illustrates the way in which the right hon. Gentleman approaches the discussion of naval questions. He looks on the question from a Party point of view, and anything which is not associated with himself, or his Party, he feels bound to disparage and depreciate. He commenced his speech by saying that I have made a statement which is not true, and which is unfair to Lord Northbrook, and to the Board of which Lord Northbrook was the head. I have great respect for Lord Northbrook, and I should be very sorry to say anything that was unfair of him, or of the Board over which he presided. What are the statements which the right hon. Gentleman characterized as untrue, but which he did not prove to be so? I stated in my Report that "in the period between 1881 and 1885 every Naval Power in Europe save England largely increased its naval expenditure." Well, that is true. The right hon. Gentleman could not deny that it was true. But he says—"You ought not to have made that statement, because in the period antecedent to 1881 the Conservatives were in power." What on earth has that do with my statement? I submit that what must to a great extent influence the expenditure of this country is the expenditure of foreign nations. We cannot help noticing what foreign nations do in this respect, and it is apparent that during the period I have named, France and Germany had enormously increased their naval expenditure.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I stated that between 1881 and 1885, France had not increased her naval expenditure, and I called attention to the statement of the noble Lord as to the position of England during that time.

Lord George Hamilton

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I showed the other day that while the expenditure of France had increased 30 or 40 per cent, our expenditure had only increased 16 per cent for the period 1876-1886; and it is the fact that between 1881 and 1885 the total expenditure of France largely increased, and I went on to say that "England was the last Naval Power to recognize these new conditions." That is true; and it was because of that the large Vote was brought forward by Lord Northbrook. All I asserted was that if that expenditure had been spread over a larger number of years, greater care would have been taken in disbursing it, and the nation would have derived greater benefit from the outlay. The Statement which I drew up and which is laid before the country, presents an accurate view of the naval affairs of the nation. If it happens to reflect on any particular Administration, what does that matter to the country—if it is true? I do not believe the House of Commons to be a hard master, in the matter of expenditure on the Navy, provided the Government take the House into its confidence, and make a full and frank statement. Every Government is liable to make blunders, and it is the duty of those who succeed them to seek to benefit by past experience, in order to remedy those blunders. If the Board with which I have the honour to be associated should commit blunders, is it to be supposed that a succeeding Government is to be deterred from commenting upon the faults of our Administration? What was the Administration up to 1885, which the right hon. Gentleman champions? Was it a satisfactory Administration? Does the Report in any way strain the facts? Why, one hon. Gentleman, who is perhaps the greatest authority on shipbuilding in the House, the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) fell foul of me the other night, because he said I made far too favourable defence of what he calls the blunders of that Administration. What are the facts? In the Memorandum to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, he will find the following passage:—

"With the important exception of being more deeply immersed than was anticipated, the Impérieuse, in her trials, fully realized the expectation of her designer, and notwithstanding her deep draft, she is now, taking the essentials of speed, armament, and armour into consideration, if not actually the most powerful, one of the most powerful iron-clad cruisers afloat of her tonnage."

And that is what the right hon. Gentleman calls undue depreciation of the vessel. The right hon. Gentleman was Secretary to the Board of Admiralty which occupied itself in laying down vessels of the Impérieuse, Warspite, Admiral, and belted cruiser class. There is a great dispute as to whether or not those belts were deep enough. Into that dispute I will not now enter; but the Committee will understand that where there is a narrow belt of armour over the vital part, so to speak, of the ship, it is essential that the draught of the vessel should be what was anticipated when she was laid down. Every one of those ships was more deeply immersed than she ought to have been. Why was that? Because, at the time they were laid down, proper co-operation did not exist between the different Departments relative to their complement and armour-plates. What happened with reference to the Bombay? She is a vessel which was to carry two 67-ton guns; but the armament was suddenly changed to two 110-ton guns; and the consequence was, that she had to carry additional weight on that account, and also on account of shot and ammunition. The Rodney was designed to carry 43-ton guns, and, after she was laid down, that was altered to 63-ton guns. In the case of the belted cruisers, the complement of men was put down at 350; but it was found that the crew necessary to work the guns was 421 men. Every one of these mistakes could have been prevented. I allude to this matter, not for the purpose of finding fault with the late Board of Admiralty, but in order to show to the country that the present Board have made an alteration which we believe will be beneficial. It consists in this—that when a design of a ship is approved by the Board of Admiralty, each single officer—the First Lord, the Comptroller, and Chief Engineer—should, in consultation with the designer, fix the weight of the engines, the number of the complement, and the exact nature of the armament, that they should estimate the exact weight necessary to supply that complement and armament; and then that they should attach their signatures to the contract, after which no alteration shall be made. I have alluded to the fact that these ships were more deeply immersed than they ought to have been, because that is a very great blunder, and because every one of them will have a belt of much less utility than it was intended to be. [An hon. MEMBER: Are any of the belts under the water?] That depends much on the quantity of coal on board. The second mistake in the action of the late Board is to be found in the fact that, for the purpose of obtaining high speed, the designer was in the habit of associating the trial of vessels with what are called legend weights. The statements made in this House with reference to trials were thoroughly misleading. They were misleading because, if the vessel has her full supply of coal on board, it is evident that she cannot attain such a high rate of speed as when she has not her full quantity on board. Having detected this, it was my duty to show, as clearly as I could, what the Board of Admiralty unanimously decided upon to prevent its recurrence. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that I wrote this Memorandum for the purpose of causing pain to those who held Office before us. If the right hon. Gentleman objects to that Statement, let him read the evidence laid before several Committees, and the Reports made by the Select Committee as to the state of things existing at the Admiralty in 1885. Let him read the evidence of General Graham on the Dockyards, and he will see that the language used is far stronger than anything I have said in this Memorandum, for I knew how much Party feeling entered into the discussion on the Navy Estimates in this House, and I was anxious to start with no such embarrassment. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the programme of work proposed to be laid down is of a very moderate character. What is the position in which we find ourselves? There is provision made for additions to the Navy which have never before been made in one year. We found that we were able to produce this result by placing all the power we could on the vessels that were building; and we felt, until that was done, it was not advisable to launch into a more extensive programme. But there was another consideration. If we had laid down a large number of sloops and gunboats, we should have been compelled largely to increase the Dockyard Establishments; but next year, when we have finished the iron-clads now building, there will be a considerable reduction in the Establishments. When we came into Office, there were in the Dockyards 86,000 to 100,000 tons in iron-clads perfectly useless to the country. They were all near completion; and the lesson we have learned is this—if you want to turn those vessels out of the Dockyards rapidly, you must lay them down at such intervals that you can afford full and continuous employment for each branch at the Dockyards. The policy which we have pursued is to complete all the vessels in hand as soon as possible; and then, when they are finished, to fill up the gaps by laying down fresh vessels. The right hon. Gentleman says there has been no alteration in the law which constituted the Board of Admiralty. But there has been an alteration in the system. Under the present law, and under the Order in Council, the First Lord of the Admiralty is primarily responsible to Parliament and the country for the Navy and the expenditure connected with it. The other night I stated that the two Orders in Council of 1869 and 1872 illustrated the different manner in which the Admiralty has been worked. Under the Order in Council of 1869, the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) speaks of the Lords of the Admiralty as his “assistants;” his object being, as he practically admitted, to reduce the Board of Admiralty to the same condition as the Board of Trade, which has very little to do. Then the second Order was passed which rescinded the Order in Council of 1869. Then the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer came into Office, and he passed a second Order in Council, which rescinded that of 1869, striking out that objectionable word “assistants,” and putting the Naval Lords in their proper position—that of Colleagues of the First Lord. Since I, myself, have been at the Admiralty I have endeavoured—and Lord Ripon worked on the same lines—I have endeavoured to give as much authority as possible to the Naval Lords, each in his own Department. The first object of our desire, therefore, is to give the Naval Lords, as far as their own Departments are concerned, as much power as possible; and the second object is to ensure, so far as the general question of policy goes, that there should be full and adequate discussion at the Board. The question is raised in another sense by the omission of my noble and gallant Friend's (Lord Charles Beresford) name from the Estimates. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bow (Captain Colomb) seems to think it would be better if in future the names of all the Lords of the Admiralty were attached to the Memorandum laid before the House. I do not think that is possible. If you have a large number of people to draw up a Report, the probability is that the Report will not be very satisfactory. It is a curious fact that, previous to 1869, when the powers of the Junior Lords were greater than they are now—and when nearly all the business of the Admiralty was transacted before a full Board—it was not the practice of all the Lords, although they were responsible for the Estimates, to sign them. It was then insisted that all the Lords should sign the Estimates, and I find that the signatures came to be given as a matter of course. I thought that a somewhat objectionable practice; and, therefore, before these Estimates were presented, I asked my Colleagues whether they had any objection to sign them, and my noble and gallant Friend (Lord Charles Beresford) said that, inasmuch as he was not cognizant of all the Estimates and their details, he thought it was better he should not attach his name to them, although he fully agreed with the policy embodied in them. It is a matter for consideration whether anyone should attach his name to any document of this kind unless he has had an opportunity of going through the whole it. It is perfectly evident to the House, as business men, that the mass of complicated figures such as this, comprising 100 pages, cannot well go before each individual Member of the Board in that manner. What can be done was done in the present instance. The policy which is embodied in the Estimates was fully discussed, the shipbuilding programme was agreed to, and then it was left to my hon. Friend the Member for Ormskirk (Mr. Forwood) and myself to go through the Estimates and, in connection with the Naval Lords, who are responsible for each individual Department, put the figures into shape. I think, however, it is a proper matter for consideration whether, in subsequent years, it would not be better to go back to the old practice, and for all the Members of the Board to sign the whole document, or whether each of them should only attach his name, so that each Lord may sign those Estimates for which he is personally responsible. Now, with regard to the subject of the Intelligence Department, which has been referred to in the discussion, I am glad to say we have secured the services of about 10 of the ablest young officers in the Navy, and I believe they will be able satisfactorily to perform their duties not at a cost of £20,000, as an hon. Member has suggested, but at a cost of something like £4,000 or £5,000 a-year. It will be seen at once that, as the officers I have mentioned are on The Navy List, their employment in the Intelligence Department does not involve any additional charge, so far as pensions are concerned. Well, then, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) approved of the proposal to estimate the value of the Navy by giving a capital sum, as representing the value of the Navy, and appropriating an annual sum for the purpose of meeting depreciation and waste. I believe that the figures which are contained in my Memorandum will stand the test of time; but when the right hon. Gentleman draws a comparison between the figures in my Memorandum and the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty in Lancashire some time back, it is only right I should say that this idea and the figures are those of my hon. Friend; and I am sure both the Board of Admiralty and the House are much indebted to him for the ability and energy with which he has worked out the idea. I believe he puts before the House, in a plain and intelligible way, what is the sum which ought to be spent annually to keep our Navy up to the requisite strength. My experience is that it is no use placing before the Committee an enormous mass of figures; what, I presume, hon. Members would like to have is a simple account which, at one glance, will tell them what we are doing, what we propose to do, and what ought to be done. There are many business men in the House, and I believe this idea of annually voting a sum neither more or less than that which we consider to be requisite to make good the waste and depreciation of our Fleet is one which will commend itself to their minds. There is a considerable difference between the total of the capital account in this Memorandum and that which my hon. Friend gave in Lancashire; but his estimate in Lancashire included a number of things which are excluded in the Memorandum. My hon. Friend's estimate included all the gun-mountings and armaments; and if we take into consideration the total cost of the armaments and gun-mountings, which amounts to something over £10,000,000, there is practically only a slight difference between my hon. Friend's estimate and the estimate in my Memorandum of about £200,000. The estimate my hon. Friend gave in Lancashire was not an estimate worked out by actuaries as that contained in the Memorandum is, but it was a rough estimate made from the materials which he had during the time at his command.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I drew attention to the fact that the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) arrived at the estimate of £3,000,000, and that then he stated that the late Board had only provided £1,800,000. The latter figure certainly did not include either armaments or gun-mountings.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am not myself cognizant of all the details of my hon. Friend's (Mr. Forwood's) speech; he is quite able to take care of himself, and I have no doubt that, later on, he will satisfactorily explain any statement that he made. Then, allusion was made to the speech I delivered at the Mansion House on Lord Mayor's Day. Now, Sir, what distresses me very greatly is that it is the habit of certain writers in the Press to constantly depreciate everything connected with the Navy, and the result is that a wholly false estimate of the naval strength of this country is conveyed to the minds of people. I believe there are persons in this country who believe we have got the worst Navy in the world; and I believe it to be a great advantage to this country that there are here competent naval attachés, representing various foreign Governments, who are ab-represent to their Governments what our real naval strength is. Therefore, on the occasion in question, I was anxious to lay before the country and the world a clear statement of the condition of things. I pointed out that we had as many ships in commission as any three naval Powers; but I never implied that we wished to fight, or considered ourselves a match for any three naval Powers that were in a thoroughly satisfactory condition. On the contrary, the views I then laid down were in full accordance with those expressed in this Memorandum before the Committee. We have made great progress with our iron-clads; we have now coming on a large number of efficient cruisers; but all naval officers will agree with me when I say that a great portion of our sloops and gunboats are obsolete and quite unsuited to the requirements of modern naval warfare. There is one remark I must make with reference to these gunboats and sloops. I find that a considerable portion of these gunboats and sloops are in their first commission, but that they are quite obsolete in respect to speed. I do hope that, whoever may be at the Admiralty, they will take care that, when small vessels are laid down, they are of the requisite speed and have sufficient power in them. Every year speed is becoming a more essential fact in naval warfare, and it is possible for a vessel of comparatively limited displacement to attain a high speed. I am sorry I have detained the Committee at so considerable a length. I have, I think, shown that this Memorandum of mine was drawn up in no partizan spirit, but with an anxious desire to secure efficiency without undue expenditure. When the present Board of Admiralty accepted Office, all of us were determined to do our best to attain that object. We were conscious we might have difficulties to contend with. We knew we might come in contact with some of the old usages of the Service, and have to confront local prejudices and class prejudices; but we felt that the duty imposed upon us was one from which we ought not to shrink. I am confident that if Boards of Admiralty will frankly lay their case before the House of Commons without exaggeration—if they point out what has been done, the manner in which it has been done, and what is required to be done—I believe this House will always give a most patient and attentive consideration to any such appeal. I believe, moreover, that no difficulty will be experienced in obtaining the money required to put the Navy in efficient condition, provided that there are guarantees that the money will not be wasted.

Mr. C. H. WILSON (Hull, W.): Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that the Statement of the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) is of a very melancholy character, because what does it mean? It means that the British Admiralty is only now—in the year 1887—learning a very elementary portion of its duty in the administration of the Navy. We, who are connected with the Mercantile Marine of this country, have been brought up to do exactly what the Admiralty now propose to do. In building ships for the Mercantile Navy it has been our custom to study every point—to consider what work particular ships have to do, what speed they are to go, and what weights they have to carry—but it seems to me that the building of ships for the British Navy has been very much a matter of chance. Why has that been so? Because of the system hitherto prevailing that ships have been laid down, and instead of being built as speedily as possible, the time of construction has varied, and in some cases has been as long as seven or eight years. I believe I am correct in saying that, at present, the capabilities of the country are such that the very largest iron-clad could be built within two years, and even in two years there are certain alterations which could not be avoided, on account of the strides now made in mechanical science. But these alterations ought to be allowed for in the Estimates. Instead of that, everything is drawn down to the very finest point, and there is no margin left for any contingency. What is the consequence? Even, according to the statement of the noble Lord, very few of our recently constructed vessels of war are up to the requirements for which they were intended. During the late war scarce large sums of public money were expended, but still the old reckless system prevails. Now-a-days ships are ordered by the half-dozen; but when they are completed, it is found there are great deficiencies in them. If one vessel were to be built at a time as speedily as possible, we should be able to find out exactly what that vessel could do, and what improvements could be made. It must be borne in mind that we have, in this country, great private shipbuilding yards, owned by gentlemen who are very competent to be of great service to the State in giving advice in the designing and the construction of vessels for the Navy. Although we are, after all, greatly indebted to the professional gentlemen connected with the Navy, we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that their profession prompts them to take a somewhat short-sighted view, compels them to run in too narrow a groove. Now, if the Admiralty, when they have once made up their minds as to the class of vessel they think suited for certain services, would consult with the different private builders, I feel sure great improvements could be made in the designs of Her Majesty's ships of war. Having sat in this House for a great many years, I have noticed the repetitions of the same old stories. We have had hon. Members rising, generally from the Conservative Benches, and telling us that a great deal of money has to be spent. Their excuse is that the expenditure is necessary for the defence of the Mercantile Navy of the country. The Mercantile Navy wants defending, but the taxpayers of the country want defending also. The speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Bow (Captain Colomb) made me wonder whether the world was so big that there were so many British interests to defend. According to the hon. and gallant Gentleman's view, it is not £12,000,000 of money that is required to protect our interests in the different parts of the world, but I should imagine it must be something like £100,000,000 of the money of the British taxpayers. ["No!"] I think I am correct in saying that, if all the requirements of the hon. and gallant Gentleman were complied with, that not much short of an expenditure of £100,000,000 would be requisite annually. But I rose more especially to call attention to the peculiar agreement which has been made by the Admiralty, sanctioned by the Treasury, for what is called the subvention of merchant steamers for State purposes. Looking through the noble Lord's Memorandum,

I find that the excuse for that subvention is, that £600,000 of the British taxpayers' money was wasted during the late war scare in hiring fast merchant vessels. I have not the slightest doubt that every penny of that £600,000 was wasted. I have not the slightest doubt that every penny that is going to be spent on this subvention of merchant steamers for State purposes will be also wasted. Although I do not like to bring, what may appear, mere Party politics before the Committee, there have been some whisperings that, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) stood as a candidate for the representation of one of the Divisions of Liverpool, a feeling prevailed in Liverpool that the people there had been badly treated by the present Government in the taking of the mails away from Liverpool and giving them to the North German Lloyd steamers sailing from Southampton. That may or may not have been the fact; but, any way, we do know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not returned for Liverpool. Well, now, shortly afterwards we find that this agreement has been made with the White Star Company and the Cunard Company, by which a certain price has been fixed for the hire of certain of their vessels. Knowing what I do of merchant steamers, I am prepared to say that the price fixed for the White Star steamers—which are not modern steamers, which have an old class of engines, and which, in other ways, are not suited for the purpose intended—is utterly unreasonable and extravagant. The price fixed for the Britannia, for instance, is £130,000. If the vessel were put in the market it is very likely it would be impossible to get half that sum for it. A new vessel of the same class with modern machinery, could be built for a considerably less sum than the price named for the Britannia. But in addition to the price of £130,000 fixed, if the vessel is taken by the Government, 10 per cent is to be added to that price, which makes another £13,000; so you give £143,000 for a merchant steamer which is supposed to be of some service to the country as a fast cruiser, but which, I fear, will not be found to be the case. Now, let us consider what is the arrangement with the Cunard Company. The vessels of this Company to be taken are these—the Umbria, the Etruria, and the Aurania. The price of the Etruria is fixed at £310,000. I am not prepared to make the statement as a fact, but I am under the impression, having made some engines, that a new vessel of the Etruria class, also with modern engines, could be built for, from £220,000 to £250,000. But in the case of the Etruria you also add 10 per cent, which makes £30,000, or a total of £340,000. In addition to that, you are going to give to the White Star and Cunard boats what a barrister would call a retaining fee of 15s. a-ton, making £5,400 a-year for each ship. What does that mean? It means that to a Company that is running in competition with other Companies, you are giving out of the taxpayers' money a subsidy which places them at an advantage over others who are competing with them in the same trade. Then you fix the hire of these vessels at 20s. a-ton per month. Any shipowner in the country would only be too glad to get 20s. per ton per month for his vessels. The fleet of the Peninsular and Oriental Company is about 200,000 tons; so a retaining fee of 15s. per ton per annum would sum up to £150,000 per annum. During the late scare, when transport vessels were wanted, and when so much money was wasted by the late Government, the hire of merchant steamers was down as low as 10s. and 11s. per ton per month. And when you have got these vessels, when you have spent this money on them, my own opinion is they will be utterly useless as armed cruisers, and that this agreement will result in a gross waste of public money. Another point in this subvention, but to which, perhaps, my remarks do not apply as strongly, is, that when new vessels are built which come up to the Admiralty requirements, they are to come under the terms of the subvention, and they are also to have a retaining fee. I am very doubtful, indeed, as to the wisdom of this arrangement; but, anyhow, the last provision of the subvention I have mentioned is very much better than that by which you take old unsuitable vessels, fix an enormous price upon them, give them a retaining fee, and also fix what is a very large and profitable price upon them for their hire. Those of us who are connected with steam shipping know that, every now and then, the country gets into a state of alarm, merchant steamers are taken up in a somewhat reckless manner, large hire is paid, and in some cases it has been a godsend to Companies to have their vessels taken; in more than one case it has saved the Company from premature bankruptcy. I do not apply this remark to this agreement; but what has happened ought to be a warning to this Government, and to any Government, not to make such a foolish agreement as this—a totally unnecessary agreement—and not to waste money in the way suggested. If the Government of this country think they have £50,000 a-year to spare—although I am now perhaps entering upon a different subject—let them grant that as an annual subsidy to the distress in the Metropolis, and we may excuse them; but as things stand, I unhesitatingly say that this is an agreement that ought not to be ratified by the House of Commons, and if there is an opportunity when the Vote comes forward of pronouncing against it, I shall certainly do so, either in Committee or in the House.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester): I should not have intervened in this discussion to-night had it not been for two Questions asked in the House this afternoon by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Yarmouth (Sir Henry Tyler) and the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Finsbury (Mr. J. Rowlands). These Questions induce me to ask the Committee to allow me to say a few words upon the subject referred to in them. It will be fresh in the recollection of the Committee that a short time ago some rather painful discoveries were made as to the sale of designs of ships of war at Chatham Dockyard; and I am reminded by what has occurred to-day of a Question I put during the last Session of Parliament to the First Lord of the Admiralty. I asked whether it was true, as stated in the American Press, that the United States Government had managed to obtain confidential plans and specifications of some of our ships of war. The noble Lord seemed to think that the Question imputed rather a breach of trust to some of our officials. Well, I happen to have with me the extract from the American Press upon which I based my question—having provided myself with it to-day on seeing in the Paper the Notices of the Questions to which I have alluded.

The Army and Navy Register, of Washington—a journal occupying in America a position similar to our Army and Navy Gazette, says—

“Secretary Whitney”—that is the official at the head of the American Navy—“has determined to include in the list of new cruisers for which proposals are to be invited, the large unarmoured cruiser authorized by the Bill passed two weeks ago to increase the naval establishment, and has directed that for this vessel the plans prepared by Chief Constructor White, of England, for the ship known as No. 27, be used. These plans contemplate a vessel of greater power and speed than any cruiser now afloat—in fact, the very highest-powered vessel of the kind in the world at the time of completion.”

Then follow the details and dimensions of the ship, with which I will not trouble the Committee. I think hon. Gentlemen will agree with me that I had some reason for asking the First Lord of the Admiralty the Question I did—they will agree that I was justified in asking whether the statement contained in this extract was true or false. Since then—only a few days ago—a statement was made in the papers to the effect that these very designs to which that Question referred were parted with by Chief Constructor White, when he was not in the employ of the Admiralty. Mr. White, therefore, is absolved from blame in this matter; but the Committee will remark that in the paragraph I have read, upon which I founded my Question, there was no indication of that kind. I am reminded of the observations of the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) the other night, who mentioned what struck me as a strange piece of information—namely, that Mr. White, whilst Chief Constructor at the Admiralty, was allowed to do work—of course including the execution of designs—for the firm of Armstrong and Company, of Elswick.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: As I have several times before stated, Mr. White was in the Admiralty, and he left it when he became head of the ship-building yard of Messrs. Armstrong and Company. When the Chief Constructor of the Admiralty, Sir Nathaniel Barnaby, retired, I offered the appointment to Mr. White; but the greatest difficulty in the matter was the desire of Messrs. Armstrong and Company to retain him in their service. The only condition Messrs. Armstrong and Company made on parting with him, was that they might be allowed to consult him in certain contingencies with regard to uncompleted contracts.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT: I simply mention what the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff said, and I hope the Committee will understand that, not for one moment, do I impute blame to Mr. White. Passing that matter by, I should like to direct the attention of hon. Members to a curious publication which appeared in America not long ago, issued for private circulation by the Naval Constructor of the United States Navy. It appears from that publication that two years ago the United States Naval Constructor was requested and required by the Secretary to the United States Navy to go over to England with the view of learning all he could as to our “improvements in naval architecture, and especially with regard to the steel ships of war.” In the preface to this book are set forth the communications made by the then Secretary of the United States Navy to this Naval Constructor, Mr. Philip Hitchborn. This gentleman was informed that the Bureau of Construction would defray all his expenses; that he was to keep vouchers of those expenses; but that when vouchers were not given, he was to keep the best record he could. Mr. Hitchborn came over to England, and visited Pembroke Dockyard first, where he met with some success. While there he obtained, in some way or other, detailed information from specifications of the size and form of the composite barbette ships Anson and Howe, and a photograph of the double bottom of the Howe. He was also supplied somehow with extracts of specifications of the Forth and the Thames, which were being constructed there at the same time. That was all the information he could obtain at Pembroke. At Devonport Dockyard his efforts were crowned with greater success; for he obtained geographical and descriptive estate plans of that Dockyard, and of the Keyham Steam-Yard or machine factory. These plans were much fuller than could have been obtained from the Ordnance Survey or any published plan. They are strictly Admiralty confidential information, and the question is how could Mr. Hitchborn have obtained them? He could not have obtained a staff of surveyors and naval architects to measure up and plot off these extensive establishments, because the proceeding would have had to be done in the open, and it would have been detected and stopped at once. He could not have obtained his information by a bird's-eye view, as the plans are geographically and mathematically exact in their details. Somehow or other he got hold of detailed information. He also procured information from specifications of the Mariner, Racer, and Icarus, sloops of 970 tons displacement; particulars of the Royalist and Amphion, sister ships; and some particulars of the Tamar, troopship, which had put in at that time for repairs. At Portsmouth Dockyard, Mr. Hitchborn obtained specifications and particulars of the following ships:—Collingwood, Colossus, Camperdown, Impérieux, Hecle, and Polyphemus; a set of detailed working drawings of the Calliope; the detailed construction of the 'midship section of the Mercy, and a plan of the fighting-deck of the Mercy, with its general arrangement of machine-guns, etc. Then he went on to Chatham, where he obtained specifications, etc., of the fast cruisers Svern, Arcthusa, Leander, Phaeton, etc.; worded particulars of structural details of the Rodney and Hero; copies of the confidential detailed plans of the 'midship section of the Rodney; and particulars of the composite construction of the Caroline. I have now in my possession fac-similes of the drawings Mr. Hitchborn obtained, and I should be glad to show them to any hon. Member who may desire to see them. The question is, were these plans and specifications confidential, or were they not? If they were, how did this gentleman manage to get hold of them; and if they were not, there is no need to make any fuss about the disclosure of naval secrets, and no need to talk about the desirability of meting out punishment to anyone? I say, if these plans and specifications were confidential how did Mr. Hitchborn get possessed of them? The Dockyard officials would never have given them to him, nor would the Admiralty officials—it seems to me preposterous to imagine such a thing for a moment. The only inference we can draw is that these plans and designs and specifications were obtained from Pembroke, Devonport, Plymouth, Portsmouth and Chatham in the same way that they were obtained from Chatham the other day. I asked the Government a few days ago whether the man Terry

who had been detected selling these designs at Chatham had ever been employed as naval draughtsman in any other Dockyard except that of Chatham; for if he had been at Pembroke, Devonport, Plymouth and Portsmouth, Mr. Hitchborn's possession of these plans and specifications might have been accounted for; but it seems that before his employment in Chatham Dockyard he was nothing but assistant overseer at some works in Sheffield. The conclusion we must come to, therefore, is that there were some other Young Terrys lying around at the other Dockyards, ready for some miserable gain to sell the secrets of their country. What Powers have been supplied with these plans? What other country, besides America, is in possession of this detailed information concerning the characteristics of our ships and the formation of our Dockyards. It is possible that some other Powers may have them. It is true that at the present moment we are at peace; but we never know now-a-days when we may have to expect war—we never know how soon or how far friendly relations existing between us and other nations may be broken. I hope hon. Members will bear this in mind, that though we may not suffer in time of peace through a foreign Power possessing the plans and designs of our ships, in time of war these very designs will be used against us to our detriment. It seems to me that it is nothing short of high treason, in time either of war or peace, for anyone to sell to a foreign Government any description of Her Majesty's ships. I do not know how hon. Members take it; but it does seem to me that designs and specifications relating to our vessels of war should be kept in the strictest manner confidential, all knowledge of them being confined to this country, seeing the enormous amount our taxpayers have to pay in respect of them. No considerations of courtesy or etiquette should permit any English official to make known to the Representative of any foreign Power such information as this; and I do hope and trust that if these designs are held by the Admiralty to be confidential—and I assume they are so held as we are told—although we are told that foreign attachés are allowed to look at them and examine them, but not to take them away—the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty will not content himself with issuing the new rules to which he has referred, and with putting up proclamations in the Dockyards—on the principle, I am very much afraid, of locking the stable door after the horse is stolen—but that if the existing law is not strong enough to punish these offences I have referred to, he will use his influence to get it amended speedily, so that it will be possible to visit with the very severest penalties, such as imprisonment with hard labour, those who recklessly and wilfully sell the designs of Her Majesty's Navy to foreign Powers, thereby imperilling the safety of the country.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR (Kincardine): I desire to give credit to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty for the improvements which he has effected in the form in which the Navy Estimates have been laid before the House. I had an idea that the Army Estimates were better arranged than those for the Navy; but I see that a great improvement has taken place in regard to the Appendices of the latter, and I trust that any defect which still may be found to exist with regard to them will be remedied by the noble Lord. In regard to the naval guns, about which I spoke last week, I had not seen the details set forth in the Appendix, but I think there are still some defects in the information which should be remedied. When we had nothing but wooden ships, we had an accurate list not only of the number of the vessels, but of the armaments of those vessels. We had an establishment of four fleets each of 30 line-of-battle ships, making 120 line-of-battle ships, armed with 17,500 guns. Since, however, the old establishment was broken up, we have always been at a loss as to what the exact armament of the new Navy should be. Until we have an accurate system established, it will be impossible to found any conclusion upon the cost and the number of guns. At one time the establishment of guns seem to be 3,000 breech-loaders; but at another time we are led to understand that it is 3,600, and in the present Memorandum and Appendix there is not a single word of information on the point of the guns forming the armament of the Fleet now maintained. In connection with the list of ships which go to make up the £32,000,000 of capital that is expended on the present Navy, there is no mention of any kind of armament put in the ships. In regard, however, to the vessels now building in the Government Dockyards, and building by contract, there is a careful statement made as to the cost of armament, but no statement as to the calibre of the guns that are required. When I mention that the amount in the Army Estimates to be taken for the guns, &c., of the ships building is £1,062,200, it will be seen that the amount for guns is not alone sufficient, but also we need the calibres and numbers.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (MR. FORWOOD) (Lancashire, Ormskirk): The armaments are set out in the Appendix. Under the name of each ship the armaments are carefully given.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR: The armaments specified of which I have a Memorandum are armaments for the general fitting out of the ships for service this year. But I will not fail to study the Table more carefully. As I understand the correction of the Secretary, the armaments given in the Appendix are for ships now building in Her Majesty's Dockyards and by contract. I fail, however, to see that the number and calibre of the guns composing the armament of Her Majesty's existing Navy are given. In connection with the one set of vessels fitting out, we have it set out that there are 308 guns, which is a very small number, indeed, compared with the total armament of the Navy. These are intended for the 15 vessels fitting out for actual service this year. It would be as well if we could have two complete lists prepared, showing the number and calibre of guns for the ships completed, and the number of guns for those building and fitting out and in service. I understand that in the case of these 308 guns, which are intended as the armament for the 15 vessels fitting out, there are no less than 15 different calibres. That is a great evil. Stores and projectiles are multiplied, and expense incurred for such varieties of guns. Great confusion also arises in consequence of describing some guns by the weight of the shot they throw, and calling others 10-inch guns and 18-ton guns, and 12-inch and 55-ton guns. These distinctions are confusing; and I feel convinced that if something is not done to rectify that evil, Her Majesty's Government will find some day that a great mistake will occur, which will be attended with disastrous consequences, in giving out guns, projectiles, and stores to the different ships. The matter is one of great importance, and I feel sure that hon. Members connected with the Naval Service will appreciate what I say. There is another point connected with the Admiralty to which I wish to draw attention, and that is the question of taking stores from the War Department. I cannot protest too strongly against this system of allowing the Navy to be supplied in these matters by the War Office; and I think the Secretary to the Admiralty would effect a great good by taking over stores from the manufacturers at first hand. It is not necessary to have these stores in the War Office magazines. Each vessel afloat or in the Reserve has its own complement of guns, stores, and ammunition, and might as well be at once handed over to the Admiralty. So also the 308 guns that I have referred to might be at once provided for in the Navy Estimates, and handed over to the Naval Authorities. Nothing but confusion will take place unless this is done. I further reiterate my advice that the Admiralty have in their gunners, boat-swains, carpenters, and other ranks, men well fitted to act as storekeepers.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): The naval experts who have taken part in this debate have expressed the opinion that we do not spend sufficient money on the Navy, and that a great deal more money ought to be devoted to this purpose every year. But I, on the other hand, think that the outside public are convinced that quite enough money is spent on the Navy, if it were wisely spent; and, in arriving at that conclusion, I have been very much influenced by the tone and tenour of the remarks of those who are best acquainted with the real condition of the Navy—especially the remarks of such Gentlemen as the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed). Now, Sir, in the Statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty which has been laid before the Committee, the expenditure for the year ending 31st March, 1888, is estimated at about £12,500,000, and we are bidden to expect a reduction of £793,000 on the Estimates of the present year. It must be quite evident that this is a case of reckoning our chickens before they are hatched. No doubt, the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty expects to see his Estimates come out as they appear now on paper; but no Estimates ever come out at the end of the financial year as they have been originally placed before the country. What usually happens is that, towards the end of the financial year, it is found necessary to introduce Supplementary Estimates. This year, as the Committee is aware, they amounted for the Navy to £277,000; and the Estimates, about which such a great flourish was made 12 months ago, turn out to have been based on the fiscal principle of Mr. Micawber. I have very little doubt that the Estimates of the present year are destined to meet with a similar fate, and that we, none of us, shall know, until the end of March next, what the expenditure has been. In all probability, there will be a bundle of more or less important accounts tacked on to the Estimates before us this time next year. Last year, the late Secretary to the Admiralty explained to us that from 1874 to 1880, under a Conservative Administration, the expenditure upon the Navy averaged £11,133,000, and that from 1880 to 1886, under a Liberal Administration, the annual expenditure was £11,500,000. This amount has now been brought up to close upon £12,500,000; and I think the general tone of the Naval Members of the House is that £12,500,000 is not nearly sufficient to keep up an efficient Navy. I am myself satisfied, however, that the great body of the taxpayers think that it is a great deal too much to pay for such a Navy as we have, especially in times of depressed trade. When we consider that this amount is £4,500,000 more than the cost of both Army and Navy during the time of the Crimean War, I think that the conclusion at which the outside public have arrived is fully justified. It is, of course, easy to understand that there should be a considerable increase in the cost of the Army and Navy since the time of the Crimean War; but is it not a fact that it is chiefly the wastefulness which has increased? If it is not so, how is it that we have heard from the hon. Member for Cardiff that £1,500,000 has been as much wasted as if it had been thrown into the sea? And how is it, again, that we have heard from the First Lord of the Admiralty himself, of vessels the armour of which is below the water line? If this sort of mismanagement were stopped, and if the money were spent in a legitimate manner, and not upon fat contracts which do not benefit the nation—which benefit nobody but the favoured contractors—there could be no sort of question that the burdens which now press so severely upon taxpayers might be materially lightened, and we should have a far more efficient Fleet. We have been told, and, no doubt, with truth, that it is the practice—not a mere accidental occurrence—to build vessels on the Clyde, and to send them to Devonport to be pulled to pieces again, before they have done any work, or seen any service at all. The last Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General abounds in statements which show that the money of the taxpayers is not devoted to its legitimate use. Will any naval expert in the House explain to the Committee, and to the country, how it is that while the prices of labour have decreased considerably in every private shipbuilding yard, they have increased—indeed, more than doubled—in Her Majesty's Dockyards? The Admiralty itself pays far less for some of its materials than it did—as, for instance, iron plates which, in 1874, cost £19 per ton, in 1883 were £18 per ton. Lead and copper, in the same way, have decreased materially in price; but has there been any proportionate decrease in expenditure? Nothing of the kind. The expenditure continually advances, and the result is a continual disappointment to those who are expecting real and practical reforms to be set on foot at the Admiralty. I defy anyone to sit here as a mere outsider, knowing nothing whatever about naval matters, and listening to the statements that are made by those who do know about them, and not feel satisfied that the money wrung from the public by all sorts of objectionable taxes, such as the Income Tax, is neither rightly nor usefully spent. If they want to get some idea where the money goes, I would earnestly advise the Members who have not yet read them, and people out-of-doors, to get hold of the Reports of the Comptroller and Auditor General. I do not say that these documents are as interesting as the last new novel; but they are full of information which will show the taxpayers of the country that their money is being wickedly and wantonly thrown away. The Comptroller and Auditor General tells us, for instance, that advances are continually being made to contractors to which they are not entitled; and he says that the view entertained throughout the Dockyards is that because money has been voted by Parliament, therefore it must be spent, if possible, within the financial year. Well, with such an opinion as that prevailing in the Dockyards, of course, there would be no difficulty in spending twice or three times the amount of money voted. Therefore, it is no wonder that naval experts should come down here and tell us that our armoured ships are generally armoured below the water line, and that most of our iron-clads are only fit to be the coffins of those who man them. The Committee appointed to inquire into the matter of contracts said that there is no business-like co-operation between the heads of Departments, and that £15,000 has been paid to a contractor for work which he actually offered to do for £8,080. Then we are told that the contracts are not scanned closely. A witness, Mr. White, when asked why the contracts are not scanned closely, replies that it is, unfortunately, against the Admiralty traditions—that is to say, that it is against the Admiralty traditions that proper caution should be taken even in the purchase of materials and stores for the use of the Navy and the Service generally. All sorts of idiotic follies are committed daily in the management of the Navy. According to the Report on Contracts, sugar and Jamaica rum are sent out to vessels on the West India stations. Flour is actually sent from Deptford Dockyard to Hong Kong, and rice to India; and the only thing requisite to complete the operation is that vessels on foreign stations should occasionally send back coals to Newcastle. This last suggestion would not involve a more absurd and wicked waste of the public stores or of the public money than to send rice from Deptford to India, and rum to Jamaica. Then, of course, when a Vote of Credit is granted, there is a sort of Saturnalia of extravagance. Ships are taken up, and never used afterwards; cables are purchased, and never taken out of the manufacturers' yards; bills are sent in to the Admiralty for all sorts of useless articles. The Report just issued by the Committee appointed to inquire into the Dockyards reveals endless scandals. It is shown therein that there is no proper examination of goods delivered; consequently, we may safely assume that inferior articles are shot into the Dockyards at Bond Street prices, because contractors, as a rule, do not spare people who do not examine the consignments of goods they receive from them, and do not look into their proceedings. I will read a short passage from this Report. It says—

“We were impressed by the fact that large quantities of tools issued from the Tools Store proved to have been of inferior quality; and although their failure had been frequent, it was left to an Admiralty Officer to bring the matter to notice, merely as the result of a casual visit to the Dockyard.”

Then there are innumerable pensions to all sorts of persons, and extravagant salaries, and a system of occasional reorganization, the result of which is to saddle the country with still more pensions, and to encourage a system under which all sorts of hangers-on, and relations of hangers-on, and men who have been useful to those in Office, or who are likely to be useful to them at election time, receive payment out of the public funds. When complaint is made of this wild and wicked expenditure, the country is told that there is no possibility of saving anything in the Navy. And, when we humble Representatives of the taxpayers desire to express our opinion upon these matters—and I submit that, although we are not experts, we have no difficulty in possessing as much information upon the subjects I have dealt with as those who are experts—we are told that we are not competent to criticize such subjects, and that we ought to sit silent and vote, and so perform our duty to our constituents. Well, I believe that the public have had about enough of that system, and, whether under a Liberal or a Conservative Government, it will not last much longer. I am very sure that in these days, when the industrial classes are finding it more and more difficult to obtain employment, and when trade is depressed at home, and this country is being invaded from all quarters, while our trade is not allowed opportunities of extending itself into foreign countries in the same proportion; you will find that there is an increasing impatience of the heavy load of taxation which Administration after

Administration places on the backs of the people. I believe that the Conservative Party has now got the best opportunity it has ever had, or in all probability is ever likely to have, of putting an end to this monstrous evil. One of the Leaders of that Party has publicly identified himself with the cause of Retrenchment, and has made sacrifices for it which have never been equalled, either in this age or in any other. I believe the public will look to this Party for the realization of the hopes of Retrenchment, of practical reform, and of a mitigation of taxation which have been held out not only by that Leader of whom I spoke, but by many of us in our addresses to our constituents—hopes of reform and of mitigation of that taxation which now weighs upon all classes with a severity which cannot much longer be endured.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I wish to ask the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) one or two questions with reference to his Statement; and, first of all, with regard to the value of the ships in reserve. The Ajax is said to be worth £552,000, and we are told by Lord Brassey in his manual that the difficulty with regard to her is that she will not steer; but if she is such a valuable vessel, it would be well worth while making her efficient. But no mention is made of repairing or doing anything to her to enable her to go to sea, and if she is not fit for sea, she ought not to stand on this list at the value of £552,000. On page 240 it will be seen that she was laid down at the original cost of £548,000, and that there is an additional sum of £3,457 for completion to the 31st of March. The First Lord also mentioned in his Report and in his speech the question of speed, which we all know is one of the greatest necessities at the present day; but he does not account for the building of the vessels mentioned in his Report which are only to go 13½ knots. I refer to the Rattler and Wasp, Class 6 and 7 in number. If this calculation is made on the old system of trial, which the noble Lord himself has properly denounced, it would mean something like 10 knots in actual sea work. The trials of these vessels are spoken of as having been very satisfactory; but at the same time we are told that the protected cruisers and torpedo boats would give nearly double the speed, and consequently they could not escape from our own vessels by any possibility. Of course, it may be said that to obtain greater power the vessels must be larger. I should think that the cost of increased size would be well repaid by the increased speed that would be gained. I should like also to ask if it is the fact that upwards of £30,000 are to be expended in putting the Garnet in order? The original cost of the vessel was £102,288 in 1878-9, and I see that the cost for completion to the 31st of March, 1886, is nearly £19,000. I understand that upwards of £30,000 more is about to be expended for the purpose of putting her to rights. The Garnet belongs to a class of vessels of the Gem type—vessels which never steamed above eight knots in their best days, and which probably will never go at a greater speed than six or seven knots. She is therefore 10 years old, and obsolete, and yet it is proposed to spend upon her now nearly one-third of her original cost. The hon. and gallant Member for Kincardine (Sir George Balfour) appealed to me with reference to the guns of different calibre supplied to Her Majesty's ships. I do not know why the hon. and gallant Member refers to me; but of course I, in common with all practical men, support the view which he takes, that the fewer types of guns—and consequently the fewer different sizes of shot and shell, a vessel has on board—the better. I should think he would know that it is impossible for the Admiralty to take over the supply of guns to the Navy in a very short time, because they have to create a Department for the purpose before they can take the responsibility upon themselves, and they must have time to get their house in order for it. If it is done in too great a hurry it will be done badly. The First Lord has made a remark which strikes me as being very peculiar, and it is, that the £36,000, which the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) spoke of as £12,000, for armour-piercing projectiles, was brought into the Navy Estimates because the War Office would not supply the money. Surely it is an extraordinary thing that the First Lord of the Admiralty should say he wanted certain guns or ammunition for a particular purpose, and that the War Office should be in a position to reply—"You shall not have them," because it practically comes to that—it is a question of cutting down a particular Vote to the smallest amount. I should like to know what the country cares whether this £36,000 comes out of the Admiralty or out of the War Office Estimate! Certainly, it ought to come out of the grant of whichever of the two Offices is responsible for supplying the ammunition. It is right that the First Lord should have included this money in the Naval Estimate, because it was the only way in which he could do that which he believed to be necessary; but it was perfectly wrong that such a necessity should have been laid upon him at all. The First Lord spoke of civil assistants at the Dockyard being conducive to economy and efficiency; and I ask whether it would not be more economical and better for the discipline of the Dockyards that a Superintendent should be appointed for a fixed term of years? Superintendents are now appointed for a year, 18 months, or two years, depending upon their promotion and other contingencies, and by the time they have got to learn what is the work of the Dockyard and become thoroughly acquainted with their duties, they are relieved by another officer, who has again to learn the duties of his position. Then let me mention the sending of ships from one yard to another in an uncompleted state to be completed. I am aware that it may be said that this refers particularly to vessels being sent from the yard in the district which I represent to be completed at another; but my argument will be equally good in the case of a vessel sent from another yard to Pembroke, Portsmouth, or Devonport. It is utterly impossible that a ship can be finished in any other yard as cheaply as she can be where she was laid down. In the first place, the people in the yard to which she is sent have not the same interest in her; on the contrary, their interest would be to run up the expenditure on her to the highest figure. They would take care when they got hold of a vessel like the Nile, for instance, at Portsmouth, that she shall cost as much as the Trafalgar, which was built there, and of necessity much work must be done. Any practical man will admit it is quite impossible that a vessel can be completed as cheaply by another set of people as by those by whom she was originally built. There have been several questions asked with regard to obtaining designs from the Dockyards. I do not know that the noble Lord has informed us yet where the gentleman is who divulged the designs at Chatham, and whether there is any means of preventing him from now divulging all the secret knowledge he possesses to anyone who will buy it? As far as I understand, he is at liberty to do so at any moment he thinks fit. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings), who has just spoken, I think he made a great mistake in drawing an analogy between times of depression and the state of the Navy, and that, if we were to be guided by his suggestion, the very difficulty which he wishes to remove would be augmented. If the money to be spent on the Navy were dependent on whether the country is suffering from depression or otherwise, we should get what the First Lord has said he is most anxious to prevent—namely, fitful, and consequently larger, expenditure. What can the efficiency of the Navy have to do with the question as to whether there is a greater or less amount of depression in the country? The noble Lord has said that we must proceed on some settled plan, and not on the plan of fits and starts such as has been adopted before. The question of the Navy has but one reference to the state of the country, and my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bow (Captain Colomb) has given us to-night a comparative statement, which shows that the amount expended in this country for the protection of its commercial tonnage is ridiculously small to that of every other country. I think the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Devonport was quite right in his statement as to the necessity which exists for having professional men and experts upon Committees such as that which was appointed to consider the system of purchase and contract in the Navy; and I do not think it was worthy of the hon. Member who accused one of those who sat on that Committee of being biassed because a firm with which he was connected had tendered in respect of one of the vessels. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has received such a severe handling from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) that I do not think it necessary further to refer to his speech than to say that the vessels—the building of which he wished to stop last year—the Nile and the Trafalgar, and the designs of which he now considers should have been the subject of inquiry by a Royal Commission, are those which the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) and others qualified to judge have spoken of as the very best that we have yet laid down.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth): With regard to the defence of our coaling stations, I have a few remarks to make. We have in the Royal Marines and Royal Marine Artillery some of the finest men in Her Majesty's Service, and those men are not employed altogether so advantageously as they might be. I have always been of opinion that the defence of the coaling stations ought to be intrusted to these men. This arrangement would leave at the disposal of the Secretary of State for War a number of men of the Regular Army who are now distributed all over the world. The defence of such stations as Hong Kong, Singapore, and Bermuda ought to be in the hands of the Royal Marines and Royal Marine Artillery; and in that way you would save the expense of transporting to those places the land forces who are now discharging the duty there. My hon. and gallant Friend opposite has said very truly that the coaling stations deserve every attention at the hands of the Government. These places are of the utmost importance for the operations of the Navy; and unless they are fortified properly our Fleet will not, in time of war, be able to keep the seas, and therefore I think their garrisons ought to be under the orders of the Admiralty, and not under those of the War Office. There is another matter on which I should like to make a few remarks, and that is the question of submarine mining. I have long been of opinion—and I have had some experience in this matter—that all the work in connection with submarine mining should be done by the Navy, and not by the Army. We require sailors for the guard-boats employed in the Service, but the mines themselves are in the hands of the Engineers. It is said that the Admiralty requires all the men they can lay their hands upon for the sea-going Fleet. I do not demur to that at all; but there are the Royal Naval Volunteers, who might be so organized that the Navy might take charge of this Department. The guns which are required to defend the submarine mines might also be in the hands of the Royal Marine Artillery. There is another point to which I desire to refer. The Staff sergeants of the Royal Marine Artillery are paid less in pensions than the men of corresponding rank in the Army to the extent of 3*d.* a-day. The armourer sergeants also get less than the men in the Line. The alterations I suggest are of a trifling character, and as they are the cause of discontent among a fine body of men, I hope the noble Lord will take the matter into consideration.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (A LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY) (Marylebone, E.): I rise to answer some of the questions which, in the course of this discussion, have been pointedly addressed to me. I may remark, in the first place, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), having begun his observations with the expression of a hope that no Party sentiment would be introduced into the discussion, immediately entered upon subjects of a Party character. I think, however, that in the conversation which he had with my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty he had rather the worst of it. My noble Friend did not intend to say anything of a Party character; his only object was to make to the Committee a clear statement of facts. The right hon. Gentleman first referred to the changes alluded to in that Statement. There are two principal changes connected with the Department. The first of these is the establishment of a regular Intelligence Department, where the Naval Lords meet together, at specified times, to discuss questions relating to the fighting capabilities of the Navy. That has never been the case before, and the reason why the change has been made is this—if you take 20 of the ablest seamen in the Fleet, and separately ask their opinion on this subject, they would all give a different opinion; but if you bring them together you will get a finite opinion from them. That is what has now been done. The other change relates to the building of ships. My noble Friend has explained that we wish to build our ships in a business-like way. The men who fight the ships will be able to give their opinion as to what is required in action, and this will be submitted to the constructors and experts whose business it is to produce the machine which is required for fighting. A ship under the new system will not take six or seven years to build; and there will be no alteration unless with the consent of the whole Board, who will have to sign the Order. There will be none of those alterations after a ship is laid down, in respect to engines and armament which will cause her to draw more water, and, in short, turn out something entirely different from the original design. I cannot understand why my right hon. Friend opposite has so strongly attacked the Nile and the Trafalgar; and I ask him whether the man who has to fight a ship has not a just right to have an opinion about her? There may be different opinions as to some parts of these ships, but as to their good qualities I do not believe that any seamen differ as to their excellence as fighting ships. I believe them to be good ships and less likely than others to be damaged in action, and therefore, as I have said, I cannot conceive why my right hon. Friend has taken such a violent dislike to them. My noble Friend has explained that the Impérieuse and Warspite are not what they were intended to be as to draught; but they are valuable ships, and can steam faster than any other of their class in the world. Moreover, they are belted, and are therefore ships of a very formidable type. I deny the argument that has been brought forward by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) with regard to the capsizing of unarmoured ships if a hole is knocked through the unarmoured ends. There has been an experiment made in the case of the Hero, which with 700 tons of water in her fore compartment steamed 18 knots without the slightest awkwardness. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bow (Captain Colomb) made some interesting remarks, and with much of what he said I entirely agree. But I cannot quite see the object of his first proposal. He rather found fault with the Marines being made butchers and bakers on board ship. I have always endeavoured to have every man on board made useful. The number of non-combatants carried has always been a great danger in our Fleet. For instance, in ships of the Invincible class, we have as many as 65 per cent of non-combatants; while in the French Navy the number of non-combatants is only 5 per cent. I should like to see Marines more largely employed on board ship, because there is no better man than a Marine, and if you can make him a double-handed man, so to speak, you have the best possible man in him on board ship. Therefore, I do not quite agree with my hon. and gallant Friend on that point. Then we come to the defence of the coaling stations. I have always had a certain idea on that point; but I do not see that it is quite practical at present. I have always held that the Marine Corps should be doubled or trebled, and that it should be largely employed at all the outlying stations—at Malta, Gibraltar, Hong Kong, and Singapore, for instance. We should always have in that case fighting men there, accustomed to go in ships, accustomed, in fact, to do anything, and by their employment the expense to the taxpayer would be materially lessened. I do not know that this is exactly the opinion of my noble Friend (Lord George Hamilton) upon the point; however, he does not object to my saying what I think on these matters. Reference has been made to the Intelligence Department. Now, the duty of the Intelligence Department is to find out everything that is necessary for the use of the Fleet in time of war; to examine the plan of campaign. [Laughter.] Oh! a different plan of campaign to the one of which we have heard so much lately; it is a more decided plan, but still a plan of campaign. The Committee of the Intelligence Department has to see to the plan of campaign, and to see that all the trade routes in the world are guarded. In other words, it has to acquire all the information that is necessary that our Fleet in time of war should be possessed of. My noble Friend has recognized the necessity of this, and we have, at this moment, an Intelligence Department working diligently, and acquiring an enormous mass of information that has not been obtained hitherto. I do not blame anybody for that; up to this the Intelligence Department has not been developed on account of—well, I really do not know why the matter has not been taken up before this. We are asked what the present Board of Admiralty have done. Now, I think that our work is very clearly set out in the non-Party Statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty. We acknowledge that things are very bad, and we hope to make them better, and we point out what we have done in this direction. There was a great and wasteful expenditure in the ships in commission going into the Dockyards with large repairs. The present Board have stopped that; they say that ships are supplied with artificers, and they must do their own repairs. That is a very important matter. Then there is the immense question of Dockyard reorganization. My noble Friend has already referred to that, and my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood) will, no doubt, enlarge upon it in due course, he having had a great deal to do with the reform. Then there is the shipbuilding circular, which will save the country an enormous sum of money. Then there is the Intelligence Department; there is no use in having ships and men unless you have somebody to tell them what to do when war is declared. The hon. Gentleman, the Member for one of the Divisions of Hull (Mr. Wilson) made some remarks about what are called armed cruisers. I think the name is rather confusing; the name should be armed auxiliaries, or, better still, runners. England will suffer most in the first three weeks after war is declared; in other words, she will suffer in her food supply, and in a tax upon her enormous floating wealth. Our merchantmen will be attacked, and some of them destroyed, and then up will go the rate of insurance. Not only so, but merchants who have ships in port will not send them out; that is another difficulty which has to be thought out by the Intelligence Department. The principal use of these runners will be to go out as soon as war is declared, or directly you think war is inevitable, to one or other focus of our trade in different parts of the world.

MR. C. H. WILSON: How many days' coal will they carry?

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: At what speed?

MR. C. H. WILSON: At 18 knots, which is considered necessary.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: That is a curious question. It depends where the ship is sent to, and the hon. Member will fully realize that fact. Take the Etruria, for instance, she will go much more quickly than the enemy; and she may go to India or to China.

MR. C. H. WILSON: She cannot go to China—she only carries 10 days' coals.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: It depends upon the speed she goes. I believe that at full speed the Etruria carries 10 days' coals; but at a low rate of speed she is able to carry 25 days' coals. I think that explains matters. What we have got to fear is that some intelligent and energetic foreigner will take a small ship, and, getting on a focus of our trade, say, 24 hours before we get there, will possibly sink 20 or more of our ships. These runners are to prevent any accident of this kind occurring to our great commercial interests and floating wealth, when war is first declared. Then they would have to attend the Fleet; they would be like cavalry to an army; they would let the Admiral know what he was to expect, and where the enemy was, and they would be used for a thousand other things that our ordinary men-of-war would not be useful for. They are merely armed to protect themselves against vessels that they would meet of their own class, who would prey on our commerce for the first three weeks after war was declared. I am quite sure this great commercial country will recognize that the employment of these fast vessels is a first step in the right direction. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings) made a very sad speech. According to him, everything is wrong. Where there is a great deal said of a thing it must be more or less true; but, after all, is it a right thing to sit down and cry because things are wrong? We are all doing our best to put them right. The hon. Member said that the only effect of the re-organization scheme had been to give pensions, and thus to increase the call upon the taxpayers. Now, the statement of my noble Friend is, in my opinion, an honest one. What the present Board of Admiralty wish to do is to put the Navy in the best state they can, and the only fault found in the noble Lord's Statement is that there is an inclination to show that we do not want quite as much money as before. I hope the hon. Member for Stockport will not this time next year be in a position to take any or quite so sad, gloomy, and funereal glance at affairs. The hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Pembroke (Admiral Mayne) spoke of the Ajax and Agamemnon. It has never been considered that they are handy ships; but the run of these ships has now been filled in, and they may be taken as fairly good vessels; we must take things as they are, and not as they ought to be, and do the best we can with what we have got, always being careful to profit by experience. Reference has been made to the Rattler class of ships. A great many of my friends have said to me—"You had better resign, because the Admiralty are going to build these 'snails' as they are called." Now we have had much discussion in regard to this matter. The hon. and gallant Admiral is quite right when he says their speed is not great; but the conclusion we came to, after thoroughly threshing out the subject, was that if these vessels were required to carry their present tonnage and armament, it was impossible to get more speed out of them; besides it must be remembered that these vessels are peculiarly fitted for the stations to which they are sent. Upon the China, West African, and Pacific Stations, steel-bottomed ships are of no use, you must have copper-bottomed ships there, and as far as the fighting capabilities of these ships goes—they are only 660 tons—there is no doubt they are better than any other gun-vessel or small ship that they are likely to meet. We came unanimously to the conclusion that it was impossible to have heavy vessels of this description that would go fast. It must also be remembered that we are not building many of them. My right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) wanted to know why I had not put my name to the Estimates. Well, it is a very natural inquiry for anybody to make, but I think the Committee will agree with me that it is a great mistake for anyone to put his name to a public document that he has not looked at. What is this document? It is a document which relates to the spending of £13,000,000 sterling of the taxpayers' money. My noble Friend quite agrees with me that I had not had time to look through the Estimates.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: What I asked was, how it was, under the new Regulation, the Estimates were submitted to the noble Lord at the last moment, when he had not time to look into them?

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: The Estimates were submitted to me at the last moment; but I do not blame anyone for that. The real question raised by the right hon. Gentleman is, whether I agree with the policy contained in the Estimates. I agree entirely with that Estimate; if I did not agree with it do you suppose I would remain at the Admiralty ten minutes longer; but that is a different thing to putting my name to the Estimates. What I represented to my noble Friend was that I would put my name to those Estimates I was responsible for. It has hitherto been the custom for all the Members of the Board of Admiralty to put their name to the Estimates; but I do not approve of that system. And I have no doubt my noble Friend will see his way to alter the system. When a taxpayer and the House take up the Estimates, and they see the name of every Lord of the Admiralty at the bottom of it, they naturally conclude that the whole of the Lords of the Admiralty are responsible for the whole lot of the Estimates. Now, I object to be responsible for any Estimates for which I am not responsible; I have no objection to put my name to the Votes under my own charge; but I object to the system which requires me to put my name to the whole of the Estimates, when I have not had an opportunity of examining them.

SIR JOHN COMMEREILL (Southampton): There is one point which has been omitted by the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) in his able speech, and that is the state of the lieutenants' list. We have now hundreds of lieutenants, the larger proportion of whom have little or no chance of promotion. But, bad as this is for the lieutenants, it will be worse for the Navy in time of war. We have now 662 lieutenants on service in various ships, 38 in the Coastguard, and 81 unemployed. Out of this 38 and 81, I have no hesitation in saying that half of them could hardly be expected in time of war to go on active service. If war broke out to-morrow, and we had to commission all the various ships that we have ready, we should be hardly pressed for lieutenants; and I wish the First Lord of the Admiralty would intimate how, in the case of war, he intends to deal with the lieutenants' list. Then there is another hardship under which the lieutenants of the Navy suffer, and which I desire to bring before the Committee. A boy may now be entered in the Navy by his parents or guardians at the age of 13, and has no possibility of leaving the Service until he is 40. That is an anomaly and inconsistency. We are every day compelling military men who are in the prime of life, and who have learnt their duty, to retire into private life; while in the Navy we keep men from 13 to 40 without allowing them to retire. I should like to mention a particular case to the Committee which will illustrate the hardship which this system inflicts on naval officers. A very eminent officer, who had risen by his ability, put his son into the Navy when 13 years of age. The young man now finds himself, after 17 years' service, fourth lieutenant in one of Her Majesty's ships. At the same age I was a post captain. The young man, however, has no chance of promotion. In fact, his only chance is that of retiring after 10 years' more service on £240 a-year. Well, finding himself almost a pauper, with a wife and children dependent on him, and an income of only £180 a-year, he had an offer of an appointment on shore of £400 a-year, with a prospect of increase to £600 a-year. He asked to be allowed to retire. That request the Admiralty refused. Then he asked to be permitted to resign his commission. That also was refused. Then the young man, unfortunately, did a most unwarrantable thing. He left his ship on foreign service, thus committing an act of insubordination in which I, as an old officer, cannot support him or lend any sanction to. Still, the case is a very hard one, and one that I trust will yet receive the favourable consideration of the Admiralty. But what I complain of especially is that our lieutenants' list is in such a state that men, having been refused retirement, are tempted to commit acts such as this which I have described. I now desire to say something about the

Dockyards and the work done in them. My hon. and gallant Friends the Members for Devonport (Captain Price) and Pembroke (Admiral Mayne), being Dockyard Members, of course raised the old cry "There is nothing like leather." But although the work done in the Dockyards is most excellent, and I should be sorry to see the Dockyards decreased for one moment, still I maintain that there is in these days an actual necessity for vessels to be built by contract in other yards; and as to vessels being built cheaper in Her Majesty's Dockyards than they can be built by contract in the yards of private shipbuilders, I do not believe a word of it. What I particularly wish to urge upon the Admiralty is that private contractors should be employed in time of peace, so that they might have knowledge and experience of our requirements in war time and in a time of emergency. If that is not done, then the contractors will not be able to do what will inevitably be required of them by-and-bye. There are one or two other points to which I should like to make a brief allusion. The Committee knows very well that one of the heaviest items which it has to meet is the cost for repairs. If the details of these charges are examined, the cost, it will be found, is enormous. A vessel which has cost over £40,000 to build has a sum of £40,472 spent upon her for repairs. That expenditure was caused by the removal of the vessel's boilers, and the putting in of new ones. I do not think that in these matters the Admiralty are sufficiently careful. There is nothing so detrimental to a boiler as repairing and patching it here and there. It would be very much better to build a new vessel rather than renew boilers on obsolete vessels. There is another matter in connection with a vessel's boilers to which I think attention should be called, and that is the extreme steam pressure resorted to when a vessel is about to make her trial on the measured mile, or for a longer testing period. Everyone knows that the pressure put upon the boilers on these trials starts the rivets, strains the plates, and weakens their power of resistance, and it has been shown that while these vessels are to be worked up to 10,000 horsepower, a premium is given to raise the power to 12,500. That is not a safe thing to do, and these risks should not be undertaken for the sake of providing a premium for the contractor and a fictitious speed. After these experiments, the vessel in question cannot be worth much, and the Committee may depend upon it that the system of over-testing both guns and boilers is the greatest mistake in the world.

MR. T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock): I hardly think the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) defended himself very successfully against the complaint made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) with regard to a blot—a small one, no doubt, but still a real one—which seems to exist in his otherwise excellent Statement as to the condition of the Navy. I refer to the comparison which he instituted between the shipbuilding policy of the present Board of Admiralty and the shipbuilding policy of the Board of Admiralty which preceded it. I must say that the comparison he drew was rather unfortunate, because anyone conversant with Admiralty affairs is aware of the fact that if that comparison had been carried some little distance further back it would have been found that the policy of the Conservative Government was of a still more unsatisfactory character. Unquestionably, between 1874 and 1880 the policy of the Conservative Administration was anything but a policy of shipbuilding. It was essentially a repairing policy. Had it not been for the measures taken at the moment when some alarm was felt owing to the danger of a war with Russia, and certain vessels under construction for Foreign Governments were purchased, the shipbuilding transactions of that Administration would have been very small indeed. But, on the other hand, I am not able to give to the Admiralty under Lord Northbrook the credit which has been claimed for it by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) of having had a continuous and constant policy on the question of shipbuilding, because I must say that I believe, with the hon. and gallant Member for Bow (Captain Colomb), that when the First Lord of the Admiralty or his deputy in this House comes down in the month of March and announces one policy, and then in the following November announces a total reversal of that policy, such an Administration is hardly deserving of that confidence which we desire at all times to give to these who are responsible for the Admiralty. And, Sir, if proof were wanted—and it hardly seems to be wanted, for the fact appears to be almost universally admitted—that our Naval Force at that time was by no means what it ought to have been, and that our shipbuilding operations were not by any means what they ought to have been, it will be found in this fact, and in this fact alone—that when the Liberal Government came here in 1884 and asked for a Vote of £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 sterling to supplement the Navy, we had scarcely a fast cruiser in our whole Fleet. Seeing that the greatness, the wealth, and the power of this country depend upon the security of its Commercial Marine, it is hardly necessary to say what straits we were in at that period. But the great question which we have to consider at the present moment is not the precise character of the Statement laid before us by the First Lord of the Admiralty, but it is whether the Naval Force which we now possess, and which we shall possess when those ships at present in construction are completed, is adequate and sufficient. Now, I must say that the Statement put before us by the Admiralty does not afford me much consolation upon that point, and I will say why. I think that the Admiralty, in their anxiety to afford us information, have been running too much into figures and getting away from ideas. They have laid too much stress upon the details of the system which they propose for meeting the waste of the Navy by means of a system of depreciation. There is not, and there cannot be, a “depreciation fund;” but they have told us about the appropriation of a certain amount, which, if it were to be applied according to commercial principles, would represent a fund, year by year, drawn from profits accruing from Admiralty sources. I think, myself, it is much to be regretted that calculations of this kind should be laid before us, because I doubt very much the soundness and reality of such arrangements. In commercial affairs it is undoubtedly the case, in connection with Shipping Companies, that they put aside out of their profits a certain amount for the renewal of their Fleet. That is a sound principle in connection with the Mercantile Marine; but it must be remembered, in the first place, that they make these profits, which is not the case at the Admiralty. Practically, then, the question which the Admiralty has to consider is not whether they can get the Chancellor of the Exchequer to vote £1,500,000 or £1,800,000 in one year for the purposes of the Navy, but they have to consider what is the condition of the Navy at the beginning of the year, and what is its condition at the end of the year. How far are our ships up to the level of the present time, and how far are they able to face the power, in the event of war, of foreign nations? Such a question as that is not a matter of a depreciation of 4 per cent or 5 per cent, but it is a radical question as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the Naval Forces of the country. Therefore, I say it is a mistake to place before us any financial calculations of that kind, which, however interesting they may be to right hon. Gentlemen to examine in their own rooms, are by no means to be depended upon as a guide for the future policy of this country in dealing with questions affecting the Navy. Now, to refer to another point, I may say that I highly approve the earnestness which the present holders of Office at the Admiralty have shown in reforming the procedure existing in that Department. There can be no doubt that there has been great need for reform in several directions, and I am bound to say that the present Conservative Administration and the late Administration have been fortunate in having at the head of the Department not only an able First Lord, but two most able Financial Secretaries, who, from their commercial experience in connection with shipping, have been in a position to lend material assistance to the Government. In reading the Reports which have been laid before us by the First Lord of the Admiralty of the reforming work, it is quite obvious that the reforms there indicated have not been begun a single day too soon. I hold it to be nothing less than a scandal that at this period of the 19th century, and with the knowledge we have of what the construction of war ships should be, that this House should have such revelations made to it with regard to the errors which seem to have been committed with respect to the Navy, and more especially with regard to those belted cruisers—their draught of water, their power of carrying coal, and their power to do that which is the first duty of a cruiser—namely, to cruise. One reads the astounding statement in the Report of the First Lord of the Admiralty that cruisers of 5,000 tons and upwards were only constructed to carry 440 tons of coal. With that quantity of coal on board, these vessels would only be able to have above water 11 inches of their armour-plating of five feet wide; and a still more remarkable statement is that with 900 tons of coal on board, that being the bunker capacity, the whole armour-plating would be six inches below the water mark. When one reads these statements, we are bound to say that it is almost incredible that such occurrences could have taken place under any Admiralty administration whatever. It is obvious that these vessels must be comparative, if not absolute, failures in the very essential duty which they were constructed to perform, which was to remain at sea a sufficient length of time, having in themselves adequate means of protection against an enemy, and being able to carry sufficient coal to enable them to cruise, for the purpose of protecting other vessels. With regard to another matter, I mean the contracts for ships and machinery, I do most sincerely hope that the measures which the Admiralty have adopted, and which they intend to carry into practice, will be successful in providing against such blunders as those to which I have referred and which one reads of in these Reports; but I must say that I think what is required at the Admiralty is not merely what the noble Lord mentioned, and what is referred to in his Memorandum—namely, that papers should be signed by this officer or that, and that they should guarantee by their signature their approval of this measure and that matter. What is required at the Admiralty is that there should be more of the spirit and less of the letter, and that there shall be more efficient means devised by which all these Heads of Departments, Lords of the Admiralty, and Directors of Departments, shall be made to co-operate together, not on paper, but in reality. Now, in regard to which I have referred, I am very much inter-say amazed—in reading the Report of that Committee over which my hon. Friend the Member for Ormskirk (Mr. Forwood) presided in reference to the purchase of stores for the Navy. I refer more particularly to the contract for machinery for the Renown and Sanspareil, which occupied so much of the attention of the Committee. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford has said that Lord Northbrook had taken upon himself the whole responsibility in connection with that contract, and I was glad to hear that that was the case; because, while the Report of the Committee appeared to lay the blame upon this system and upon that individual, and notably upon the constructors and engineers connected with the Admiralty, I considered the whole blame rested immediately, if it rested anywhere, with the Lords of the Admiralty themselves. Therefore, I was glad to hear that Lord Northbrook was willing to take the whole responsibility in connection with that transaction upon himself. Now, in what light did that transaction strike me, as a man who has a good deal to do with matters of a somewhat similar kind? Well, I may say the first light in which it struck me was this—namely, that the firm of engineers who obtained that contract (Messrs. Humphreys and Tennant) knew exactly the length of the Admiralty's foot, and knew exactly how to pitch an offer which would meet with approval at the hands of those who had influence to cause its acceptance to be made. Putting aside this peculiar feature of the case, I am not prepared to say that Lord Northbrook was wrong in accepting that particular proposal, because it is perfectly clear that if one contractor offers to give machinery to effect a speed of something like half a knot more in an iron-clad vessel than was sought for or expected, or if one contractor could give half a knot more than another, I should say the First Lord of the Admiralty might make a great mistake if he did not accept that offer—unless he were justified in refusing it by those who understood affairs of that kind, who gave him advice and showed him that great injustice would, in all probability, be done to other tenderers if he were tendering in a more liberal bona fide manner. I must say that I think that in this particular case very great injustice was done to the firm of which the hon. Member for Jarrow (Sir Charles Palmer) is the head, inasmuch as their tender was some £17,000 or £18,000 lower than that of Messrs. Humphreys and Tennant; and he was not, as he might have been, asked whether he could not, by some alteration of the pitch of screw, or by other means, develop the same power as the other engineers professed to be able to do. But, Sir, with regard to these reforms, I am not altogether able to adopt the idea which appears to be entertained by the Committee over which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty presided, that the way to prevent mistakes of this kind occurring in future is to entrust the duty of dealing with matters of this kind to one Department of the Admiralty rather than to another. For my own part, I think that the Director of Contracts has quite sufficient to do to attend to everything relating to the Department under his charge, and I am by no means able to endorse the idea that the mere transference of the shipbuilding and engineering contracts to that Department will be any remedy whatever, or any advantage, in Admiralty business. What is required is this—that these different Departments, Naval and Civil—the contractors department and the military department within the Admiralty—should be controlled, I care not by whom, but shall be so controlled, and so made to work together, that errors like those we have heard of to-night cannot possibly occur. I must say, in reference to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for Bow (Captain Colomb), that I shall probably shock him, and some other hon. and gallant Gentlemen, by stating that what I think the Admiralty is most deficient in is continuous civil administration. I do not, in saying that, wish for one moment to deny the necessity of having military and naval men at the head of all proper Departments at the Admiralty. Give them higher rank if you like—[Admiral FIELD: We do not want that.]—call them something better than Lords of the Admiralty if you like—give them higher pay, if you choose—but what you want in order to promote a healthy and efficient state of affairs at the Admiralty is continuous civil administration, which you have not at present. I said I was sure I should shock the feelings of some of my hon. and gallant Friends, and no doubt I have done so; but, at any rate, such is my opinion. These Gentlemen who sit on the Government Bench are, no doubt, able business men, but they have many other duties to discharge besides the duties with which they are entrusted within their Office. They change Office, perhaps, on an average, once in six months. I am not sure whether it will be a full six months before we have a change of Government again. At any rate, these changes recur with remarkable frequency, and yet it is to the fleeting influence of these Gentlemen that we look for a sound financial state of affairs, and a sound financial state of affairs is what we look to as the basis of all efficiency in the Navy or anywhere else. I say that the Admiralty is in that respect singularly and unfortunately deficient. And, after all, what is the Admiralty? It is a great fighting machine. It is impossible to have a better Representative than the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) connected with it as a fighting machine; but it is also a great manufacturing and administrative machine. Do you mean me to tell me that if you had acquired a great administrative machine, such as, for example, the London and North-Western Railway, you would get the management you required for its success without entrusting it to permanent civil financial control? I am aware of the difficulties that there are in connection with this matter, and which probably there always will be in connection with it; but that is the conviction which has pressed upon me, and I say that, until you insure a permanent Civil administration of the Navy, in concert with practical and naval administrations, which is even more important, you will never have that adequate management which is necessary to prevent great mistakes, such as those we have had to deplore. There are only two other things that I will mention in connection with the Statement of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty. The first is one which I am exceedingly glad to see—namely, an observation he made with regard to encouraging officers of the Naval Reserve to join Her Majesty's ships when cruising. I am glad to see that, in order to succeed in that, he has been good enough to arrange that officers of the Naval Reserve, who merely rank as sub-lieutenants, should mess with lieutenants on board ship; and if he had only added to that that he would be prepared to pay these officers, to some extent, for what they may lose by joining Her Majesty's Service for a year or so, I am quite certain—speaking not only for myself, but for many others—that the large Mail Steam Companies with which we are connected would only be too happy to co-operate with the Navy in strengthening and enlarging the body of men to be at the command of the Admiralty in the event of war. The next matter I should like to say a word upon is of a somewhat personal character, and I mention it because I should, perhaps, be misunderstood if I were to pass it over. I refer to one part of the noble Lord's Statement which he speaks of the Cunard steamer Oregon. That vessel is mentioned as the only ship that was armed as a cruiser during the late Russian scare. I beg to say that two steamers belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company were armed, not in Liverpool and not in London, but one was armed at Sydney, and one was armed at China—a very much more important feat than arming a vessel in Liverpool. I beg to say that these ships were practising their officers and men and guns off Hong Kong and Sydney at the time the Oregon was taking on board its armament; and I also beg to say that the crews and officers of these ships—every one of them—volunteered for Her Majesty's Service. In justice to the service that is under the flag of that Company, I think I was entitled to mention these circumstances in correction of, or in amplification of, the remarks in the noble Lord's Statement. Sir, I have only to add that, while I endorse heartily the views which have been expressed so abundantly on this side of the House—views of sympathy and respect for the Statement made by the noble Lord—I do hope and trust that we shall not, in dealing with the Navy in future, rely upon any paper figures or paper depreciation, but that the Admiralty, whether it be Liberal or Conservative, or Liberal Unionist, will take stock of its affairs in quite a different fashion to what it has sometimes done in the past, and will maintain the Navy as the Navy of this country ought to be maintained.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I would ask the permission of the House to interpose for one moment to express a hope, which I think the Committee will not feel to be an unreasonable one, that the observations which may yet have to be made on this Vote will be condensed as much as possible by hon. Gentlemen who may wish to speak. We are now arriving at the time when it is only reasonable that the Vote on Account for Civil Services should be taken in order to enable those hon. Members who wish to express opinions upon the subject of that Vote to make their remarks. The Vote on Account must be taken to-night; therefore, it would only be reasonable to allow some time for its discussion.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I do not intend to occupy much of the time of the Committee, not more than five minutes; but, as I represent a Dockyard constituency, I should like to be allowed to say just half-a-dozen words. The hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. T. Sutherland), who has just sat down, commenced his speech with some comparisons between the naval policies of different Administrations. He did not carry that argument to excess, and I do not intend to find any fault with him about it; but he stated that the Naval policy of the Conservative Government of 1874 was a policy of repairing. I just wish to remind the Committee that the reason of their policy being one of repairing was, as was stated at that time, that there were only 14 iron-clads which were fit for the sea service of the country. That, I think, is a sufficient answer to the statement, or rather the reproach which the hon. Gentleman seemed to cast upon the Conservative Government of having followed a repairing policy during those years. My hon. and gallant Friend who sits in the Gangway below me made some remarks about us Dockyard Members wishing to have more ships built in the Royal Dockyards. Well, I think the hon. and gallant Gentleman rather has us at a disadvantage. If we speak from interested motives, I would remind him, at all events, of this, that those hon. Members who represent Dockyard constitu-tuencies may be counted, if not on the fingers on one hand, at all events on those of two hands. Those who take the opposite view, or what I may term the contract view, are very numerous indeed in this House. There are a large number of shipbuilders in this House, and a larger body of hon. Members who represent constituencies where these "fat contracts," as they have been termed, are given out. And that is not all—when the Government appointed the Committee to inquire into the question, so that the House of Commons might form an opinion as to which is really the most effectual and most economical way of building ships—whether in private yards or in public yards—what was the sort of Committee appointed? We had one appointed in 1882, and on that Committee every Member, with one exception, was the Representative of a constituency in which private shipbuilders had yards, or was himself a shipbuilder. There never was such a Committee appointed. If the Admiralty wanted to get at the rights of these cases, and were to appoint a Committee composed of the Representatives of the Dockyard constituencies, the House would say that it was eminently unfair and absurd. But the late Government went to the other extreme, and appointed a Committee almost, if not entirely, composed of private Dockyard Representatives. The Secretary to the Admiralty himself is closely allied with the shipbuilding interest, and it is impossible that we can arrive at a fair comparison of the cost of ships built in the Royal Dockyards and private yards under the circumstances. I remind the Committee that we are at the present moment building ships costing millions of money at seaport towns which are utterly unprotected, and which in the event of a naval war might be destroyed by the enemy's gunboats in 24 hours. I wish to renew the appeal which I made the other night in favour of granting commissions to our seamen. I rose at a very unfortunate time on that occasion; it was half-past 11, the House was then very thin, and I believe my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty was unprepared with an answer on the subject, because the only answer he made was that there was some difficulty with regard to half-pay. Now there is no such difficulty at all, and I am sure that my noble Friend, if he looked into this matter, must have seen that he had made a mistake. If a warrant officer is given a commission, and he reverts to half-pay, what is that half-pay? Why, there is no fixed figure at all; there is no reason whatever why the same chance which is given to the warrant officer should not be given sometimes to the chief boatswains and chief gunners. I hope the noble Lord will show a little more interest in this subject, and I hope hon. Members will back me up in what I say. First of all the chief gunners and boatswains ask that, when they retire from the Service, they shall be given retiring rank as lieutenants. That will not cost one penny to the taxpayer, and there is no difficulty with regard to it, either social, technical, or professional. They also ask that a certain number of commissions should be given on the active list to warrant officers. There is nothing new in that; they are already entitled to it by the Order in Council, passed in 1856, whereby it was laid down that these commissions should be given from time to time to deserving men. That Order, however, has been made a dead letter from the time it was issued to the present day, and no warrant officer has since then received a commission. Before that time, when I entered the Service, which was in 1855, there were officers in high positions who had risen from before the mast; but there is nothing like that now in the Navy. In the Army there are many officers who have risen from the ranks, but in the Navy it is utterly impossible, owing to the policy of the Admiralty, that any seaman should rise from the ranks to be a commissioned officer. I apologize for having made these few remarks in addition to what I said the other night, and I trust that my noble Friend will be able to give me a more satisfactory answer than he did on that occasion.

MR. B. W. DUFF (Banffshire): I have only a few remarks to make with regard to the observations which have fallen from the hon. Member for Devonport (Captain Price). As pointed out by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty, there are very considerable difficulties in the way of giving commissions to warrant officers. I believe that the Admiralty have been very anxious to do something in this direction; but, as was stated by the First Lord the other night, the chief difficulty in the way is with regard to the warrant officers' education. I do not suppose my hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Price) would say that a warrant officer should receive the rank of lieutenant unless, to a certain extent, he was qualified in this respect and able to navigate a ship. If the warrant officers were able to pass an examination, then, I believe, the main difficulty in the way of this would be removed. I may mention that, from what I saw at the Admiralty, I believe a step has been taken in the right direction. When I went down to the school at Greenwich, I found that they did not teach navigation; I pointed that out, and I believe steps were taken, and it was arranged that navigation should, in the future, be taught to the boys attending the school. My opinion is that if these men passed an examination, the Admiralty would be glad to apply to them the same system which obtains in the Army. The noble Lord, in his remarks to-night, referred to something which fell from my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) with regard to Admiralty administration. I do not think it is quite fair to my right hon. Friend to say that he wanted to place the Board of Admiralty on the same footing as the Treasury, and I do not think that this was the intention of my right hon. Friend. Although I do not approve of all that was done, I feel bound to say that the general organization of the Board of Admiralty was very much improved by my right hon. Friend. I think the old system of sitting for five or six hours over any small question that came before them was a very absurd one; but my experience was that the work was very competently done. We had Minutes, and knew everything that was going on in the Department. I do not think it was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to usurp the position of First Lord and take out of his hands the work which properly belonged to him. I am sorry to return to the statement which I made the other day—that the First Lord has introduced some things of a Party character into his Statement. My noble Friend the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) said the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty had rather reversed the argument of my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre); but I think that a reference to the figures will show that that is not the case. We have been told that the Navy was let down very much between 1881 and 1885, and the hon. Member who made this statement describes the policy of Lord Northbrook as one of dawdle. If that is so, then the policy which preceded it was one of stagnation. The hon. Gentleman gives us credit for spending £1,800,000 on shipbuilding; but if I take the figures for the last three years of the Beaconsfield Government which preceded Lord Northbrook's, I find only £1,500,000, £1,388,000, and £1,426,000 expended under the Shipbuilding Vote. If the whole Vote 6 and 10 and gun mountings are taken, it will be found that the average expenditure of Lord Northbrook's Board from 1881 to 1884 was £448,000 in excess of that of the previous Government. Therefore, I think that when the First Lord began his period of comparison with 1881, it is difficult to believe that the noble Lord is not giving a Party complexion to this matter. Reference has been made to the calculation as to depreciation which has been arrived at by the First Lord, and also by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty. They do not quite coincide; I do not, however, want to lay great stress upon that point. But I myself made a calculation on a somewhat different basis from that of the noble Lord and the Secretary to the Admiralty. I take the calculation on the number of vessels condemned between this time and last year; what the cost was originally; and what was the cost of repairs. I remember that the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone requested us to get rid of and blow up a great number of ships. I find that the cost to the country through depreciation during the year of the vessels actually condemned was £1,863,000. But if we take the vessels which my noble Friend wanted to get rid of, the depreciation would amount to £2,100,000.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD: What I wanted was to get rid of the vessels which came home from abroad—that is to say, that they should not be repaired when they came home. There are at this moment 32 ships at ports on foreign stations which are unfit for repair.

MR. R. W. DUFF: I give the noble Lord credit for that; but I am going to speak of eight composite vessels included in the list of the noble Lord. It is certainly very unsatisfactory that vessels which were only built in 1880 and 1881, and which have been only three years at sea, should now be condemned; and if these Navy Estimates are referred to a Committee of this House, I trust there will be a searching investigation into the character of these vessels, and how it comes that vessels only eight years old, and only three years at sea, are now condemned. There is one point which I do not think has been referred to, but which the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty refers to in his Statement. It is with regard to our vessels on foreign stations. I gather from his Memorandum that we are going to adopt a new policy—that we are not going to have such a large squadron on foreign stations. I suppose this decision was arrived at after consultation with the Colonial and Foreign Offices, because there was a Committee representing the Foreign and Colonial Offices, and they came to the conclusion that we wanted 83 vessels and 15 gunboats on foreign stations, and last year we had 99. I have no doubt many of these vessels were of very little use indeed; anyone who has spent any time on a foreign station, as I have done, knows that to foreign stations we send the most disgraceful old tubs that ever carried a flag; and even third-rate Powers, such as South American Republics, have more powerful men-of-war than we possess in those waters. I am glad to think this system is to be stopped; it is better to have fewer ships, and have them efficient, than to have many inefficient ones. The policy which puts an end to the present system I shall be very glad to support. Some remarks were made by the hon. Member for West Hull (Mr. O. H. Wilson) in regard to the employment of auxiliary vessels; I quite approve of the general policy of the Admiralty in taking up these Cunard and other vessels. My noble Friend the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) explained very properly the use of these vessels, and, therefore, I shall not detain the Committee longer on this point. I do not profess to have sufficient knowledge to express any opinion as to whether the Admiralty have made a good or a bad bargain on the terms in which these vessels are engaged; that is a point upon which the hon. Member for West Hull and the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. T. Sutherland) are better able to give an opinion than I am; but the policy of securing the fastest vessels we can get, and having such vessels ready at a moment's notice, is, I believe, an economical one, and a sound one so far as the country is concerned. Now, my noble Friend the Member for East Marylebone referred to the Intelligence Department. I think that the present Board of Admiralty are quite right in increasing that Department, and I give my noble Friend every credit for having developed the Department. But in that celebrated Memorandum which found its way into The Pall Mall Gazette I think the noble Lord went a little too far when he said that we really had no provision for war at the Admiralty, or words to that effect. That is rather strong language to use, and I am sure he will not endeavour to maintain it when he considers that it really amounts to a reflection upon the noble Lord sitting beside him (Lord George Hamilton), who has, previously to the present, occupied the position of First Lord of the Admiralty. There are at the Admiralty certain private and confidential documents which, if one could refer to them, would clearly show that provision is made for time of war. I cannot give the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone credit altogether for having created the Intelligence Department, because to do that would be to cast a grave reflection not only upon the First Lords, but upon the Naval Lords. When I was at the Admiralty my Colleague (Lord John Hay) took a great deal of trouble to work up the Intelligence Department; and, therefore, that Department is not altogether a new institution. Now, my noble Friend the Member for Marylebone said there was no dock in the Pacific. I see that £55,000 is taken for such a dock at Esquimalt in this year's Estimate, and I believe the dock is complete. The other night I ventured to trouble the House—I am afraid at great length—with the question of education of naval officers. I am not going to refer to that now, except to say that when the First Lord of the Admiralty replied the other night he had to deal with a multiplicity of subjects, and was unable to give as much time as he would have liked to this subject. It is a subject which does occupy a good deal of thought in the Navy. There are a variety of opinions entertained upon it; some take the view I do, and I know many who do not. It is a matter in which the Navy are very much interested; and I had hoped that if the First Lord of the Admiralty did not give his view upon it, his Colleague and my Successor, the hon. Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), might possibly have given his view upon this question. I hope that on some future occasion the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett)—naval education coming, as I believe, in his Department—will be able to enlighten the House upon the subject. I do not think there is any other matter on which I need detain the Committee, and I can only say that I am sorry that the duty of making these few criticisms should have fallen upon me, as the only Representative of the late Board of Admiralty. The criticisms I have addressed to the Committee have been made in no unfriendly spirit, and I shall be very happy to give the Admiralty my cordial support in carrying out this programme.

MR. DELISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): In the last paragraph of his Memorandum, the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) describes the steps he proposes to take for the utilization of the auxiliary resources of the country. With the policy which is involved in the noble Lord's proposal I heartily concur. Upon the question of our defences, perhaps the Committee will allow me to refer to the defence of our coaling stations. Now, in the Memorandum which the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) circulated in relation to the Army Estimates, the right hon. Gentleman remarks that more than one Colony has fulfilled its engagements with regard to defences, and that we are bound in honour to find the necessary funds to enable us to fulfil our part of the engagement. Now what I want to point out is, that it is hopeless to expect our Colonies to enter into engagements with this country, as proposed in the last paragraph of the noble Lord's (Lord George Hamilton) Memorandum, if we are not prepared to fulfil our solemn obligations. The present is a most opportune time to make a few remarks upon this question, because, in the noble Lord's Memorandum, there is no reference made to our coaling stations under the heading of "Utilization of Auxiliary Resources." The most important auxiliary resources which the Navy ought to be able to look to in case of war are the resources which our coaling stations afford. Our coaling stations make good harbours of refuge, but unless they are put in an adequate condition of defence they will be a source of danger to us instead of support. Under the heading "Coaling Stations," the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in his Memorandum, says—

"It is well known to everyone who has looked into the subject that more than one station of primary importance still remains undefended."

This, surely, is a most unhappy condition of affairs. We have involved our Colonies in serious expenditure on the strength of our word, and we are in honour bound to fulfil our part of the contract. I ask what encouragement is there for Australia or any other Colony to fit out a squadron, when they know that, owing to changes of Government and other causes, the word of Parliament is not worth anything? I should like to get from the Government a definite pledge that our obligations towards the Colonies shall be fulfilled. I think I can see a way in which this can be easily done—at least, so far as Singapore is concerned. In page 22 of the noble Lord's Memorandum, it is admitted that our commerce is not protected as adequately as that of other nations, but that by utilizing our merchant vessels we can, in case of war, quickly recruit our strength. Now I have a Question on the Paper to-night as to whether the Government can see their way to give an adequate and localized naval force for the defence of Singapore, as they have no guns to send there? What I want to know is, whether the Government will, in order to fulfil its definite pledge to the Colony of Singapore, obtain at once from one of our Ship-building Companies an armed vessel for the defence of Singapore? It is unnecessary for me to dilate upon the necessity of defending Singapore, especially when we consider the importance of Singapore as a place of defence for our enormous trade. The total value of trade at that port during the year exceeds £200,000,000 sterling; and during the American Civil War, within three days of its being known that the Alabama had rounded the Cape, 17,000 tons of shipping, all American, were seeking refuge in this harbour of refuge. I do, therefore, most earnestly ask the Committee to give these matters their most urgent consideration.

Mr. MASON (Lanark, Mid): I shall not detain the Committee more than a few minutes; but I have an appeal, as a Representative of the taxpayers of the country, to make to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty. I feel it necessary to make a few remarks upon the important Statement submitted to us by the Admiralty on the present occasion. I congratulate the Government upon having supplied the House with such a valuable Statement to take the place of the Statement previously made in the House upon the Navy Estimates. It is a very important matter that we should have such a Statement put before us, enabling us to thoroughly understand the Estimates before we come to vote the money. This Statement contains a capital account, showing what we really possess in the way of value of ships. It is very right and proper that this Capital account should be opened; but it is also very important for us to know upon what principle this Capital account is opened. I am rather disposed to think that this Statement is open to criticism, so far as figures are concerned, and I shall point out one or two things upon which we ought to receive additional information. To begin with—the First Lord of the Admiralty takes credit for reducing the Estimates by £793,300, compared with the expenditure of the preceding year, and he says—

“A reduction of expenditure generally implies a decrease of the effective strength of the service with which it is connected. We are fortunate enough to be able to reverse this rule in the present instance.”

And he adds—

“These satisfactory results have been attained partly by policy, partly by improved methods of administration; but a careful review of the expenditure of the past six years is necessary in order that the significance of our present position, and the causes at work in establishing it, may be understood by Parliament and the country.”

What is that policy, and what are these improved methods of administration? There is not a very full statement made as to what these are; but, on page 5, the statement is volunteered that—

“In 1885, under popular pressure, the Government of that day admitted the insufficiency of its previous arrangements, and, with the assent of all Parties in the State, Lord Northbrook, the then First Lord of the Admiralty, proposed to expend, in addition to the ordinary shipbuilding programme, the sum of £3,100,000 in the building of ships by contract in private yards. An additional sum of £1,600,000 for guns was also proposed to be added to the Ordnance Votes of the Navy, which are included in the annual Estimates of expenditure of the War Office. The Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated that this outlay would be spread over five years, ending March 31, 1890, and form a portion of the expenditure of the country for that period. The work has been executed with such rapidity, that nearly the whole of this expenditure has fallen upon three, instead of five, years.”

That seems to explain pretty much the cause of the decrease of the Estimates this year. It has been provided for by a former Government, and yet the present Government take credit for the reduction of £793,000. It must be remembered, however, that by mixing up Army and Navy Estimates we have the one nearly balancing the other, or, in other words, we have pretty much the same sums to be voted this year that we voted for the Army and Navy last year. I do not think this is a satisfactory state of things to the taxpayer. It is monstrous that we should be called upon to vote these enormous Estimates for the Army and Navy. So much for the Admiralty taking credit for a condition of things which they tell us they have improved. I do not think they have effected the improvement they desire to show. We are told what they are going to do in the way of laying down new ships, and I should like to know whether the First Lord of the Admiralty intends to build these new ships by contract or in the Royal Dockyards? I believe that work can be done by contract cheaper and better than it is done in the Royal Dockyards. [Cries of “No, no!”] I say yes. I am perfectly satisfied that if the First Lord of the Admiralty were to state the result of his experience candidly to-night, he would say that the value which the country has

t from contract work has been infinitely better than their work in the Royal Dockyards. I am sure it would be satisfactory to the country to know that we are going to build some of these 13 ships by contract rather than in the Royal Dockyards. It seems to me that this Statement is not at all satisfactory with regard to what it tells us in regard to the value of the Fleet we have. An Estimate is given us here of the value of the Fleet, and of the estimated annual expenditure necessary for replacement. I confess I have looked into this Estimate; but I am totally at a loss to understand how the depreciation has been calculated. I should be obliged if the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty, or some other Member of the Government, will explain the figures which are given on page 14. The First Lord of the Admiralty makes out an Estimate for the depreciation and replacement of the Navy. For the first class of ships, or for armour-protected and partially-protected iron or steel vessels, he takes 22 years from date of completion, and 4 per cent. It seems to me that 22 years at 4 per cent give only 88 per cent. Then second, or of corvettes, sloops, torpedo-cruisers, gun vessels, gunboats, troopships, and other vessels, he takes 15 years, at 6 per cent, which is 90 per cent. Then, for torpedo-boats, steam launches, &c., he estimates 11 years at 9 per cent—namely, 99 per cent. For the fourth class—small vessels, tugs, and yard-craft—he estimates 18 years and 5 per cent, which gives 90 per cent; and, for the fifth class of vessels, he takes 22 years at 4 per cent—namely, 88 per cent in the whole. I shall be glad if the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty will explain these figures a little more closely, and show how vessels will be replaced at such a depreciation as that now given. Then, with regard to Dockyard administration, which I cannot help thinking is in a most unsatisfactory condition, I take the Statement simply as it stands. He says—

"In the meantime, I have given directions that no vacancies in the Admiralty and Dockyard clerical staffs are to be filled, as there is reason to believe both are redundant."

Why, everyone has been saying that such has been the case for years, and now here we have got a confession of it. I trust a practical effect will be given by the reduction of the redundant members of these staffs, and that the taxpayers of the country will not be called upon to pay for a staff that is not necessary. The taxpayers of the country are at present very heavily taxed. The income of the country is not what it was, and there are a great many hard-working men in this country who find it difficult enough to maintain themselves and families. Now, Sir, there is just one other point I wish to direct attention to, and that is the transference of the supply of naval armaments from the Army to the Navy itself. I do not think that that is a matter which should be so difficult as is indicated in this Memorandum. The noble Lord says—"To place one Government Department towards another in the relation of purchaser and manufacturer is no easy matter." I can see no difficulty in the matter at all. It is a matter of ordinary common-sense business, and I cannot understand why it should not be arranged without the slightest difficulty. At present we have these monstrous Estimates of £31,000,000 sterling for the Army and Navy mixed up in a way that no intelligent man can ascertain how the money is spent. Now, I quite endorse the view of right hon. Gentlemen on the Government Bench in regard to the utilization of the auxiliary resources of the country. I think that is one of the best things this Government has brought before us. The swift steamers which are being built for the Merchant Service of the country will prove a valuable auxiliary, and I do not sympathize with the criticisms passed from this side of the House against the proposal of the Government in this respect. After the experience of the Alabama in connection with the American War, the utilization of the auxiliary resources of the country is a wise step in the right direction; and I believe it will prove a most economical step. Only one other remark in conclusion. I congratulate the Government upon their proposal to appoint a Committee for the examination of the Army and Navy Estimates. I ventured to raise this question of sending the Army and Navy Estimates to a Committee for investigation three days after I entered Parliament, rather more than a year ago. I did not expect that the question would have borne fruit so soon; but I am glad to think that the Government have taken up the idea, and that we are to have such a Committee as I suggested. I believe we shall have some light thrown upon the expenditure by the Committee upon the Army and Navy, and that we shall be able to examine the Estimates with some idea of how the enormous sums of money are really spent, and that we shall be able, by-and-bye, to cut down the Estimates, and really to get value for our money, which I do not believe we at present got. I trust the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty will be able to see his way to give us the explanations I have asked at his hands.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Committee will remember that on the last occasion we discussed these Estimates an understanding was arrived at that, on this Vote, a general discussion should be taken. There is a Vote on Account to be taken to-night, and as we have spent now some six hours in this discussion I think the Committee will allow the Vote to be taken. I understand there are a certain number of Gentlemen who wish to raise a discussion on the Vote on Account; and, therefore, it is quite clear that the longer the discussion on this Vote occupies, the longer the consideration of the Vote on Account will be delayed.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): The noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty will remember that on the last occasion he acceded to my request that I should have some opportunity of bringing certain matters relating to the Navy before the Committee. We have been promised an evening to discuss general matters upon this Vote. Up to this the remarks have been entirely general, and it seems extremely hard that several of us—who have got matters of importance to bring before the Committee—should now be asked to give up the right which we have been accorded by the Government. If I and others waive the right to bring matters relating to the Navy forward this evening, will the noble Lord undertake that we shall have an opportunity of doing so on some future and near occasion?

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I would make the same appeal to the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton). I have a good deal to say on various matters; but, after what has fallen from the First Lord of the Treasury and the First Lord of the Admiralty, I am too loyal a supporter of the Government to obtrude my views on them to-night. But I claim the right to speak on the matters I feel a great interest in on some future occasion. It is a monstrous thing that we should be muzzled—that these important naval matters, which only come under consideration once a year, should be before us without naval men having an opportunity of stating here, on the floor of this House, what our views are. Whilst listening to observations on one side and the other, I have been seriously provoked by some things that have been said, and I wish to have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I should like to know why it is absolutely necessary for us to give a Vote on Account to-night? Right hon. Gentlemen say it is absolutely necessary. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; but why is it absolutely necessary? I can understand that it may be absolutely necessary to obtain the Vote by the 31st March; but this is the 21st. No doubt it is necessary that the first Votes in the Army and Navy Estimates—the Votes for men and money—should be given before the 31st March, so that they may be included in the Appropriation Bill that will be brought in and passed by the end of the financial year; but I ask for information as to whether it is really necessary, and, if so, why, that the Vote on Account for 1887-8 should be included in that Bill? Why it cannot be included in another Bill, brought in at some later period of the Session, I cannot understand; and I therefore hope someone in authority will rise and endeavour to remove our doubts upon this matter.

Mr. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): I desire to add any pressure it may be in my power to exercise on the Government to that of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the House. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Devon a short time ago, stated that the whole of this discussion had taken place between naval Gentlemen and Gentlemen interested in shipbuilding. As I represent a constituency which does not participate in any shipbuilding interest, and as I am not a naval man, I think I have a right to say a word or two on the subject of these Estimates, and have a right to ask the an opportunity shall be afforded me to do so.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The noble Lord tells us that the Committee is anxious to proceed with the Civil Service Estimates. ["No, no!"] Well, that is what I am told. It is said that that is the reason why we are to vote this money for the Navy without adequate discussion. There are a great many Members of the Committee who are anxious to discuss the Navy Estimates. I, myself, ventured a few evenings ago, when the Speaker was in the Chair, to make some observations as to the Navy Estimates; but I am afraid I was not able to impress the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) with that sense of the importance of the matter which weighed on my mind. At any rate, he did not take notice of my observations. Well, I am anxious to know whether the Committee attach any importance to them? I endorse what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the late Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Henry H. Fowler), as to the complete and radical difference that there is between this Vote on Account of the Civil Service Estimates, and the Supplementary Estimates for the Army and Navy Services, which must, of course, be included in the Appropriation Account that deals with the present financial year. But the Estimates we are asked to proceed to do not relate to this financial year at all, but to the financial year upon which we have not yet entered. They may be included in a subsequent Appropriation Bill, and in that way all the requirements of the law may be completely met. These representations of the noble Lord as to the absolute necessity of taking a Vote on Account for the Civil Service Estimates is altogether without real foundation. It is a monstrous thing that having submitted to curtailment of debate on going into Committee on the Navy Estimates, on the complete understanding that we should have an exhaustive discussion of the whole Estimates, on the first Vote taken this night the Government should attempt again to curtail debate in order to proceed to another branch of financial business.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension as to the necessity of taking this Vote on Account to-night. I assure him that it is absolutely necessary, in order to comply with the law, that the Vote on Account of Civil Services Estimates should be taken to-night. ["No, no!"] It must be taken before the commencement of the coming year. It has always been taken with those Votes which are practically Votes on Account for the Army and Navy. The hon. Gentleman is aware that not a single farthing can be issued for the service of the country, unless the money has been provided under a Ways and Means Bill. That Bill will be introduced the moment the Vote is taken, and we have obtained money in Ways and Means for the Army and Navy. No Civil Servants will be able to receive their salaries on 1st April unless they are provided in a Bill, set up as a Ways and Means Bill. I will tell the Committee how this Vote on Account has been taken for the last 7 years. In 1881 it was taken on the 16th March, in 1882 it was taken on the 24th March—[MR. H. H. FOWLER: The 24th? This is only the 21st.] There was some specific reason for the Vote being taken on the 24th March in 1882. I cannot tell precisely what it was. In 1883 the Vote was taken on the 15th March, in 1884 on the 20th March, in 1885 on the 16th, and in 1886 on the 18th. Curiously enough for the last four years—namely, in 1883-4-5 and 6, this Vote has been taken on the same night as the Army Vote. Hon. Gentlemen may receive my assurance that the Vote must be taken and included in a Ways and Means Bill. The days on which the Vote may be taken vary in different years, owing to the manner in which Saturdays and Sundays may intervene and follow after; but I assure the Committee that this is the last day on which we can take the Vote on Account, so as to comply with the law.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: I am sorry to dispute the statement of so high an authority on financial business as the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury; but I cannot accept his statement in the face of the exception to the rule he has laid down which he has himself quoted, and which shows that this Vote has been taken on the 24th March. It is impossible to introduce a Bill, pass it through all its stages, and obtain the Royal Assent for it between the 24th and the 31st of March; therefore, there must have been an occasion when the Vote on Account for the Civil Service was not granted before the introduction of the Appropriation Bill passed at the end of the financial year. It is a common thing to take Votes on Account in May. The final appropriation of money for the purposes of the State is made in the Appropriation Act at the end of the Session. I agree that this Vote should be taken before the end of March and of the financial year, and I think it is necessary that there should be a Vote in Ways and Means before the 31st; but I am respectfully doubting that it is unnecessary to do what the right hon. Gentleman proposes, and include this Vote in the Appropriation Bill which the Financial Secretary to the Treasury must bring in at once.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry to be obliged to differ from the hon. Gentleman who has held the Office of Secretary to the Treasury later than myself; but I am sure he will find, if he inquires into the matter, that no money can be paid for Civil Services, or for the Army or Navy, unless it is included in an Act of Parliament that has received the Royal Assent before the 31st March. In regard to the case of 1882, which I mentioned, and to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, I am strongly of opinion that the Vote was put in in Committee, which is an irregular transaction, and one which ought not to be recognized in this House. To be regular, the Committee should take the Votes as a whole; and I am satisfied, from my experience of Treasury arrangements, that it is necessary that this Vote should now be taken.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I should like to point out that if it is as the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury says, the difficulty which has arisen is solely owing to his own act. His contention is, that one Vote must be taken for the Army, one for the Navy, and one for the Civil Services, in time to pass the Appropriation Bill. Well, he had his Votes for the Army and Navy some time ago, and what was there, I should like to know, to prevent him from putting down the Civil Service Estimates at the beginning of the evening? It was not necessary to take the third Navy Vote to-day; at any rate, if we have been led into any difficulty, it is the fault of the First Lord of the Treasury, or the Secretary to the Treasury, for not having put down the Vote on Account for Civil Services before the Navy Estimates. Having put down the Votes wrong, they now come to us, at half-past 11 o'clock at night, and seek to prevent us from discussing these Estimates. We, on these Benches, should like to discuss the Civil Service Vote proposed for our consideration, for at least five or six hours; but we are told that it must be taken at 12 or 1 o'clock in the morning. I think the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, having acted as he has done, is bound to tell us, going over the period from now to the 31st March, day by day, how it is impossible for him to allow us an opportunity to discuss these Estimates. He ought to tell us how many days are required for the passing of the Appropriation Bill. I think it is eight—and the subject is one with which most of us are pretty familiar, seeing that the question of the days required for the passing of the Bill is very much mixed up with the question of our holidays. If it takes eight days, we still have two days more for these discussions; but, probably, it does not take as much as eight days, so that there may be even more than two days for the consideration of the Estimates. Under any circumstances, it is always possible for us to suspend the Standing Orders and get a Bill through in a day. In the House of Lords they very frequently do that, and why should not we follow that course? I certainly think we should not give up the discussion of these Estimates. There are two burning questions I wish to raise on the Navy Estimates; but in addition to that I desire to talk on the Civil Service Estimates, in regard to which there are a whole crowd of Notices put down. I think we ought to have a statement from the Government showing that it is impossible to put down Supply for to-morrow. I believe he would find it easy to do that. The House would, no doubt, allow him to withdraw the Notice he has given for to-morrow, so as to enable him to take Supply. He would even then have five or six days before him for the Appropriation Bill. Seeing that the right hon. Gentleman had such a simple course open to him as to have put the Civil Service Vote down first on the Paper to-day, but has not availed himself of it, I think the Committee would be entitled to refuse to yield to him. He seems to be wrong all round, and not to be sufficiently alive to the fact that there are half-a-dozen ways out of the difficulty.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I quite agree with the First Lord of the Treasury that this Civil Service Vote should be included in the Ways and Means Act before the end of the financial year, otherwise the Civil servants cannot be paid; but, on the other hand, I am not inclined to accept his statement that the Vote cannot be obtained in Committee on the Bill. It has been done—I am told that it has been frequently done, and that there is nothing irregular about it. It may not be customary; but that has nothing to do with the question of regularity. It was done in 1882, as the right hon. Gentleman himself states, and that being the case, why should not it be done now?

MR. W. H. SMITH: In reference to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Nolan), I would remind him and the Committee that I stated distinctly when in Committee last Thursday, that it was proposed to take a Navy Vote and a vote on account for the Civil Service to-night. I said that, in order to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen who appealed to me for an opportunity for discussion on the general question of the Navy Estimates. There was no breach of understanding, therefore—

COLONEL NOLAN: I never said there was a breach of understanding.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) says that this Vote on Account has been put in in Committee on the Ways and Means Bill, and no doubt that is true; but it is an irregular transaction. It is an irregular course, and one which I, for one, do not recommend the Committee to take. The custom is that the Vote shall appear in the Bill in the form in which it has gone through its several stages, and the Rule of this House is not to suspend the Standing Orders in respect of the passage of Money Bills. I never, during my 19 years' experience, remember two stages of a Money Bill being taken on the same night in this House, and I certainly should not be the one to depart from that Rule, which I consider a sound one in financial matters. I hope the Committee will allow the Vote to be diately before us to be withdrawn, and put off to a future day; or to be disposed of at once, so as to allow the Vote of Credit to be discussed.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I am afraid that we are introducing a new form of clôture. Surely it is not contended that in voting practically the main principles of this huge sum for the naval services of the country, a single night's debate ought to satisfy the Representatives of the people. I cannot imagine that the First Lord of the Treasury can be serious in putting forward any such contention. What has happened to-night? The Committee has been engaged in listening to experts upon the Navy, the discussion having been varied by mutual complimentary bandying between the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench and the Treasury Bench. But hardly any serious discussion and inquiry as to whether this huge sum is necessary for the defence of the Empire has been entered upon by any single Member, nor has the Government ever attempted to show its necessity. Surely, it is not wrong to remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that certain professions were made in their name by the noble Lord who is now absent (Lord Randolph Churchill), and who, whether present or absent, counts for a great deal. [Cries of "Divide!"] If we are not allowed to proceed with this conversation, all I can say is that I never witnessed such an exhibition in the House of Commons before, as that upon a general question of policy in regard to these great spending Departments, it is not allowed a single Member to occupy five minutes of the time of the Committee. With regard to the subject before us, I would not undertake to say that the right hon. Gentleman would be likely to get his Vote for the Civil Services, even supposing the debate on the Navy Estimates were to be adjourned, at this time of night. One of the first duties of Members of Parliament is to deliberate on these finances, and to suggest to the Government the possibility of effecting the reductions in certain directions, and I see no reason why the independent Representatives of the taxpayers of the country should yield to the demand of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman cut the ground from under his feet by the list he read. He told us that the Vote on Account was taken on one occasion on the 24th March; and in order to have imported any value at all to the case he was attempting to make out, he should have assured us that as much time has been given to the discussion of the Votes in Supply this Session as is usually given in other years up to this date.

MR. W. H. SMITH: More time.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: All I can say is, that I have sat in this House and listened night after night to discussion on various branches of the Estimates; but there has been no opportunity afforded us of discussing these matters. But whether that is so or not, both Parties have been charged by the country to secure economy in these great spending Departments. Now, I want to ask has there been economy in the Army and Navy? We have an undertaking given to us that next year some economy will be brought about. It is said that there can be no economy effected this year, or at any rate no substantial economy. But as to that, it might be remarked that right hon. Gentlemen opposite probably do not feel any great responsibility in regard to next year's Estimates. Therefore the postponement of any plan of economy is all in their favour. If the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) continues to possess influence in the Government, we are not likely to have much economy in connection with naval matters for years to come. I have not forgotten the impression he made from this side of the House, when he condemned half the Navy as either obsolete or rotten, and wanted £5,000,000 spent on it one year, and £6,000,000 the year following, with another sum in reserve as large as the first two put together. All I can say is, that hon. Members will be deluded if they reckon upon economy being initiated by the Government now in Office, or by any Government that is likely to succeed them. If economy is brought about it will be through the exertions of independent Members sitting on both sides of the House. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh; but I venture to say that the denunciations of the extravagance of the late Government, which came from private Members in this House, was not all idle talk. I should be glad if the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Admiral Field) succeeds in obtaining the opportunity he desires. If he does, I have no doubt he will pour a very powerful broadside into his noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. I consider that this Committee is bound to make a stand, and to refuse to allow this hustling and shuffling of the Estimates through the House. I, for one, see no reason why we should forego the opportunity of discussing the Estimates, seeing that the Government have taken nearly the whole of the time this Session for other Business. As I have suggested, one of the first duties which belong to us is to criticize, with all necessary minuteness, the items of the Votes and the general policy that the Government have embarked upon. A question has been asked as to what is the general policy of the Government in regard to the magnitude of our Navy, and the work it has to do. Well, I want an answer to that question. I think it a very crucial one. It is impossible for us to say whether the amount asked for is excessive, or not, unless we have some explanatory statement as to policy beyond that given in the Statement issued by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty. Therefore I hope I shall receive some support in insisting that this question shall remain open in order that we may discuss general policy. It was an undertaking given by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that we should discuss general policy upon this Vote. It must be clear to the Committee that such discussion has not taken place, and that the clôture which the right hon. Gentleman now proposes to apply, will be in the highest degree unsatisfactory.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Do I understand that hon. Members opposite desire this Naval Vote to be withdrawn?

AN HON. MEMBER: On one condition.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: What condition? If it is the wish of the Committee to discuss this Vote further on another occasion, I should be perfectly willing to withdraw it. It seems to me to be the wish of the Committee to have some further discussion. [Hon. MEMBERS: We do wish it.] Then I would ask the leave of the Committee to withdraw the Vote.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I rise to ask a question. I wish

Mr. Illingworth

Navy Estimates distinctly, before this Vote is using the opportunity in n, at what date it is proposed to see, I have no doubt in should renew the discussion powerful broadside into : What date will be fixed for the First Lord of the all we have a fair opportunity ing that the urse pursued?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: Yes; there will be an opportunity for making Motions.

Mr. CONYBEARE: There are several Resolutions of different kinds to be discussed, involving an enormous amount of detail in connection with the Civil Service Vote; and I should like to know what time to-morrow morning the Government expect that we should be able to dispose of the matter? It would be impossible for us to permit the Vote to pass without discussion. I, for one, am not at all disposed to allow such a Vote to be rushed through in the manner contemplated by the Government. I do not charge the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury with any breach of understanding in having put down this Civil Service Vote on Account. Certainly not; but what I do charge him with is this—that after promising us an adequate opportunity of discussing these Navy Estimates, he practically deprives us of that opportunity by endeavouring to treat us as he is proposing to do.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I did not understand my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Nolan) to charge the First Lord of the Treasury with a deliberate breach of understanding. What my hon. and gallant Friend complains of is this—that the right hon. Gentleman has put down an important Civil Service Vote behind another Vote, which must be discussed in order to choke off discussion upon that Civil Service Vote. That is what we object to. We, who take an interest in the Civil Service Vote, have sat here all night in order to have an opportunity of discussing it. If the noble Lord had withdrawn the Naval Vote at 7, 8, or 9 o'clock this evening, we should have been willing to go on with the discussion of the Civil Service Vote. But what is it we are asked to do? Why, here is a Vote on Account for the Civil Service of £3,624,100; and I must say that during my short experience in this House I never recollect a single instance on which a discussion of a Vote of this kind did not consume at least one whole night. We are asked now to vote this enormous sum of over £3,500,000 for the Civil Services, covering a vast number of subjects of vital interest. By doing so we shall be placing the Government in a position above criticism—we shall be removing them from criticism for a period of, perhaps, three months—that is to say, until the end of May or the beginning of June. Personally, I am altogether opposed to an important Civil Service Vote being brought on at this time of night (12 o'clock). If the First Lord of the Treasury considered it absolutely necessary to take this Vote to-night, he should have put it down on the Paper first. He could have taken to-morrow night, or any night during the week, for the discussion of the Vote. What I would suggest is this—that if the Government are not disposed to postpone the Resolutions of which they have given Notice for to-morrow, in order to take these Votes, they should postpone the Votes until the 24th March—Thursday next—when we shall all be prepared to discuss them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) has given Notice of the course he intends to pursue, and when he did so there was no protest from any quarter of the House. [Cries of "When?"] On Friday last. No hon. Member will lose his right by the course now proposed. An hon. Member has said that he never remembered such a course having been taken before; but the fact is that last year the Vote on Account was taken on the same evening as the first Navy Vote; in 1885 it was taken after the first Navy Vote; and the same thing was done in 1884 and in 1883. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government are strictly following the course pursued by right hon. Gentlemen opposite when they had the occupancy of the Treasury Bench. I hope that the Committee will now consent to the withdrawal of this Vote and reserve it for future discussion.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Poplar): As far as my recollection serves, it was not specifically stated on behalf of the Government that it was absolutely neces-be no possible excuse for their going on with the Vote they propose to take at this hour in the morning.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) : I must say that I object to a Vote on Account of the Civil Service Estimates being taken without discussion, because there will not be another opportunity for discussing the Education Code before it will have lain on the Table during the 40 days necessary to give it validity.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Government are able to give the assurance that the Civil Service Estimates shall not be put down for the first night after Easter. Supposing there were an open day for discussing the Vote on Account, nothing could be more unsatisfactory than to use it for discussing different Votes, the debating of which is properly taken in Committee upon the ordinary Estimates. Already more subjects have been named than could be discussed on the Vote on Account; and it is evident that if a debate were to be opened on one of them the others would have little chance of being reached the same night. I trust that after this explanation the Vote on Account may be allowed to be taken without discussion.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) : The Government speak of the necessity of passing this Vote to-night, although I confess I do not see the necessity myself. They put down a Vote for the Navy which is not necessary, and they allow a most irregular discussion to take place which they must be aware cannot be brought to any practical issue. And this is precisely what the Government has been doing all along the line. They are particularly tenacious about points of precedent when that suits their purpose; but when it suits them to go the other way they are equally ready to dispense with anything like regularity. It is all very well to talk about the Appropriation Bill requiring eight days; but we know how the Bill may be expedited in "another place," where they have not the same regard for rule that we have. For all that is necessary, it would be just as well if the Vote they are asking for were to be taken on Thursday.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : No answer has been given to the statement that the 24th of March has been held to be early enough in former years for taking the Vote on Account. Two methods have been pointed out by which the Vote on Account can be taken without being taken to-night, and it is impossible for the Irish Members to assent to the Civil Service Votes being taken at this hour. We are not responsible for the prolongation of the debate; and although the Government may think the time to which they wish to limit us sufficient for the discussion of the Vote on Account, we should very much prefer to begin the discussion at half-past 5 in the evening rather than it should be brought forward in the way proposed and not discussed at all. We must judge every occasion by itself and every Government by itself, and I may say that I have never known any Government like the present. True, our Governments are not easy to understand and are impossible to define; but I have never known the relations between the Government of this country and the people of Ireland to be such as they are at this moment. We are told that we are not prevented from raising questions on the regular Services of the year; but when will they come on? There are questions of great magnitude in connection with the administration of Ireland which we desire to discuss, and in saying this I am arguing against this Vote being taken in the middle of the night. There are Irish questions of great urgency which will not brook delay, and it is impossible for us in the performance of our public duty to assent to their indefinite postponement. I, for one, should prefer to see the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury rise in order to give us his interpretation of his own remarks, rather than have the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as his interpreter. It was at a quarter to 11 that the First Lord of the Treasury said that would be a reasonable time to bring on the Vote on Account, and he appealed to his Friends to assist him in obtaining it; and it is now nearly half-past 12. The debate on the Navy Estimates was kept up by the irrepressible Admirals on the other side of the House, and was not prolonged by us. The sailors in this House do not evidence the taciturnity they display elsewhere, and if, but for them, it was reasonable to bring on the Vote on Account at half-past 11, it is not reasonable to bring it on at half-past 12. It is, in fact, an insult to our common sense to ask us to agree to the withdrawal of the Navy Vote at half-past 12, in order that another Vote of an important character requiring much discussion may be pushed down our throats. It will certainly be my duty, if the Vote on Account is pressed forward to-night, to raise an important question relating to social order in Belfast. The Government have had the Report on the Belfast riots before them for two months, and during those two months repeated inquiries have failed to secure a scintilla of information as to the policy they mean to pursue with regard to it. I represent a division of that town in which my constituents have had their houses broken into, their property destroyed, and their lives taken; and although this has been the case the Government have so dawdled during the last two months over the questions affecting that place that disturbances have broken out four times, while the Report lay in some pigeon-hole in Dublin Castle; and I beg to inform the Committee, in the discharge of my public duty, that if we go to the Vote on Account at this hour, I shall be bound to raise the Belfast question on the Report of the Royal Commission with a fulness that will in all probability keep the Committee till daylight.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure the Motion be withdrawn?

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Objection being made—

THE CHAIRMAN: I put the Question, and heard no answer; but if hon. Members say so, of course I accept the statement.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Will the Government now tell us what they propose to do with the Sitting?

MR. W. H. SMITH: We are desirous of withdrawing the Vote; but if the Committee refuses to allow us to do that, we must take a Division upon it.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I really have something to say on this Vote, and my mission is to make myself heard in the House. I did not intend to make a speech now, because I do not think I could do so with advantage to the constituency that sends me here; nor do I think the Committee would profit by it; nor do I think the Government will gain anything by an attempt to muzzle discussion. It strikes me there are many important matters in connection with this Naval Vote we have before us. You, Mr. Courtney, will have it within your recollection that I am within the circumscribed limits of Order. I do not want to make any Motion. I do not want to attempt, for a moment, to put myself into any obstructive position. I do not wish to go anything beyond my legitimate privilege. What I want to say is this. It appeared to me that, on Vote 2 of the Naval Estimates—if hon. Gentlemen opposite will permit, I would put my intention as briefly as may be—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to address himself to the Vote.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON: What I intended to do on this Vote 2—which is reached, but not yet passed—what I intended I will now only indicate by saying that the question I was going to raise was the use of gunboats at evictions. Late as the hour is, we are not at all “funking” a debate on this question; we do not shirk the opportunity of raising it now. We will raise it with great deliberation; but I want to know what is to be done—whether we must go into it now, or whether the Government will allow us another opportunity of raising the question of the presence of gunboats at evictions? It is hard to put one's views before the Committee, when all around there are so many—it would be an expression un-Parliamentary to say “larking” at one—while so many Members have something to say at the same time. What I want to say is this. If I am only to have this opportunity of raising the question, I am fully prepared; if the Government think it inconvenient to proceed with it to-night, I am equally prepared to accept that decision.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): For something like eight hours I have been waiting to discuss a matter of great importance to my constituents. I desisted from doing so on a former occasion in deference to the wish of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton), when the first Vote was taken, on the distinct understanding that I should have an opportunity upon the second Vote. The hon. Member for South-East Cork (Mr. Hooper) and myself did not bring forward the Haulbowline Dockyard question while hon. and gallant Gentlemen connected with the Navy were engaged in a consecutive discussion, as we did not feel warranted in interrupting for the purpose of bringing on a peculiarly Irish question. This was the case on Thursday; and we thought that hon. and gallant Gentlemen, having occupied some eight hours that evening with their discussion, it would have finished to-night, in reasonable time, enabling us to bring on the subject in which we are interested. Since I agreed to postpone the subject, the face of affairs has been changed. The Government have given a Notice to take up the whole time of the House with matters they consider urgent, and so we have to regard matters in a different light to that in which they appeared in the last hour of Thursday's Sitting, and it becomes a matter of urgency with us to try to press upon the noble Lord and his Colleagues in the Admiralty the question which we formerly deferred at their request. It has become more incumbent upon me individually to bring it forward to-night than upon anyone else, because, though the Island of Haulbowline on which the Dockyard is situated, is geographically within the district represented by my hon. Friend the Member for South East Cork, it is practically within mine, though it may seem a paradox to say so, because nearly all those who work in that Dockyard live in my constituency at Queenstown. I have since Thursday had forwarded to me a Resolution of the Queenstown Town Commissioners asking me to bring this question under the notice of the House at the earliest opportunity, and I have also had a Memorial from those unfortunate men who are under notice of dismissal from the works at Haulbowline. Though the deputation which waited upon the noble Lord and his Colleagues when they visited Queenstown last November appealed for a continuation of the works on the ground that it would be an act of charity, we do not make any such appeal from our places here. It is only right that we should acknowledge the courtesy with which the noble Lord received the deputation, and I will go so far as to say he almost came up to the expectations of those who approached him from that point of view, that his sentence of dismissal upon the 400 labourers at Haulbowline Dockyard. The noble Lord very kindly gave an undertaking that they should not then be discharged, but should be kept on until the early summer. On the part of these men I thank the noble Lord for his consideration. But I wish now to place the matter before the heads of the Admiralty in a different light. On Thursday, when the noble Lord had it brought under his notice, he said these works were completed, or nearly so, therefore there was no hardship about to be inflicted on the artisans and labourers about to be discharged. It is my duty to-night to traverse that statement of the noble Lord. I am not at all surprised that he should be so mistaken, because the origin of these Docks is now so far removed into the remote antiquity of officialism that it is absolutely impossible that the noble Lord should have any conception of the original plans or ideas that prompted the Admiralty first to undertake these works. The idea at that time was not to establish relief works in Cork Harbour for the employment of superfluous labourers—that seems to be the idea which has got into the minds of members of the Admiralty Board in recent years—and it is on that assumption they have based all their replies on this question when Irish Members have had their annual opportunity of bringing it forward. They have said as the noble Lord said on Thursday, that the Government have done all they could to provide employment up to a certain point, and that point reached they could do no more. When the noble Lord states that the plans as originally contemplated in connection with the Dockyard are completed he seems altogether to ignore the fact that in the original plans—of which I have a copy here which I shall be happy to place at his service—there is specified a second dry dock of much larger dimensions than that now constructed, and until this second dock is constructed the work cannot be said to be carried out. If all the money that has been spent up to the present time, an enormous sum—£500,000 or £600,000, I do not know the exact figures—if all this is not to be wasted, sunk in Haulbowline Island, it is absolutely necessary for naval purposes that the original plans should be carried out and this second dock constructed. I say this because the undertaking was commenced with a view to establishing an efficient, thoroughly serviceable Dockyard where the largest ships of Her Majesty's Fleet could not only be repaired but even constructed. The present dock is useless, not from any fault of the engineers who made the original plans, but because orders had to be given to have the dock shortened by 70 or 80 feet from the original plan. Since the original plans and specifications were drawn up, as I need not say to so many hon. and gallant Gentlemen, who have served in the Navy, the length of Her Majesty's ships has very much increased. Even had the dock been constructed upon the original plan it would now be too short for the bulk of the ships in the Navy. If we unfortunately drifted into war, and if three or four ships became disabled off the Irish Coast, not one of them could dock for repairs at Haulbowline. Even if one vessel could go into dock, all the other ships would have to lie in Queenstown Harbour for refuge, and would be practically blockaded until they could be towed to Devonport or some other Dockyard; their services being meanwhile lost to the country, which services would largely consist in the protection of our commerce. If you had your docks completed, with ample accommodation, machinery and appliances, vessels slightly damaged in their complicated machinery by accidents of warfare could be quickly repaired. In time of war, a large part of the duty of our Fleet would be the protection of our commerce on the ocean, and it is no wild supposition to indicate Haulbowline as the only possible and safe place for repairs for those ships. In that Statement upon which the noble Lord has been so much complimented it is stated that Her Majesty has 260 ships in commission. A very large proportion of these would be engaged in duty for the protection of the transatlantic commerce, and where could more convenient accommodation be found for such than in Cork Harbour? The noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) said on Thursday that naval warfare would in future be conducted on a system of electricity, an expression indicating, I presume, the celerity of the operations. All the more important then was it to have accommodation for repairs to ships ready to hand. I, as representing this particular constituency, and my colleagues representing neighbouring constituencies, stand up here to say we do not think the question of Haulbowline Dock should any longer be discussed on the very narrow basis of giving employment to a few hundred labourers. It should be approached in a broader spirit, and the Admiralty should make up their minds to carry out the original intention and establish in Cork Harbour a thoroughly efficient Dockyard for the purpose of repairing, if not of constructing, Her Majesty's ships of war. The original Estimate for the work was £550,000, and to that was subsequently added £18,000. I believe the whole amount of the original estimate has been exhausted during the 22 years the works have been going on—exhausted, to a very large extent, by a system of bungling and muddling. I do not say the present Board of Admiralty are responsible for the bungling and muddling of the past. I think the noble Lord has been deservedly complimented on the economies he purposes to effect in several Departments. The bungling, however, has taken place in connection with these Dockyard works; the money has been spent, and the plans are not half executed; and, that money being gone, we are told we ought to rest satisfied with the incomplete establishment which is the result, and that it is absolutely impossible for the Admiralty to ask for any further sum for these works. But we do not hear any statement of that kind in connection with an English Dockyard. If it is necessary to extend them, or, if the works turn out more costly than was anticipated, the Government come forward without hesitation. The noble Lord spoke a short time ago of a saving on the Navy Estimates of £800,000. Now, I do not think it unreasonable to ask that a small proportion of this saving might fall to our share. We have been getting something like £30,000 a-year on account of these works, and that is reduced this year to £3,000, and £7,000 for machinery. Only £10,000, out of an expenditure of £12,476,000, while Ireland, at the lowest computation, contributes £1,000,000 annually. I do not for a moment say, that because we in Ireland

contribute £1,000,000 a-year as our quota of £12,000,000 for the Navy, are, therefore, entitled to ask that a considerable portion of that amount should be spent in Ireland; we simply ask that the necessary sum should be expended on this solitary site in Ireland which is specially suitable for, and actually necessary as an Imperial Dockyard. A very small sum will suffice to carry out the original plan. Of course, I do not presume to speak with professional knowledge; but, so far as I have been able to gather, £70,000 or £80,000 would make the establishment thoroughly effective, and a valuable addition to our naval strength. The noble and gallant Lord the Member for Marylebone on a previous evening told us, in connection with the Navy Department, that one of the most important considerations to be attended to was that of being well prepared beforehand; and, that, in consequence of this foresight, a very large saving in the expenditure required in the Navy Department would be accomplished. I, therefore, respectfully submit to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty the reasonableness of the expenditure which we ask for this Navy Dockyard in Haulbowline. For many reasons, we think that an immediate alteration should be made in the programme of the First Lord of the Admiralty—on the score of economy, utility, and the fact of the proportionate contribution of Ireland to the Imperial Navy Estimates. I see by the Estimates which have been placed before us that, in the Dockyards at home—meaning by that the English Dockyards—there is a total number of 19,522 artisans and labourers employed, at a cost of £1,483,291; and in Her Majesty's Dockyards abroad—which I presume are merely a provision for the contingencies of accidents and breakings-down—there are employed 2,587 salaried officials and members of the artisan and labouring classes, who are to be paid in this year £278,737. Altogether, in the home and foreign Dockyards, the total number employed is 22,109 individuals, at a cost of £1,662,028. How many artisans or mechanics have we got in Ireland receiving anything whatsoever from Her Majesty's Government in the way of naval employment? In this Haulbowline Dockyard, in connection with the technical repairs, some 12 or 13 artisans are employed; and, in addition, about 300 or 400 ordinary labourers, working for about 12s. or 14s. a-week. It is now proposed by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty, from the 1st of June in this year, to dismiss these 400 hands who are receiving these miserable wages as unskilled labourers at Haulbowline Yard; and this in face of the fact that the labour is paid for out of Imperial Votes, to which Ireland contributes her proportionate share. I ask, are we to be told by any Supporter of the Government, or any Minister of the Crown, this is dealing out even-handed justice to Ireland? I say that hon. Gentlemen opposite, who are so constantly twitting us that we in Ireland are unjustifiably discontented, and charging us with being disloyal, should recognize that, in this very Navy Vote, we have sufficient ground for being discontented, and I would almost say for being disloyal. At this moment we are asked to Vote this large sum of money to the Government for the employment of over 22,000 hands in connection with the Naval Service; and, side by side with this request, we are informed that from June 1st forward there is to be no other consideration shown to Ireland by the Lords of the Admiralty, except the consideration implied by the monthly dismissal of 80 of these labourers at Haulbowline. I appeal to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty, if the policy of his Party is, that people living in different parts of this kingdom should all be treated alike and none of them receive exceptional favours, as compared with others, that in this matter of Naval Expenditure he should give the Irish people their just share. I do not think that we are seeking any preference; on the contrary, we find our £1,000,000 absorbed for the purpose of being expended in English naval Dockyards, and we get none of it, notwithstanding the fact that we have been paying our Imperial levy for 86 years. The Party to which I belong think it their duty to their constituencies to urge on the Government to take a wider view of this question of the Haulbowline Dockyard than would seem to be manifest in the policy of merely carrying on the works for a few weeks and more than dismissing the men. The Government should take the original plan upon which this work was undertaken, and inquire into the case carefully, and not in a manner which sanctions the spending of £500,000, which just might as well have been thrown into the sea. The establishment of a Dockyard in Ireland—a Dockyard which would not be too short for Her Majesty's ships—would be recognizing the proportionate share of Ireland in the expenditure for Navy Estimates, and at the same time furnishing our shipwrights and ship-carpenters, who are now literally starving, with some amount of employment. If this were done, Her Majesty's Navy, I believe, would be increased very largely in efficiency, and in time of war immense assistance and immeasurable advantage would be rendered to disabled ships of war which, in the hour of danger, could find a port of refuge and facilities for repair at the very threshold of the ocean.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I rise, Sir, to move that you report Progress and ask leave to sit again. I understand that the Government are anxious to bring forward a Vote on Account. It is perfectly preposterous that a Vote of such magnitude, involving large matter of discussion, can be brought forward at this time of night. I strongly object to this system of Vote on Account, and I think it is not fair to the House of Commons or the country that we should be called upon to pass a Vote of £3,000,000 when the discussion on it commences at half-past 1 o'clock in the morning. If the Government were not so very anxious to get this money, why did they bring the Vote on at this hour? They say—let the Navy Estimates be discussed; we will withdraw on the condition that this Vote on Account be taken. It is surely an old principle that no contentious Votes in the Estimates are taken after half-past 12 o'clock, and I certainly never heard of a Vote of this amount being brought forward so late as this and the discussion begun. Because I believe that it is impossible to do work adequately in this style—we get so impatient and sleepy—that I hope the Government will agree that progress be reported, and in case they do that, I think they will find no opposition to the Navy Vote being taken on the understanding that the Vote on Account will be taken on a future day.

Mr. Lane

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Labouchere.) [1.20 A.M.]

The Committee divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 196: Majority 125.—(Div. List, No. 70.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I am very sorry that it should be necessary to go into this Question of voting the Estimates at such an hour. The night has been spent by the speeches of experts on subjects mostly, I admit, of great importance in regard to the Dockyard system, and I strongly object to the discussion being taken at a time when the public will be unable to see by the Press what is passing. As I understand this Memorandum of explanation, it is matter to be referred to a Select Committee, and if then any economy can be scored for the figures presented by the officials of the Departments, the Report of that Committee will show whether these Estimates have been prepared with any regard to economy whatever. I should like to ask of the Government upon what principle did they go in determining what should be the strength of the Navy. In the Memorandum given by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) we are told that it was upon the review of the last six years' expenditure, and it seemed that when there was a fit of economy on the part of the British Government there had been in all other European countries a desire to increase their naval armament, which embodied consequent expenditure. We are told, Mr. Courtney, because other Powers have increased their naval strength, it was necessary for us also to increase our expenditure on the British Navy, and the result has been that in the last two years, as compared with the preceding five years, we have spent nearly £8,250,000 above the average expenditure of the preceding five years. Now, Sir, I understand that has been done to make our fighting power equal to the combined fighting power of three States of Europe. Mr. Courtney, what I have to say is this—that in all probability we shall continue this same policy. We may, from time to time, introduce small cheeseparing economies; but the other hand, accordingly as the Powers in Europe see our expenditure rising, they will say to themselves, it is necessary to increase our armaments, and then again, because they have increased their armaments; we shall be told it will be necessary for us to strengthen our Navy in proportion. We have been doing all we could of late years to strengthen our ships, and to make heavy ordnance. The other nations in Europe have been compelled to follow our example, and the consequence has been a rivalry between the different States in Europe in regard both to their Naval and Military armaments, and I want to know when is this to cease? Is there no capacity in British statesmanship—is there no prospect that it will be able to put an end to this increasing rivalry between foreign Powers and ourselves? Are we prepared to go on increasing our armaments accordingly as the Continental Powers increase theirs? If we are, I can only say the result will be that it will become an intolerable burden to this nation. I for one moment should very much like to imagine that there would be such statesmanship on the part of the Conservative Administration as would enable them to put an end to this rivalry; and I say also that no Government in Europe is in so easy a position for making overtures to foreign nations having this object in view. We are able to say that we have a fighting capacity equal to any three Naval Powers on the Continent combined, and we can say that we are willing to rest upon our oars. We could make rational appeals to the other Powers in Europe to cease their rivalry before it is too late, because, I insist, that this rivalry cannot go on without doing an enormous amount of evil. Let an appeal be made to check this expenditure. We have been reminded by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty to-night, that next year's Estimates have been prepared with such care and moderation as to show a decrease of nearly £800,000. That may prove to be so or not; but I would remind the House that there is such a thing—as we have found to our cost—as a Supplementary Vote, and it may be possible that in the spring of next year we may see the making of such a Vote.

promises of this kind as of very much value until the year's expenditure has been got through, and we find ourselves not burdened with Supplementary Votes. When an appeal was made in the year 1885-6 for a very large amount of money, it was based on the ground that the British Navy had fallen below its proper strength; and that an extraordinary expenditure would be necessary for a year or two, in order to make it efficient, and equal to the requirements of the nation. We are assured now by the First Lord of the Admiralty that we are really in a strong position, and able to grapple with any three Powers of Europe. I, therefore, appeal to the Government to know why they do not now cut down their Estimates to the normal expenditure of 1884. If we are in such a strong position, why not immediately drop back to the ordinary Estimates which satisfied both sides of the House before 1885? It appears to me that the decrease of £800,000 is totally inadequate to what we have a right to expect; and I would urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen)—from whom no doubt we shall have a flattering Budget in due course—that if he exercised the influence in his power, he could put a stop to this continually increasing expenditure on our Navy to Army; and he could compel the spending Departments of the State to use much greater economy than they have done in the past. It should be remembered that we are now at peace with all the world, with perhaps the exception of Burmah, where, however, we are told, affairs are rapidly becoming quiet. What then, I would venture to ask, is the use of keeping up the armaments of this country at their present extravagant level? I shall never cease, Sir, as long as I have the honour of sitting in this House to protest against this waste of the people's wealth. This country to my mind has not put itself in any more secure position now than it was in the past, although we have spent so much more money. We are told that there is a most necessary expenditure to be incurred in regard to our coaling stations, but that has not yet been provided for; and I have no doubt that in due course the First Lord of the Admiralty will find that he has pressure brought to bear upon him to induce him to indulge in that outlay. We also have it intimated to us by the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford), that the Government are building a number of small vessels; and in view of this I must offer my earnest protest against the expenditure which is being incurred, and which the Government are attempting to justify on the ground that in no other way can we place ourselves in a position to escape from our difficulties.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I had hoped, Mr. Courtney, that we should have been relieved at this late hour from the necessity of discussing those Estimates. I must say that I am alarmed at the ever-increasing expenditure of this country; and I am prepared to say that I think the greatest damage to the Empire is to be found in her extravagant naval expenditure. I think, Sir, that the state of trade and of industry should prevent the Government from placing their names to the very extravagant items indicated in this Vote; and I must add my belief that if we listened to the advice of the Admirals, and of the General Officers, who happen to be Members of this House, in reference to the supposed necessary expenditure of this country upon the two Services, we should find that we had landed this country very quickly into an exceedingly serious position. I noticed, in connection with this discussion, three points which are worthy of attention; but, before I deal with them, I should like to say that I think, after the enormous amounts we have already spent upon the Navy and Army, it is insulting, on the part of the Admirals and Generals, to come here and tell us that all our money has been thrown away, and that we must go in for fresh expenditure. Why, Sir, my reply to them would be that, if the money has been thrown away in the past, it has been so expended on the advice of hon. Members of their class, and there would be every reason for the belief that again to follow their advice would result in another useless outlay. I desire to express the earnest protest of my constituents against the ever-growing expenditure, and the continual increase of the Votes; and I did hope that the lesson taught us by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) would not have been lost upon the Government. I had hoped that he had sufficient influence with the Government to induce them to listen to something in the shape of economical proposals; and if that had not acted as an inducement to them, I had hoped that their professions before the country a few months since would have led them to put before us Estimates of a very modest and economical character. But, Sir, I am afraid that official life is fatal to economy; for the moment a man is appointed a Member of the Government, he seems to lend himself to the greatest amount of expenditure possible. I venture to give just one note of warning. If this increasing expenditure is allowed to go on, you may depend upon it that in future the burden will fall, not upon labour, but upon property; and Members in this House who may be said to represent the propertied classes would do well not to lose sight of this fact. I had hoped that the professions of the Tory Party would have induced them to try and rival hon. Members on this side of the House in economy. I am afraid we are doomed to disappointment. There is only one other argument that I wanted to use; and in relation to that I may say that my own impression is that the great battle of the future will be fought between this country and America, and that the object of that battle will be to secure supremacy in the commerce of the world. Now, Sir, I would remind you that America is fast paying off her National Debt. She is paying, at least, £30,000,000 a-year; and when the day of competition comes, this country will enter upon the contest handicapped to such an extent by her National Debt that I am afraid she will be over-weighted; and I, therefore, warn the Government and this House against entering upon a line of extravagance which must have such disastrous results in the future. I am certain of one thing, and that is that the rate-payers and the taxpayers, the men who form the industrial part of this great nation, have a right to a voice in this matter. They feel the burden and the pressure of this taxation, and their voice, at any rate, is, and ought to be, lifted up in protest against the extravagant Estimates.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): In looking through the Estimates, I notice, in regard to the item for victualing, that the amount is, at least, 25 per cent more per man than it was in 1878-9, although, since that time, provisions have fallen in price to the extent of, at least, 30 per cent. This, I think, is one of the matters which ought to be discussed in connection with these Estimates. To my mind, it is of far more importance than the proposed expenditure on our coaling stations. I would urge upon the Admiralty the desirability of sending the Fleet more often to Ireland. There we have splendid anchorage for vessels, with admirable facilities for naval manœuvres, and; at the same time, provisions can be purchased, at least, 25 to 30 per cent cheaper than in any other part of the world; and, therefore, while the ships would be in a healthy climate, the opportunities for practice and naval evolutions would be unusually good, and, at the same time, economy would be promoted in the expenditure in victualing the Fleet. At one time the Fleet was more often seen off the coast of Ireland. It only wanted some of the old Conservative Irish Members to make representations at the Admiralty to induce them to send the vessels there. Of late years, however, they have not been sent there; and I would especially call the attention of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty—who has not a little connection with a part of Ireland—to the desirability of making use of the excellent harbours to be found there for naval purposes.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): On a recent occasion my hon. Friend the Member for one of the Divisions of Cork was very anxious, with his Colleagues, to bring under the notice of this House the question of the Haulbowline Dockyard; but before he could bring it on, many hours were spent, and perhaps properly so, by hon. and gallant Gentlemen in discussing the general question of the efficiency of the Navy, and it was consequently impossible to bring the matter before the House at a period at which it could be adequately discussed. We desired to raise the question relating to this dockyard as a matter of economy, because if the intentions of the Government were carried out as announced last Thursday by the First Lord of the Admiralty, the entire sum which had been spent upon the place would be utterly lost to the country, and if a new dockyard would remain a muddy monument to the gross incompetency of Her Majesty's Naval Administration. Twenty-two years ago this subject was brought before this House. It was intended to spend a sum amounting to something over £500,000 in the erection of a suitable dockyard at Queenstown, where the largest ships of the Navy could, if necessary, be repaired; but now, when much of the work has been done, the plan has been altered, the Dockyard has been shortened by something like 70 feet, and, if completed as proposed, it will be utterly useless for the purpose for which it was originally intended. I regret, Sir, that the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty is not in his place to give us some more explicit declarations of the intentions of the Government in regard to this matter. A deputation from the district waited upon him 12 months ago, and in compliance with their urgent request he consented to retain upon the works a number of unskilled workmen who were at that time threatened with dismissal. We claim now not merely their exemption from dismissal, but we claim also for them work, on the ground that Ireland is entitled to a legitimate share of the Imperial expenditure of this country on the Navy; and I do think that the people of Ireland have a legitimate grievance, especially those residing in the immediate locality of this Dockyard, in the fact that a large amount of money has been spent up to a certain point; and that money is to be allowed to remain unproductive and useless for all purposes except as constituting a monument of gross blundering on the part of the Naval Administration. The case as it at present stands is this—that £500,000 has been spent for making a Dockyard; but, if the work be discontinued now, there will be a dock too short and quite unfitted for the purpose originally designed. On the first occasion when that matter was brought before Parliament, it was pointed out by Mr. J. F. Maguire, who was then Member for the City of Cork, that the Harbour of Queenstown was peculiarly well-suited for the establishment of a Dockyard, and that for many reasons. So strong were his arguments, and so powerfully did they appeal to the Naval Authorities of the day, that his recommendations were adopted. A Report was issued stating that, in the opinion of the Naval Authorities, Queenstown was admirably situated as a harbour of refuge for Her Majesty's Fleet, and that in this harbour it was eminently desirable that a Dockyard should be created, in which vessels of war could be properly repaired. Yet, at the present moment, if storm or any disaster overtook a vessel of the Fleet off the coast, she could not be repaired at Queenstown. We had a recent instance. The Belleisle, upon which it was found necessary to expend £30,000 or £40,000, instead of being towed to Queenstown, as she would have been had this Dockyard expenditure been properly directed in the past, she was taken to Chatham, or Devonport, or some other Yard. We contend that these are matters well worth the consideration of the Committee. I think my hon. Friend the Member for East Cork was a little too easy and somewhat lavish in the praise he awarded the noble Lord on this Dockyard question. I maintain we are fairly and fully entitled to a reasonable and proportionate amount of expenditure for Dockyard purposes; and it is impossible that we can have this in future, unless Her Majesty's Government reconsider the determination which apparently they have come to. Well acquainted as I am with the harbour, knowing how far the work has progressed, and what a serious disappointment it is to many who take the deepest interest in the subject, and who expected by this time that substantial progress would be made—I shall take every opportunity that is offered in the House of bringing this question forward. My Colleagues who represent neighbouring constituencies are actuated by similar motives; but I hope it will not be necessary for us to use pressure upon the Naval Authorities with regard to this most important matter, and which affords a flagrant example of that blundering which has come to be regarded as inseparably connected with the great expending Departments.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): The Motion to report Progress was moved in order to afford the Government the opportunity of saying what they intended to do. It must be pretty evident to anyone who has listened to the debate for the last two hours, discursive though it has been, that it has ranged over a considerable number of new topics, and that it has not been altogether unconnected with the possibility of another Vote being taken subsequently. Now, I must certainly say that my hon. Friends who have felt it necessary to object to going on with the Vote on Account of Civil Service Estimates, seem to have reasons on their side which are every moment increasing. I am informed that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury admitted that it was not absolutely necessary to go on with the Civil Service Vote on Account. Various methods were pointed out whereby all that is legally necessary may be complied with. Naturally, the Government desire to get their Vote to-night; but there has been much time lost in the attempt; and, surely, they will not, after 2 o'clock, ask us to vote away £3,500,000, and on a Vote that embraces a number of topics upon which discussion is certain to be raised. I shall now propose, Sir, that you leave the Chair. Of course, if the Civil Service Vote is to be gone on with, we must stay and attend to matters in which we are interested; but, surely, the Government will not ask us to take this enormous Vote at such an hour. Therefore, to give the Government the opportunity of making an explanation, I now move that you leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Dr. Cameron.)

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I should like to point out to the hon. Member that it is not the fault of the Government if we do not get on with Business. I believe, as far as I am able to judge, that it is the opinion of the Committee that the time has arrived when we should take the Vote which has been under discussion so long. I want also to point out to the hon. Member, in reference to what he appears to believe is an unreasonable hour to take the Vote, that it must be taken to-night; because, although it has been mentioned that on one occasion it was taken on the 24th March, it was then, as has been explained, inserted at a later stage of the Ways and Means Bill; and unless the Vote is taken to-night, it cannot be taken on the 24th (Thursday). We could not take it until Friday; and, therefore, it is absolutely necessary it should be taken to-night. I am sure hon. Members are not aware, or they would not have expressed so much surprise, that in 1882, this Vote on Account was commenced at 1.45; in 1883 it was commenced at 1 o'clock; in 1884 it was commenced at 2 o'clock; in 1885 the Vote on Account was commenced at 4 o'clock; and last year it was commenced at 1.30, and finished at 2 o'clock. I think, therefore, there is nothing unusual so far as precedent is concerned. There is nothing unreasonable in the Government asking that the Vote should be taken under the circumstances, and no single Member of the Committee will lose the opportunity of criticizing any single Vote in the ordinary course of Supply, nor will any Member lose the opportunity of raising a discussion on an Amendment to the Motion for the Speaker leaving the Chair.

MR. DILLON: The hon. Gentleman has used an argument of some force; but he leaves out of view altogether the fact that there are circumstances at the present time that render it absolutely essential that there must be a prolonged discussion on this Vote. Of course, the Government are masters of the arrangement of Business; and if they do not choose to afford a more reasonable opportunity, we must discuss it at this time of night. It is all very well to tell us that no Member parts with any privilege by allowing this Vote to pass. It may be perfectly true that in the past year, or the year before, it was not necessary to challenge and persist in a discussion of a Vote of this kind; but that is no argument that it is not necessary this year. Whatever the circumstances were in the years alluded to, they are now such that it is entirely out of the question that the Vote should pass without considerable discussion. English or Scotch Members may not be in a position to discuss the Civil Service Estimates. I leave them to judge of that; so far as we are concerned, we avail ourselves of a privilege with which we have not the slightest intention to part. If we allowed this Vote to go without discussion, we shall not have another opportunity until May of raising questions that are convulsing Ireland at the present moment—questions that can and will be raised on this Vote, no matter what is said by the Government, no matter how inconvenient it may be for the Committee. Measures of vast importance may be passed; while, by the patent plan brought to perfection by Members of the Tory Party within the last few weeks, every discussion on questions of importance to us can be blocked by bogus Notices on the Notice Paper never intended to be brought to discussion. I allude to this practice, so unworthy of Members of the House, as an additional reason why we shall insist on a fair discussion of this Vote on Account. I ask this question—if these Votes are to be passed; if it is considered necessary, or essential, to pass these Votes without discussion—why is it not the Rule of the House? Why are the Government and the Committee obliged to admit discussion? Is it not because, as we all know, that the principle is that circumstances may arise that will challenge discussion, perhaps a prolonged discussion, and in relation to matters that ought to have a prolonged discussion? Circumstances in the country, or circumstances connected with the Service, may arise that cause the Vote to be challenged at length. This has happened in the present case. Circumstances are going on in Ireland in connection with a Service for which we are asked to provide a large sum of money, and it would be absurd to suppose we should allow this Vote to pass. No matter, if there are half-a-dozen Votes on Account, we challenge each one so long as things are conducted in Ireland as they are now. I say this in support of the Motion for adjournment. If the Government considered this Vote was absolutely necessary to-night, they ought to have put it down before the Navy Vote, and then we could have debated it; and, early or late, the debate might have been closed. You have gained nothing by your conduct in regard to this Vote, though you may think it a gain to have choked off a certain number of gallant Gentlemen who desired to discuss naval matters. As I have said already, it is entirely out of the question that this Vote can be taken without considerable discussion; you must expect this when you ask us to provide money for the Bankruptcy Court and the Irish Constabulary, and you might have taken the discussion at a more reasonable hour.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: The Secretary for the Treasury always tells us that money must be taken by a certain day. Sir, I am curious to know what would happen if the money were not taken. My own impression is, that the world would wag on very much as it did before. What terrible circumstances would take place if this money were not taken to-day? As the hon. Member for East Mayo has pointed out, this trouble has arisen entirely from the Government arrangement of business. [Cries of "No, no!"] I say it has arisen entirely from the action of the Government, and if an hon. Gentleman thinks otherwise, let him put his thought into speech. Why, when there were only two Votes to take, was the Navy Vote put first? It was not necessary, because the Government offered to withdraw it. If you had commenced discussion with the Vote on Account, you could have said to the gallant Admiral, "We will have your discussion at another time." Very valuable suggestions were no doubt made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman; and then when your own followers, naval Gentlemen, have been discussing naval matters up to a late hour, you complain that we on this side are anxious to bring forward certain economical matters connected with the Navy, and you want to burke discussion on the part of Irish Members by bringing forward this Vote on Account at half-past 2. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury appeals to precedents of the last few years, and that only proves to me our sacred duty to hold fast to our privileges, and not to add one more to these evil precedents. No one can deny for a moment that this Vote on Account is worthy of discussion at a reasonable hour. Very frequently there are complaints of our discussions being carried to a great length; but nothing of the kind can be said of this Vote on Account, for discussion has not commenced. If the committee like to go on I am prepared. I have the Estimates here, and I judge from them that I shall have to speak some 30 times, and I estimate that I shall have to move about 20 Amendments; but I am perfectly ready to remain here.

Mr. GOSCHEN: After the speech we have just heard, everyone must see that it is the bounden duty of the Government to proceed with the Estimates.

What would be the use of postponing them, in order to give an opportunity for an Irish discussion, when we hear from the hon. Member for Northampton that it is his intention to make 30 speeches, and move 20 Amendments. The hon. Member is indifferent whether the money is voted or not, and he wishes to know what would happen if the money were not voted. The effect would be that the financial arrangements of the country would be seriously embarrassed, and we have no resource but to proceed. I can quite understand the views of hon. Members, who say there are important matters in connection with Ireland to be discussed; but how do we know that any particular Irish Question will come on when we are to have 30 speeches from the hon. Member? We should probably come to the Vote on Account, if proceedings were to be conducted in the manner indicated in the course of weeks, not days. Therefore, though it must be most inconvenient to any Member of the Committee, there is nothing for it but to proceed and listen with patience to such matters of importance as may be brought before us. I only hope that hon. Members opposite will, when we come to discuss the Vote on Account, go at once to the more important matters they desire to bring forward, not wasting time upon minor details.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman says even if we did get a day for the discussion of our questions, what guarantee would my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo have that he would obtain time for the adequate discussion of the important subjects to which he has referred. Well, of course, it would be difficult to obtain that guarantee in favour of the matters he thinks it due to his countrymen to bring forward. But the language of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury shows that he feels the inconsistency of the position of the Government. He tells us that some years ago when a Vote on Account was taken, it was proposed at half-past 1 and passed at 2. That is perfectly true; but it only shows how differently things were situated then.

if they were 20 crimes; but my hon. Friend would only be doing what he is in the habit of doing. Let hon. Members recollect that last year my hon. Friend moved the reduction of a Vote and carried his Amendment. It was a friendly Government then in Office, and it had not to go out; but it may be expected the present Government would go out if they were defeated. However, we are in no hurry to get through the discussion; there are items we would prefer to have debated to-morrow morning when Representatives of the Press will be present. We are standing upon Constitutional grounds; you are not when you attempt to shout us down or vote us down in silence in the early hours of the morning. The Secretary to the Treasury says that for years this Vote has been passed at a late hour; but what happened? Did not the Estimates go up; did not these very Civil Service Estimates increase, because we did not discuss them? Well, we are not doing that now. What is the use of sacrificing a Chancellor of the Exchequer on the altar of economy if we are to vote the Civil Service Estimates when there is no Press to record the names of Members who are in sympathy with us? The Chancellor of the Exchequer is like the beggar in Gil Blas on a large scale. I do not think we ought to yield, but should proceed calmly to debate the Naval Estimates until the Press return, and we shall be well reported at 7 in the morning. If the people of this country knew that we wanted so unconstitutionally to pass the Estimates at this late hour, when Members are too tired to discuss and criticize the items efficiently, they would make themselves heard in such a way that we should soon have to do something in order to keep down this dreadful extravagance.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I desire, Sir, to support the Motion to report Progress, and I do so as one who has a few small grievances to bring forward during the discussion on the Navy Estimates. I protest against the way in which Business is being rushed through at this hour. The grievances of which I have to complain being of comparatively and apparently small importance, I have abstained from bringing them forward hitherto; but I do not see that I should lose any opportunity of making them known. Whilst hon. and gallant Gentlemen below the Gangway were discussing matters of naval interest I refrained from interfering with my complaints, because I knew they wished to give the Committee the benefit of their experience and special knowledge, and to bring under notice items of technical importance; but I did not expect that facilities for discussing grievances would have been curtailed or cut off. I repeat that, though the particular grievances against which I take exception are small, I protest against being compelled at this hour of the morning to proceed with them. For it is of the highest importance to our constituencies that the grievances which specifically affect them should be adequately inquired into and made generally known. Yet, owing to the lateness of the hour, we must fail to get publicity in the Press, and accordingly the views of our constituencies cannot get ventilated. I consider that the manoeuvre of the Government this evening was very unworthy of them. They have treated these Estimates in such a manner as to force and compel all reasonable Members of the Committee to accede, if possible, to their request that the Vote should be taken; and considering the public duty that hon. Members have to perform, considering the necessity that we feel exists for the adequate discussion of these Estimates, we find ourselves, in fact, reluctantly obliged to refuse the Government that which they desire. Sir, I also believe that the language and tone of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) towards my hon. Friend the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was also a very unworthy proceeding, and I do not think that my words are at all too strong in saying that, for if we are to take our cue from the words and manner of the right hon. Gentleman, it would seem quite an unbecoming thing for an hon. Member of this House to bring forward an Amendment, or to make a Motion during the discussion of the Estimates. In the most emphatic manner possible I protest against such language, and against such a tone towards hon. Members when they find it necessary to prolong a discussion, in order to complain against the treatment of those who have substantial grievances to bring forward.

MR. JACKSON: I want to remove, so far as I can, the impressions formed from criticisms which proceed on an incorrect assumption. Let me say that nobody is responsible for unworthy conduct in connection with the placing of that Business on the Paper except myself. I entirely accept and take the whole responsibility, and there is no attempt to do otherwise. I placed the Business of the House on the Paper in the manner in which it stands, in discharge of a promise made by the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), and made at the request of hon. Members on the other side of the House; and, so far as I am able to judge, it was on the distinct understanding that the Vote on Account, which is so necessary to be taken to-night, was to be taken subsequently; and this was made last Friday morning, and renewed again at half-past 4 o'clock. I should very much like hon. Members to remember that if there is anyone to blame I am entirely to blame in this matter.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I confess I am in some difficulty in understanding the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen). He rather gave the Committee to understand that there was a change of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government as to the procedure on the Vote on Account, in consequence of the speech of my hon. Friend the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). As I understand, from about 11 o'clock to-night, the Government had the intention to force through both these Votes; and I feel perfectly convinced that the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton had nothing whatever to do with the Government's determination. I admit that I am somewhat surprised that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) should take such a ground. I asked the Question of the Government whether they did not intend, and whether they did not avow that intention, to take both these Votes. I did not understand in the least that any remarks of my hon. Friend had anything to do with the arrangements of the Government; and I think they ought to tell the House whether it was or was not the intention of the Government to force through, without discussion, both these Votes. There is another point to which I should like to call attention, and that is the circumstance which the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) has impressed upon us—namely, that there is some actual necessity for the Vote on Account to be taken to-night. We had the same point urged by the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith); but, though precedent completely cuts the ground from under his feet, I wish to state that, as this matter appears from this side of the House, it would seem that the Government is of opinion that there is an urgent necessity that this Vote should be pushed through to-night, discussed or unconsidered, on the score of time. Now, I submit that if this House is driven into a corner like this, it is the Government who have done the damage, and it is the duty of that Government to make such necessary changes and arrangements as will enable the Vote to conform with the law. It is not justifiable on the part of the Government to assume that in the case of the Votes being brought forward late they should be allowed to pass them through without discussion. It is surely the duty of the Government to bring in the Votes at such a time that the Committee of the House may not be deprived of a reasonable opportunity of examining and discussing them. It is a strange doctrine to promulgate that on account of the way in which the Government has arranged Public Business we are bound to forego discussion of important matters, in order to suit their convenience. Let us clearly understand that hon. Members from all parts of the United Kingdom regard this to be an altogether abnormal Session. The House has been almost entirely in the hands of the Government. Much time has been spent in discussing unnecessary changes in the Procedure of the House. This having been done, the Government have hinted to us that they intend to fully monopolize and absorb the time of the private Members, on the plea that that time is required for special Business. It seems to me that hon. Members of this House, though they may have other questions to consider, would be very remiss in their duty if they did not seize the only opportunity that is given for discussing questions of so much importance as these. I would venture to suggest to the House that a very fair and reasonable course to pursue at this time of night would be that if there is a disposition shown to let this Vote pass at a convenient time, the Vote on Account should be postponed until Thursday next, in order that hon. Members may have a chance of discussing matters of the highest importance. The main way in which the constituencies can be informed of what Business is passing in the House is through the Provincial Press; and if discussion on this matter is prolonged, a great deal which would have been interesting to the country and to the Irish constituencies will never reach them. I submit that it is utterly unreasonable that these important discussions should go on between the hours of 3 and 8 o'clock in the morning—unreasonable to Members who wish to take part in the debates, and unreasonable to the constituencies which desire to see that theirs and the country's interests have been attended to. The great security which Members have in this House is not the weight of the speaking in the House, but the weight of public opinion throughout the country. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on this side, for instance, are the Representatives of the overwhelming majority of public opinion in Ireland. I ask and appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to show to his Colleagues how desirable it is that this Vote on Account should be left until Thursday for discussion. I grant that if the matter were taken up again on Thursday the Government would be in a position to request to allow the Vote to pass without delay, and I am of opinion that such a request would be heeded. I feel satisfied that this appeal is deserving of the consideration of the Government, and I hope that right hon. Gentlemen opposite will see their way to take advantage of it. If it were necessary to my case, I could refer to the fact that, owing to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), it so happened that these Supplementary Votes were not further postponed; but I think, on the whole, the Government should give their serious consideration to the suggestion, and they will find that they could follow, in the circumstances, no better course.

Dr. CLARK: Might I point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) that it was on Friday morning, between the hours of 2 and 3 o'clock, that the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) mentioned about having these Votes discussed? A long discussion has taken place on a Vote which was not required, and after that the Government asks the House to begin a discussion at this time of the morning on most important subjects, and tells hon. Members that unless they do so it will be necessary to resort to an All-night Sitting. Now, that is a course which I think will meet with very little approval, and it seems to me that very little regard is being devoted to the interests of the constituencies, and more especially of the more remote portions of the United Kingdom. I might be allowed to tell the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there has been a strong growth of national life in Scotland and Ireland, and also in Wales. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite may laugh; but I am only telling what is a very patent fact, and one which they would do well to recognize, for, in consequence of that expanse of nationality, the feelings of the people have been affected regarding the ancient Celtic.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman might remember that the Motion before the House is that I "do now leave the Chair."

Dr. CLARK: I wished, Sir, to point out that the reason why we desire that you should leave the Chair is that other matters should be discussed—matters brought forward by Scotch and Welsh Members, and of the greatest importance to the Scotch and Welsh people. My hon. Friend the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), I feel sure, will, if we appeal to him, in order that very important matters may come before the House, withdraw his Motion regarding the Royal Palaces, Parks, and the like, for the purpose of giving Scotland and Wales half a chance of making known their public opinion on subjects chiefly concerning themselves.

Mr. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I consider, Sir, that no class of Members in this House have more reason to complain of the conduct of the Government, when matters concerning and interesting to that class are for discussion, than the Scotch Members. There are a number of Votes of a contentious character which we consider that it is our duty to call attention to and discuss. Thus there is the Vote for the Secretary for Scotland. The Government recently have made arrangements in regard to that Office of the most unsatisfactory character, and of such a character as demands a full discussion in this House. There are, again, matters concerning the Fishery Board of Scotland which also require careful consideration; and I could go on pointing out one Vote after another upon which it is the duty of the Scotch Members to express the inconvenience to which the people of Scotland have been subjected by the action and conduct of the Government. My experience of the present Government is this—that when there is an opportunity seriously to discuss questions affecting Scotland we ought not to forego that opportunity, because we may expect no consideration, no mercy, from the Government; for if it is possible for the Government to adopt and pursue arrangements which leave no facilities for the consideration of Scotch affairs, no other means will be provided in order to enable Scotch Members to express their opinions on matters most immediately affecting their constituencies. I wish to say that if, when we come to questions of the greatest importance to the people of Scotland, we are asked to discuss these questions at 3 o'clock in the morning, that is a proceeding so unsatisfactory to the people of Scotland that it will open their eyes to the utter hopelessness of carrying on the Business of Scotland in this House.

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I must say that I feel distressed when I see the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) rising in his place, with his face denoting the words of the old song, "Home, Sweet Home!"—and this indicates what is exactly in the right hon. Gentleman's heart; but, unfortunately, owing to the representations and remonstrances made by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on his own side of the House, he seems to be yielding to the policy which is implied in the words of the comic song, "We won't go Home till Morning."

Sir JAMES M'GAREL HOGG (Middlesex, Hornsey): I should like to ask you, Sir, what comic songs have to do with the Business of the House?

THE CHAIRMAN: I trust the hon. Gentleman will be more respectful to the Committee.

Mr. Hunter

Dr. TANNER: I will refer, Sir, to no more comic songs. But really, I think, when we take into consideration all the various remonstrances which have been addressed to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) and to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), that certainly some reasonableness should be shown, and the request made for opportunity of discussing important matters should be granted. The Vote under consideration this evening is one which I hope to say a few words about in connection mainly with the Medical Service in the Navy. In that Department there is a highly unsatisfactory condition of things; and I desire to bring attention to bear in debate upon matters of great grievance in regard to the various schools where medicine is a subject of instruction. I suppose the Government is acquainted with the fact that remonstrance is being made by the Royal College of Surgeons in Dublin; and I hope to be able to give them some information on this matter. Another point to which I want to call attention is about Haulbowline Dockyard. Now, these are two very important points; and I think, when the Government consider them carefully, they will find that it is not very right to ask the House to go on at this hour of the morning, instead of giving an opportunity for deliberate discussions of matters of grievance. And I maintain that we have a right to expect fair treatment, because I presume that hon. Members are sent to this House to represent constituencies which expect that they will see how the money which the taxpayers contribute is spent. That being so, I should certainly have thought that there would have been a tone of moderation, at any rate, assumed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), in accordance with the usual method of behaviour which has been the usage and custom with right hon. Gentlemen who are at the head of affairs; and that the right hon. Gentleman would have respected the assurances which he received from this side of the House—that if the Supplementary Vote were taken upon Thursday the debate on it would be curtailed, so far as hon. Members on this side of the House were concerned, within due and proper limits.

MR. LABOUCHERE: When the House has to decide whether it should proceed to discuss reductions of the Estimates or Coercion Bills, I think that it does better in choosing to discuss reductions in the Estimates. Therefore I do not see why, when a series of reductions of the Estimates are proposed, hon. Gentlemen ought to give way simply in order to give the Government greater time for their coming Coercion Act. As a matter of fact, the Government should recognize that the Irish Members are anxious to bring forward matters in reference to Ireland, and that they are bound to give fair hearing to the due Representatives of that country. In order to lighten the difficulties of the Government, I would make the proposition to the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), that if the Government will really not try to force this Vote through to-night, and offer to the Irish Members an opportunity to discuss their most devoted grievances, I will safely promise that, during the whole of the discussion, I will hold my tongue. I will further point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there is a way to get out of the difficulty that would arise, if the Government did not get the money. The amount of the Vote on Account is calculated at two months. I do not see why the House should not be asked to give the Government sufficient money for four or five days, and then we would be simply in the same position with regard to the discussion as before, and the items could be carefully considered. I am very anxious about the question whether, when the Government has put off the Estimates to the last moment, they have a right to keep forcing them simply for the purpose of getting more time for the Coercion Bill. We actually meet the Government more than half-way when we offer them sufficient money to carry on their Business, and ask in return only that, at a later day, an opportunity for criticism and consideration will be afforded to the House, and that the Government should not force this Vote down the throats of the Committee in order to gain more time for coercive legislation.

MR. CONYBEARE: I am in this difficulty—that I want to call minute attention to many matters in this Vote; and if we go on now I shall not have any opportunity of doing so with proper efficiency. Thus, there are the Votes for the Royal Palaces and Marlborough House. Now, I object to both of these in toto, and I desire to take a Division on the Vote; for I think that we ought not to pay £6,000 for the one and £500 for the other. I believe it is impossible for me to do my duty by my constituents, who are reasonable men, and object to these Votes, if the Government prevents me from taking an opportunity of doing it, for I cannot possibly place the views of my constituency before the Committee under present circumstances and conditions. There are a number of other items in this Vote which I am exceedingly desirous of having debated, for I have a very strong objection to have public money spent in many ways that it is spent. It would be utterly impossible, even if we proceeded at this time of the morning, to adequately discuss and consider matters of such large importance to the people of this country.

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.): The Government have told us that it is absolutely necessary that they should get this Vote to-night, and that they should get a grant of more than enough money to carry them over the next fortnight. But, Sir, it is a monstrous thing that for the next two months we should, practically speaking, be precluded raising questions regarding Ireland. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Akers-Douglas) has drawn attention to what he says took place in the early hours of Friday morning; but my distinct recollection of the compact is that the Vote on Account of the Civil Service Estimates was postponed in order to afford us an opportunity of discussing the whole Irish policy of the Government. It will be in the recollection of this House that my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cork (Mr. Hooper) sat on these Benches eight or 10 hours a few nights ago in order to secure an opportunity of raising a debate on a subject of great interest to his constituents, and of vital consequence to the people of Queenstown. Not wishing to interrupt the debate which was proceeding that evening, it was 1 o'clock before an opportunity was afforded him to speak on the question of the Haul-bowline Docks. He then put a series of questions to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty; and although he did not then press for specific explanations, he surely has a right to demand an answer to his many queries. He was placed in a disadvantageous position, because he did not like to interrupt the gallant Admirals who were addressing the House on naval questions. To-night we are placed in a like position, and for very similar reasons. Again the Admirals have occupied eight or 10 hours; and I do contend now that it is not fair and reasonable that we should now be called upon to discuss important questions. There are a number of topics which we might have discussed on the Navy Estimates, but we refrained from doing so. For instance, gunboats have been used in Ireland for the purpose of carrying troops, policemen, and bailiffs to the West and South Coasts. In regard to the Civil Service Estimates, there are a lot of questions on which we desire to have the verdict of the House of Commons. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has given Notice of a discussion he intends to initiate; and it is preposterous to say that at this hour a reasonable or useful debate could take place on it. In connection with these Civil Service Estimates, we shall be able to point out that illegal grants of money have been made by Government after Government, year after year; and one of these topics alone would be sufficient to occupy the time of the House for several hours. Again, we desire to have a debate on the riots at Belfast; and I repeat it is not fair at this time of the morning to ask us to commence it. If it is a question of sitting all night, I tell hon. Members opposite that we are as much accustomed to that as they are, and perhaps at the close of an All-night Sitting they would find that we did not come off second best. So far as I can learn, there is no reason in the world why the Government should not postpone this Vote until Thursday; and I would suggest that, if necessary, there might be a Saturday Sitting to take the Report stage. If they will adopt our suggestion, they will find that we are not unreasonable.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W): Mr. Courtney, I am very anxious that we should divide. I believe, after the remarks that have been made, we shall do so. And it will mean also nothing more than that right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite will out-vote us by a very large majority. But my point is this. We are here to represent the people who have elected us. I do not intend to keep the House very long; but I must say this—that it is physically impossible for people to apply themselves as they could wish to the performance of their duties if important debates are to be taken at such an unreasonable hour. I am putting my opposition to the Vote on the lowest ground possible—that of physical capability; but, as hon. Members are forcing me to do so, I will add a few words further as to my reasons for my present conduct. I consider that I have a serious and solemn duty to perform towards my constituents, and towards the country generally. I can only say that if this Vote is pressed we shall certainly persevere in discussing it; and I must add, Mr. Courtney, that up to the present it certainly cannot be stated that the obstructive talk in this House has come from these Benches. The time of the House has been occupied by hon. and gallant Admirals and hon. and gallant Generals and Captains. Does the Committee understand what it is doing? Does it understand what the right hon. Gentlemen the Leaders of the House want it to do? They have taken up the Vote, and they carry it on until they have practically exhausted the whole time of the House for discussion, and then they run a red herring across the Vote, and want to pass the Civil Service Estimates in the scent of that red herring, and under the cover of the Naval Votes.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): The hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson), when he last addressed the House, stated that at the request of the Irish Members the Naval Vote was put before the Civil Service Estimates for discussion. Now, Mr. Courtney, I submit that that is not so. The hon. Gentleman, I freely admit, is a most straightforward man; and I do not think he would wilfully make a misstatement. But, Sir, I myself was deeply interested in the final scene of the night to which the hon. Gentleman referred; and my recollection is that no request was made from the Irish Benches for the Naval Estimates to be put before the Civil Service Estimates.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I did not say that the request was made by the Irish Members. What I said was that they were put on in that order in discharge of a promise, made by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, that an opportunity should be afforded for further discussion of the Navy Votes on the item for clothing.

MR. LANE: I readily accept the explanation of the hon. Gentleman. What I wish the House to understand is that we are not responsible for the Civil Service Estimates being reached at so late an hour. The Government, with the best intentions possible, no doubt, have made a serious mistake; but I do not see why we should be asked to place ourselves in a ridiculously false position simply because the Government have done so. The truth is that when we are supposed by the Government and their supporters to be fagged out, they commence the discussion of an important Vote, in the hope that it will be quickly passed. I say it is simply ridiculous to ask the Irish Members to discuss the Civil Service Votes at this hour in the morning. We are not responsible for their coming on so late as half-past 3, and therefore I think we are quite justified in asking that they be adjourned.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 199: Majority 138.—(Div. List, No. 71.) [3.25 A.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): This question of the Naval Vote is not altogether exhausted, and is one on which there ought to be some further discussion. For my own part, I strongly object to sitting up until this totally unreasonable hour, and to discussing the Navy Estimates at such a time. Still, if we are to have a discussion, I suppose I may as well put some questions to the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton). I had intended to put them earlier in the evening, and they are certainly important questions. It may be some relief to the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone the Junior Lord of the Admiralty (Lord Charles Beresford), if he has to sit up, to be able to turn to the subject of the Navy Estimates. The first question I wish to ask is one which I put to the Government last year. There are a great many ways of attacking in naval warfare. We all are acquainted with the gun and the torpedo; but there is another system of warfare which, it seems to me, the Government are very much neglecting, and that is the system of submarine warfare. I allude, not to submarine mines, but to submarine boats. I think I saw in the papers some time ago that the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone went down in one of those boats. Whether this be so or not, I am of a very strong opinion that this is a very dangerous system of warfare, and one which we are totally neglecting. I would ask the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has done anything in the direction of trying the Nordenfeldt boats? I have not seen any of those boats, but I have carefully read a lecture respecting them, and I think that Mr. Nordenfeldt's system is a perfectly feasible one. I am quite aware that it is not a system of warfare which is yet entirely developed, and that it is one which is disliked by naval men. I know of one gallant officer, a Member of this House, who says that he would give no quarter to people who attacked under the water. The hon. and gallant Gentleman thinks it is quite fair to fight on the surface of the water, but that it is very wicked to do so under the surface. There is, therefore, a certain amount of prejudice against this method of warfare. I think, however, that, by the expenditure of a small amount of money—say £10,000 or £15,000—the Government might obtain some very important experiments regarding it. The last time I drew attention to this subject in the House, I was asked by a naval officer—the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price)—whether I was aware that one of the Nordenfeldt boats had gone to the bottom? The hon. and gallant Gentleman, however, afterwards admitted to me that he did not know himself that the fact was as he suggested, but that he put the question because he thought it might be so. I have recently read of some experiments at Constantinople with Nordenfeldt boats, and I think they were tolerably successful. I may say, Sir, that I would much rather have drawn attention to this subject at a reasonable hour; but I think that if we are to continue sitting here we may as well talk sense. The second question I have to put to the Government is as to what the Admiralty are going to do with respect to the manufacture of artillery. Last year the question of naval guns came before the House, and it was stated that the Naval Authorities had arrived at the conclusion that for the future they would be responsible for their own guns. Now, I should like to obtain some information on that point. What are the Naval Authorities going to do? Are they going to set up a large arsenal of their own, or are they entering into large contracts with Elswick, and with other large firms? I may be told that I was one of those who objected to the Admiralty manufacturing their own guns. Well, what I objected to was a system under which we should have two sets of people making guns, as I thought it would lead to double expense in the matter of superintendence, as well as to divergences in the types adopted, which might be very awkward in time of war. At the same time, I should like to know whether the proposal I have referred to is to be carried into effect, or whether matters are to go on much as they did before? My own idea on the subject is that if the Admiralty do not think that they are sufficiently considered by the Ordnance Board they ought to have one Committee, and not two, to deal with the subject. You will see, Sir, that I have only spoken on scientific questions, and I have done so because there are present a good many scientific men from whom we may get information.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): Mr. Courtney, I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to the action of the Admiralty in the Corea.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member will not be in Order in doing that.

MR. MOLLOY: What I intend to do, Sir, is to go through the Correspondence which has been issued by the Admiralty, and placed in the hands of Members within the last few days, in regard to the action of our Fleet at Port Hamilton, in the Corea.

THE CHAIRMAN: That course would not be in Order.

MR. MOLLOY: I will not dispute your ruling, Sir; but I may point out that the cost of victualling these ships is in the Vote. The action I refer to was taken by the Admiralty, and we are discussing the Admiralty Vote.

Colonel Nolan

CAPTAIN PRICE: Mr. Courtney, I rise to Order. I beg to ask you, Sir, whether what occurred at Port Hamilton would come under this Vote?

MR. MOLLOY: I may say that Port Hamilton is referred to as a coaling station.

THE CHAIRMAN: The items in the Vote refer to the coming year, and transactions which have taken place at Port Hamilton last year cannot be discussed under them.

MR. MOLLOY: The Estimates include a sum of money which was spent there.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood) (Lancashire, Ormskirk): The hon. Member is referring to the Supplementary Estimates, which have already been passed.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): There is a considerable increase in one item of this Vote—namely, that relating to the victuals and clothing of seamen and Marines; but, before drawing attention to the manner in which the contracts for these victuals are issued, I desire to say a few words on the matters introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for East Cork (Mr. Lane). I do so because I see the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) in his place, and I desire to draw his attention particularly to the situation of Haulbowline Docks. I protest against those Docks being left in their present disgraceful state. It is a crying shame and a scandal that the Haulbowline Docks, after so much money has been spent on them, should be allowed to remain in such a condition. I do not regret that the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) has left his place, because I think that when he visits Cork Harbour he seems to have an eye only for the beauties of the view. The view is a very beautiful one; but, when he looks at it, he keeps carefully closed that particular eye which would embrace Haulbowline Docks. The bare and naked state of those Docks really spoils the beauty of the scene. I would appeal to the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Marylebone to say whether it would not be well that the Docks should be put into such a condition as would enable himself or any other naval commander to go there for repairs if unhappily his vessel should be disabled at any time. I may say that Cork Harbour is one of the strongest harbours in the world. Naturally, it is a strong harbour. Long before the forts which protect the entrance were built, a great Commander, of whose courage there could be no doubt, was obliged to take refuge in Cork Harbour, and we still point with pride to a small river which falls into the harbour, and which is called Drake's Pool. It was there that Admiral Drake took refuge, and when the Spaniards came in after him they failed to find him.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must warn the hon. Member that he is excessively irrelevant.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I should indeed be sorry, Mr. Courtney, if you should find it necessary to accuse me of irrelevancy. What I want to point out to the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Marylebone is that Cork Harbour has been fortified in such a way as to make it impossible for any enemy to reach the Haulbowline Docks whilst the forts are armed with their present big guns. The erection of the forts has had such an effect upon the Docks as to make them perfectly safe for the building or repairing of vessels. It would, therefore, be for the interest of the Public Service if the Department to which the noble and gallant Lord belongs would ask for such additional supplies as would enable it to put the Docks in such a condition that they would be available in time of war for the repair of disabled vessels. I think it is perfectly disgraceful to the Public Service that these Docks should have been in course of erection for as many as 22 years. Only a small sum of money is asked for this year in respect of the Docks. Last year money was granted for the purpose of building an engine-shed and obtaining machinery; but the shed has not yet been built and the machinery has not yet arrived at the Docks. Indeed, nothing has been done by the Department which proves the least desire on the part of the Naval Authorities to make the Docks what they should be—a credit to the Department and an advantage to the State. I believe that there is some difficulty in the way. The noble and gallant Lord thinks, perhaps, that Haulbowline can scarcely be available as a naval station.

It seems contrary to common sense, however, that any man of experience can think so. Surely a harbour that has in the past played such an important part in the protection of the Navy of these countries can still be used for that purpose. It seems only reasonable to suppose that the further use of that harbour would be for the advantage of the Public Service. I should be glad if the noble and gallant Lord is able to give me such an answer as will relieve my mind from the distress I always feel when I look at these unfinished Docks. It has been pointed out already that my country contributes largely to the Imperial Exchequer for the construction and maintenance of the Navy, and that only a very small portion of the funds so provided are devoted to naval construction and to naval matters in Ireland. I leave it to the noble and gallant Lord to justify the lamentable negligence of the Admiralty Department in regard to the Haulbowline Docks. I am particularly anxious that the Docks should be completed at an early date, for I believe that we Irishmen shall soon have a greater interest in the construction and maintenance of the Navy than we have cared to evince in the past, and nothing would give us greater pleasure than to have these Docks completed and contributing to the defence of the common Empire in which we all hope to take such an increased interest after certain events have transpired. And now I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to a matter of comparatively minor importance. I find in the Estimates that there is an increase of £27,600, caused principally, I understand, by the additional prices for victualling, for stores, and so forth. Now, I believe it is a wrong principle to go outside the country for the food supplies of the Navy. If in time of war your foreign food supplies are cut off, you will find that you have allowed those sources of supply to perish that would have afforded you an ample supply. It should be the policy of the Naval Authorities to encourage the home trade as much as possible. The experience of the Crimean Campaign would illustrate my meaning when I seek to impress on the Government the necessity of having in a flourishing, capable condition those institutions and firms in the country capable of supplying the needs of the

Navy. It is the custom of the Navy to send to Denmark for their mess pork. We do not know what political combinations may be brought about; but we may imagine a war between this country and a State with which Denmark is allied, and then we should be deprived of this source of supply, and we should be compelled to rely on home supply, which would be found as unsatisfactory as it was in the Crimean War. The manner in which the meat was made up and its quality was a source of reproach then, and has continued so since. It was found, too, that the trades not having been encouraged by Government orders, they had not the necessary machinery and appliances, and broke down under the unaccustomed strain; they could not execute the orders they received from the Army and Navy. Only a short time since a large quantity of pork in casks was found among the stores at Haulbowline, and it had evidently lain there ever since the time of the Crimean War—a disgraceful thing reflecting anything but credit on the management of a great Department, which at the same time neglected institutions that could serve them well in time of war, sending money out of the country, while the trade at home languished. Because of a small advance in price I hold that such a policy is a false economy. There are tradesmen anxious to contract for this class of supplies. Only recently I was speaking to the manager of a large firm in the South of Ireland, and he told me that he could not think of tendering for Navy contracts, because of the vexatious conditions in the form of contract that contractors were obliged to sign—conditions that restrict the meat supply to one class of animal. But foreign contractors were free from those conditions, and made up their meat supply in such a manner as to deceive the experts. Now, regulations of this kind should be swept away or stringently enforced. If the examination of supplies were strictly performed, it would be found that a considerable quantity of contraband meat is imported, made up by foreign tradesmen whose dishonesty almost equalled their dishonesty. For mess pork there is no need to go beyond Ireland; Irish pork having a world-wide fame. Ireland might be said to be the home of the pig; it is indigenous to the soil. The animal is the friend of the family; he pays the rent, the taxes too, and I have no doubt his resources, if called upon, would be equal to supplying the British Fleet. There is no need to go beyond Ireland for these contracts, and I cannot believe that when the matter comes before the Admiralty Board this grievance will be disregarded. There is a peculiar knack among Admiralty officials of clinging tenaciously to old practices, bad though they may be, and this though, year after year, attention might be drawn in the House to these malpractices. I hope the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty will take some notice of these matters, which I have brought forward without any desire to waste the time of the Committee. Honestly, I have never spoken a word in Committee, and I have always manifested a desire to fortify myself with the Votes. There is no reason why Queenstown should not become an important naval station, after works have proceeded for the past 22 years. The day may arrive when the Admiralty will regret this neglect, and the noble Lord should take the matter into his serious consideration and signalize his entry into Office by a work of which he might well be proud.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): When I see stretched before me the recumbent forms of so many sleeping Ministers, I doubt the advisability of bringing any more matters before the attention of the Committee; but we are bound not to waste the time of the Committee, and as I have not been permitted at an earlier hour of mentioning one or two questions I will take the opportunity of making the reference now. The hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) alluded to the cheapness of Dockyard as distinguished from contract building; and if I refer to that for a moment, it is with a view of calling the attention of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty—who has everything connected with the Admiralty at his finger ends—to another matter in which it might be advantageous to give to the Dockyards work now undertaken by contractors. I allude to the breaking up of old vessels. The noble and gallant Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) prides himself on being the most destructive Lord of the Admiralty the country has ever seen; for he asks for the destruction of I do not know how many different vessels of the Fleet at present scattered over the face of the seas. Now, I should like to know whether the noble Lord judges it would be cheaper that these vessels should be sold to contractors to be broken up, or whether it would be cheaper to break them up in the Dockyards? I refer to specific instances to illustrate what I mean. Recently, in the Hamoaze I saw a number of old unarmoured vessels which I was given to understand had been sold to contractors to be broken up. Now, at the same time when these vessels were being thus disposed of, men were being discharged from the Dockyard by the present Government because there was not work for them to do. I put it, therefore, to the noble Lord—if the contractors find they can make a profit by buying and breaking up old vessels, could not the Government make the same or more profit by having such vessels broken up in the Dockyards, selling or using the old materials? It seems to me that the profit in the business might as well be in the pockets of the nation as in those of contractors, and especially when the want of employment has led to the discharge of Dockyard workmen, and a consequent addition to the distress for want of employment. There is, too, another point in connection with the matter I have referred to. We are very much exercised now as to what is to be done to relieve the excessively congested districts in some parts of Ireland; and though it may seem an extraordinary non sequitur to connect this with the old ships of the Navy, I venture to suggest would it not be possible to send some of these old vessels, no longer fit for sea service, to the firths and estuaries of Great Britain and Ireland, to afford some means of exciting the interest of the unfortunate youth in congested agricultural districts, and perhaps encouraging some of them to seek a sphere of employment beyond the land that will not support them, taking them from the small holdings for which by farming industry they cannot pay rent? It seems to me here is some assistance towards the solution of a difficulty which Her Majesty's Government—when they have got coercion out of their mind—might well take into consideration. These vessels would be useful to the people, as teaching them something about the Naval Service, and you might form small naval establishments thereon with results beneficial to the nation and the unfortunate inhabitants of congested districts. Another question I should like to ask has reference to a couple of small vessels which, during last autumn, I saw building in a private yard at Falmouth. I should like to know what has become of them? When I saw them I had some conversation with the superintendent of the yard, and I learned that the lines upon which the vessels were laid down had been altered several times, and it was considered probable that more orders and countermands would be received. The vessels were ordered by the penultimate Board of Admiralty in the previous year—I do not know whether it was necessary to produce a favourable impression in Falmouth in view of a General Election—and I understand these vessels are not yet completed, after having gone through such a variety of changes that the builders scarcely know what to make of them. I have nothing to say for or against the necessity of building these vessels, or of the propriety of ordering them at this particular yard; but it is very desirable that when a vessel is ordered we should endeavour to make a good job of the business, which appears to me an impossibility when the plans are changed almost every other week. Having put these observations before the Committee on matters I should have liked to have touched upon earlier, I should now like to bring before the Committee another matter. We are well aware that a Commission is at present inquiring into the question of those scandals that have arisen in connection with the supply of stores—it is called, I believe, the Ordnance Inquiry Commission. At the head of that Commission is a distinguished Judge—Sir James Fitzjames Stephen—and what has happened in this inquiry should, I think, have the notice of the Committee and the Government. There is a gallant officer—Major Arnott—who has been chiefly instrumental in procuring inquiry into various allegations. He has been treated with anything but fairness by the Head of that Commission, Sir James Stephen—almost with a want of courtesy. I do not dwell on that; I only want the Committee to understand how this inquiry, which is of vital importance to officials at the head of Departments and all who desire that the Service should be supplied with cartridges that do not jam, and bayonets that do not buckle up, and to keep contractors from preying on the innocence of Government Inspectors, is conducted. It is most essential that an inquiry of this kind should be conducted with every desire and every effort to reach the guilty parties, and where there are such to put a stop to abuses. Major Arnott says, in a letter he has published, that Sir James Stephen—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member it is rather an abuse of the proceedings of the Committee to question the conduct of a Commission still sitting.

MR. CONYBEARE: I do not wish to do anything that is unfair; my real object is to draw attention to the published letter of this gentleman. I thought I should not have been out of Order, because Sir James Stephen is acting not as a Judge, but as Head of a Commission. I will only ask the noble Lord, and those who take an interest in the subject, to see for themselves what are the allegations made by Major Arnott, and to consider whether, from the point of view I have taken, and having in view the stress laid upon this matter by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, if anything has been going wrong every effort should be made to track out the offenders, and no endeavour should be permitted by anyone, however elevated, to prevent that being done. These are the more important matters among those I wished to bring forward at the earliest opportunity that presented itself. Some other questions I may touch upon later, but they concern a humbler class of individuals—the unfortunate hard-working men in the lower ranks of the Navy who have no opportunity of speaking for themselves, and have few friends to speak for them; but it would be better to follow the example of others, and wait for the return of representatives of the Press to the Gallery.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I should certainly have spoken in detail before if I thought that the Business would be going on. But now, as Business appears to be proceeding, I should be wanting in my duty as a Member of this House if I did not—and I should very much like to do so—call attention to at least three different sets of facts which are all important in connection with the Vote at present before us. The first point which I shall bring under the notice of hon. Members is in regard to the Naval Medical Service clustering around which there are a number of abuses which give such strong ground of grievances that they merit the careful consideration of the House. In going into the history of that Service—

THE CHAIRMAN: The Naval Medical Service is not in this Vote at all.

DR. TANNER: I was not, Sir, going to specifically apply my remarks to the Naval Medical Service; but I was merely going to explain in a general way the causes of the discontent of the medical officers in that Service, and—[“Order!” “Question!”] Then, Sir, I shall simply proceed now to the Haulbowline affair, about which I shall adduce some important facts or series of facts. I cannot help wondering, Sir, at the immense amount of ignorance which is displayed by officials who are placed in important positions; and in particular relation to this subject I think that no one can fail to be struck in regard to these docks or prospective docks at Haulbowline with the large amount of ignorance on necessary matters on the part of the Admiralty officials of the present Government. I took the trouble when I was last in Cork to visit these docks, and I found very great difficulty indeed in getting round to see them, because the officials there appear to be conserving the secrets of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton). You have in this Dockyard a large floating dock, an outer dock, and one dry dock, which is simply but the last monument of naval incapacity in dealing with practical matters. This naval dock has been dug out at the right-hand side of the floating dock. It was originally intended that a second dock should have been constructed; but this was the manner in which that was done. Practically, the workmen were directed to excavate the wrong dock first. One of the sites at their disposal could easily be excavated, because it was muddy; but the other site was a portion of an island known as “Rat Island,” and they actually went and blasted out the rock, and left the interspaces on these rocks, which made the leaks of which so much was heard about in the course of the last Session of Parliament. But, in order to show further the lamentable ignorance and incapacity of the authorities in choosing this right-hand site for a dock, I may mention that they ran it close to the deep water, and, of course, the running water in the deep channel filtered through into the dock, and caused most of the trouble complained of. Now, the authorities are trying to mend their hand with the same damaging incompetency. As yet they have not finished the stone fastening of the floating dock, which is left very incomplete, and the reason given for this neglect was because that it was intended to go on with the construction of a second dock. And, again, now we hear that there is a new development, and that this is not their purpose at all; but that they are going to discharge from employment all the hands whom they have hitherto utilized in connection with the construction of these Docks. The authorities, I insist, are acting in ignorance, and in a wilful way which I do not think they will find the country able to endorse. They are discharging their hands without having completed the channel, and they have directed that a great deal of the work —

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I rise to Order, Sir. I beg to move "That the Question be now put."

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The time has now come to make a serious appeal to Her Majesty's Government, and hon. Gentlemen opposite will not be surprised to hear that my argument will be in the form of the Motion that you, Sir, report Progress. We have had a very interesting discussion on the Navy Estimates; we have prolonged that discussion until the early hours in the morning; yet we are now asked to vote a sum of £3,624,100 on account of the Civil Service Estimates. It must occur even to hon. Gentlemen opposite that this is not an hour at which such a Vote should be moved, and such a discussion as must follow upon it should take place. Under these circumstances, I do hope that the Government themselves will see that in common fairness to the House—not only to Members on this side, but also to those sitting behind Ministers—they should not press it. I am always anxious to pour oil on troubled waters, and I would therefore make a practical suggestion to Her Majesty's Government. They tell us that they must have some money to-night in any case. I would suggest that, instead of asking for a Supply sufficient for two months, they should take a sum to carry them over 10 days or a fortnight. During the fortnight surely the Government will be able to find some day to bring on the Estimates, and give an opportunity for their adequate discussion. Hon. Gentlemen from Ireland have so far been unable to discuss questions of moment to their countrymen, because some hon. Gentlemen opposite have pursued the somewhat remarkable course of putting on the Paper Motions which probably they never had the slightest intention to make. Therefore, this is the only opportunity left to my hon. Friends behind me to discuss these matters—at any rate for some months to come; and I think that, under these circumstances, the Government will accede to the request I have to make.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

opposite, who says it is his occupation to pour oil on troubled waters. He can hardly have made his request, that we should take enough money for a fortnight only, seriously. Why, that period would arrive in the middle of what I hope will prove to us a period of some holiday and some rest, and it would only defer for a short time the inconvenience we now wish to avoid. I am sorry to say that we must ask the Committee at this Sitting to give us the Vote which we ask.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I think there is another course open to the right hon. Gentleman, and though I cannot pledge English, Scotch, and Welsh Members definitely, I am in a position to speak for my Colleagues. There are in these Votes certain sums of money for services rendered in Ireland which are of great interest to my countrymen. The Irish Members are being unfairly and unjustly treated. An effort is being made, by means of a trick, to get through the House—to smuggle through the House—Votes which the Government must know we regard as highly contentious. I was silenced here one night while endeavouring to direct attention to the action of the Bankruptcy Court in Ireland, and I undoubtedly looked forward to this opportunity to bring under the notice of this House practices on the part of that Court the like of which has not existed for the last 25 years. Do the Government for one moment suppose that 60 or 70 Irish Members are going to be silent while money is voted away for the purposes of that Court? If they do, they have made a mistake. I am laying before this Committee reasons which compel us to criticize and oppose to the best of our ability some of these Votes. Certain questions are convulsing Ireland at this moment, and if money is to be voted to enable operations against which we wish to protest to be carried on we shall do our best to oppose the Vote. I can mention other Votes which are contentious if necessary. I think it is hardly decent on the part of the Government to endeavour to smuggle this Vote through at such an hour. They were ready enough to withdraw the Navy Vote, but that offer was made at an hour which did not appear to me to be fair, and therefore with my Colleagues I opposed it. The Government told us they would withdraw it in order to bring on the Civil Service Votes, but how could we hope to discuss them adequately at that time of night? One of the items is for the Irish Chief Secretary's Office. A man has recently gone to that country to govern it without knowing anything about it. His action threatens us day by day with bloodshed. Can the Government be serious in asking that this Committee, without discussing what he did in Dublin, should vote money to enable him to carry on his Office without criticism for several months? As long as we have power in this Committee, and so long as the Government denies us the right to discuss at such length as is reasonable and fair, Votes which are of the most vital, and it may be of the most deadly import to our constituencies—Votes which, if allowed to pass to-night, will deprive us of the power of criticizing the action of the Department for months to come—we will oppose them by every means in our power. Why, in these months events may occur which none of us can forecast, and we should be false to our duty if we, by our action, justified the action of the Government in imagining that they could get these Votes through without adequate discussion otherwise than by brute force. For myself, I am perfectly prepared now to enter on the discussion, and if, by exercising the Rule they passed only yesterday, they thrust down our throats Votes the discussion of which should occupy eight or ten hours, I am convinced that the public of this country will not approve of their action.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I desire to point out in very few words that this is a matter which concerns not merely Ireland, but the people of England and their Representatives in this House. It must be understood that this money comes from the pockets of the British taxpayer, who therefore has a right to carefully criticize how it is to be spent. I, for one, am not in the least disposed to forego my right and my privilege in this respect as the Representative of the people to criticize any detail which may suggest itself to me. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House expressed surprise that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) should have proposed this Motion, and he seemed to treat the whole thing as a joke. I can assure him that if he chooses to play practical jokes we do not, and we are perfectly serious in making this Motion. Indeed, we shall be equally serious in making as many more as we consider necessary. He seems also to consider it an outrageous proposal, and he rests his objection to it on the ground that they must have money for the next two months. We have told them we are willing to give enough for a fortnight or three weeks. What I want to point out to the Government is this—if they are content to accept our compromise and take a Vote on Account—say, for a fortnight—it only requires that they should give up one day to us. They have every day at their disposal between this and the holidays. It is but a small thing to ask them to set apart one day for us to discuss the Vote, as all they have as an alternative is the introduction of a fresh Coercion Bill. For all I know we may sit here all day. I know hon. Members opposite have been burning for this for weeks; but we are bound to consider, if not our own, at least the health of other people—of the servants of this House. There are the attendants, the Clerks at the Table, and the policemen on duty outside; they cannot, like many hon. Members, make up for this long Sitting by taking extra sleep later on. Supposing this Sitting is to continue all day, will these men be relieved from their posts? If hon. Members are callous to their own suffering, I say it is monstrous and scandalous that we should tax the energies and sacrifice the health of our servants.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I am not surprised, Mr. Courtney, at the prospect held out in the brief speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House. He has, I think, made an unprecedented proposal. I am old at this kind of thing, and I call it unprecedented to ask the Committee at half-past 5 in the morning to vote £3,500,000 for the purpose of carrying on the Public Service. We are surprised; but we are not disheartened at the action of the Government. I speak with some confidence, and after an experience of seven years, and I say the Irish Members here, and some English Members too, both below and above the Gangway, are as ready, as willing, and as able as any

hon. Members opposite to proceed to continue this Sitting until the time arrives for Mr. Speaker to take the Chair on the Sitting of Tuesday, the 22nd March. Now, Sir, the First Lord of the Treasury, in the exercise of what I suppose I am obliged to call his discretion, has thought fit to refuse his assent to the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton. Well, I very respectfully and humbly, as befits my position, venture to express a doubt that the right hon. Gentleman has acted wisely. I think he must have already perceived that the grossness of the mismanagement of the Business of this House in the present Sitting has not been equalled for many years. There were three courses open to the Government at the present Sitting for the furtherance of Public Business, and they took the least convenient. If they had placed the Vote on Account first on the Paper they might have obtained a Division upon it at the usual time for the closing of ordinary Sittings of this House. If, on the other hand, they had been content to take a Division on the Navy Vote at half-past 12 they could have had £1,250,000. But nothing satisfied them except to cram both Votes into one Sitting of the House, and I venture to hope they will find it impossible to do so.

MR. NOBLE (Hastings): Mr. Courtney, I rise to Order. I wish to ask you whether the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) is in Order in saying that hon. Members on this side of the House are drunk?

THE CHAIRMAN: I did not hear the words used, even as repeated by the hon. Gentleman.

CAPTAIN COTTON (Cheshire, Wirral): I beg to say, Sir, that I heard the hon. Member for Mid Cork use those words.

THE CHAIRMAN: The words have not reached this end of the House in any form.

CAPTAIN COTTON: I heard the hon. Member for Mid Cork say, Sir, that one Member on this side of the House was drunk.

THE CHAIRMAN: Such an observation, if made by the hon. Member for Mid Cork, is most offensive and improper.

DR. TANNER: (Cork Co., Mid): But, Mr. Courtney, I must ask you—[Ministerial cries of "Withdraw!"] I am not going to withdraw, Sir. [Renewed cries of "Withdraw!"] If the hon. Member opposite will point out any person to whom I said it, I will withdraw.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is most offensive and disorderly to say it of any Member of the House. I must now call on the hon. Member to withdraw the observation as he does not disavow it.

DR. TANNER: Mr. Courtney, I shall certainly, out of respect for you, withdraw anything you tell me to withdraw.

MR. SEXTON: I was saying, Mr. Courtney, when I was interrupted, that the Government ought to have granted us an opportunity for properly discussing the Vote on Account. They have pursued a course which is unfair and inconsiderate to the Members of this House, and which will be regarded as unfair by men of all political Parties. They put first on the Paper a Vote for the Navy, and they place second the Vote of over £3,000,000—a Vote involving the whole Public Service of Ireland. This course has been pursued by the Government in the hope that when we reached the Vote on Account at a late hour at night they might gag the Irish Members with regard to questions of vital importance and of manifest urgency. I turn now for a moment to the question of physical endurance. [Ministerial cries of "Question!"] Well, if there is anything more relevant to the present situation of the Committee than the question of physical endurance I should be glad to hear what it is. We have been here for 13 or 14 hours. Eleven hours hence, that is to say at about 5 o'clock to-day, we shall be called upon to discuss a question which the Government themselves regard as of such unequalled urgency that they intend to ask for the whole of the time of the House for the purpose of discussing it. Now, Sir, I ask is it fair, is it seemly, under such circumstances, to proceed with this Vote now? [An hon. MEMBER: Yes.] The hon. Gentleman opposite showed such extremely bad judgment, as well as bad taste, in a recent episode, that I do not think it necessary to reply to his interruption. I ask whether it is reasonable to go on, when Members have been here so many hours, and when we know that there is only time enough left for us to get to our homes, obtain the necessary natural rest, and come back to the House before the Speaker takes the Chair for this evening's Sitting? Is it fair to ask us to approach the consideration of the question of precedence for the Irish Coercion Bill, which, I am told, contains novel and startling provisions—to approach the consideration of that question with our minds worn out, and with our bodies jaded? The Government want to go on with the Vote on Account. The Vote on Account includes a sum of money for the Office of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Where is the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour)? Where is the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes)? I believe that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland is wandering gloomily somewhere about the premises; but I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is at a distance from the House. The Attorney General for Ireland may be competent to deal with some legal questions, although some doubt has arisen on that point since the right hon. and learned Gentleman formulated his opinion respecting the Plan of Campaign; but, assuming that he is, is he to be allowed to be the mouthpiece of the Irish Executive on any large question of policy which may be raised? We intend to raise the question of the death, or, as some consider it, the murder, of the boy O'Hanlon, of Youghal, the question of Proclamations by the Lord Lieutenant, and the question of social order in Belfast. Will the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) contend that it is seemly or tolerable that we should be asked at this hour of the morning to bring forward questions of such urgency and gravity when the Minister of the Crown responsible for the affairs of Ireland is not here to answer us? I think I am perfectly justified in pleading that we should not be called upon to do so. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant is elsewhere taking his natural rest, or is preparing his mind for that masterly and memorable statement of policy which is expected from him this evening. Is it fair to allow the right hon. Gentleman that rest, and to reduce us, by continued attendance in the House, to such a condition of mind and body that when the evening comes we shall be unable to answer him? I wish to ask another question, Sir. Have the Government considered what will be the probable length of this Sitting? I think we ought to have some information on the subject before we proceed any further. Do the Government contemplate sitting all day? Do they mean to allow the Sitting of the 21st of March to merge in the Sitting of the 22nd? Hon. Gentlemen may find that the result may be confusing, because, if the two Sittings are merged, what will become of the Order of Business set down for the 22nd? The plan of the Government was that this evening the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, should move for precedence for the stages of the Bill it is intended to bring in to apply coercion to Ireland. If we continue sitting, I apprehend that the Business on the Paper for this evening will lapse, and that the only Business to be done to-day will be the Business of the Vote on Account. I ask Gentleman opposite who have a taste for mathematics to tot up the balance of advantages, and to see whether they are really gaining any time by the course they are now taking. I heard somewhere recently that Irishmen, compared with Englishmen, are taller men, stronger men, and men of greater endurance. The majority opposite are anxious for a compromise, and are crying out for conciliation. [Mr. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): Oh, oh!] I am too well acquainted with the heroic nature of the hon. Member to think that he would ever do so. At all events, Gentlemen opposite may be anxious for a compromise at 4 o'clock this afternoon, when, perhaps, we shall be no longer in a melting mood. It may interest the House to know that a large batch of eloquent, and some of them, perhaps, prolix Members, are arriving from Ireland by a train which reaches Euston at half-past 6, having occupied Pullman cars on the journey. We have taken the precaution, Sir, to despatch a messenger to Euston to bring them to the House of Commons. On the whole, Sir, I think that, considering the amount of this Vote and the questions involved in it, there is no prospect of an early termination of this Sitting, and that the Sittings of the 21st and 22nd of March will be merged into one another, to the no small confusion of the Public Business. I can confidently say to the Committee that not only will the numerous questions in this Vote relating to Ireland be raised as long, Sir, as you consider that the rights of the minority entitle them to raise them; but they will none of them be discussed with any less fulness than if we were conducting a debate at half-past 5 in the evening. Now, I desire that fair progress should be made with the Public Business, and I would suggest to Members of the Government that the most sensible thing they can do, seeing that the Procedure Rules have been given Notice of for Thursday, and that the only urgent Rule of Procedure has been passed, is to alter the arrangements so far as to put down Procedure for another day, and to take this Vote on Account on Thursday. I think my Colleagues will bear me out when I say that we would undertake, notwithstanding the urgent and important character of the questions involved in this Vote, that the Division upon it should be taken at a reasonable time. Now, Sir, I think I have made the largest and most reasonable offer that could be made, and, if it is refused by the Government, there is nothing for it but to fight the question out. Of one thing I am sure, and that is, that when this battle is over, it is not the Irishmen in this House who will feel discomfited and defeated.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Mr. Courtney, I did not vote against the majority in the last Division because I thought that there was some ground on which the Government might urge that full debate had taken place on the Navy Estimates. But I think the situation is altogether changed now. In my opinion, we are entitled to say that the Government are turning the Business of this House topsy-turvy. They are turning our days into nights, and they are driving us into a situation which I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Courtney, is becoming intolerable. No one, not even the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), if he were here, or even the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith), could deny that hon. Members are within their rights, upon the Motion which, you, Sir, have put from the Chair, in discussing any item in the Civil Service Estimates. I will go further, and say that not only are Gentlemen within their rights in taking that course, but that it is their bounden duty, under the special circumstances into which we are thrown by the action of the Government, to raise any question in which they are interested, and to discuss it at length. The prospect before us is altogether uncertain. The Government are at this moment seeking to get Votes on Account, whereby they will be able to postpone any Vote in the Estimates for the period of a couple of months. The Government have been taking all the time of private Members, and if even there was an occasion when such Members were entitled to take the first opportunity of discussing matters in which they are interested, I think that time has arrived. No answer has been given from the Front Bench opposite to the appeal which has just been made that this Vote on Account might be taken up on Thursday, and discussed at a reasonable hour and in a fair way. On the Vote which we have just passed there was an absolute silence on the part of the Government, and I would, therefore, ask this question. Suppose we enter upon the discussion of this Vote on Account, is it the intention of the Government to deal with it in the same spirit as they dealt with the Vote for the Navy, and to observe an obstinate silence upon the important questions which are to be raised? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland is not in his place, and I say that there is no one else who is able to speak for the Government on the points which will be discussed. I cannot imagine that it is intended by the Government to make it a sham discussion, because, if it be, I venture to say that there will be a complete breach of faith on the part of the Government. We have had an assurance that if that discussion is started, the infinite variety of subjects over which it will range will receive the consideration they deserve at the hands of the Government. I have not one particle of misgiving as to the duty that rests on me, and upon hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, to offer the strongest opposition to the course taken by the Government in seeking to drag the Committee into passing so large a Vote.

Mr. Sexton

[Mr. RAIKES (Postmaster General) took the Chair.] [5.45.]

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Mr. Raikes, your appearance in the Chair reminds me of several All-night Sittings which were held a great many years ago, and I would just ask the "old Parliamentary hands" on the other side of the House to point out to their Friends and Colleagues that it was very seldom that any good came of them. We all got tired and weary and excited, and the excitement spread to people out-of-doors, and a great deal of harm was done by the attempts made by the Government of the day to force Business on in those All-night Sittings. I think, Sir, that in regard to some of those Sittings, over which you, Mr. Raikes, presided—and as far as your presidency went, Sir, no complaint could be made—things would have been much better if they had never taken place. I would now suggest to the Government that they should assent to the Motion for reporting Progress, and I would urge on them several reasons for doing so. I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) that we ought not to plead for a little rest. I always feel fatigued at these Sittings. I have been present during all the All-night Sittings in this House, except for four or five hours of one of them. But I have always felt fatigued. I do so now, and I know that other Members cannot bear the fatigue any more than I can. I must, perhaps, make an exception in the case of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who came down, I think, as late as about 5 o'clock in the morning, and who looks very fresh. Well, we are now supposed to enter upon serious Business, expecting a Vote on Account amounting to £3,600,000. I should like to ask you, Mr. Raikes, whether you would like, in the conduct of the Business of the Post Office, to have to consider a question involving an expenditure of £3,600,000 after having been sitting in this House all night? I do not think, Sir, that you would be in a proper condition to do so. At all events, I would rather have your opinion upon any subject when you have not been sitting up all night than when you have. I should like to put it to you, Sir, whether it is prudent for a Committee of the House of Commons to take a course which would not be considered wise in an individual. I quite acknowledge that if it was absolutely necessary that this Business should be done at once, we should have to do it. But no such necessity exists. It is a mere question of obstinacy on the part of the Government. The Government may, of course, say that they are merely firm, and that it is we who are obstinate, but I contend that the reverse is the case. Would it not be better that we should adjourn and consider this question at a reasonable hour? This sum of £3,624,100 is really not wanted by the Government. I would put this question to Ministers. Does an Appropriation Bill take more than eight days to pass? If it does not, it is not necessary to force this Vote through the Committee now, and I would ask the Government whether they really intend to cause such a scandal as would be involved in making us vote this large sum, when they know that the immense majority of Members must be so tired and fagged that, not only are they unfit to deal with the money of the country, but they are unfit to take part in an ordinary game at whist. The taxpayers, I have always found, are very jealous about the action of their Representatives in regard to voting money, and rightly so. But can we, at this time, give reasonable attention to voting Supply? What is the Government programme? Do they want us to surrender all right of discussion and simply pass this Vote? We want to come here after a few hours' interval to discuss this matter properly. Will they give us a fair opportunity of doing so? We are not in a position to do it now, and soon we shall have excited London pouring into the House, not much helping towards a calm dispassionate discussion of some of those Irish subjects that are called burning questions. There is another reason for not plunging into this discussion at once, and why the Government might make some temporary arrangement, even if they allow an adjournment for a couple of hours only. Besides the personal advantages of a rest for that time, we should, on resuming, have representatives of the Press here in proper force, if not in numbers above the usual average. It is a matter of consequence that the pith of the remarks in reference to this large sum, one of the most important Votes of the year, should be made public. The Civil Service Estimates open up the whole field of Civil administration. The late Mr. Isaac Butt, a great authority on matters of Parliamentary Procedure, declared it most un-Constitutional to habitually take these large sums on account. You take a Vote for two months, then for another two months, and then, at the end of the Session, when we are all heated, tired, and jaded, and want to get away, these Votes are brought on with a rush. First and last, these Estimates do not get properly considered, and evil consequences result. The Departments will not pare off abuses in expenditure if this expenditure is voted without protest; it is only pressure from this House that will induce them to do so. Then the constituents, too, seeing that the Estimates are not properly discussed, are apt to think the expenditure is more extravagant than it really is; and thus we are susceptible to sudden bursts of frugality that may be detrimental to the true interests of the Public Service. Passing a Vote on Account like this without proper discussion leads to these evils, and it is mere idleness to say there can be a proper discussion at the end of the year; there will be no more than a discussion of a few foremost items. I am unwilling to take up time in elaborating my argument; but I urge the Government to take into account our anxiety to discuss the Vote, not item by item, but by five or six Irish questions and eight or nine English subjects; and my hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) has given a pledge that, so far as Irish Members are concerned, these discussions shall terminate on Thursday. This extraordinary attitude of the Government was quite unexpected, or a large number of Members would have been here to increase our minority; and, even as it is, we have English Liberal Members here to aid us in our protest against the action of the Government—Members whom you do not often find taking part in an All-night Sitting. They have done so on this occasion, for they feel that in this contest on this question of Supply they have their constituents with them.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): The proceedings of to-night will have an effect in the country. I am quite sure that nothing will more endanger the position of the Government, bringing it into collision with the feelings of the taxpayers, than the attempt to force on a large Vote at this hour. I may urge this view on Members of the Government—that the effect, when these things become known outside, will be disastrous to them, leading the people to believe, what I am afraid they will have considerable ground for believing, that we vote away money without due consideration. For their own interest, I would advise the Government to take the Vote at a time more opportune for discussion.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): Throughout this discussion it appears to me to have been forgotten that there is another part of the United Kingdom besides Ireland having grievances felt acutely, which desires to have those grievances discussed, and has sent 72 Members for that purpose. May I call attention to the fact that, of those 72 Representatives, only three are present—or, say four, though we do not usually count the Lord Advocate as a Scotch Member. Sixty-eight Scotch Members are certainly absent. I have waited here all night for the purpose of performing my duty as a Scotch Member, knowing that there are different grievances which our constituents expect us to discuss at the very earliest moment. I have waited for the simple reason that, of all the Nationalities represented here, the Scotch nation has the most difficulty in obtaining a hearing. We are constantly on the watch to get in a word upon Scotch affairs, because our difficulty is that, while the Irish are hated, we are despised, and contempt is far more difficult to overcome. Hatred stimulates resistance from the hated, contempt crushes and paralyzes the organ of combativeness. We are, on this very account, the more eager to discuss our grievances at those moments permitted by the spirit of the Constitution. It is a new doctrine to me—and, though not an old Member, I have been a student of the subject—that grievances are to be postponed for Supply; I always thought they preceded it. It is astonishing to me that a professed Conservative Government should resist by physical force one of the oldest traditions of the Constitution of the country. I might remind the Government of some of the Scotch questions that naturally arise in consideration of the Vote. There are items that have connection with the proceedings that have taken place in Skye—

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAIKES): I must remind the hon. Member it would not be in Order to discuss the items of the Vote on a Motion to report Progress.

MR. WALLACE: I had no intention of doing so. I was merely about to point out, as reasons for having Progress reported now, that there were items of a certain character that would require to be discussed, when discussion of these particulars became orderly. These, I was about to say, were so complicated, so numerous, and so important, that they must needs give rise to considerable debate; and, therefore, in view of the amount of work before the Committee, it would be well to report Progress, and resume under more favourable circumstances. One of the items we, as Scotch Members, would be called upon to discuss would be the Crofter Question, never sufficiently ventilated in this House. When occasion seemed to offer itself, I had myself prepared an elaborate speech on the subject; but, if I might use a colloquialism, that speech was burked by hon. Gentlemen opposite. It would be a serious undertaking to bring out all the arguments, facts, and illustrations I had prepared—a serious undertaking for me, and possibly for the House too. There would be many questions, abstract and particular, arising in connection with the Vote for Law and Justice in Scotland, the Crofter prosecutions in particular. Again, there is the Education item to be considered. Members not now present have an engrossing interest in educational matters, and have various grievances to ventilate. Not only so; but there is the Fisheries Question, which presents many points of absorbing interest. If I were to mention the herring brand, for instance, it would, if it did not exactly produce excitement, excite most diversified interest in the minds of Scotch Members—

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAIKES): Order, order! I have already pointed out it would be entirely out of Order to attempt to discuss items of the proposed Vote on a Motion to report Progress. I must request the hon. Member to confine his observations to that Motion.

MR. WALLACE: I shall avoid that subject, Sir. Not that I was intending to disregard your ruling in any way, or to depart from Order by discussing the item; I was about to point out the difficulties of attempting discussion at this unusual hour. There will be Scotch Members desirous of considering the question of the appointment of the Secretary of State for Scotland; but, passing away from the special aspect of the Vote as affecting the grievances of Scotland, I think, as an individual, I have a right to appeal to Her Majesty's Government on the question of the physical resources of hon. Members present. I think they are mistaken if they enter into this contest regarding it as a question that must be settled by plurality of numbers; it is rather a case of Thermopylae than a battle on Salisbury Plain—a few only are necessary to stop a pass against a host incalculably more numerous than the defenders. We shall be able to keep up a sufficient supply of strong, fresh Members, able to do what is necessary to oppose the arguments, or the mere official presence of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I feel myself, I will not say brighter, that would be arrogating too much to myself, but not more dull than I was 12 hours ago, and I do not think it is possible for me to be more dull 12 hours hence. Still, I would appeal to Her Majesty's Government to accept the reasonable compromise that has been held out to them more than once. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) offered a reasonable compromise when he suggested the Government should take a Vote on Account sufficient for a fortnight; but I think the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) offered a still more reasonable compromise, when he consented, on behalf of those for whom he was entitled to speak, if the Vote were set down for Thursday that it should be considered fairly, with no attempt to resist it beyond that day. But it is a very difficult thing to restore peace when war is raised by challenge and attack from the other side. There is much that might be said in regard to the mind of the country not being sufficiently informed in regard to the Vote owing to the absence of the Press.

Naturally, the country takes an interest in the expenditure of the money raised by its taxation: and if we discuss an important Vote like this behind the backs of those who are to pay it, I am perfectly sure a feeling of resentment will be provoked. I might add many other reasons; but I desire only to participate in the debate to a reasonable extent, and I think I have said enough to make good the position I occupy in support of the Motion before us.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The speech of the hon. Member makes us recognize the cleverness of the nation to which he belongs. He tells us the Scotch Representatives have all gone to bed; and I am quite sure he will be glad to follow their example. There is nothing in what we are asking the Committee to do to prevent him. We ask, in order that the law may be complied with, for a Vote on Account of the Civil Service. We are asking a thing that has been asked every Session for years past, and such a Vote has been passed Session after Session with little or no discussion. When the hon. Member talks about the necessity for discussing item after item, he will forgive me for saying he hardly understands the nature of a Vote on Account. It is not possible for the affairs of the country to be carried on if there is to be such a discussion of items. The Committee will have ample opportunity of considering every item, and of attacking any to which objection is taken when in ordinary course the Votes come on. We are told it is an easy matter to adjourn the Committee to Thursday and finish the Vote then, but we should not be able to comply with the law if we did anything of the kind. Hon. Members must credit us with having paid some attention to the Rules of Order, and this matter, in which we are specially interested, we have carefully considered. Hence the statement that we cannot comply with the law unless we obtain the Vote we now ask for, and which has been granted in several Sessions. The sooner we get it, the sooner shall we get to bed.

Mr. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): The right hon. Gentleman speaks the usual clap-trap of officialism. We have heard that speech from the Treasury Bench times out of mind. The right hon. Gentleman says it is absolutely necessary to carry on the work of the nation, that the Vote should be taken, but we have equally good authority that it is not absolutely necessary. If the Government want money to comply with the requirements of the law, they should come here in time and propose their Votes—at such a time as will enable us to discuss grievances without being met with this stale Tory cry, the exigencies of time, the usual plea from that Bench. We have a right to claim that at the beginning of the Session—at the earliest possible moment, to insure the passing of the Appropriation Bill within the required period—the Government should submit their Estimates for consideration. Otherwise we stand in the position that we are entitled to refuse the money, seeing that we have not the opportunity of bringing forward our grievances in accordance with the time-honoured Constitutional doctrine that grievances precede Supply. So far as I can see, Sir, the practice in Parliament diverges altogether from the procedure laid down in books. The practice of Parliament seems to be that the Ministers of the Crown come down to the House at the end of every six weeks with a Vote of Supply, and expect to get the money, and the discussion on the details comes on after the Ministers have got the money. Then the hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) comes here and says that the money has already been voted, uttering the usual clap-trap of officialism. It is a very strange sort of procedure which allows the money to be voted, and then when Motions for reducing the Votes are made, hon. Members find that they are of no use, because they are barred by the very effective argument that the money is already voted. I always thought that the Constitutional doctrine was that grievances came before Supply; but the practice of this House is very different. There is another fact which illustrates the odd character of the practice of Parliament. To-night we have had a precedent created of the application of the closure, which no doubt will be in time fully felt in practice by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Members on this side of the House had no indication that the Government were going to pursue the policy which they have entered upon, or that they intended to persevere or apply the closure on a question of Supply. This is a precedent which before long will be used with great effect upon hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, and very reasonably because, when their Leaders set an example they should be prepared to understand that such bad examples are likely to be followed, which one would think ought to make them very chary in setting them. The Government may carry forward these Votes to-night by the repeated application of the closure with a mechanical majority at their back. But if they should do that they will be countenancing an un-Constitutional thing, for since it is in their power to apply the closure on the discussion of each Vote which comes up for consideration, they will, if they do this, be making attempts at silencing Members in a legitimate debate on a question of a Vote on Account. It certainly does appear to me that the Government are proceeding very unwisely. Votes in Supply have been free from the operations of the closure in the past, but now that there is a precedent it is hard to say how far the power will extend in the future. There is no guarantee that the power will not be used in Committee of Supply, and consequently the whole principle of Representative Government is reduced to an absurdity.

MR. T. F. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I just want, Sir, to point out a contrast between the statement on a certain point of the hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson), and a statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope). The Financial Secretary admitted earlier in the evening that the law could be complied with if this Vote were taken on Thursday. On the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State has declared that the reason why the Government requested that the Vote should be taken was, that the law demanded that it should be passed to-night, at the present Sitting. Now, I am anxious to know if the Government are willing that their case should stand or fall by the assertion of their Secretary of State for War. The case of the Government is that one of its Members makes a statement absolutely contradictory to the assertion of another of its Members in a previous part of the same evening. I am glad the Secretary of State for War has put his contention that the law positively requires that this Vote should be passed to-night; but I have to say that the law does not require this, and that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury was quite correct when he stated that the Votes could be taken on Thursday and yet the law would be completely complied with. ["No!"] Well, in other words, he did not deny that the law would be complied with if the Vote were taken on Thursday, and I suppose he can if he chooses. And this diametrical opposition is the cause of the trouble and a scandal of this All-night Sitting. It was agreed that if the Vote was put down for Thursday the debate would be extended to Friday, and the law could not in that way be complied with; but hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House have answered that by saying that the Vote would be allowed to pass on Thursday; and thus the whole objection falls to the ground at once, and no danger of a breach of law is incurred. I only hope that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War will reach the Press, that the public may be able to judge of the intelligence and ability of some Members of the Government. Sir, I am informed on high authority that if this Vote was carried on Thursday, the 24th of March, it could be reported on Friday, the 25th of March, and this would be three days before the time upon which it was reported in a previous year. It is simply monstrous to consent to the passing of over £3,000,000 of the public money without any discussion. We are desired to pass the Estimates referring to the Home Department in the absence of the Home Secretary; those of the Public Works Department in the absence of the Chief Commissioner of Public Works; those for the Law Department in the absence of the Attorney General and the Solicitor General; and, finally, the most important, solemn, and contentious Votes of all those of the Irish Department in the absence of the Chief Secretary. We are quite willing that the way in which the taxes are spent should go forth for the judgment of the country, and I again repeat that it is mainly owing to the gross, palpable, and immense contradiction between two Members of the Government that we have the scandal and trouble of this All-night Sitting. I say again, Sir, that if the Votes are put down for Thursday, hon. Members on this side of the House will undertake that the discussion will close on that day, and probably hon. Members above the Gangway would assent to this arrangement or accept the suggestion as a reasonable promise.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) asks whether, if this Vote were put down for Thursday, it would be in accordance with the law? I pointed out, I think, that it required eight days for the Appropriation Bill, and Thursday is the 24th of March. Hence the hon. Member will see that Thursday would be too late a day for passing the Vote if the law was to be fully complied with. The Supplementary Votes are to meet expenditure for the current year, and they require to go through exactly the same processes as the Vote on Account to make them available for the Services of the country. Hon. Members must see that in order to make the money serviceable within the current financial year—that is to say, shortly before the 31st of March—it is absolutely necessary that we should have this Vote now passed. I am quite sure that the hon. Members of this House do not want to put the Government into the unpleasant position of being driven, at the last moment, to the inability of carrying out the Services of the country. The Government are quite willing to meet the suggestions of hon. Members; but I have to say distinctly that Thursday would be too late, and that it is necessary to get this Vote in order to make matters regular.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I wish to ask, Sir, whether, seeing that Thursday is too late, it would be possible to regularize—if I may use the word—the situation by holding a Sitting on Saturday. Mr. Raikes, I have sat in the House, and often heard that grievance comes before Supply; but I find in practice that there is far too much of a feeling in the House now that the principal and first object of the House is to legislate, whilst high authorities on the House impress on us that the ventilation of grievances is a most important point to observe and follow. We, on this side of the House, have no desire indefinitely to prolong the debate on these Estimates; but we certainly do feel that it was a very mistaken proceeding to so arrange matters that the Civil Service Estimates should be discussed at the late hour which the Government thought proper to provide. It will be remembered that at an early period of this Session I suggested myself that we should require to discuss the Estimates on a side Vote, because I foresaw and feared this awkward situation. I may venture to say that the cause of many of us remaining in this House during the discussion of these Estimates was in order to secure to hon. Members below the Gangway an opportunity of ventilating certain grievances connected with the Government of Ireland—grievances which there were no other means or facilities of making known. I would point out to the Committee that the position of affairs in this matter in the present year are peculiar, and therefore it is not right to compare past years with the present year, because during the present year hon. Members have been deprived—and prospectively are to be deprived—of almost every opportunity which private Members are supposed to possess, in order to bring forward the grievances which naturally would have been brought forward had there been a chance of doing so. Besides, not only is the time of private Members taken and to be taken by the Government for a lengthened period, but that new method of procedure whereby we find subjects really pass out of discussion because of bogus Motions several days or weeks in advance, has come into existence; and private Members have to seize every available opportunity in order to endeavour to secure a chance of discussing matters of grievance. Therefore, on these Estimates hon. Members on this side of the House have really got the desire to get such an opportunity of informing the House and calling the attention of the country to abuses which require reform. I hope that right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench will take into consideration whether they can see their way by some less violent tactics and method than passing a Vote without discrimination or discussion of its important contents—especially the Irish items—to regularize the situation. Hon. Members have been in attendance for about 15 hours; and I would again suggest, in the absence of other alternative, to the Government that Saturday could be introduced for a Sitting for the purpose of accomplishing the passing and consideration of this Vote, and especially that the House may discuss questions of great interest and importance concerning the safety and security of Ireland. No better course could be followed; and it is surely preferable to this Sitting in excitement, and under circumstances which prevent the utterances of hon. Gentlemen being properly recorded in the public Press.

Mr. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I think the whole fault, Sir, of this scandalous Sitting is to be blamed upon the Government. We have heard from the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) and the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) that it was absolutely necessary that these Estimates should be passed to-night. And the Government knew that fact before to-night—that they wanted over £3,000,000, and with that knowledge in their minds they come down to the House and bring on the Estimates just before midnight. I ask the Government, are they not ashamed to acknowledge that they knew it was necessary to pass this enormous sum of money to-night, and yet they did not introduce the Estimate for consideration until midnight? It was not the custom to discuss the items upon this Vote, it was said. I took the trouble to look what happened last year, and what do I find? That a Member of the present Government itself discussed these Votes. If hon. Members will look at the Estimates, they will find that we are now called upon to discuss, as a part of this Vote, the grant of some £100,000 for the Post Office; and I would call attention to the fact that the Government have put the Chief of the Department the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) in the Chair while the matter is under discussion. I venture to say that never in the history of this Parliament has there been a single precedent of the discussion of an Estimate in Committee with the Minister who is responsible for that Estimate occupying the Chair. I can hardly realize myself that what I have stated is the case. Now, what would be the procedure when we come to the Post Office Vote? It would be that you, Mr. Chairman, would leave the Chair, and the Government would select another Chairman from the Treasury Bench, or that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes), in charge of a Department, would find himself in the Chair whilst the Estimates of his Colleagues were being passed, and not knowing what Vote may come next—it might be the Estimates of his own Department—he would stand up and ask the acceptance of his own Vote with the Committee discussing Estimates of a right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. I desire to repeat that this is what the Government has reduced us to this evening. I am able to speak deliberately and with some knowledge. The position we are in is this. The Government declare in this House that they are bound to get the money represented by this Vote to-night. They knew that, and that by law they must get the money. And yet they bring in a Vote for this money at midnight. Then, when the proper Chairman leaves the Chair, the Government put the Chief of one of their own Departments whose Estimates are under discussion, in the Chair. I challenge the Chairman (Mr. Raikes) and the Clerks at the Table to show the Committee a solitary instance of a similar character, and I call attention to the fact that the permission of this is prejudicial to our Parliamentary usage.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): When hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench are as still as statues, we cannot expect them to accept the invitation of my hon. Friend (Mr. Molloy); and, besides, not even the ingenuous mind of the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) can find an answer. I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Raikes, that the point which my hon. Friend (Mr. Molloy) has made is one so cogent, that either you, Sir, as Postmaster General, should be out of the Chair, or the Sitting should come to a termination. The challenge of my hon. Friend has not been answered; and I say, for my part, that during my seven years in Parliament I have never known such a case to arise as that to which our attention has been called. In regard to the observation made by my hon. Friend, that it would be necessary for you, Mr. Raikes, to leave the Chair when the Vote for your Department comes on, it seems to me that from the moment that you put the Question of the Vote on Account from your Chair—from that moment you will be in the position of presiding over the deliberations of the Committee upon the Estimates of your own Department. I think the House will agree with me that it is impossible, under these circumstances, for the debate to proceed. We are told that it is necessary for the public interests that this Vote should be taken at the present Sitting; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton has told us it is not necessary. When doctors disagree, how shall we decide?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): Since the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton made the statement that once the Vote was taken on March 24, I have discovered that it was interposed in Committee, but that it was actually taken on March 19.

MR. SEXTON: I have not had the advantage of looking at Hansard. Are we to understand that the proposal for a Saturday Sitting is rejected?

MR. JACKSON: A Saturday Sitting will not help us. It is a question of beginning. We must take the early stage.

MR. SEXTON: Will Thursday do? I have another suggestion to make. The Government have proposed this day to ask for precedence for the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill. It is obviously inconvenient, to say the least, that we should proceed to the discussion of that. Will the Government consider the expediency of winding up this Sitting, and putting down this Vote for the first Order this evening? If they are disposed to do that, I think my hon. Friends will agree with me that, having taken a substantial and full discussion of two or three questions of gravity, the debate on the question of precedence for the Criminal Law Amendment Bill might be taken after the dinner hour. What more can you expect than that? Suppose we go on sitting till noon to-day, and the Vote is got by the application of the closure, so as to secure precedence being taken at half-past 5 this evening—

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAIKES): The hon. Member is now travelling beyond the Motion to report Progress.

MR. SEXTON: Am I not at liberty to make suggestions on a Motion to report Progress? Instead of proceeding with this Sitting now, let the Government adjourn this debate, on our undertaking to close it to-night in time to give the Leader of the House an opportunity to move the Resolution of which he has given Notice, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) an opportunity to reply. I see the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is here. I do not doubt his ability at any time to appreciate promptly and accurately the importance of any point that may be suggested. Let this Vote precede the precedence Resolution to-night; the latter will go on all night under any circumstances. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see that this suggestion is prompted by a serious desire for the harmony of the House, and to avoid ill-temper arising from extreme courses.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I regret exceedingly the Government do not avail themselves of these chances. I, for my part, cannot help feeling that the Government have an object in view. [Laughter.] I, too, have an object in view, and I should recommend hon. Members opposite not to laugh at it, if humanity form any portion of their composition. I firmly believe—and whether I am right or wrong will be for my countrymen to judge—that Her Majesty's Government are trying this on at the present moment in order to excite the people of Ireland to bloodshed. Mr. Raikes, they simply want to promote murder and assassination in Ireland.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAIKES): The hon. Gentleman must be aware that it is entirely contrary to the Rules of this House to impute motives to hon. Members, and especially motives such as murder and assassination. He must withdraw the statement.

DR. TANNER: I dare say, Sir. But what I said, Sir, was I feared the policy of the Government—the policy which the Government were promoting at this Sitting—was one which would lead to assassination and murder.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAIKES): The hon. Member stated, in the hearing of the Committee, that he believed the Government had an object in view, and that was to promote assassination and murder. I call upon the hon. Member explicitly to withdraw that statement.

DR. TANNER: I will certainly withdraw that, Sir; but I say again I believe that this policy will lead to assassination and murder. [Cries of "Withdraw!"] Of course I withdraw what the right hon. Gentleman told me. He is a Member of the Government, and I withdraw. It is all very fine; but I maintain that my hon. Friend is justified in calling attention to these very important matters. Why, Sir, at the present time we are called upon to discuss the Post Office system, when we know that the papers are teeming with accounts of the extraordinary dealings with the Post Office by officials, of whom the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman is at the head. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is in his place; he is practically the prop and the crutch of the Government, and I should hope that he would deal with this matter properly and decently. And, accordingly, I charge the Government with doing what I believe will lead to murder and assassination in Ireland. Let them answer that if they can.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I have only to say that even if we agreed, the Committee now in passing these Votes would be doing an illegal act.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I am only going to say one or two words to the right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson). We have received no answer to the appeal made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). I wish to add to that appeal that, as far as I am concerned, if the Government will accept the compromise, I shall be willing to waive my right to speak on these Estimates. If they do not, I shall certainly raise a question, and go to a Division.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): It has been asked, more than once, whether it is the intention of the Government that if a discussion is raised on any of these items it will receive the attention it deserves. Is it desired to vote money wholesale, without any discussion? Not long since the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War pointed out that if discussions were raised on these occasions it would be impossible for the Business of the House to go on. But that is not an answer to the question. Whenever money is demanded, every individual Member of this House is entitled to raise any grievance in his mind, or that may be felt by his constituents; and if, as a result, Votes on Account should be abandoned, it would not be a matter for regret. I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is the intention of the Government to enter upon the Vote and fully explain all points raised on this side of the House. Are we to have a reply to any questions we may raise?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I can assure the hon. Member that even if the discussion on the Estimates had been taken hours ago, he would have found Members of the Government perfectly prepared to give such explanations as are necessary, and all questions will be answered.

MR. SEXTON: The responsible Ministers are not here? Where is the Chief Secretary for Ireland?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am answering the question, I trust, in good humour; but I wish to point out to the hon. Member for West Belfast, in regard to the compromise he has suggested, that I have heard the Scotch Members and others declare that they wish to discuss certain points connected with these Estimates; and, therefore, he is not in a position to make the compromise bind them. I would suggest to the hon. Member to do now what he might have done hours ago—to discuss the points which he wishes to have discussed. He may expect a courteous answer from any Members of the Government to whom he may appeal. With regard to Post Office questions, if it is wished to discuss any particular Vote affecting the Post Office, another hon. Member can relieve the Postmaster General in the duty of Chairman. I hope the Motion will be withdrawn, and that we may now begin to make some progress. Will the hon. Member state the points on which he wishes information?

MR. SEXTON: At no time while this discussion has been going on has the Chief Secretary for Ireland been in his place; I believe he left the House before midnight.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Attorney General and the Solicitor General for Ireland are here.

AN HON. MEMBER: What do they know?

MR. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Member wishes it, we will send for the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: I am thankful to know that he will be sent for. It will be necessary for him to hear our complaints. We cannot accept the replies of the Law Officers. We are not at liberty to receive from them replies on grave questions arising outside their Office. Why does not the Chancellor of the Exchequer accept my offer? Is it merely to gratify the ill-temper which seems to prevail among hon. Members below the Gangway opposite? I think you are making a great mistake in refusing it. Hon. Members on this side of the House are unanimous in support of my proposition, and I believe none of our Friends now absent will interfere with the arrangement.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I think Her Majesty's Government would be well advised to accept the compromise offered by the hon. Member for West Belfast. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was pleased to say that if grievances were stated by hon. Members, the Government were perfectly prepared to answer them. He knows, however, perfectly well that hon. Members who have grievances to state, never expected to be called on to state them at such an hour. It is all very well to say that the Government are prepared to answer at a time when he knows perfectly well hon. Members are not present to make their statements. As the only Scotch Member now present, I will state that, as far as I am concerned, I am in harmony with the offer made by the hon. Member for West Belfast.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): When the hon. Member for West Belfast made his offer, I heard hon. Members opposite cry out, "No compromise!" Sir, I understand the spirit of those words; but I scarcely understand the meaning. What do they mean? Do they mean that the minority have no rights at all that are worth consideration? The time may come—and it may not be very far hence—when they will be in a minority themselves, and they then will not like to hear "No compromise" called out under similar circumstances. We are asked to vote £3,500,000 on a Resolution brought in after midnight, and I think it is in the highest degree un-gracious to reproach us with anything improper. The Government have the matter in their own hands; they can, whenever a discussion is allowed to take place, apply the clôture. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) has told us Votes on Account have been repeatedly taken before with little discussion. It is true; but then it was not at a time when a feeling of uneasiness pervaded the country. There is now a profound feeling of uneasiness as to what use is to be made of the money the Government are asking us to vote. Therefore it is only fair that the minority should be allowed to bring forward their grievances. The arguments used by the other side might have been proper in the time of Charles I., when they used to say—"Give us the money and trust us to do the best we can with it. Leave yourselves in our hands." But that is not the case to-day, and I trust that the temper of the House of Commons will not tolerate treatment of that kind. I hope the reasonable arrangement proposed will be agreed to.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): We are perfectly ready to go on with the discussion. We have no right to waive the privilege to discuss the Estimates. We will be able to show, after a discussion of a few hours between the Irish Members and the Government, from their different standpoints, that the position of Ireland is somewhat critical. Really it seems to be reasonable, therefore, that some arrangement should be made by which the Irish Members may be enabled to discuss for a few hours the points they wish to raise. It is really absurd for us to sit all night. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "Hear, hear!" Do they mean to say that the Irish Members have not a right to discuss these Estimates? All the Irish Members ask for is that they should be given a few hours in which to do so. The Government must admit that it is a concession on the part of the Scotch and the English Members to say that, as far as they are concerned, they will waive any sort of Amendment or discussion which they might legitimately move or raise upon it. They do that in order to facilitate the action of the Government in making a concession to the Irish Members. Of course, the Government would not think of asking for the clôture on the Vote, because, if we were to begin discussing it now, no one could say we were exceeding our legitimate rights if we were to divide on every single item. Supposing we were to discuss each English and Scotch item of the Vote for half-an-hour. That would take a very long time, and then we should have to deal with the Irish portion of the Vote. It could hardly be said that the Irish Members were exceeding their rights if they discussed the points in which they are interested for three, or four, or five hours. I ask hon. Gentlemen whether a fair and reasonable proposal has not been made? Do you mean that the discussion shall go on now? [Ministerial cries of "Yes!"] Then for how long? [An hon. MEMBER: Days.] An hon. Gentleman says it ought to last for days. Well, we do not take such exaggerated views of these things. We speak of hours, and not of days. The Government declare that they have a heavy task before them in reference to their Coercion Bill this evening. If the Government will say that they will allow this Vote on Account to come on at half-past 4 this evening, the discussion of their demand of the time of the House for coercion can be taken later. Or, perhaps, the Government will suggest some other plan by which these Estimates can be discussed.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): In reference to the compromise which has been proposed, I wish to point out that the Government could not carry it out, because they have only obtained precedence for Procedure, and if the Procedure Rules are not taken, private Members will resume their rights. For my own part, I am quite willing to go on with the fight; but I would suggest another compromise which may meet the views of the Committee. I would propose that Government Business should be taken at 5 o'clock to-day; but that the debate should be stopped at 10, or half-past 10, and that this Vote should then be taken and discussed until the close of the sitting. I do not throw out this suggestion with any idea of urging the Government to surrender their right to have this Vote. It has struck me all through that what hon. Members below the Gangway on this side of the House are contending for is that they shall be allowed to have a discussion relevant to the items of the Estimates; but not relevant to the first Vote on Account. I think, however, that if my suggestion were carried out, we might close this discussion, which is not creditable to Parliament.

MR. SEXTON: I would point out to the Committee that the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) curiously lost sight, at the end of his speech, of the point which he raised at the beginning of it. The same argument would apply at half-past 10, as at 5 o'clock; and, if the hon. Gentleman is right on his point of Order, it would be just as impossible for us to take the discussion on the Vote on Account at half-past 10 as it would at the earlier hour. I would further point out that the point of Order is altogether wrong. What is to prevent the Government, if they put down the Order of "Supply (Vote on Account)" to-day from making and carrying a Motion after Question time, that the Orders of the Day be postponed until after that Order had been disposed of? Therefore, the hon. Member's point of Order is absurd.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 141: Majority 84. — (Div. List, No. 74.) [7.40 A.M.]

Sir JOHN GORST (Under Secretary of State for India) took the Chair.

[7.45 A.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The rapid changes of Chairmen show how wrong it is, Sir John Gorst, to keep us here. But it must not be supposed that we are not perfectly fresh. We have now reached an hour (10 minutes to 8) at which reasonable persons can discuss Business. It is somewhat an early one; but I believe that in former days the House was in the habit of meeting at 8 o'clock. We shall now go through the Estimates in precisely the same way, if not more severely than as if we had not been sitting up all night. I find that the first portion of the Vote relates to the Royal Palaces, which last year cost £31,000. This year the Estimate amounts to £35,000, or about £4,000 more. We are asked, on this Vote on Account, to contribute £6,000. Now, I think the Committee will hardly assent to that, and I shall conclude with a Motion to reduce the Vote in respect of that item by the sum of £5,000. I have several reasons to urge in favour of the reduction. In the first place, Sir, I object entirely to these heavy Votes on Account. I have already several times suggested that we should give the Government enough money to tide them over a fortnight, as they seem to have got into a mess by not bringing forward the Estimates at a reasonable time. I estimate that the £1,000 I am willing to let them have in respect of the Royal Palaces would last them for rather more than two weeks, as they ask for £6,000 to carry them over two months. I may point out that if the Government persist in the course they are taking, we shall not have any time except at the end of the Session to discuss this question; and, as the Government cannot accept our terms, we must go into the various items thoroughly and exhaustively. This Vote includes an item of £1,200 for the maintenance and repair of the royal mews at Pimlico, and one of £500 for new works and alterations. These sums are excessive. The whole palace, apparently, costs £2,281 for maintenance, repairs and alterations, and the stables cost £1,865. I am not aware of the number of horses kept in these stables; but I should think that generally there are very few. Her Majesty is not often in London, and these stables are kept up for the benefit of those parasites who always exist about a Court. Then we come to palaces partly in the occupation of Her Majesty. These include St. James's Palace, of which the cost amounts to a great deal. I will allow that, however, to pass. Then we get to palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty. There are a considerable number of houses tenanted by persons to whom Her Majesty has lent them. You will find, Sir, that these persons insist upon the houses so lent being kept up at the public expense for their benefit. Now, I say that the pensioners who are put into these houses ought to be called upon to pay for their maintenance. I find here items for Pembroke Lodge, Thatched House, and East Sheen Cottage, Richmond Park. Of course, I know who lives in Pembroke Lodge; but I do not know who occupies the other two, or where they are. I should like the right hon. Gentleman the First

Mr. Labouchere

Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) to tell us who lives in them, and also what the occupants have done in any way beneficial to the country as a reason for their having houses rent free. Then we have "Bushey House, gardens and stables," and another house, which, I believe, has been lent to one of the Orleans Princes. Now, these Orleans Princes are rich, "beyond the dreams of avarice," and yet they come sponging upon the British taxpayer, and asking him to house them. We have, therefore, to pay money every year for the maintenance of the house of an Orleans Prince. Why, I should like to ask, are we to pay for housing a Prince who has been turned out of his own country for the misdeeds of former members of his family? There are several places in Bushey Park which are mentioned in the Vote, and I should like to know who lives in each of them and why he is allowed to do so. There is another item to which I have frequently called attention in this House. It is the Hampton Court Stud-house. I believe it is tenanted by some person; but all I know about it is that, although I have asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury again and again what becomes of our foals which are bred there, I never see any deduction made in the Vote for the price which those foals fetch. The foals must go to someone; but there is no item in respect of them. Someone gets hold of our foals, and yet we have to pay every charge in connection with them. Well, Sir, I think I have made out a case in favour of the reduction I propose. I have shown that in this Vote there are items which need explanation, and of which no legitimate explanation can be given. This is not the first time I have asked for an explanation; but I have never been able to get one. I beg to move that this Vote be reduced by the sum of £5,000 in respect of the first item.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £6,000, for Royal Palaces, be reduced by the sum of £5,000."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The criticisms from the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) are substantially the same as those he has made regularly each year for the last two or three years, and therefore the answer I have to give will be substantially that which has been given before and accepted by the House. But I may say, as regards these particular Estimates for which I am responsible, that there is a reduction on the total sum of about £90,000, or 9 per cent on the whole. What we are now asking the Committee to do to-day is to provide a small portion of the required sum, such an amount as will enable us to carry on the necessary repairs and maintenance in connection with the various items specified in the Vote. If it would be any satisfaction to hon. Members, I might say that I would undertake not to spend any of the larger sums which are included in the Vote until the Estimates are taken in their entirety, and the completion of the sums submitted. The main part of the expenditure is for the ordinary and regular keeping up of the different Palaces, parks, and public buildings enumerated. There would have been on this Vote for Royal Palaces a considerable reduction this year, were it not for the items in connection with Hampton Court, rendered necessary by the fire that unfortunately occurred there recently, and which, as the Committee will be aware, caused considerable damage. Were it not for this item which the Committee will agree it is impossible to forego, there would have been a considerable reduction under the head of Royal Palaces. As to the particular criticisms made just now, some of the buildings are kept up for the occupation of Her Majesty, some are in partial occupation, as, for instance, St. James's, others again are not in occupation, but all this forms part of the arrangements entered into with the Crown at the beginning of the reign when the Civil List was settled. The money we are asking for is to keep up these Palaces according to the bargain made at that time, and as to who inhabits these Palaces by the gracious favour of the Sovereign it is not my business to know or to inquire; my duty is confined to asking the House for the money that maintains these Palaces, fulfilling the obligation we have incurred.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I am not at all satisfied with this Vote; but I do not want to complicate matters by opening another Amendment. I only wish my hon.

Friend had taken my suggestion to move the omission of the Vote altogether. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that some of these items are unnecessary, though he commenced this long Sitting many hours ago with the statement that it was necessary to take the Vote now. It is now said that the whole are not necessary, and by a process of exhaustion—such as has been going on all night—we may arrive at the conclusion that none of the Vote is absolutely necessary to be taken now. First, I may say, in reference to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, that most of us were not in existence 50 years ago when this absurd bargain was made, and I am inclined to think that the taxpayers will think it is quite time that a revised version of this bargain should be issued. This Jubilee year offers an admirable occasion for Her Majesty to do something for her loyal subjects, though I have not heard there is any intention of the kind. May I offer one or two suggestions? I should like to know if many of these Royal, noble, or great personages inhabiting these buildings are German paupers? [Cries of "Order!"] I am surprised to find hon. Gentlemen ignorant of the fundamental principle of our law, that people who live at other people's expense are paupers. Now I should like to know if these people pay any rent at all for their lodgings? We do not live rent free in our houses or chambers; and I cannot see—even if it is part of the Royal Prerogative to fill these Royal Palaces with these aristocratic paupers—why they should not be asked to pay a moderate rent, drawing, as many of them do, substantial salaries or allowances from the pockets of the taxpayers. It would be reasonable that they should pay sufficient to meet the cost of repairs, and to that extent relieve the suffering people who have to pay taxes to support these aristocratic paupers. I would suggest that Her Majesty's Advisers should put this in a plain common-sense way before Her Majesty. We all know that Her Majesty is an exceedingly kind-hearted woman, with great common sense and great respect for the Constitution, and I am sure she would be delighted to assist her suffering subjects to the extent of the value of the rent of these lodgings she not lets, but gives away, to foreigners and others who dwell in them. We are this year celebrating the Jubilee of Her Majesty's accession to the Throne, and during the past half-century we have been paying annually to Her Majesty £385,000, or something more—last year we voted £410,000. When the proper time comes we shall ask why it is we should pay so much more than we consented to pay? Some £800,000 a-year is the cost of the Royal Family. During these 50 years the Royal Family have absorbed from the taxation of the country something like £23,210,000, or probably a great deal more by this time. Have we not, then, substantial grounds for asking that some relief should be given where it is so much needed to the overburdened taxpayers at the expense of those we consider are overpaid? So I make my request that the Government will place these matters in a common-sense light before Her Majesty, that she should make her lodgers in their Royal Palaces pay rent, seeing that we have been paying the rent for these people in the long past; that we are now overtaxed, many of us starving; and that it would be a graceful act to afford her suffering people this relief. Next I would ask to whom do these places really belong—to us, or to Her Majesty? When we come to Marlborough House a similar question will arise. I have studied all the Acts of Parliament bearing upon the subject, and I can find nothing about these Royal Palaces; in fact, the Acts of Parliament relating to Her Majesty and her belongings are so wrapped up as to evade the closest scrutiny. What is the logical position? If we are the owners, we are responsible for the repairs; or do the Royal Family hold these Palaces on repairing leases? We have a right to know the position. It is all very well for the Commissioners of Works to put us off, as the House has been put off in past years. The nation is of opinion that the Royal Family costs the country a great deal too much, and when they reflect upon the comparison with the cost in the United States—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not confining himself to the Question.

MR. CONYBEARE: It was merely a casual illustration. I will confine myself to the point. We have a right to demand the excision of these unnecessary items of expenditure—first, on the ground that we are sent here to do so by our constituents, who look very closely at these items; secondly, on the ground that the people are overtaxed for the purpose of maintaining pauperized aristocrats, who are living in these Palaces; and, chiefly and lastly, that this being the Jubilee year, it is reasonable to ask for some relief to the taxpayer, and this is a reasonable way of granting it.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 53; Noes 121: Majority 68.—(Div. List. No. 75.) [3.15 A.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): At this stage it might be convenient if some Member of the Government would inform us when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland is likely to be in his place?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, a message had been sent to his right hon. Friend.

MR. CONYBEARE: As we must not waste time while the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is being found, the next item upon which we have to ask for a reduction of a trifling amount is £500 for Marlborough House. I find among the items £150 for the construction of a drying closet; and then I find a charge for the substitution of embossed for plain glass. These are matters of luxury for which I do not think we should be called upon to pay. I think His Royal Highness might undertake that. Then we have £300 for drains, £205 for other alterations, water rate £10, and ordinary maintenance £1,455. What I wish to remark is this—that if, as I intimated just now, we are the landlords of this Palace, we may fairly be called upon to pay for repairs and so forth; but then I have a right to ask whether His Royal Highness pays any rent, or on what terms he occupies the Palace? I would suggest that if we give him this Palace to live in, we should ask him to pay the rent of it, and also to pay the water rate. These Royal personages like us to pay for all these things; but I object to it, and do so in the interests of the Royal Family itself, whose popularity is rapidly waning—

Mr. Conybeare

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must speak respectfully of the Royal Family in debate. The Royal Family have nothing to do with the present Vote; it is a Vote for Marlborough House.

MR. CONYBEARE: I was saying, Sir, I advocated this curtailment of expense on behalf of the Royal Family, for whom I entertain, of course, the greatest respect. I was trying to make my meaning clear, that the taxpayers feel very strongly on the question of this expenditure. I did not wish to convey anything disrespectful to the Royal Family—far from it—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. Member to respect my ruling; he is repeating the very words I said were not in Order.

MR. CONYBEARE: I was repeating them in order to withdraw them—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not allowed to repeat observations I have ruled out of Order.

MR. CONYBEARE: I will not repeat them; I only desire to make it clear that the people of this country watch this expenditure with the closest scrutiny. It is, to my mind, strictly in the interest of Monarchical institutions that we should take every means to reduce this expenditure. At any rate, what I want to know in respect to Marlborough House is exactly what is our relation to it—does it belong to the nation, or to the Royal Family? If to the nation, under what terms is it occupied by His Royal Highness? I would not trouble the right hon. Gentleman with this question, except that I have made the most assiduous efforts to find out an answer for myself; but I cannot find, in any Act of Parliament, anything bearing on the question. It is in order that people outside may be enlightened, that I bring this before the Committee on a Motion to reduce the item on account of Marlborough House by £500.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Item of £500, for Marlborough House, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 115: Majority 66.—(Div. List, No. 76.) [8.30. A.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The next item I find is the Royal Parks and their grounds, and we are asked to contribute £17,000 for the purpose. I must do the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) the justice to congratulate him for the lower Estimate this year than last. There are some very serious things, I believe, in these Votes which require explanation, and I protest strongly against anything of the sort being concealed from the public view. I shall, therefore, move that this £17,000 be reduced by £14,000. Before I examine the detailed items, I would like to learn why the London Parks appear in this list, while the other Parks, like Victoria, Hyde Park, and Battersea, are not to be found? I think that the right hon. Gentleman is bound by the promise on this subject made by the right hon. Gentleman the then Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Childers). Last year we obtained a majority, and it was agreed that the Vote should be taken upon Report without discussion, on condition that a Bill should at once be brought in, transferring and vesting in the Metropolitan Board of Works the possession of and the duty of looking after these London Parks. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) since then has announced the Bill, and it is to be hoped that it will be speedily passed in this House. I will give an instance, Sir, of some of the absurdities in this Vote. Many Gentlemen, especially country Gentlemen opposite, are fond of field sports, and have gamekeepers. Well, this is how some gamekeepers are paid out of this Vote—and I wonder is there any country Gentleman opposite who pays in the same generous way. The head gamekeeper of Bushey Park gets £100 per annum and £10 in addition; the keeper at Greenwich Park gets £100 per annum, and I do not know what game he keeps in that Park. The Hampton Court gamekeeper receives £150; but the man who gets the most is the fortunate gamekeeper of Richmond Park, who receives £358, and the under-keeper £150. I ask any hon. Gentleman who is acquainted with these matters, whether they can find any people to give these sums to their gamekeepers, or more than £60, £70, or £80 at the most a-year? There is, besides, a very great complaint in the neighbourhood of Richmond Park, which is kept up for the benefit of the ~~Ran~~ Duke of Cambridge. The at the property of neigh.

bouring persons gets destroyed, and really, apart altogether from this damage, I see no reason, if a man wants part-ridges and pheasants and such like in a park so near London, he should not pay for that himself. Then, there is no game in Greenwich Park, and the gamekeeper has no game to keep. It is preposterous, Sir, that these charges should be year after year in the Estimates, and that there should be protests every year from Radicals, who are the sound political economists, and yet all the Chief Commissioner of Works will do is to produce a book, an official book—and he is nowhere without it—which comes to him from his Predecessors, whose excuses he repeats without imagination, but slavishly reads his lesson from the book. I cannot understand how it is these men, who have nothing to do—who are gamekeepers without game—are paid these large salaries every year. We want to make it clear to every Government that if they hope to get through the Estimates easily they will do well not to bring in Votes on Account. It is on account of my objection to these, among other things, that I move these reductions, and in this case from £17,000 to £14,000, which will still leave a margin to enable the Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to get on for a fortnight.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £17,000, for Royal Parks and Pleasure Grounds, be reduced by the sum of £14,000."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I wish, Sir, to draw attention to one fact. We are asked to pay salaries for Rangers and Deputy Rangers to Richmond, Hyde, and other Parks. The Ranger, I think, is somebody called George. I do not know him. However, Rangers and Superintendents are, it appears, military officers in the receipt of high pay from Army funds. We have to complain against these persons being put into these sinecures. If they are paid as Rangers they should not be paid as officers. The two offices are totally inconsistent with each other. It is supposed that their military duties, for which they are paid, take up their time; but if they choose to become Rangers they should get nothing in addition to their salaries as officers. Apparently these positions are simply a sort of jobbing, often established by the wisdom of our ancestors, or in fulfilment of musty contracts. And there is no need for them. In the face of the depression of trade and condition of the people, a rearrangement of these matters should be introduced, and these sinecures done away with. It is quite clear that if military officers are appointed as Rangers they should give up their highly paid offices in the Army. Besides, I cannot see why these people of substantial wealth should receive so many thousands from the pockets of the taxpayer, and they should be made to pay for their own lodgings when they are installed in these berths. Questions like these greatly affect the welfare of the people, and the Government should recognize the necessity there is for them to make some determined effort to get rid of these anomalies.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): If, Sir, the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) insists on going through all the items in this Vote I cannot hope quite to follow; but those of his questions which were distinctly asked I shall endeavour to answer. In the first place, the hon. Gentleman has asked me about the fact that last year an arrangement was arrived at for the purpose of transferring certain Parks to the Representatives of the ratepayers of the Metropolis, whilst certain of the Royal Parks were still to be retained on the Estimates. As a matter of fact, a Bill for this purpose has already been introduced and read a first time, and is on the Paper for second reading; but, unfortunately, owing to the circumstance that it has been blocked by an hon. Member opposite, I have not yet been able to bring it on any further. However, I am prepared to say, if the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton will undertake to get that block removed, I, for my part, will promise to proceed with the Bill on the first possible occasion; and if the Bill be passed this Session it will be in operation in six months. In regard to the objection that the neighbourhood of the Parks where the game is preserved is dangerous, so far as my memory serves me, I do not know of any incident which has occurred that has manifested those dangers. There was a point in the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the expense of maintaining the Royal Parks and the gamekeepers. But there were no gamekeepers to preserve the game for the use of any person in these Parks. The keepers there are paid for by the Rangers; but the keepers who appear in this Vote are those who look after the Parks and the ornamental deer only.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): The circumstances under which this Vote is now brought forward are very disadvantageous for a proper discussion, especially considering that it is 9 o'clock in the morning, when the body is wearied and the mind jaded. On the last occasion that this Vote was discussed the House was fairly full, and we obtained the publication of the proceedings and some reduction of the items. But now, as the condition of the House is, the likelihood of getting any reduction of the items is not much, and anything we do can only be of the nature of protest. It is very necessary for those who object to this Vote to keep hammering away from year to year at these abuses. It is only by keeping these matters prominently before the notice of the public that attention is attracted to the multiplicity of small items upon which public money is wasted or badly spent for the benefit, to a large extent, of a certain number of select individuals. It is better to move the reduction of a Vote by some definite sum, pointing out that that sum is definitely applicable to some definite purpose; and I am sorry that we are obliged to postpone the moving of the reduction of this Vote by a definite sum; but I hope, when the time comes to discuss the Estimates as a whole, we shall be able to move some definite reduction. When we call the attention of Parliament to these salaries the absurdity of the expenditure of many of these Votes appears. They furnish a great many pickings to persons who are well enough off without them. A great many people are better contented when the items of these Votes are better looked into, and for these reasons I support the reduction.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I wish to call attention to the fact in regard to Richmond Park that the carriage way of a certain private road is always closed, although the passenger gate is open. Will the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) undertake to see if it is possible to get the drive open?

MR. PLUNKET: I will do my best.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): It was my intention some time ago to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, when this Vote came before the Committee, to a point in connection with Kew Gardens. There is a portion of the grounds at the further end not properly laid down as horticultural ground, and from time to time many requests have appeared in the public Press, that citizens who go there should be allowed to partake of any light refreshment they had with them. Hitherto there has been an express prohibition placed on anybody entering the grounds against their doing so, and they have been obliged to leave their sandwiches and oranges at the gate. Kew is a source of pleasure and delight to anyone who goes there, and not merely to those who are interested in botanical studies. It is placed there for public instruction and observation; there can be had exercise and pleasure combined with pure air and instruction. I frequently go there, and there is one thing I have noticed; there is an obvious tendency in connection with the higher class plants to have too many of the same class; and nothing seems to be done to multiply varieties, as I think ought to be attempted. Further, I wish to say our public Parks and Gardens are not so open to the public on Sundays as one would imagine or wish, and, indeed, as on other days, there are too many rules and restrictions, interfering with the enjoyment of the public. But, returning to Kew, I wish to point out how convenient it would be to allow the public to take with them, into the portion I have referred to, something in the shape of light refreshment. I intend to stand up for the poor people of England as well as of Ireland; and I believe it would be a gracious act on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works to do away with these restrictions.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): As a Scotch Member who has taken some part in what I will venture to call this carnival of obstinacy and folly on the part of the Government, I intend to support what is put to the First Commissioner of Works in this matter. It may be said that Kew Gardens are of little interest to Scotland. My reply is that there is a very large Scotch population in London—probably more Scotchmen are to be found here than in any other part of the United Kingdom.

Edinburgh or Glasgow; and they have a deep interest in the freedom of the people to enjoy these Gardens. Many of the restrictions imposed are not necessary for the exigencies of science, while they are inconvenient to the people. I admit that great credit is due to the Government in many respects for the arrangements they have made for the convenience of the public. But the official mind is naturally and constitutionally opposed to public freedom; and I think the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works might do a great deal more for the public if he were to resist the tendency to officialdom in these Gardens. I do trust that, as a result of the representations made, something will be done in this matter.

MR. PLUNKET: As to what the hon. Member has said relative to the proceedings of the past night, I must state that as far as my experience goes, and as far as the information given me by competent authorities goes, this examination in detail of a Vote on Account is unparalleled in the House of Commons; and it would be quite impossible to find any precedent for it. But so long as the House chooses to tolerate these proceedings, it is my duty to answer any questions put; and, therefore, I will reply to the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner). I can only say that since I have been First Commissioner I have tried to make the public Parks and Gardens as free as is possible, consistently with their proper care and treatment. I have not seen the newspaper criticisms to which he has referred; but if he will send them to me I will consider the matter raised.

DR. TANNER: My request is that more freedom should be allowed in the portion of the Gardens not devoted to horticultural specimens.

MR. PLUNKET: I will go into it as soon as I have the matter before me. As regards the other matter, I will do my best; but I see great difficulty before me.

MR. JAMES STUART: The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works has said it is unprecedented that these matters should be discussed now in detail. I will remind him that the conditions under which the discussion is taking place are remarkable and peculiar.

THE CHAIRMAN (Sir JOHN GOSSET): Order, order! I do not think the hon.

Gentleman is in Order in discussing the question as to whether items may or may not be discussed now.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): We are obliged to the First Commissioner of Works for the answer he is always willing to give with so much courtesy. But I must tell him the responsibility for what he calls an unparalleled discussion rests with the Government for deliberately attempting to carry a Vote of £3,500,000 after midnight on the last day on which it can be legally taken.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): When I come to look at the items comprised in this Vote I find a sum of £57 for munitions. Anyone versed in these matters knows that represents an expenditure of at least 4,000 cartridges, or 6,000 shots. Are all these shots used to kill a few deer? If they are, I do not envy the recipients of the carcasses of the animals. We are told there is little firing done, but I have known Richmond Park literally obscured by smoke caused by the butchery which is carried on four or five times every season. This is evidence that there is a considerable head of game, and I suppose we have to pay money for men to tend this game. A considerable portion of Richmond Park is railed off for the purpose of preserving game. I note, too, that a part of Kew Gardens is railed off. Is it for the same purpose? I did not know there was any game there. It is a bad policy to restrict the enjoyment of the people, especially as we are paying large sums yearly for the maintenance of the Gardens. I see one gentleman has £300 a-year as Ranger in one Park. I would suggest to the Committee that it would be reasonable to dispense with his services, and instead to employ five or six men, at a salary of £1 a-week, to pick up any litter visitors may leave behind.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): Complaint is made of our discussing the items in the Estimates. I can only hope that future Parliaments will emulate our example in this matter.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 144: Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 77.) [9.20 A.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As it is important that we should be enabled to decide whether we should now proceed with the discussion of the Irish items in the Vote, it would be convenient if the Government would inform us whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has yet arrived at the House, and, if not, how soon we may expect him?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Mr. Chairman, I think I must ask for leave to report Progress, in order to get an answer to the question just put by my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). An hon. Member below the Gangway opposite says that no engagement was made. That hon. Gentleman, however, was not in the House at the time, and an engagement was made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—
(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Sir John Gorst, as I was present when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) made the statement to which the hon. Member has referred, I may state that what my right hon. Friend said was simply this—that if there seemed to be a prospect of an important Irish debate coming on, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) would be sent for. After the statement which the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has made, I will send for my right hon. Friend.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I am surprised at what the right hon. Gentleman says. My voice is worn out with continually stating that I am anxious to bring forward the Irish Question. At about 6 o'clock the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he would send for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. We intimated that we were anxious to see the right hon. Gentleman, and we have been waiting for him ever since. If there is a prospect of the right hon. Gentleman turning up soon, we will ask the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) not to proceed further with his Amendments.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I may say that the reason why the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not send for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary at 6 o'clock was, that there was continual obstruction, and no attempt was being made to get on with Business.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I strongly protest against the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, that there has been anything like obstruction in this matter. I hold, Sir, that there has been no speech made, no act done, no question addressed to the Government which could be styled obstructive.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think it is in Order for the hon. Member to discuss whether there has been obstruction or not.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Well, Sir, who initiated that discussion? I did not. I only wished to repudiate the charge. On the Motion to report Progress, I have to say that I fully understood that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was to be sent for in order that he might be in his place when the Irish debate came on, and an hon. Member left the House apparently with the object of fetching him.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: As I have obtained an answer, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Motion to report Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Nobody can say we are obstructing now, Sir John Gorst, any more than it can truly be said that we have been obstructing hitherto. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) has been good enough to tell us that somebody has sent for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland, and we must now go on, whether we wish it or not, until the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary turns up. I am, therefore, obliged to proceed with the discussion of these items. With regard to Vote 6, which relates to public buildings, I find that the number of houses taken by the various Members of the Government is perpetually on the increase. I find here an item relating to the "residence of the First Naval Lord," 34, Queen Anne's Gate, &c. I assume that the "First Naval Lord" means the noble Lord, George Hamilton) on the Treasury Bench. [Cries of "No!"] No! Then it is all the worse. You have a First Naval Lord, who receives a salary of £1,200 per annum, which is regarded as the value of his services. I suppose there were one or two rooms at some time in the Admiralty in which he managed to establish himself. The Admiralty is to be altered, and so a Gentleman whose salary is £1,200 a-year has a house taken for him at a rent of £700 per annum. I ask whether anything can be more monstrous than that? As the house happens to be near where I live, I have had my eye on it, and have observed plate-glass windows being put in and ornamentation going on there. No doubt I shall find the cost of it all in the Estimates. Now, I ask whether we ought not to put a stop to a system under which we give to Gentlemen houses which cost the country more than half of their salary? At any rate, we ought to have some explanation on the subject.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The First Naval Lord is not the same person as my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton), and it is necessary that the First Naval Lord should be provided with a house.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, I will pass to Vote No. 10, which relates to Metropolitan Police Courts. We are now asked to Vote £1,500 in respect of the maintenance of these Courts. There is no town in the country, besides London, which has the cost of its Police Courts thrown on the general taxpayer. In all other instances the expense is borne by the ratepayers, and I really do not see why the taxpayers should be called upon to meet it in regard to London. Why in the world the inhabitants of Northampton, for instance, should be asked to pay not only for their own Police Court, but also for the Police Courts of the richest town on the face of the earth, I really cannot conceive. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £1,500, for the Metropolitan Police Courts, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Mr. Labouchere

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I wish to know, Sir, how we are to understand the silence of the Government? There is no Member present who is responsible for this expenditure.

MR. COURTNEY here resumed the Chair. [9.35 A.M.]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Mr. Courtney, we are in this extraordinary position, that, as far as I understand, there is no one present to speak for the Government in reference to this Vote. I am told that the Vote comes within the Department of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket). Of course, if that be so, I withdraw the observation.

MR. PLUNKET: I must repeat, Mr. Courtney, what I said a short time ago—namely, that this process of discussing at length the items in the Estimates on a Vote on Account is most unusual and extremely inconvenient, and I believe that, with one single exception, there is no precedent for dealing with a Vote on Account in such a way. The Vote is only asked for to enable the Government to carry on the Business of the country until the Estimates can be brought forward in the ordinary way. Having made that protest, I must say again that, as long as the Committee chooses to allow that proceeding to continue, it is my duty to answer hon. Gentlemen. In reply to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) I can assure the Committee that the question he has referred to has been raised over and over again. The Metropolitan Police Courts continue to be provided by the taxpayers on the same principle as the County Courts are paid for by the taxpayers. My hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) reminds me that all the fees and fines gathered in the Police Courts are paid into the Treasury, and I have no doubt, therefore, that if an account were taken it would be found that, on the whole, the taxpayers lose nothing by the present system.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman's argument hardly holds good, because there are County Courts as well as Police Courts in the Metropolis. I have often wondered where the receipts from the Police Court fines and fees go to. The right hon. Gentleman says they are paid into the Treasury, and that they exceed the cost of the Courts. If so, why do we not have it stated in the Votes that the Police Courts support themselves? The right hon. Gentleman complains that we are going through the Accounts item by item. I can only say that if the right hon. Gentleman and the Government did not wish us to do this, they have greatly wasted the public money in having the Estimates printed and circulated amongst Members. We have had these printed Estimates given to us for our guidance, and we are told that we are doing a monstrous thing if we venture to discuss any of the items. We protest against the action of the Government, and still more against the action of the Ministers who preceded them, in getting the House into the habit of voting large sums of money on Account. I think that the course we have followed to-day will tend to induce Governments not to take away henceforward all the time of private Members up to the 21st of March, then to bring forward a Vote on Account, and to complain because the items in that Vote are discussed. The Government will find that we are now establishing a precedent, and I trust that on all future occasions when Votes on Account are asked for, Parliament will follow the excellent example we are setting.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 186: Majority 135.—(Div. List, No. 78.) [9.40 A.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am sure we are all anxious to bring these proceedings to a close as speedily as we can, consistently with the proper discharge of our duty. I, therefore, propose to pass over a large number of items in Class II., and come to Class III., in order to come to the Vote for the salaries of the officials of the House of Lords and the salaries of Cabinet Ministers. Indeed, so anxious am I to simplify matters, that I will ask the Committee to consent to an Amendment for the reduction of two separate items by putting the two items together. So far as the officials of the House of Lords are concerned, I was anxious to do away with the whole expenditure; but I propose to confine the Motion to a simple reduction. It is well known that the clerks of the House of Lords and other employés there are paid on a higher scale than similar officers in this House. The second item I move to reduce is that which provides the salaries of Ministers I have already placed on the Paper, an Amendment upon the main Estimate, to reduce the salaries of the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Those two Gentlemen are both very rich Gentlemen, so that they can scarcely conceive I have any personal intentions in the matter. But I do not think that, considering the number of Ministers we have who do their work well and efficiently for the sum of £2,000 a-year, we ought not to give more than £2,000 to any other Minister sitting on that Bench. It would be most regrettable that there should be a desire for Office for the mere sake of the emoluments of Office. I am afraid that there is a greater desire than there used to be to obtain Office on that account; but I doubt whether, if the salaries were considerably reduced, we should have Gentlemen so very anxious for the mere honour of the thing to sit on that Bench night after night and perform Administrative duties. It may be said that they work hard; but we work hard too, and right hon. Gentlemen are not paid for the work they do in this House, but for being Members of the Administration. I do not believe in the appointment of Ministers because they are men of genius. On the contrary, I believe that men who know something about business would make the best Ministers. Of course, there must be some head to direct the whole machine; but, as a rule, a few partners selected from flourishing concerns would make just as good Ministers as the ordinary article which we get, and I am perfectly convinced that there are very few clerks in any bank in the City who would not make as good officials as the small fry who sit on that Bench. I may add that in every other country in the civilized world, the salaries of Ministers are considerably less than they are here, and certainly they are not more than you would pay if you reduce the present salaries to £2,000 per annum. I am strongly of opinion that it is most desirable to reduce these enormous salaries from £5,000 per annum to £2,000. It may be said that there are heavy expenses connected with the position of a Minister. Now, I have looked into that matter, and I have very grave doubts about it. Perhaps the Foreign Minister may have large expenses; but, certainly, not the First Lord of the Treasury, nor the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I take it that all they have to do is to give a few dinners to their private friends. If they were not in the Ministry, perhaps they might not give the official soirées and routs which are now-a-days given by a Cabinet Minister to "the classes," but what I object to is that "the classes" should be entertained at the expense of the taxpayers. If a Minister desires to entertain "the classes" and the aristocracy, let him entertain them out of his own pocket. I beg to move the reduction of £4,000 in the item for the salaries of officers of the House of Lords, and of £6,000 in that for salaries of the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the total amounting to a sum of £10,000 in classes one and two.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would be necessary in that case to move the reduction of £10,000 in the whole Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Would that prevent any subsequent reduction being moved?

THE CHAIRMAN: Not subsequent to the Treasury Vote.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,614,100, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888."—(Mr. Labouchere).

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 204: Majority 155.—(Div. List, No. 79.) [10.10 A.M.]

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): If necessary I shall conclude with a Motion; but I think it is desirable, at this stage, that the Committee and also the country should understand the manner in which hon. Members, and especially the Irish Members, are being dealt with by Her Majesty's Government, and by the right hon. Gentleman who now holds the Office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. This Vote was first put from the Chair at 5 o'clock this morning. For several hours before that time—I think as early as 2 o'clock—upon several occasions the Irish Members intimated that they were prepared to raise upon the Vote certain questions of the very gravest importance to their country. Now, this Vote includes, among its numerous items, the salary of the Chief Secretary who has recently accepted that Office; but during the course of this prolonged Sitting the right hon. Gentleman has not honoured us with his presence. Four hours ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having been strongly informed of our desire to proceed with Irish Questions, said that a message would be sent requesting the attendance of the right hon. Gentleman. We hoped that that message would be speedily followed by his bodily presence. However, whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer repented of his courtesy, or the messenger proved incompetent to discharge the duty entrusted to him, I am unable to say; but the promise has not yet had any substantial result. A second time we applied for the presence of the Chief Secretary, and a second time a Cabinet Minister, in this case the Secretary of State for War, informed us that a messenger would be sent to procure his attendance. Now, I am stating a fact which can be tested by the visual power of every hon. Member, when I say that the Chief Secretary for Ireland has not yet appeared in his place. Many questions of great magnitude require to be discussed on these Votes. There have already been mentioned the murder of the man Hanlon at Youghal, the repeated suppression of public meetings in Ireland without cause, and the protracted delay in dealing with the favourable recommendations of the Royal Commissioners in regard to the Catholic minority in the town of Belfast. What can be the meaning of asking us to go through the form of a debate in the absence of the Minister who, by the position he holds, is responsible, and who is required to give an answer to our complaints? We have remained here all night in the discharge of our duty to our constituents. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, who enjoys a high dignity and great emolument, has all the time been quietly and comfortably in bed. If he should now arrive here, after a good night's sleep and a hearty breakfast, it would certainly be a very unequal debate between him and myself. I have been 19 hours in continuous attendance upon the Business of this House, and for 14 hours I have been without food. [A laugh.] Hon. Members may well laugh; they have taught us how to do without food in Ireland. The question I wish to ask is this—Is the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland coming down to this House at all? Have these repeated messengers who have gone forth from the ark brought back any answer? If he is coming down, how soon may we expect him? If he is not coming down, do the Government intend to press to a Division the Irish items of this Vote? If he is not coming down, I ask, in the name of common sense and in the name of humanity, that we, who have been 19 hours in constant attendance in the House engaged in the fatiguing exercise of debating these Votes, should be released?

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Mr. Courtney, I wish to know from you, Sir, whether it is in Order for an hon. Member opposite to say that if he catches me outside he will black my eyes?

THE CHAIRMAN: Such an observation is clearly out of Order.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I rise to make a personal explanation. I did not use those words.

THE CHAIRMAN: No name was mentioned. It is not, therefore, necessary to explain. Mr. Sexton.

MR. SEXTON: I am in the unfortunate position of having been repeatedly interrupted by calls to Order for riot and imaginary offences. The question I have risen to call the attention of the Committee to is the inability of the Irish Members to discuss certain items of expenditure in the absence of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is coming down at all this morning to perform his public duties? If he is coming, when will he be here, and are we expected to engage in debate with him after the exhausting Sitting we have already had?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Member appeals, I presume, to me. I must remind the Committee that at 11 o'clock last night we offered to withdraw the Navy Vote, in order that progress might be made with the debate which is now going on. That offer, however, was refused, and until 5 o'clock in the morning the debate on the Navy Vote was kept up, against the wish of the Government, who desired to withdraw the Vote in order to allow the present debate to be brought on. In the view of the Government, it is necessary, in the public interests, that this Vote should be taken at this Sitting. It is most unusual—in fact, I believe it is contrary to the practice of Parliament—to debate items in a Vote on Account. [Cries of "No!"] Hon. Gentlemen who say "No!" may have their own views on the matter, but I am entitled to state mine with the full sense of the responsibility which belongs to any statement I may make. I repeat that it is contrary to the practice of Parliament to debate items in a Vote on Account; and it has been so held by the highest authorities, and especially by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). Let me remind hon. Gentlemen that if they are to claim on every item in a Vote on Account, the right and privilege of debate in Supply in the House of Commons must break down altogether. It is utterly impossible for this Committee to debate item after item in a Vote on Account, and to maintain the privileges of the House, and discharge their duty as guardians of the public purse. The right to debate an item arises only when that special item is put from the Chair. Each item must be put from the Chair before it is finally passed. The charge for a particular Service cannot be voted by Parliament in any other way; and, therefore, I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite to permit the usual practice of Parliament to be observed on the present occasion—to allow Parliament to discharge its proper duties, and to allow this Vote to be taken according to the usage and practice of Parliament, and the best interests of the country we are here to serve. The hon. Member has made an appeal to me with regard to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I am informed that both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intimation that he won't

[An hon. MEMBER: Then produce him.] Without further detaining the Committee, I must enter a protest against debating the items of a Vote on Account as opposed to the best interests of Parliament.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman permit me respectfully to ask him one question? We do not desire to discuss items, but to raise upon this Vote on Account certain questions of policy. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will not deny that we are entitled to raise questions of policy, and that it has been the uniform practice of Parliament to raise questions of policy on Votes on Account. Although the right hon. Gentleman asserts that we have no Constitutional right to debate items; does he deny our right to raise questions of public policy, or does he say that we are not entitled to decline to proceed with the discussion of questions of policy relating to Ireland in the absence of the Chief Secretary?

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I will not dispute with the First Lord of the Treasury the exact hour at which he made the offer to withdraw the Navy Vote. He may have been within an hour of the actual time. But assuming the statement to be perfectly correct, I and other Irish Members were desirous of debating the Naval Vote. After he offered to withdraw it, at 11 o'clock, two hours of solid debate occurred on English Votes; and when 1 o'clock is reached, everybody knows that the Reporters' Gallery is clear, or very nearly so, and it would have been of very little use for us to debate very important Irish questions when the speeches of the Irish Members could not have been reported. If we had accepted the offer of the First Lord of the Treasury, we should have been launched into a very important debate at an altogether unusual hour, and a debate would have taken place which could not, by any possibility, have been reported at any length. Therefore, I think the Irish Members were perfectly justified in declining the offer of the First Lord of the Treasury. That was one point in the speech of the First Lord; and as he has given the view of the Treasury Bench, I think it is just as well that the country should know what the views of the Irish Members are in regard to what occurred last night. It was after half-past 11 when this offer on the part of the Government was made, and I have described what subsequently occurred. There is another point in the statement of the First Lord to which I must refer. He has declared, categorically and emphatically, that it is wrong—I do not think he went so far as to say that it was wicked—to debate the items of a Vote on Account. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman is a Minister, and he looks at the question exclusively from an official stand-point; but I think there are high authorities who may be set against him. I recollect the late Mr. Butt declaring, in emphatic terms, that it was wrong to give Votes on Account at all. I must say that, high as the authority of the First Lord of the Treasury is on Parliamentary practice, Mr. Butt's authority as to Constitutional usage and practice was at least as high. I think he will find that the old practice was not to introduce Votes on Account at all, and that it is quite a novel practice. [Mr. W. H. SMITH dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but that was the opinion expressed by Mr. Butt; and Mr. Butt, who was always received as a high authority, was in this House before many hon. Members opposite were born. I consider that our conduct has not only been justified, but that we should have fallen far short of our duty if we had adopted any other course. By holding on during the night, we have reached an hour when we can expect to be reported, and we can show the country that we have been here to defend the public purse, and to discuss these items properly. Where the Government were wrong was this—they should have agreed to take the Naval Vote at 1 o'clock in the morning, and then have postponed the consideration of the Vote on Account. Is it reasonable to suppose that a sum of £3,600,000 should be voted without any discussion at all? We offered to take Wednesday or Thursday for the debate; indeed, we made every offer we could to conciliate the Government. We were most anxious to avoid the scandal of this All-night Sitting, and the excitement which it has produced; but we were not prepared to give the Government a sum of £3,600,000 without debate. I think the country will be of opinion that we were right.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): As one who has been present throughout the whole of the Sitting, I desire to speak upon a question of fact; because there has been an unconscious divergence of statement between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury. At 7 o'clock this morning the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he was prepared to hear a statement of grievances upon every item contained in the Vote on Account. We offered him a compromise on the matter; but he would not accept it. But now, after four and a-half hours' further debate, a number of hon. Gentlemen have come in who have not heard a word of what passed, and they cheer and support the First Lord of the Treasury when he goes entirely against the statement that was made by the Representative of the Government at the time the right hon. Gentleman himself was probably asleep. Now, how is it possible to carry on a proper discussion on terms of that description? I claim, as one who was attending to my duty, while others were absent, the fulfilment of the promise which was made by the Representative of the Government between 6 and 7 this morning. I have always understood that a first contract should stand until a second contract has been accepted by both parties to the first. I therefore must distinctly claim that the discussion should be allowed to go on on the lines laid down to us, and definitely laid down to us, by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in opposition to our offers of compromise. I desire to add my humble voice to what has been stated by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), that we are now entitled by the offer made to us by the Government to debate the items contained in this Vote, and we are further entitled to ask that those Members of the Government who are responsible for the items should be present to answer any questions that may be raised. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant would be sent for. That promise was made four hours ago. How long does it take to send for the right hon. Gentleman, and how long does it take to awake him? I am not prepared to say that there may not be reasons why he should not always be wide awake; but I think he might be made tolerably wide awake in the course of four hours. I think he ought to be here on the simple ground of the contract made between the Government and the Irish Members.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I have not ventured to offer a single word upon this Vote on Account, and therefore I cannot be accused of any improper motive in rising to take part in the present discussion. No doubt I did take part in the previous debate. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) has imputed to us, as a matter of blame, that when the Government wished to withdraw the Navy Vote, the proposition to withdraw it was opposed from these Benches. I maintain that it was rightfully resisted, and the resistance had this result that, instead of having the whole evening wasted, the Navy Vote was finally disposed of, and the Sitting was not, so far, lost. For the fact that it was not lost the House is not indebted to the Government, but to those who refused their consent to the withdrawal of the Vote. The Navy Vote involved a sum of nearly £1,000,000, and already on this Vote on Account we have agreed to items that make up a considerable amount—probably amounting to another £333,000. If we had passed the whole of the Vote on Account we should have been voting away the money of the country for several hours at the rate of £10,000 a-minute. I think that is scarcely the way in which the money of the country should be dealt with. We have passed Class I., and in the remaining items I contend there are matters which ought to receive the attention of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury says—and he told us he made the statement with all the responsibility which attaches to a statement from him in his place on the Treasury Bench—that it is altogether against the practice of Parliament to discuss the items of a Vote on Account. Now we have no desire to discuss all the items in this Vote on Account; but if we did want to discuss them, we are entitled to do so, and the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is altogether wrong. We have had these Votes on Account brought before us during the last five or six years, and the right hon. Gentleman will find that in each of those years the items contained in the Votes were discussed. Among those who have been most energetic in their opposition to Votes on Account have been the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) and several of his associates of the Fourth Party who are now on the Government Bench. Now with regard to Class II.—that Class contains the Vote for the Board of Trade; and in reference to the Bankruptcy Department of the Board of Trade there is a question connected with a certain surplus, which, in my opinion, ought to secure the attention of a Committee of this House at the earliest possible moment; because while we are voting money for the Board of Trade, the Board is practically plundering the creditors of bankrupt estates by exacting fees altogether disproportionate and unreasonable. The Board is making up a fund from those fees and placing it practically under the control of the Treasury. The Treasury itself is proposing to draw on the fund in a way which was not contemplated when the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 was passed; and in order to make up for the depreciation of that fund, all the creditors and others who have bankruptcy business to transact are being charged rates of fees that were never anticipated, and a great deal higher than were contemplated in connection with bankruptcy proceedings. Then, again, with regard to the Mint coinage, it is within my own knowledge that an hon. Gentleman sitting above the Gangway has sat here night after night, for many hours, for the purpose of bringing forward at the first opportunity a debate in connection with the depreciation of the coinage of this country. Then, again, year after year money has been voted on account, and there has been no regular Estimate presented for the Patent Office. Not only has the money not been wanted for the purpose for which it has ostensibly been drawn, but year after year, systematically and deliberately, the money has been diverted from that purpose, and appropriated to a different purpose. One of the items in the present Estimates includes a sum of £900 for the salary of an individual who is actually an imaginary officer of the Patent Office. The last officer died, and his place has not been filled up for a period of nearly three years, and yet this Vote is presented without any statement to the effect that the sum drawn for the Superintendent of Indexing is not required for that purpose. I think it ought to be recognized that the primary duty of those who are in charge of the Patent Office is to see that the arrears of work in connection with patents should be at once taken in hand, and pressed forward with the utmost possible despatch. The work, as a matter of fact, has been systematically neglected, and yet money has been obtained from the Committee of Supply under a deliberate false pretence. I contend that these are matters which ought to be discussed, even at this stage, upon Votes on Account. Will any reasonable man say that it is not a proper thing for a Member who is acquainted with the facts to bring them forward? I say that it is the clear duty of every Member, on every occasion when these items are open to discussion, to lay such facts before the Committee. Therefore, I protest altogether against the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. If the time of the Committee has been wasted, it is not our fault, but his; and there would have been a greater waste of time if we had consented to the preposterous proposition that, after the Navy Vote had been discussed for six or seven hours, it should then be withdrawn, and the whole of the discussion which had taken place upon it be rendered useless, and have to be renewed again.

MR. SEXTON: As the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has now, at 11 o'clock in the morning, returned to his place, I shall proceed at once to raise the question which I desired to raise when this Vote was first put from the Chair at 5 o'clock this morning, and which I was anxious to raise the moment the right hon. Gentleman was in his place. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is possible to ascertain from him what provision the Government have made or intend to make for the better security of social order in the City of Belfast? This is a question upon which I am personally charged with a heavy responsibility, and a question which I could not delay bringing before the Committee without transgressing my public duty. It may be my good or ill fortune, but at present I have the honour to represent in this House the Division of Belfast which is described in the Report of the Royal Commission as the main theatre of the recent riots. My Catholic constituents—the poor artisans and labourers of that Division of Belfast—are those who, as often as rioting occurs in that unfortunate town, have their district invaded, their houses broken into, their property plundered, and their lives put in danger and sometimes taken. That being the state of affairs, I think I am entitled and that I am bound to protest against any delay on the part of the Government in applying such measures as may be found necessary for the preventing any new disorder arising in Belfast. The Catholic Committee of Belfast—a body of gentlemen who are highly representative of the Catholic community of the town—have felt themselves obliged, by the scandalous inactivity of the Government, to hold a meeting, and to pass resolutions, in which they strongly and solemnly protest against the neglect of the Government to give effect to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Belfast Commissioners. Everywhere in Ireland except in Belfast the policy of the Government is thorough. It is expressed in brief apophthegms, such as “Deal summarily,” “Do not hesitate;” but in Belfast they refuse to deal summarily; and although they do not hesitate elsewhere, but even kill, in regard to Belfast they agree to kill nothing but time. The Catholic Committee complain of the delay that has occurred. Let me show the scandalous character of that delay. The riots occurred in the months of June, July, and August last year. They involved the taking of 30 lives at least, the wrecking of 60 houses, the looting of 30 others, and the destruction of property to the value of £90,000. A force of police and military, amounting to 6,000, was sent to Belfast in consequence of the riots which were carried on intermittently for three months, and the whole of the town was placed in a state of the utmost confusion. What did the Government do? They appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the origin and circumstances of the riots; they nominated three of the Commissioners in August, and completed the nomination in September. The Commissioners were—Mr. Justice Day—an English Judge—Major General E. J. Bulwer, Mr. R. Adams, and Mr. Frederick Le Poer Trench, barristers, and Commander Wallace M. Hardy, R.N. They opened their inquiry at Belfast, in the Court House of the County of Antrim, on the 4th of October, and continued it uninterruptedly until the 25th of the same month. Nevertheless, it was not until January that they presented their Report, and even then it was only signed by four out of the five Commissioners. But although the Report was presented two months ago to the Government, up to this moment, although the Constitutional Representative and protector of these unfortunate people, my repeated applications to Her Majesty's Government have been utterly fruitless in obtaining from them what the conclusion is which they have drawn from the Report of the Commissioners, and what proposals they are prepared to make. And let the Committee consider what has happened in those two months which have elapsed since the Report was laid before the Government. Other desperate riots have broken out in Belfast. There is one sentence in the Report which ought to receive the serious attention of the Government unless they are altogether callous and careless of the consequences. It is that in which the Commissioners describe Belfast as a place where, as its history shows, riots of the most formidable kind may at any time break out. Yet the Government have remained criminally supine, although disorder has four times broken out in Belfast. What was the conduct of the Government on the 31st of January, when there was a dangerous riot, which, fortunately, however, proved to be of a transitory character, although the Government are not to be thanked for the fact, seeing that they had applied no remedial or suppressive measure. On the 31st of January a number of men were arrested for a violent attack upon the police. What happened when the men were brought up in Court? The District Inspector, who acted as prosecutor on the occasion, said that he had been directed, by desire of the Government, to ask for an adjournment, in order to await the presence of the Crown Solicitor. An adjournment accordingly took place. Now, nobody is entitled to instruct the Crown Solicitor except the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland; and here was a statement made by an officer of the police with regard to a body of desperate rioters, that the case should be adjourned in order to procure the attendance of the Crown Solicitor. Two adjournments were procured on that plea, and in the end, when the case was adjudicated upon, what happened? There was no Crown Solicitor in attendance at all; but a minor agent of the Crown came forward and said that the Crown Solicitor had received no instructions from the Attorney General. The trials therefore proceeded, and the rioters were set free on fines of 10s. and 20s. a-piece—fines which, so far from exercising any repressive effect on the elements of blackguard faction and brutal disorder in Belfast, distinctly held out a premium to the continuance of disorder. For the fourth time, only on Saturday last, disorder again broke out in Belfast since the presentation of the Commissioners' Report. It appears that a private of Dragoons was wandering through the streets and used language of a most offensive character to Catholics. He was cheered by a Protestant mob, and when the police arrested him the Protestant mob endeavoured to effect a rescue. The baton was resorted to. The baton is held to be a sufficiently effective weapon, in Belfast, for quelling disorder, although elsewhere than in the sacred region of Belfast a weapon somewhat more deadly than the baton is to be employed. I do not make an exaggerated statement when I complain that the Government have four times, in the course of two months, allowed rioting to take place in Belfast, which might at any moment in that magazine of gunpowder have produced an explosion that would have been fatal to life. They have allowed this length of time to elapse without having taken a single step to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners. I have already pointed out who the Commissioners were. They were gentlemen the solitary opinion of each of whom is entitled to respect, while the united opinion of the whole of them is entitled to every attention on the part of the Government. Only four of the Commissioners have signed the Report—Mr. Justice Day, an English Judge, General Bulwer, an English Major-General, and two Irish barristers, one of whom is certainly an Irish Conservative, while the other is not particularly attached to any Party except himself. These four gentlemen have signed the Report. The fifth Commissioner has not done so, nor has he sent in a separate Report of his own. Why has he not done so? The inquiry was closed five months ago, but Commander Wallace M'Hardy is still persistently silent. Why have not the Government either induced or compelled him to speak? At the time of the nomination of the Commission, I was strongly opposed to the appointment of this gentleman, because I knew him to be a bigot, and as having used his position as a Scotch police officer to prosecute Irish Catholics. But I did not think that even Mr. Wallace M'Hardy would be guilty of the indecency of accepting an appointment upon the Commission on such a question as this, and then declining to perform the functions which the duties of his office imposed upon him. Why has he refused to sign the Report? I am inclined to think that a letter from the Home Secretary to Mr. Wallace M'Hardy, as Police Commissioner of the County of Lanark, would have a great effect in inducing him to sign it. If he was satisfied with the inquiry which took place in Belfast, and with the evidence taken before the Court, why has he, on two occasions, gone back to Belfast, like a thief in the night, and held secret and stealthy interviews with the people who are accused of having incited the people of Belfast to riot? I await an explanation of that act of indecency. I will now pass from the absence of Mr. Wallace M'Hardy's signature from the Report in order to consider the recommendations contained in the Report which bears the signatures of the other four Commissioners. The Commissioners were directed to—“Inquire into the origin and circumstances of the riots and disturbances, the cause of their continuance, the existing local arrangements for the preservation of the peace of the town of Belfast, the magisterial jurisdiction exercised within it, the amount and constitution and efficiency of the police force usually available there, the proceedings undertaken by the magistrates, stipendiary and local, and other authorities, and the police force, on the occasion of the said riots and disturbances; whether these authorities and the existing police force are adequate to the future maintenance of order and tranquillity within the town; whether any and what steps ought to be taken; and whether any and what changes ought to be made in the local, magisterial, and police jurisdiction arrangements and establishment, with a view to the better preservation of the public peace, and the prevention or prompt suppression of riot and disorder."

I beg the Committee to attend to one brief extract from the Report of the Commissioners which in a graphic picture lays bare, in a piercing light, the real nature of the provocative cause of these disturbances in Belfast. What do the Commissioners say? They say—

"The evidence leads us to believe that the riots, at a very early period, and certainly from and after the 8th June assumed, to a great extent, the aspect of a determined attack by the Protestant mobs upon the police, and upon the places of business of Catholics residing in Protestant quarters of the town. Of the cause of this we shall come to speak when we have to deal with other matters into which your Excellency's Warrant directs us to inquire. But in this instance of Hassan's public-house, and in several others to which we have drawn attention, the attack was undoubtedly made by Protestant mobs against the property of Catholic traders. Of course there were retaliation and faults on both sides, but so far as we can judge from the evidence twenty-eight public-houses owned by Catholics were assailed and looted during the course of the riots, and only one or two public-houses owned by Protestants."

They might have added that 29 private houses were also wrecked. The Report proceeds—

"This state of affairs may to a considerable extent be accounted for by the fact that the vast majority of the public-houses in Belfast are owned by Catholics, and that when once rioting begins those engaged in the pursuit are but too prone to attack any house in which intoxicating drinks can be procured. But at the same time these incidents seemed to show, and we have arrived at the opinion, that for a considerable period, at all events, from the 8th of June to the 19th of September, the principal actors in the rioting were what is known as the Protestant mob. Mr. Cullen informed us that up to this date, the 19th September, the Catholic Party behaved remarkably well, and Mr. McClelland, a Protestant magistrate, stated to us that the endurance and patience of the Catholics during the riots was simply wonderful. We are of opinion that the comparative good conduct of the Catholics must be largely attributed to the zealous exertions of the Catholic Bishop and clergy, who, during the riots, laboured persistently in the cause of peace, and who exercised over their people a great and most beneficial influence."

It is on behalf of that Catholic minority in Belfast, so certified to be patient and enduring, that I now appeal to the Chair and the Committee to support me in obtaining from the Government an immediate declaration of the policy they intend to pursue in order to secure the future preservation of order. The Commissioners say—

"We attribute the extraordinary persistence of the riots largely to the intensity of feeling in Belfast during the period covered by them, a fact admitted upon all sides. The weakness of parleying with, and yielding to the mob did much harm. Had the police not been withdrawn on the 9th of June the tumult of the night would, in our opinion, have been suppressed with comparative ease, and the heavy loss of life which caused so much exasperation, would have been avoided. Unquestionably, however, a main cause of the prolonged continuance of the disturbances was the wild and unreasoning hostility exhibited by a large section of the Protestants of Belfast against the police."

The Commissioners state further—

"We are sorry to add that certain persons having great influence in Belfast, thought proper, at various periods during the riots to indulge in language, written and spoken, well calculated to maintain excitement at a time when all men of influence should have tried to assuage it." "Another cause," say the Commissioners—"of the continuance of the riots was the unhappy sympathy with which, at certain stages, the well-to-do classes of Protestants regarded the proceedings of the rioters."

Further on they say—

"A most important cause of the continuance of the disturbances were certain serious defects in the magisterial and police arrangements of the town."

They define this as follows—

"The magistrates do not possess any special powers of any kind, and are therefore unable to deal summarily with such offences as riot, persons charged with which can only be sent for trial before a jury. During the riots the ordinary magistracy of Belfast was largely reinforced by resident magistrates drafted in from various parts of the country, and at one time at least twenty of these gentlemen were in the town. Again, while on the one hand there was no evidence before us to prove that the borough magistrates acted with partiality, unquestionably, in the atmosphere of Belfast, they are regarded by the rival parties with suspicion, which enormously militates against the weight of any decisions they may give. Further, public inconvenience is caused by their fluctuating attendances on the bench; and during the riots this was most unfortunate, as the varying character of the tribunal rendered punishments unequal, at a time when it was most desirable that they should be, at once, equal and severe. Passing from the administration of justice in the courts to the action of the magistrates in the streets, we wish, in the first place, to say a word as to the resident magistrates. These gentlemen were brought up to Belfast in great numbers during the outbreak. They behaved, undoubtedly, very well, but here also we notice the absence of headship which helped so much to prolong the riots. Each resident magistrate appears to enjoy an equal amount of authority with his fellows, and this tends to produce that absence of an intelligible, consistent, and determined plan of action which is to be observed in the course taken to suppress the disturbances.

When to the fifteen or twenty resident magistrates we add the borough magistrates, all with equal authority, it will be seen that the police of Belfast had, during the riots, some hundred masters, and it is not strange that such an arrangement did not work well. At a time when action was all important it is to be feared that too much time was lost in discussion."

I may say that one of the local magistrates, in the midst of the riot, released a prisoner at the dictation of the mob, and it was proved that another caused a disastrous withdrawal of the police from the barracks at Bowers' Hill, which had the result of producing in the mob a feeling that they were in the ascendancy. These having been the cause of the riots and the continuance of them, what do the Commissioners recommend? I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland to tell us before this Vote is taken, what action the Government are prepared to take upon the recommendation of the Commissioners. They recommend, in the first place, that the Chief Officer of Police for the town of Belfast should be entirely independent of all Police Authority, save and except that of the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary. They say—

"We recommend that such officer should have absolute control of the police force of the town, and the sole responsibility of maintaining the peace, free from any magisterial or other control, save that of the Executive Government and the Inspector General."

They desire, in other words, that the Chief Officer of Police in Belfast should be set free from the control of that Local Authority which in the past has been proved to be paralyzing in its effect, so far as the preservation of order is concerned. Now, I consider that the appointment of this future Chief Officer of Police is a matter of great and vital importance, and upon the fitness of the individual selected for the office will very much, in my opinion, depend the prospect of preserving peace. I have heard it asserted that a certain Inspector—Mr. Cameron—a gentleman of some notoriety, is to be appointed; and I am prepared to tell the Government in advance, that if they select that gentleman to be the Chief Officer of the Belfast Police they will have struck a vital blow against the maintenance of the public peace. Why was this Commission appointed at all? Why are we debating the question now, except that the Catholic minority in Belfast requires protection? Do you not conceive that the opinion of the Member who represents that Catholic minority and of the Catholic priests of Belfast should have any value? Do you think that in selecting the Chief Officer of the Belfast Police you ought not to select some officer who by the way in which he has discharged his duties hitherto would not be influenced by any partizan feeling? That is all I ask, and I agree with the Commissioners that—

"Power should be vested in the Chief Officer of Police of Belfast to forbid processions, bands, and the erection of arches, when, in his opinion, they are calculated to lead to a breach of the peace. That the Chief Police Officer of Belfast shall have full power, from time to time, to transfer to the Head Quarters of the Royal Irish Constabulary all such officers and constables as may, in his judgment, prove unfitted for the discharge of urban duties as required in Belfast; that no officers or men should be otherwise removable, except with their consent; that the Chief Police Officer shall have sole control of promotion among the constables under his command; and that the promotion of the officers shall, as far as may be, be dependent upon his recommendation."

The Commissioners further recommend that the number of the normal police force of the town shall be increased to such extent as the Executive Government shall determine—

"So as to render the force as far as possible complete in itself, and competent to deal with rioting, without any assistance from outside police forces; and that the military garrison of Belfast should be maintained at such strength as will render recourse to police aid from outside Belfast unnecessary at any time."

I ask the Government to accept that principle, and whether they intend to adopt it? I want to know if it is true, as it has been reported to me, that an alteration has already been made in the balance of creeds in the police force of Belfast since the month of October last? At that time Protestant constables were in a slight majority—280 to 250. It is far from me to suggest that a Protestant constable would not discharge his duty equally with a Catholic constable; but it must be remembered that the conflicts in Belfast have continually arose upon questions founded upon creed, and upon stringent proceedings arising out of imperfect understanding of the nature of some particular question. When disorder arises in such a case it is not only desirable but necessary that the minority, as well as the majority, should have confidence in the force that has to preserve the public peace, and the object should be to give confidence to the Catholic minority. The proportion of the Catholic members of the police has certainly not been increased since October; but I am told that a steady process of intrigue has been going on, by which the number of Protestant constables has been steadily increased, while that of the Catholic Constabulary has been decreased. The fact that the Catholic Constabulary is being withdrawn from these districts, and the preservation of the peace left to the Protestant police, is certainly open to the suspicion that in a time of disorder they might be found fraternizing with citizens of the Protestant faith. I am told that in some of the barracks in Belfast the number of Catholic Constabulary are now so few that they are exposed, at the hands of their comrades, to disagreeable experiences. I do not propose to go into details now; but it may be my duty to expose this matter to the notice of the Committee and of the country hereafter. In the Report of the Commissioners some important recommendations are made with respect to the administration of justice. The four members of the Commission who have signed the Report—Mr. Justice Day, General Bulwer, Mr. F. Le Poer Trench, and Mr. Adams—have arrived at the conclusion that the borough magistrates should be withdrawn from all connection with the administration of justice in Belfast. The Catholic Committee have confided to me a resolution, in which they say that no step will be of any avail in placing the peace of Belfast on a satisfactory footing unless the Government, without delay, deprive the borough magistrates of all criminal jurisdiction; that this is the only remedy for the evils under which Belfast is suffering; the only step that will engender a fear of the majesty of the law, and secure confidence and respect in its due administration. Have, then, the Government arrived at the conclusion to support the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners? I am afraid that not only have they not done so, but that they have removed two of the most experienced and able magistrates from the Bench. When I asked the question, I was told that this had been done in pursuance of the recommendation of the Commissioners. It has been done in pursuance of nothing of the kind. What the Commissioners recommended was that—

The object of the Commissioners is evidently to withdraw the Resident Magistrates from any duty in the streets, so that magistrates engaged in arresting rioters to-day should not be engaged in trying them to-morrow. But the Government have inverted the recommendations of the Commissioners. While the Commissioners have enlarged on the importance of local knowledge to deal with the rioters of Belfast, the Government, after a visit from the Mayor or Town Clerk of Belfast at Dublin Castle—the two chief mouthpieces of the faction of disorder in that town—have taken the first step, not towards the establishment, but towards the uprooting of order by removing the two functionaries whose impartiality, whose activity, and whose courage in the administration of their judicial duties was the only redeeming feature during those three dreadful months of rioting and partizanship. I allude to Colonel Forbes and Mr. Macarthy. I do not know their creed, and I do not care. I believe that Colonel Forbes is a Protestant, and I have heard that Mr. Macarthy is a Catholic. Colonel Forbes was obliged more than once in the course of these riots to threaten to retire from the Bench of Belfast in consequence of the expressed and earnest determination of the local Justices to stand by their fellow partizans in the dock. It was only by the exercise of that threat that Colonel Forbes, who has now been removed from Belfast, was able to serve in the Petty Sessions for the district any semblance of the due administration has been sworn before the Commissioners that an intrigue existed among the more corrupt Justices for the removal of that official. One gentleman came forward and said he heard one local magistrate say to another, "We shall never be easy until Forbes is driven out of Belfast." Colonel Forbes was the stumbling-block in the way. As a public official he had the inconceivable obstinacy to endeavour to discharge his duty. Accordingly he was to be driven out of Belfast, and now the Government have inverted the recommendation of the Commissioners, and have driven out the only two officials who had shown a distinct regard for the interests of public peace, and in replacing them they have struck a criminal blow against the interests of order and have conceded the demands of the faction of disorder. Who is to replace these gentlemen? Is it true that Mr. Rich, an Inspector of Constabulary, who was formerly quartered there, and Mr. Lister, a close connection of his, are to replace Colonel Forbes and Mr. Macarthy? If so, I am afraid that a more calamitous appointment could not be made. Mr. Lister is no lawyer. He is nominally a barrister, but he never had any practice. He is not a barrister of a certain standing, or of any standing, but he is a barrister of no standing whatever—merely a colourable barrister. The Commissioners recommended that the two paid magistrates who are to be appointed should have summary jurisdiction in cases of riot and unlawful assembly and affray. Now, I think that is an important recommendation, and one well worth the attention of the Government. I hold that the public peace will never be secured in Belfast so long as a long interval of time is allowed to elapse between the arrest of offenders and their punishment. Punishment would most certainly produce a more powerful effect if immediately applied. I may remind the Committee that since the murder of Private Hughes and Constable Gardner, in July last, the murderers have not yet been brought to justice. I think that punishment should more speedily follow crime, and I hope that the Government will see their way to invest the local Bench with an enlarged jurisdiction in regard to offences in the nature of riot. I hope to receive an assurance that the Government will, in accordance with the united recommendation of four of the Royal Commissioners, withdraw the Borough Justices, who are condemned in this Report, from any share in the administration of justice; and that they will appoint men who are not merely lawyers in name, but barristers in spirit and fact, as paid magistrates. There is still another point in regard to the law as to property. The Town Council of Belfast have smuggled a clause into a Local Act by which the town of Belfast is at the present moment governed, which will probably starve hon. Members of this House who are lawyers. It is a clause which places Belfast in a different position in regard to the question of compensation for injury to the person and damage to property from all other parts of Ireland. In every part of Ireland, except in Belfast, a man is able to obtain compensation from the Grand Jury for personal injury; but in Belfast he cannot obtain a single penny of compensation. Is that state of the law about to be continued, or will the Government take away from Belfast this exceptional privilege and place that town in exactly the same position as the rest of Ireland? Then, again, as to damage to property. The people injured in this case were Catholics. It was the houses of Catholics which were wrecked and looted, and yet the victims are required to go before a Town Council composed of 40 members, on which there is not a single Catholic. If the Town Council award any compensation whatever; if, for a claim of £100, they award £1, or even only 6*d.*, there is no appeal. The Commissioners recommend that Belfast should be placed on a level with the rest of Ireland, both in regard to injury to the person and damage to property; and, further, that, in regard to those matters, the jurisdiction should be transferred from the Town Council of Belfast to an independent tribunal, such as a Government or some other arbitration, and that the applicant should have a right of appeal to the going Judge of Assize. They make one additional recommendation—namely—

"That it would be advisable to give this tribunal, so suggested by us, power, if they thought it advisable, to applot the amount of compensation over a more limited area than the municipal boundary of Belfast."

I presume the object of making that recommendation is to confine the amount of compensation to that part of the municipal district which may have supplied the riot. These are the recommendations of two Englishmen and two Irishmen—all of them of eminent judicial position—one an English Judge, another a distinguished military officer, and two others Irish barristers. I want to know whether these recommendations, which appear to me to have been honestly conceived and carefully thought out, will be adopted by the Government? There is one final recommendation in reference to the search for arms. The Commissioners say—

“We are also of opinion that the law as at present existing enabling the police authorities to search for arms in the possession of persons unauthorized to possess them is wholly inadequate, and practically useless, and that the authorities should be armed with adequate powers for this purpose.”

They propose that this power should be repealed, and that some more stringent regulations should be substituted. All I know is that hitherto, when the Government have instituted a search for arms in Belfast, they have searched houses where everybody has been convinced no arms could possibly be found; while they have refrained from searching other places where there was a reasonable suspicion that they would be found. I have now gone over the three classes of recommendations made by the Commissioners—the recommendations in regard to the police officers, in regard to the administration of justice, and in regard to the amendment of the law for compensation for injury. I shall feel it my duty, unless the Government give some satisfactory and rational assurance, to press this question still further on the Report. I have mainly spoken to-day in the interest of the Catholic minority, which I chiefly represent in Belfast; but I think I may claim with some confidence that I also speak in favour of all who desire some rational provision for the preservation of social order in that afflicted town—afflicted by the unscrupulous conduct of the educated and by the passions of the uneducated. In calling attention to the subject, I have spoken not only for Catholics, but for persons of every class in Belfast—persons of every creed who desire the prosperity of that town, and who further desire to see that social peace and that settled good order without which material prosperity cannot possibly exist.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down began his remarks by levelling a reproach at me for not having been in my place when the hon. Member wanted to bring this matter forward.

MR. SEXTON: I did not at all reproach the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As a matter of fact, I did not leave the House until a quarter to 4 o'clock this morning, and, as far as I was aware from what had gone on for the four hours preceding that time, the Committee was not engaged in a discussion of a valuable or instructive kind; and, moreover, the hon. Member had had an ample opportunity before then, if he desired, for bringing the whole Question before the Committee. The hon. Gentleman has complained, first, of the delay of the presentation of the Report of the Commission; but he must be aware that the Executive Government had no control whatever over the Commissioners as a body, or over any individual member of the Commission. It was not for the Executive Government to interfere with their arrangements. Therefore, whoever may be responsible for the delay in the production of the Report, it is neither I nor my right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who preceded me in Office. The hon. Member says that after the Report was presented a further culpable delay took place; but I must remind him that even now we have not got the full Report of the Commissioners.

MR. SEXTON: Why not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We have only received the Report of four members of the Commission, and the minority Report of Mr. M'Hardy will not be received in London for two or three days.

MR. SEXTON: Why not? He has had five months to prepare it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Report of Mr. M'Hardy will, I believe, be received on the 26th instant. The hon. Member seems to suppose that the delay on the part of Mr. M'Hardy is a very culpable neglect of duty. Now, I regret the delay, but I cannot blame Mr. M'Hardy, because that gentleman has had very grave responsibility thrown upon him outside Ireland. He is a very distinguished and a very hard-worked public officer, and the fact that other and imperative duties have been imposed upon him has interfered to delay the sending in of his final Report. Certainly the Government are not to blame, and, as far as I am acquainted with the facts of the case, Mr. M'Hardy is not to blame either. The delay, however, has occurred, whether we regret it or not; and can the Government be expected to arrived at a final and complete decision on this very difficult question until they have in their possession the Report, not only of the consenting majority of the Commission, but also the Report of the one member of the Commission who formed the dissentient minority? I think it would be a wholly improper course for the Government to make up their minds, finally, upon all the details of the matter before they are in full possession of Mr. M'Hardy's views. At the same time, I think I am able to say something—I will not say to satisfy the hon. Gentleman—but to meet his views. Some of the questions he has asked I can answer. He asks whether the relative number of the Catholic and Protestant members of the Belfast Police Force has not been altered in the course of the last two months.

MR. SEXTON: No, since October.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no knowledge upon that subject, nor does it in any way fall within the purview of the duties of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It is a question which is entirely left to the chief of the Constabulary, with whom I certainly do not think it my duty to interfere. If the hon. Gentleman wants to know what the facts of the matter are, I will make the necessary inquiries and give him an answer either in the House or in private on a future day. And so also with regard to other details upon which the hon. Gentleman desires to have further information. The hon. Gentleman has gone through the various recommendations of the majority of the Commission. Those recommendations may be divided into two parts—namely, those which are of an administrative character, and those which require legislative action to effect them. The hon. Member is aware that I have had but a short tenure of the Office of Secretary for Ireland, and during that short tenure questions of great difficulty and perplexity have come before me. I do not pretend that I have had time to consider specially and carefully the question of Belfast; but as far as I have made myself acquainted with the recommendations of the Commissioners, who deal with a variety of details of administration, speaking broadly, it appears to me that they may be regarded as effective, and as indicating the lines on which the Government should proceed.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman speak only of the recommendations which relate to administrative matters?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; and I may say that the Government intend to accept them. I refer to the recommendations in which the Commissioners say—

“We are of opinion that the Royal Irish Constabulary should be maintained as the police force of Belfast; that the Chief Officer of Police for the town of Belfast should be entirely independent of all police authority—save and except the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary; we recommend that such officer should have absolute control of the police force of the town, and the sole responsibility of maintaining the peace free from any magisterial or other control, save that of the Executive Government and the Inspector General. We recommend that a special Code be instituted for the police force of Belfast, having for its object the impression upon such force of a civic and urban character; and we further recommend that the changes in that force should be as few as consistent with the exigencies of the service. Power should be vested in the Chief Officer of Police of Belfast to forbid processions, bands, and the erection of arches, when, in his opinion, they are calculated to lead to a breach of the peace. That the Chief Police Officer of Belfast shall have full power, from time to time, to transfer to the headquarters of the Royal Irish Constabulary all such officers and constables as may, in his judgment, prove unfitted for the discharge of urban duties as required in Belfast; that no officers or men shall be otherwise removable except with their consent; that the Chief Police Officer shall have sole control of promotion among the constables under his command; and that the promotion of the officers shall, as far as may be, be dependent upon his recommendation. The object we propose hereby is to secure for the police force to be employed in Belfast thorough fitness and continuity of material, and unity of control and direction, subject to the intervention of the Inspector General and the Executive Government. The number of the normal police force of the town should be increased to such extent as the Executive Government shall determine, so as to render the force as far as possible complete in itself, and competent to deal with rioting, without any assistance from outside police forces; and the military garrison of Belfast should be maintained at such strength as will render recourse to police aid outside Belfast unnecessary at any time."

I am speaking under correction; but I apprehend that these recommendations could be carried into effect without any legislative action on the part of this House. The next recommendation, however, could not be carried out without legislation—namely, the recommendation that—

"The borough magistrates should be relieved of the duty of attending the Petty Sessions Court of Belfast."

I believe that it is the rule which now prevails in Dublin, and I should have no objection to see it carried into effect in Belfast, if it can be done; but, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, it would require legislative action on the part of Parliament before it can be effected. The next recommendation is—

"The sole jurisdiction at the Petty Sessions should be conferred upon two paid magistrates, who should either be barristers of a certain standing, or selected for this duty from the general body of Resident Magistrates. If Resident Magistrates are appointed, their sole duties should be judicial, and they should not interfere actively against rioters in the streets."

Well, Sir, that recommendation cannot be fully carried out without legislation. One part of it can be carried out, and it has been carried out; and I was sorry to hear the hon. Gentleman criticize the action of the Government in having done their best, apart from the delay, to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners. They have already arranged that magistrates who are not barristers shall be transferred to other districts, and that barristers shall be employed.

MR. SEXTON: One selected is only nominally a barrister.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; I understand that the hon. Gentleman is mistaken in that matter; and I am informed that Mr. Lister was a barrister in practice for 10 years. The next recommendation is that—

"Special jurisdiction should be given to the Belfast Petty Sessions to deal summarily with cases of riot, unlawful assembly, and affray; and, in our opinion, that jurisdiction should provide for the punishment of offenders convicted of such crimes, or any crime against order in the town, by substantial and serious punishment."

That is a provision which ought to be introduced into any Bill that may deal with the question of law and order in Ireland; and I hope, shortly, to lay a proposition before the House upon that matter. The next recommendation of the Commissioners is a long and a very elaborate one with regard to those who may be injured in Belfast in the event of a riot. My view of that recommendation, also, is that it cannot be carried into effect without legislation, and legislation of an elaborate kind. But, at the same time, I do not think that the town of Belfast should be in a different position from the rest of Ireland; and it will be the object of the Government to place the whole of Ireland under one law in regard to injuries sustained through rioting. The next recommendation is that the law, as it at present exists in regard to damage to property, should also be altered.

MR. SEXTON: The Commissioners recommend that there should be an independent tribunal to deal with questions of injury to property, instead of the Town Council, with the right of appeal to the Judge of Assize.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; but the hon. Gentleman will perceive that that is part of a general scheme for dealing with the question of malicious injury, and the Government are perfectly prepared to consider the whole matter. The only remaining recommendation of the Commissioners deals with the question of the power of the Police Authorities to search for arms. That comes under the same category as the other recommendations in regard to special summary jurisdiction in the case of riot, and it is one with which we also propose to deal at an early date. I think I have now placed before the hon. Gentleman, as far as I am able, the general view of the Government as far as they have made up their minds on the subject. I hope that I have done something to satisfy him. At all events, I have done all that I can to satisfy him. I will assure him that the subject will receive the most careful consideration. The Report of the remaining Commissioner will be in my hands in the course of a few days. As well as the other Report, it will be carefully studied by me, and I trust to be able this Session to lay before the House such part of the recommendations of the Commissioners as we think ought to be carried into effect. In conclusion, let me congratulate the hon. Gentleman and the House on the earnest desire he has expressed that law and order shall be maintained in Ireland. I listened with great satisfaction to that part of his speech, and I hope that in every effort made by Her Majesty's Government to restore law and order in any and every part of the country, we shall have the earnest and zealous support of the hon. Gentleman and his friends.

Mr. SEXTON: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I have only raised the question at this moment from a sense of duty. I think he has shown a reasonable desire to meet the objections I have raised; and, bearing in mind his brief tenure of Office, I will consider his reply in a fair spirit, and will, at a later stage, again raise the question of the Belfast riots.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): It is quite evident, Mr. Courtney, that, owing to the inconvenience of the course adopted by the Government in pressing forward this Vote, the physical condition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) is not such as to enable him to carry on the discussion in a satisfactory manner. I think that, now we have all somewhat cooled down, nobody can doubt, after listening to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), that he has made out an unanswerable and overwhelming case for his justification in raising, not a question of detail, as he pointed out at an early hour last night, on this Vote on Account, but a question of public policy—a question of public policy which brooked of no delay; one of the most vital and imminent importance, and one there would have been no opportunity of discussing properly for some months to come if this opportunity had been allowed to slip. The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), just before the Chief Secretary came into the House, complained bitterly of the course we have pursued during this Sitting, and he accused us of wishing to adopt the unusual course of discussing items on this Vote on Account. It is perfectly manifest that, by the course the Government have adopted, they desire to prevent us discussing, not only items on this Vote, but discussing any question whatever on this Vote; and we cannot too strongly emphasize the fact that all the trouble of last night, this first All-night Sitting that has occurred for two Parliaments, has arisen from an attempt on the part of the First Lord of the Treasury to pass through Committee a Vote without any discussion—a Vote raising questions of the most vital importance to Ireland, and upon which we are bound to take every opportunity of raising a discussion. There is another point in our favour. I availed myself of an opportunity the other night of raising a discussion on a question of immense importance to Ireland at the present moment; and it will be within the recollection of Members of this Committee, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary may have learned from the facts that have since occurred a lesson of wisdom—it may be in the recollection of hon. Members what treatment I received from the responsible Governor of Ireland. I never received such scant courtesy in my life before. The right hon. Gentleman treated me with the most absolute and supreme contempt; and he did not deign to take notice, not to say answer, a single one of the questions I put to him; or to meet a single one of the charges I made against the Government. If we are accused of coming forward at inconvenient times and taking out-of-the-way opportunities—though I do not admit that this is an inconvenient opportunity of raising this question—I think we are entitled to show that we are driven to expedients of this kind by the reception we met from the responsible officers of the Government of Ireland. Because, when the right hon. Gentleman who has to govern a country in the condition of Ireland treats debates raised in this House with the supreme and studied contempt he treated us with the other night, he must be prepared for repeated attacks upon the same subject. Although I am aware the Chief Secretary is physically incapable of continuing this discussion—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No, no; perfectly capable.] I am exceedingly glad to hear that, because I shall now raise, at length, several points which are of great importance. The first point I wish to raise on this Vote has reference to the Office of the Chief Secretary in Dublin. It is quite clear that we could not raise such a point until the Chief Secretary was in his place. We have just heard a statement from our new Governor; his experience in the troublesome and responsible Office of Chief Secretary has been somewhat brief; and his visit to the country, his opportunity of attaining an acquaintance with the country he has undertaken to govern, has been exceedingly brief. I am bound to say, from all the information I have been able to collect, from all information which has reached me, that although the right hon. Gentleman's visit to Ireland was brief, it was important and ominous. He made good use of his time. Now, what did he do? He held a meeting in Dublin Castle, as I am informed, of all the District Magistrates or Divisional Magistrates in Ireland. All these gentlemen were summoned to meet him, and he addressed to them instructions of the most extraordinary character. The proceedings at that meeting are reported in the country in such a way that we are entitled to bring the matter under the notice of this Committee. We are informed—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has been misinformed as to the fact?

MR. DILLON: As to your having met the Divisional Magistrates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman may not have met them—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did meet them, and perhaps it would be convenient if I were briefly to state what happened. Among other gentlemen whom I desired to see were the Divisional Magistrates of Ireland. I asked them to come and see me. They came, and I discussed with each magistrate the condition of the district in which he had control.

MR. DILLON: That explanation, Mr. Courtney, is worth all the sitting up we have had to-night. I can assure you, Sir, that the belief in Ireland, that the popular report in Ireland, founded upon private information which came from one of the magistrates concerned—though, I admit, it reached me in a roundabout way—the popular report in Ireland is that the words used were that—“At evictions for the future, if the least obstruction is offered, do not hesitate to fire upon the people.” At Ballindyne, in Mayo, two days after the visit of the right hon. Gentleman, a Divisional Magistrate of the name of Burn, who resides in Athlone, is reported in the papers to have addressed some individual of local influence in these words—“For God's sake, keep the peace, because if there is any resistance, I must fire immediately.” Now, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman will remove entirely the impression that any such instruction or advice was given, our discussion to-night will not have been a fruitless one. Notice how monstrous such an instruction would be. Within the last five or six years there have been evicted in Ireland, I should think, no less than 25,000 families. [“Oh, oh!”] For the sake of argument, I will say 15,000 families—I am not particular as to numbers. [Laughter.] Well, the number is very great; but you will see that whether the number is 25,000 or 15,000 it does not affect my argument. At the majority of these evictions large crowds of people have assembled, and obstruction was offered in a great number of cases. What are the historical facts? Why, that during the whole course of these years not one single policeman was killed, maimed, or seriously injured. During these years, in which let us take it that 15,000 families have been evicted in Ireland; there was not as much damage done as was done recently in the streets of Belfast in one half-hour. In face of that fact, to issue instructions to the Irish police that, on the least obstruction being offered, they were not to hesitate to fire upon the people, would be one of the most terrible responsibilities any Official ever undertook. At these evictions it must be remembered that no civil magistrate is ever present, and the Riot Act is not read, and the precautions are not taken which are taken in England when any disturbance is apprehended. It appears from the information we have received that the police officers have been deprived of discretion; for the words reported to have been used at Ballindyne are—“For God's sake keep the peace, or I must fire immediately.” Now, Sir, I have mentioned what happened at Ballindyne during the evictions to justify us in giving credence to the rumours which have been set afloat in Ireland. We all know now of the truth of the telegram which was sent to Youghal. That telegram was treated by the newspapers of this country as a bogus message; but when a Question was asked in this House concerning it, the Chief Secretary accepted full responsibility for it. What was the interpretation put upon that telegram by the police authorities at Youghal? It was that they were to use deadly weapons, whether they be bullets or bayonets, and that if necessary they were to act without the presence of a civil magistrate. Not only did they act on the occasion of the recent disturbances without the presence of the civil magistrate, but they took the most elaborate precautions to secure that no civil magistrate should be present. We have had a most deplorable instance of the temper of police officers, who have the lives of a great number of people in Ireland at their mercy. We know that a police magistrate went into the police barracks at Youghal to protest against the conduct of the police, and to remonstrate with Mr. Somerville for his treatment of him as a magistrate, and for not asking him to be present when the extra police entered the town. Mr. Somerville, instead of expressing the slightest regret at the death of the poor man Hanlon, made use of the following words, which will never die out of the memory of the Irish people:—"I am sorry I did not fire on them." It is useless for the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) to tell us that we can raise these points hereafter, when the Civil Service Estimates are in Committee of Supply. Things have moved very fast in Ireland indeed, and we know very little of what may occur in that country during the next three months. It would therefore be preposterous for us to postpone or to neglect any opportunity of bringing forward these facts. Now, Sir, I am bound to take this opportunity of calling attention to a third point raised by this Estimate, and that is in regard to the Irish Constabulary Vote, which I regret to find is steadily assuming greater proportions. It is many years since I first called attention in this House to the monstrous character of the Irish Constabulary Vote. Members of the then Government admitted to the fullest extent the justification of my charge; but in spite of all that can be said, and in spite of the confession of the Government, the Irish Constabulary Vote has mounted year by year until its proportions has become a public scandal, because the larger the Vote grows, the worse the condition of the country becomes. I have prepared some figures of the most extraordinary character in relation to the Irish Constabulary Vote. The Estimate for that Vote for next year has reached the figure of £1,412,000. The expenditure last year was £1,397,000; therefore we are threatened now with an increase of something like £15,000; but that increase is only part of an arithmetical progression which has never ceased. It has gone on steadily, sometimes by great jumps and sometimes by slow progress. In the year 1871-2 the Vote for the Irish Constabulary was £918,000; in the year 1877-8 it was £1,000,000; in the year 1885 it was £1,380,000; in the year 1886 it was £1,397,000; and in the next year it is estimated to be £1,412,000. And, Sir, when we consider that, pari passu with this steady increase in the Vote for the Irish police, the population of Ireland has dwindled away, we have a condition of things the like of which I challenge anyone to point to in the whole civilized world. In Ireland, in 1871 it cost £918,000 to police 5,500,000 people. This year, it is to cost almost exactly 50 per cent more to police 4,750,000 people. At the same rate of progress, and after you have brought in more of your Bills for Ireland, and brought down the population to 2,000,000, I suppose the cost of the police will amount to something like £3,000,000. What is the result of all this expenditure on the police? Why, we are told that while you have almost doubled in 15 years the Vote for the Irish police, government in Ireland is paralyzed. I sometimes wonder how it is that the Executive do not inquire whether it is paralyzed by having too many policemen in the country: the present condition of things has no parallel in the civilized world, and it is a positive disgrace to England. I have made a calculation that the increased expenditure from 1871 to 1887 on the Irish police—over and above what the expenditure would have been had it remained during these years at the same figure as it was in 1871—amounts to £2,500,000 sterling. Many an Irish problem would have been settled if that money had been spent on the people, instead of on the police, and in reducing the whole island to chaos. Finally, I will draw your attention to this fact—that in England and Wales you pay for your police 2s. 6d. per head of the population; while the police in Ireland cost this country 5s. 6d.

per head of the population. Of course, it requires less, as a rule, to police country districts than town districts; but I have no hesitation in saying that, if we could work out this problem, it would be found that it costs to police the country parts of Ireland five times as much as it costs to police country districts of England. I have devoted a great deal of attention to this subject, and I cannot help being struck very forcibly by a fact recorded in the newspapers a few days ago—namely, that when Father Keller was arrested on Friday last, there was no disturbance. I was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary say that that was so; because, as it turns out, the police were on the occasion strictly confined to barracks and not allowed to go on the streets. That is a strange statement. It amounts to this, that when the police are on the streets, there is rioting; but when they are confined to barracks, there is no disturbance, no property is injured, no man is hurt. I really put it to you whether you are not wasting money in Ireland; whether you are not turning the country upside down by this enormous expenditure? What did Mr. Justice Lawson say at the Winter Assizes in the County Mayo? His words are characteristic of Irish history; he said—"Undoubtedly this county is remarkably free from crime." It is true that, with the exception of a drunken row or two, County Mayo, as regards crime, will compare favourably with any part of the civilized world. The Judge said—

"But, although that is true, although the country is remarkably free from all kinds of crime, I cannot say its condition is satisfactory; for the law is paralyzed."

Such a statement from a Judge ought to make us reflect; because, from this statement, it would appear that when the law is paralyzed, there is no crime, and that when it is in force, crime breaks out. It is really a question for Englishmen whether it is worth while spending this £1,400,000 a-year for the purpose of enforcing law in Ireland. Now, I do not want to comment at present at any great length on the subject—which undoubtedly we shall hear a great deal more of in this House—except to say that as often as there is a single shilling voted for the Irish Constabulary I shall speak at considerable length. There is one other Vote I feel it my bounden duty to refer to before this Vote on Account is agreed to. I own I am astonished that the First Lord of the Treasury supposed for a moment that the Vote for the Irish Bankruptcy Court could pass through this House without discussion. It would be a remarkable thing if, in the present condition of Ireland, and in view of events which are happening in that country, and which have convulsed society in that country to an extent which few Englishmen are capable of believing, that we could allow a Vote for the Irish Bankruptcy Court to pass without comment. I endeavoured the other night to show that the Irish Bankruptcy Court has been turned from being a Court of Justice into being a political engine. I endeavoured to show that Judge Boyd, one of the Judges of that Court, has consulted with the men who belong to one side of politics, or to one party or faction in Ireland.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Mr. Courtney, I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether it is in Order to impute to a Judge of a High Court that he has consulted with political partizans, and that his conduct, I apprehend, is influenced accordingly?

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to say I did not hear, in the confusion of the Committee, all the words of the hon. Member. But it is undoubtedly out of Order to impugn the conduct of a Judge in Committee of Supply, when there is a definite and well-regulated mode of bringing the conduct of a Judge before the House.

MR. DILLON: I presume I shall be in Order, when we are voting money for the Bankruptcy Court, to criticize proceedings which have taken place in that Court; at all events, I shall endeavour to do so. The contention I make is this—that at the present moment a gentleman has been summoned to the Court of Bankruptcy in such a way as to convey to the whole population of Ireland—and I speak now of both sides in politics—the impression that that summons was not the result of a bond fide attempt to investigate a case of bankruptcy, but a deliberate effort to beat down a political movement. I think I am entitled to lay down the grounds which have induced the entire public of Ireland to look upon this act as an attempt to intimidate and beat down a political movement to which one side is intensely hostile, and the other is passionately devoted. The Court of Bankruptcy was invited to extract from a tenant on the estate of Mr. Ponsonby certain moneys he owed to his landlord, and to have judgment entered against him. So far I have no complaint to make; but when a considerable period had elapsed, a summons was issued and served upon the parish priest of this tenant, and the priest of another parish. It is not alleged that these gentlemen were in the possession of funds collected with the estates. It is notorious in Ireland that they are not in possession of funds in connection with the estate; but, Sir, the very line of examination which was commenced in the Bankruptcy Court showed plainly what facts were sought to be ascertained from these priests; they were summoned to give information of a meeting held in a private room to which the police were not admitted. It is all very fine to talk about the jurisdiction of a Court; but at the meeting there were 70 or 80 tenants on the Ponsonby estate. There were many well-known Members of Parliament, and hundreds of laymen. Why select two priests? They could have taken any one of the laymen to give evidence, and to tell everything that the priests knew, unless it be the confidences reposed in the priests as Catholic clergymen? I do not know whether they expected to extract from Father Keller anything of a particularly private or confidential character; but what they were evidently aiming at was, that they should get him in the face of his congregation to turn informer on his own people, to reveal what had transpired at the meeting in question.

THE CHAIRMAN: As far as the hon. Gentleman has opened his case, he makes no case attaching to the Vote for the Court of Bankruptcy. He is impugning the conduct of some persons, who, he asserts, rightly or wrongly, have perverted the Court of Bankruptcy. If the persons who obtained the summons from the Court are provided for in the Estimates, he is in Order in discussing this subject; but he is not in Order in attempting to discuss what has happened under shelter of the Vote for the Court of Bankruptcy.

MR. DILLON: Your ruling, Sir, shows clearly that I am in Order, because the men whose conduct I am impugning are officers of the Court of Bankruptcy.

THE CHAIRMAN: Their duty is purely ministerial.

MR. DILLON: I think that if you will bear with me for a few moments, Mr. Courtney, I shall be able to show you that, under your own ruling, I am strictly in Order. When it came to the summoning of Father Keller, the landlord and the solicitors who set the Court of Bankruptcy in motion, withdrew from the case, and when they were asked on Saturday last whether the proceedings were taken with their authority, they replied that they were not taken with their authority. When the case came into Court the solicitor for Father Keller brought under the notice of the Judge the fact that the landlord of the estate and his representative were no parties to the proceedings. But what did the Judge say? Why, that "the matter" is now taken out of the power of the creditor, and is in the hands of the official assignees, and they will proceed in the matter in due course. Now, I am not sufficiently a lawyer, and I do not know whether you, Mr. Courtney, have sufficient technical knowledge, to know what the discretion of the official assignees is; but I want to point out that this extraordinary circumstance arose, that the creditor, having realized the fatal character of the step he was taking for his own future, wished to withdraw, and he is now in a vice and compelled to go on in a course which will inevitably wreck his estate and leave him a pauper. I think this contention, Sir, brings me completely in Order. I want to know what was the mysterious influence at work which led this man into a struggle which, if he continues in it, will leave him a beggar; and which, when he had realized the character of the step he was taking in getting a priest arrested, prevented him using his own discretion, and extracting the Government of Ireland from a most unpleasant position. If the official assignees are exercising their discretion, I venture to say that a more injurious act of discretion was never made in any country. In the long run, they will deprive this man of the money he would have got if he had acted reasonably; and they are landing the Irish Government in the most unpleasant position in which the Irish Government has ever been landed. I maintain that no regard ought to be had, in a case which comes before a Court, to the politics of the people concerned. Cases of this character have all been brought in the Junior Court, except one, in which it was attempted to adopt the same course, but in which Justice Miller promptly said—"I will hear nothing about the Plan of Campaign; I sit here to administer law." The consequence of which dictum was that no "Plan of Campaign" cases were ever brought in Justice Miller's Court again. I venture to say that, although he is a Conservative in politics—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is proceeding in direct violation of my ruling.

MR. DILLON: I was trying to bring before the notice of the Committee the large expenditure which has been incurred in Ireland in recent years. I will content myself with moving to omit the sum of £1,500, being the amount asked for the Irish Bankruptcy Court.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is out of Order to move the omission of this item.

MR. DILLON: Then I beg to move the reduction of the whole Vote by the sum of £1,500.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the sum of £3,622,606 be granted to Her Majesty, for the said Services."—(Mr. Dillon.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Chairman, I repudiate absolutely the attack which has been made upon Judge Boyd by the hon. Member (Mr. Dillon). I consider it most intolerable that any Gentleman in this House should bring against a Judge the accusation that he has been influenced in his action by political motives. With this repudiation, I will leave this part of the hon. Gentleman's case, and proceed to refer to some other remarks of his. The hon. Gentleman began his speech by saying that in consequence of the treatment he received on Friday night, he was compelled to bring this question before the Committee to-day. Let me say, at the onset, I meant no discourtesy to the hon. Gentleman, or to any other Member of the House. On Friday night the hon. Gentleman deliberately accused me of promoting murders in order to get a Coercion Bill passed through the House;

but even such provocation as that would not have justified discourtesy, and no discourtesy was intended. The hon. Gentleman will recollect that the Motion he made on Friday night did not touch at all the question of the attitude assumed by the coroner at Youghal. I dealt with the whole extent of the Motion the hon. Gentleman made, and if I omitted to deal with one fragmentary part of his speech, not knowing the relevancy of it, he must forgive me. The hon. Gentleman has, to-day, accused me of having gone to Dublin, called together the Divisional Magistrates, and given them instructions to shoot down the Irish people, whenever any obstruction was offered to any process of eviction. That is entirely baseless fiction, conjured up by the hon. Member himself. I went to Ireland, not for the purpose of giving specific directions to the Divisional Magistrates, but to hear what they had to say about the state of the country. If the hon. Gentleman asks me what views the Government hold on this question, I shall say I stated them adequately in answering a Question put to me with regard to the telegram sent by Captain Plunkett. To the terms of that answer I absolutely adhere. The hon. Gentleman has dealt at great length with a question which I think he has already brought before the House—namely, the growth of the Constabulary and of the Constabulary Vote. I admit it is greatly to be regretted that the Constabulary Vote is growing. I do not wish to introduce controversial matters in this debate; but I will ask the hon. Gentleman whether he does not think that others besides the Government are responsible for the growth of the Vote. I may remind the hon. Gentleman of an answer given by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Bristol (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who preceded me in Office, in a debate on this subject. My right hon. Friend pointed out that the increase in the Constabulary Vote is partly due to the riots in Belfast, partly to the enormous amount of personal protection which has to be given to people who are in danger of their lives and property; and partly due to the fact that from motives of humanity, if from no other motives, it is absolutely necessary to have at any point, where disturbance is apprehended, a large and, if possible, an overwhelming force. These are the reasons, I admit the melancholy reasons, which have made it necessary to increase the Vote for the Constabulary. The hon. Gentleman says that in spite of the gigantic Constabulary Vote, Government is paralyzed.

MR. DILLON: I said that you stated Government was paralyzed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, Government is paralyzed. But does the hon. Gentleman confound the Police Force with the whole machinery of Government? Does he not know that there are other parts of that machinery not less necessary to the healthy working of any Constitution? The Government of Ireland is paralyzed because the Courts of Law are paralyzed; and no one is more ready than I to admit that increase the Police Force as you may, pile up this Vote as you will, it will all be in vain if the Courts of Law, whom the police have to obey, are paralyzed in the fulfilment of their functions. I hope I have now dealt with the chief question which the hon. Gentleman has raised. Let me conclude by again assuring him that neither in my reply the other day, nor in the few words I have uttered now, nor in any reply I shall ever make in this House, do I intend any discourtesy either to the hon. Gentleman opposite or to any Gentleman in any part of the House.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): The speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) is, from the point of view of hon. Gentlemen on these Benches, a very unsatisfactory reply to the unanswerable indictment brought forward by the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). The right hon. Gentleman stated that he did not hold such language with the Divisional Magistrates assembled in Dublin, as that my hon. friend attributed to him; but he left entirely unexplained, or unsatisfied, the action of the police in obedience to whatever commands or instructions he gave them in Dublin Castle. He did not deny that the police had been ordered to shoot down the people on the smallest provocation. The other day, I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he disputed the telegram of Captain Plunkett, ordering the police to shoot down the people without delay or hesitation. He objected to the interpretation I put upon the telegram of Captain Plunkett, but I

maintain the words of the telegram bear the construction I put upon them, and are, in fact, incapable of bearing any other. The right hon. Gentleman says the Government are bound in the interests of humanity to send large forces of Constabulary to points where disturbance is apprehended. But to Youghal, they sent the small force of 24 men. The unhappy consequences which followed were the result of neglect to carry out what the right hon. Gentleman has just stated to be necessary. Where do these disturbances take place? They take place at evictions carried on by the landlords with the assistance of the police. What are these evictions for? They are for the non-payment of unjust and impossible rents. [Colonel KING-HARMAN: No.] Did I understand the hon. and gallant Gentleman to say "No?" [Colonel KING-HARMAN: Yes.] I congratulate the hon. and gallant Gentleman on his courage, for he must know by this time that in stating that the rents of Ireland are possible, he stands alone almost amongst civilized men. He certainly stands in opposition to Lord Cowper, to Sir James Caird, to Mr. Knipe, I think to a large extent to Judge Flanagan, and to a large extent to Lord Milltown. I will not go into personal matters with reference to the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel King-Harman); but I am afraid his experience has rather prejudiced his judgment. If I were to go into the details of his own estate, I think I could show there is a large discrepancy between what is his opinion of what is a fair and possible rent and the opinion of some of the Courts of Law; but I will return to the point—that the resistance to eviction is, in nearly every case, the resistance of men and women, and sometimes of children, to eviction for unjust and impossible rent, and I ask every Member of the Committee, as humane and Christian men, what are they to think of a system of Government which orders police officers to shoot down, without hesitation, men who are defending their homes against unjust and impossible rents. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary never made one allusion to that portion of the speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon). The right hon. Gentleman denied the statement of my hon. Friend—that he gave orders to the District Inspectors to shoot the people down without hesitation; but he did not offer any defence or explanation of the telegram of Captain Plunkett. Compare the action of the authorities in this country with the action of the authorities in Ireland. Will anyone tell me that a Minister in this country who had given the order to English magistrates to shoot down English crowds without hesitation could survive for 24 hours? A Minister who had dared to give so savage and barbarous an order would be immediately swept from his seat in a cyclone of popular wrath and hate. What do you do here when there is a riot in a town? The Mayor is called in—the Civil Authority has all the initiative, and the Civil Authority, before he gives the order to the police, even to use batons, much less rifles, uses all the resources of persuasion. The law is carried out in England and Ireland in an exactly converse manner. In England you have a superabundant hesitation before shooting down any rioters. In Ireland the police have orders to shoot the people down without hesitation. Now, objection seemed to be taken to my hon. Friend's (Mr. Dillon's) statement that in the last five or six years 15,000 Irish families have been evicted from their homes. Why, in two years alone there were 7,000 evictions.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Will the hon. Gentleman say how many were re-admitted as caretakers?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I anticipated the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and, if it will be any satisfaction to him, I will read the figures from the Blue Book. What I wanted to point out was, that my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon) was talking of the number of people evicted. Whether the people were re-admitted as caretakers has really nothing to do with the question.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Will the hon. Gentleman fulfil his promise, and read the figures?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I will read the figures if you like; but I am afraid it would be a waste of the time of the Committee. [A laugh.] If hon. Gentlemen are careless with regard to the time of the Committee I do not share their feeling. Mr. Courtney, the point my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon) raised was this—that although there have been 15,000 evictions in Ireland in the course of the last five or six years, no policeman has been killed or seriously injured at any one of them.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I only want the hon. Gentleman to fulfil his promise.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I said I would read the figures from the Blue Book, if the Committee desire that I should do so. I will place the figures at the hon. and gallant Gentleman's disposal.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I rely upon the hon. Gentleman to fulfil his promise.

[Dr. TANNER walked across the floor of the House and offered the Blue Book to Colonel King-Harman.]

THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask hon. Gentlemen to conduct this debate in a seemly manner.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I think I was right, Mr. Courtney, in resisting the attempt of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel King-Harman) to get me to deal with entirely irrelevant matter. I have pointed out that in two years there were 7,000 evictions, and therefore I think my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon) was quite justified in saying that in the last five or six years there have been 15,000 Irish families evicted from their homes. In spite of this terrible number of evictions in Ireland, there has not been one case of serious injury to a policeman; yet we have this extraordinary increase of police on one side, and this barbarous and savage order to the police on the other side. It seems that evictions can be carried out without any serious danger to life or limb, and yet we have directions given to the police to shoot down the people without hesitation. There is only one excuse for shooting down people without hesitation, and that is the imminence of great danger to human life. We are driven to this conclusion—that the reason of the recent order to the Irish police was not to save the lives of the police, but to strike terror into the hearts of the people. There was a time when massacre was the avowed policy of the English governors of Ireland; and I saw, not later than a week ago, that a newspaper with which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was once intimately associated, declared that the weak point in the Government's policy

Cromwell, and the general laws, was that they were not carried out with sufficient force and continuance. We have now Gentlemen who wish to carry out a policy which differs very little from that of Mountjoy and Cromwell. When the English people understand that this is so they will raise a storm which no one can withstand. My hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon) is quite justified in endeavouring to impress the English public with the full meaning of the extraordinary growth of the Irish Constabulary Vote—for what does it mean? It means that the people of this country have not only the responsibility and the shame and the guilt of the misdeeds of the Irish police, but they have to pay for the misdeeds out of their own pockets. I shall be surprised if the result of bringing these facts before the people of England is not a crushing verdict against the Government.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Perhaps I may be allowed to address a few words to the Committee with the view of expediting the issue which the Government, no doubt, desire. Thirteen hours ago we were willing that the Navy Vote should be taken, on condition that the Vote on Account was subjected to a debate of moderate length at a future Sitting of the House. The Government refused that offer, and I think it is apparent their then refusal has not resulted in an economy of public time. At an early hour this morning, I suggested to the Government, that if they would put the Vote on Account down as the first Business to-day, we would consent to a Division being taken at 10 o'clock to-night—that is, after a debate of about four hours—after which the Government might proceed with the other Business on the Paper. Since that offer was made eight hours have elapsed. We have, however, succeeded in obtaining the discussion which we claimed and sought. My hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who, when he speaks, speaks with the assent and confidence of all the Members of the Irish Nationalist Party, has been enabled to place before the Committee and the country his case and ours upon the questions of the increase of the Constabulary Vote, the misuse of the Bankruptcy Court, and the sinister instructions given to the police. He has extorted a reply from the Government. I do not say it has been a satisfactory or an adequate reply; but, at any rate, it has been such a reply as the miserable pass to which the foolish policy of the Government has got enables them to make. I have had an opportunity of raising the question of social order in Belfast. I think if there was anything to justify the stand we have made it would be this—that the principles I stated in debate in this House last year, which have now been ratified by a Royal Commission, have been practically adopted by the Government, and that we, by what I beg, without undue egotism, to call patriotic persistency, have placed social order in Belfast upon a basis more permanent and more safe than that upon which it has hitherto rested. We have held the field, and we have won. Our persistency has been vindicated by the result. The masterly statement of my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), the miserably weak reply of the Government, the valuable declaration which I myself have obtained with respect to social order in Belfast, are vindications of the course we have taken. There is not a man in the House who will now get up and, judging us by the declarations of the Government themselves, say that we do not stand justified before the House and before the country in what we have done. We do not wish to argue further with the majority of the House, but with the justice of the people—not of Ireland only, but of England and of Scotland—we leave the moral merit of this conflict between the Government and ourselves. Now, Sir, so far as we are concerned, the Vote on Account may be taken.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member for East Mayo withdraw his Amendment?

MR. DILLON: No, Sir; I intend to vote upon it.

BANKRUPTCY OFFICES (SITES) BILL.

(Mr. David Plunket, Mr. Jackson.)

[BILL 197.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): In moving that the Bill be now read a second time, it is only necessary to explain that its object is to authorize the Office of Works to purchase land close to the Royal Courts of Justice, on which to erect buildings for the accommodation of the Bankruptcy Offices.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Plunket),—put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House and Two by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill, presented two clear days before the meeting of the Committee, be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.

ISLE OF MAN (CUSTOMS) BILL.

(Mr. Jackson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

[BILL 199.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Jackson.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): There is a little doubt as to the object of this Bill; perhaps the hon. Gentleman will explain what it is.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The object of the Bill is simply to correct a difference which was created by the alteration of the duties on wine in the United Kingdom last year; it is to raise the strength on which the lower rate of duty is paid from 26 degrees, which is now the limit in the Isle of Man, to 30 degrees, which is the limit in this country.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): What is the nature of the power under which this House legislates for the Isle of Man?

MR. JACKSON: The power of levying duties is regulated by Parliament. The Isle of Man authorities can make no alteration without the sanction of this Parliament.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SMALL DEBTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(Mr. Caldwell, Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Thurburn, Mr. Watt.)

[BILL 42.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I have to ask the House to read this Bill a second time. Its object is to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts in respect to small debts, to simplify the procedure, and to reduce the expense. Since the Bill has been printed, there have been several valuable suggestions made regarding it by both the present and late Law Officers of the Crown; and it is intended that if the House will assent to the second reading, affirming the principle of the Bill, the suggestions of the Law Officers will be given effect to by Amendments of the Bill in Committee, and the Bill, as so amended, will thereafter be reprinted. I hope that, as the Bill has received the assent of the Law Officers, it may now be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): This is a Bill relating to legal procedure; and the Government are quite prepared to allow it to be read a second time. In conference with my hon. Friend (Mr. Caldwell), I have arranged that certain alterations should be made in Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) (SUPERANNUATION) BILL.

(Mr. Chance, Mr. William Corbett.)

[BILL 62.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. O'HANOE (Kilkenny, S.): This is a Bill to assimilate the law in Ireland to that in England. It carries out the recommendations of a Select Committee of this House which sat in 1860; it also carries out the unanimous recommendations of the Lunacy Authorities, and I believe it has the assent of the Government. I hope it may now be read a second time. If so, I shall be quite prepared to postpone the Committee stage until a fairly distant day.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chance.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The Government are prepared to assent to the second reading, without pledging itself to the details of the Bill, on the understanding that the hon. Gentleman will allow a reasonable time to elapse before he takes the Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday, 19th April.

THE COLONIAL CONFERENCE—REPRESENTATION OF MALTA.

QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Malta will be represented at the approaching Colonial Conference; and, if so, whether by one or more elected Members of the Council of Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (The Earl of Onslow), in reply, said, that Malta would not be officially represented at the approaching Colonial Conference, inasmuch as no special Representative, as requested in the terms of the late Secretary of State's (Mr. Stanhope's) despatch, had been sent to this country; but care would be taken that some person ~~person named~~ with and interested in present when any that Colony came under consideration. If any elected Member of the Council of Government should express a desire to be invited on the opening day, an application from him would be carefully considered, having regard to the fact that the accommodation in the Conference Room would be very limited. Owing to a misunderstanding of what he said on a previous day, in reply to his noble Friend (the Earl of Harrowby), he wished to make it clear that if any unofficial Members of any Colonial Legislature were in this country at the time of the Conference, preference would be given to them in respect to admission, in order that they might have the advantage of learning the views of Her Majesty's Government.

CHURCH PATRONAGE BILL.—(No. 44.)

(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Clause 2 (Rights of alienation).

On the Motion of The Lord Archbishop of CANTERBURY, the following Amendment made:—In page 1, line 8, leave out ("commencement"), and insert ("passing").

On the Motion of The Lord HERSCHELL, the following Amendments made:—In page 1, lines 10 and 11, leave out ("or until"), and insert ("unless"); and in line 12, after ("provided"), add ("without the applicant having been informed of the result thereof").

LORD GRIMTHORPE moved the omission of the sub-section, which provided that the right of patronage should not be sold until the proposed purchaser was certified to be a fit person to possess that right, or until four months should have elapsed from the date of the application thereunder provided for. He said, their Lordships must not suppose that the £18,000,000, which the Treasurer of Queen Anne's Bounty told the Commission of 1879 was the probable value of all the private patronage, was all in the hands of rich people. Many poor people, the widows and daughters of clergymen, had nothing to live on but the proceeds of advowsons which their ancestors had bought many years ago. It was not even pretended that the right of patronage had been exercised badly; and its exercise was now to be safeguarded to a very great extent. Although a Papist, a Jew, or an Atheist was to be allowed to present to any living, yet this sub-section made every person who bought an advowson a suspected or objectionable person. The measure would give the Bishops greater power than they had possessed in any time of which we had record in regard to the sale of livings and to presentations, and the effect would be to seriously diminish the value of patronage; but he did not think it would diminish the sale of advowsons. The only effect would be that a worse class of purchasers would come forward. He begged to move the omission of Sub-section 1 of Clause 2.

Amendment moved, to leave out Sub-section 1.—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, in opposing the Amendment, said, he held that it was necessary to provide some security against the free traffic in next presentations. He contended that the abolition of the scandals that now attended the sale of patronage would produce a better class of purchasers.

Amendment negatived.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD, in moving, as an Amendment, to insert the following new sub-section to Clause 2:—

"The sale of any right of patronage shall not be valid within a period of five years from the date at which the said right of patronage shall previously have been sold, unless on occasion of the death of the patron for the time being."

said, that, in doing so, he wished to cut at the root of the scandals existing, and to put an end to jobbing in livings; but, at the same time, to protect the rights of bona fide purchasers.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 12, after ("provided") insert as a new sub-section—

"2. The sale of any right of patronage shall not be valid within a period of five years from the date at which the said right of patronage shall previously have been sold, unless on occasion of the death of the patron for the time being."—(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield.)

THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (Earl BRAUCHAMP) said, he was of opinion that the new sub-section went too far, and that the object of the Amendment might be better secured by amending Sub-section 10.

The Earl of Onslow

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that he fully appreciated the object of the right rev. Prelate; but thought that it would be wiser to leave this matter to the discretion of the Commission.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD said, he was willing to do so, if the question could be dealt with by the Commission; but, as he was advised, that Body, as constituted under the Bill, would not be able to deal with it. He felt that, unless some such limitation as the one he proposed was inserted, they had done but very little to put down the traffic of the jobber in advowsons. He hoped that the object of the Amendment would be secured in some form or another.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of The Lord Archbishop of CANTERBURY, the following Amendments made:—In line 16, after ("of") insert ("the chancellor of the diocese"), and after ("archdeacon") leave out ("the chancellor of the diocese") and insert (" of the archdeaconry"); in line 17, after ("rural dean") insert ("of the rural deanery in which the benefice is situated"); and in page 2, line 21, leave out ("commencement") and insert "passing").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On the Motion of The Lord Bishop of LONDON, the following new clause agreed to, and added to the Bill :—

"It shall not be lawful for any person who shall purchase any advowson or any right to a presentation to a benefice, afterwards, on any avoidance thereof, to offer himself to the bishop for admission or institution thereto; and the Act of the thirteenth year of Queen Anne, chapter eleven, intituled 'An Act for the better maintenance of curates within the Church of England, and for preventing ecclesiastical persons from buying the next avoidance of any church preferment,' shall, as regards any purchase after the passing of this Act, be read as if the words 'advowson of or any right of presentation' were substituted for the words 'next avoidance of or presentation' in the said Act."

EARL COWPER, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out Clause 14, and insert a new clause in lieu thereof, said, he had fully argued the question when the Bill was in Committee, and he would not detain the House by repeating those arguments.

Amendment moved, to leave out Clause 14.—(The Earl Cowper.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, the noble Earl proposed to do two different things—to leave out Clause 14 and to insert the new clause. But there was nothing in Clause 14, or in the new clause, which rendered it necessary that Clause 14 should be omitted before the new clause was inserted. The two clauses should be considered separately.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, that the clause about to be moved by the noble Earl behind him (Earl Cowper) would cover everything in Clause 14, besides remedying certain defects in that clause. He thought that service by post of the representation was quite sufficient, and that personal service in cases of that kind was unnecessary.

Amendment agreed to; clause left out accordingly.

On the Motion of The Earl Cowper
the following new clause inserted :—

"On a representation being made to the bishop by any three parishioners, by writing under their hands, that any incumbent ought, on the ground that he has for the three years last preceding been incapacitated by continuing mental or bodily infirmity from the due performance of his duties, to retire from his benefice, it shall be lawful for the bishop, if he see fit, to cause a commission to be issued in manner and form provided in the Incumbents Resignation Act, 1871, and that Act shall apply in all respects as if the said representation had been a representation by the incumbent himself in pursuance of the fifth section of that Act: Provided, that one month at least before issuing any such commission, the bishop shall cause a copy of such representation to be sent by post to such incumbent, addressed to him, either at any place where he may happen to be for the time residing, or at the house of residence of his benefice."

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD said, he would not propose the new clause which stood in his name, but would take another occasion of raising the question embodied in the clause, which was that it should be lawful for any patron to present or collate, and for the Bishop to institute or license, a presentee to any benefice for a limited term of years not being less than five years.

On the Motion of The Lord Archbishop of CANTEBURY the following Amendment made:—In page 7, line 38, leave out from (" of ") to (" shall ") in line 41. and insert—

named and described in any such engagement shall be a person then under seventeen years of age; but it is hereby provided that this addition.")

Bill to be read 3^d on Tuesday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 52.)

CHURCH SITES (COMPULSORY POWERS REPEAL) BILL.—(No. 22.)

(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD, in moving that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee upon the said Bill, said, that its object was to remove from the Statute Book an enactment which concerned the Church of England alone, and enabled it compulsorily to acquire sites for churches. The Act was passed 70 years ago, when a great deal of church building was going on throughout the country; but from that date to the present time, in only one instance, and that within his own diocese, had it ever been put in operation. He did not believe that there was any chance of the Act being ever again made use of, and on that ground it ought to be removed from the Statute Book. In addition to that there was no doubt that the existence of the Act furnished a serious and continual grievance to Nonconformists; and it was frequently stated in public that it was unjust that the Church of England should possess this power. The Church of England did not seek any special privileges of this kind, nor did it need any such powers to be granted to it, as it had sufficient influence to obtain all the sites it required. The Church only desired the same freedom to build as was enjoyed by other Bodies, and had no wish that this enactment should remain on the Statute Book.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that he could not help feeling some doubt as to the expediency of the House going into Committee on the Bill. As far as he could make out, it was not said that any harm had resulted from the Act proposed to be repealed, but only that it had been put in operation on only one occasion. But the second, and he imagined the chief, reason why the Bill was introduced was, that the Act afforded some ground of complaint to Nonconformists. He did not go into the question whether a general Act should be passed, giving compulsory powers for the purchase of sites to all religious Bodies; but still, if the present measure were to become law, while the particular grievance arising out of the exceptional treatment of the Church of England was removed, the complaints of other religious communities would be left untouched. He thought, therefore, that, as the object of the Bill was rather to remove an argument than a grievance, in the interests of the Church of England itself this matter had far better be left alone.

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, he also thought that the Bill was unnecessary. It was founded on an altogether mistaken assumption, which was put forward in "another place," as an excuse for a Bill to enable Dissenters to seize land anywhere to build chapels; that the Church had that power under the Acts named in the Schedule to the Bill, of which the first was in 1818, and the last of the Amending Acts in 1831. The right rev. Prelate had said that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—who alone had the power to take land by this so-called compulsory purchase—had done so once; but he could add, from the information of their secretary, that in that one case they had not acted in invitum; and he was quite sure that they never could or would. The Acts contained none of the old-established machinery or proper words for that purpose, but only enabled the Commissioners to get over all difficulties of absence, bad titles, and the like. Besides that, he could show, if the Bill went into Committee, that it went too far, and destroyed some really useful powers for no object whatever. He was not present when the Bill was read a second time, or he should have given their Lordships that information then.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that this Bill would perpetuate an inequality between the Church of England and other religious denominations.

On Question? Resolved in the negative.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE ARREST OF FATHER KELLER.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in rising to call attention to the circumstances in connection with the committal to prison of Father Keller, and to ask, Whether the prison rules ordinarily applied to persons committed for contempt of Court are to be applied in Father Keller's case; and, if not, for what reason any relaxation was to be permitted? said, that the case had excited considerable attention both in Ireland and on this side of the Channel, and reports had appeared in various newspapers as to the treatment of Father Keller by the Government, and for this reason he thought it desirable to ask the Government their intentions in regard to this matter. He wished, in a very few words, to recall to their Lordships' attention the events which had led to the arrest of Father Keller. In the latter part of last year the tenants on the Ponsonby estate, at Youghal, had adopted the Plan of Campaign, and paid their rents to a certain person. Amongst other persons having a knowledge of the circumstances was Father Keller, who was also parish priest of Youghal. In the Court the ordinary course of proceedings were taken against the tenants, and one named Patrick O'Brien was made a bankrupt. Father Keller was called upon to give evidence in the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin last week, but he refused to attend. A summons was served upon him in the ordinary way, and when he failed to appear a warrant was issued for his apprehension. He was apprehended by a messenger of the Court, and on Saturday last he attended the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin. When he was called he refused to answer the questions put to him, and he did so on the ground that they related to matters which had been communicated to him secretly and in confidence in his capacity of priest. Of course, he (the Earl of Camperdown) did not need to argue before their Lordships that that was a state of things which could not for a moment be allowed, and perhaps the best answer that could be given to the contention was given by the learned Judge. Judge Boyd thereupon told him that if witnesses were allowed to refuse to answer questions put to them upon such a ground the whole object of the Bankruptcy Law might be defeated by the simple expedient of getting a priest to occupy a position of trust with respect to the property of the bankrupt. Notwithstanding this remark of the learned Judge, however, Father Keller refused to answer the questions put to him, and accordingly he was committed to prison for contempt of Court. He (the Earl of Camperdown) thought that, in the first place, this contention of Father Keller could not be allowed. He quite admitted that if a Home Rule Government were to be established in Dublin, judging from the way in which the Nationalists had behaved at every town along the railway from Cork to Dublin, it was very likely such a privilege as that claimed by Father Keller might be allowed; but as long as these countries remained the United Kingdom of Great Britain such a claim would never be submitted to by Parliament or by the country. He now came to the point of his Question, which was, whether the present rules ordinarily applied to persons committed for contempt of Court were to be applied in Father Keller's case; and, if not, for what reason any relaxation of them was to be permitted? He put that Question in consequence of what he had read in the newspapers. He put it to their Lordships that if ever there was a case in which the ordinary prison discipline and rules ought to be enforced it was the present one. In the first place Father Keller had committed a contempt of Court in the ordinary manner; and he had been committed to prison in the ordinary manner; and therefore, so far as he knew, there was nothing peculiar in the circumstances of his case that called for any relaxation of the ordinary prison discipline. In the next place, Father Keller might purge himself of his contempt at any moment, and might come forth from prison at any time he chose. There were, however, under the circumstances of the case, special reasons that made it, in his opinion, peculiarly undesirable that any extraordinary leniency should be exhibited towards Father Keller. In the first place, all the circumstances connected with Father Keller's imprisonment had been used as means for promoting so many National League demonstrations throughout Ireland. When Father

Keller was arrested he was conveyed to Dublin by a slow train. It might, perhaps, be open to question whether it was wise to allow Father Keller to travel, not by the proper train, but by a later and a slower one, so as to give time for demonstrations and meetings to be organized all along the route between Cork and Dublin. Their Lordships would remember that such demonstrations took place everywhere. At one place Father Keller was greeted by the Archbishop of Cashel, and at Dublin he was met by the Lord Mayor and several Members of Parliament, and on this occasion language of a very turgid character was used for the purpose of bringing the law, and the persons appointed to administer the law, into contempt. For his part he thought, if they were to carry on the Government, they could not allow the law and the Judges to be brought into contempt. He was convinced that, in the peculiar state of things in Ireland, it was most unwise to allow the law to be brought into contempt. The Lord Mayor of Dublin was a member of the Prisons Visiting Committee, and as such he had already visited the prisoner. There was another reason why the prison regulations should not be relaxed in this case. A statement had been made in the newspapers—he did not know whether it was correct or not—to the effect that Father Keller had applied to be attended in prison by a physician not belonging to the gaol, but who was notoriously connected with the National League. The Lord Mayor of Dublin had taken the earliest opportunity he could find of identifying himself with Father Keller—he had met him at the station, and the next day Father Keller, accompanied by the Lord Mayor and by the Archbishop of Dublin, was driven in the Lord Mayor's carriage to the Court, and Father Keller entered the Court in company of the Archbishop of Dublin and the Lord Mayor; but afterwards the Lord Mayor took a course which he (the Earl of Camperdown) had observed many Irish patriots take in similar circumstances. He had watched the papers to see whether, when Father Keller was removed to prison, he was accompanied by the Lord Mayor of Dublin; but the Lord Mayor had been much too wise to accompany Father Keller on that journey to prison. The Lord Mayor of Dublin was perfectly ready to encourage Father Keller to resist the law and bring it into contempt; but as soon as there was any danger to himself of incurring any inconvenience by opposing the law he very wisely desisted from doing anything further. The Lord Mayor of Dublin was one of the Prisons Visiting Committee, and is was quite plain what course he would take, and that he would do everything in his power to relax prison discipline, and to make the treatment of Father Keller as little disagreeable as possible. He (the Earl of Camperdown) hoped this would be prevented, as far as it was possible to do so. He was quite convinced that if the Government in this case displayed any want of firmness, or allowed any relaxation of the rules, their motives would be misinterpreted and misrepresented exactly in the same manner as the action of the law had been misrepresented throughout Ireland. It had been stated far and wide in Ireland that Father Keller had been put in prison because he would not betray his duty and trust as a Catholic priest. Of course, there was not a word of truth in that assertion. If there was any want of firmness in the treatment of Father Keller in prison, it would be said that it was from fear of the Nationalist Party. The noble Earl concluded by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN), in reply, said, he thought the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) had stated with accuracy the earlier circumstances connected with the case of Father Keller. But he could inform the noble Earl that the Executive Government and the Police Authorities had nothing whatever to do with the journey of Father Keller having been undertaken in a slow instead of a fast train. The arrangements for the journey were under the direction of the Court of Bankruptcy, whose messenger was sent to bring Father Keller to Dublin. With regard to the Question asked by the noble Earl, the rules which were applied to prisoners for contempt were to be applied in this case. These rules empowered the Visiting Justices to make certain relaxations in particular cases, and application was made, on behalf of Father Keller, by the Governor of the prison for some of those relaxations which it was in the power of the Committee to grant. It might interest the noble Earl if he read the requests. Father Keller requested that he might be allowed to say mass daily in his cell. That was granted, subject to the approval of the Board. He requested to be allowed to see more than two visitors for more than a quarter of an hour daily. He was allowed to see three persons for half-an-hour. Father Keller also asked to have Dr. Kenny as his medical attendant. The Committee had not power to grant that request. He asked to have four hours' exercise, and to be furnished with a fire and bed clothes. These requests were granted. He then requested that he might be supplied with two daily and two weekly papers, and with periodicals, the daily papers being The Freeman's Journal and The Pall Mall Gazette, and the weekly The Nation and United Ireland. He was to be allowed one Dublin daily paper, one weekly paper, one London paper, one local paper, and periodicals. He asked to be allowed to provide himself with food from outside and to wear his own clothes. That was granted. Finally, he asked to be supplied with such stimulants as the doctor might think necessary, and to be allowed to use snuff. This was granted. The signatures appended to these orders were those of the Lord Mayor, Mr. Ion Hamilton, and two other Justices—Mr. Godley and Colonel Hartley. He could assure their Lordships that all these relaxations were such as, according to the prison rules, the Committee were entitled to grant, and that no exceptional facilities and no "extraordinary procedure" would be permitted in this case.

QUESTIONS.

SCOTLAND—CROFTERS' COMMISSION—VALUERS AND ASSESSORS—APPLICATIONS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Lord Advocate, If it is the intention of the Government to appoint valuers and assessors to assist the Crofters' Commission; if he will lay a Return upon the Table, giving the number of applications to the Court, and the number of decisions made up till 1st March; and, when the first annual Report of the Commission will be presented to Parliament?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities), in reply, said, the Government had no power to appoint valuers and assessors to assist the Crofters' Commission. This power was, by Section 20 of the Crofters' Act, vested in the Commissioners themselves. The Commissioners were bound by Section 18 to issue a Report in every year after the first year, and they could not yet say when their first Report would be ready. As regarded the Return asked for by the hon. Member, the Commissioners were of opinion that such a Return would be misleading at the present time, as a very large number of cases were far advanced, although decisions have not yet been given; and the decisions were in many cases delayed at the request of the parties themselves.

WAR OFFICE—OFFICIAL STATEMENT—ALLEGED DEFICIENCY OF £635,735—NAVAL ORDNANCE.

MR. H. F. PEASE (York, N.R., Cleveland) asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the War Office Official Statement, which appeared in The Times and other papers on the 1st of January last, whether that some hundreds of thousands of pounds have been voted for guns for the Navy and spent by the War Office, but that no guns have been supplied to the Fleet in consequence. Whether his attention has been called to Mr. Burdett's letters, published in The Times on the 3rd and 31st of January and the 24th of February, showing a total money deficiency of £635,735, and also year by year the ordnance actually manufactured and supplied by the War Department to the Navy, compared with the estimated value of guns, iron and steel, taken credit for yearly issue from store in the War Office Estimates for 1877-8 to 1883-4; and, whether these figures are correct?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHGOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: The two Returns quoted in the Correspondence to which my attention has been called do not refer to the same class of subjects. The one dated May 12, 1884, includes only expenditure on certain new guns manufactured for naval use; while the other, which is taken from the annual Estimates, represents the value of guns to be issued from store. Moreover, machine guns are included in the latter case, while they are not included in the Return of 1884.

LAW AND POLICE (SCOTLAND)—ARBROATH POLICE COURT—JAMES BENNETT.

Mr. LACAITA (Dundee) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the case of James Bennett, before the Arbroath Police Court on the 27th of February last; whether it is true that Bennett was sentenced to 60 days, for having been in the High Street of Arbroath after 11 o'clock on a Saturday night; and, if so, under what clause of what Statute it is criminal to be in a public street after 11 o'clock; whether Bennett was ready to go home at once, had he been warned to do so by the constable who apprehended him; whether it is true that Mr. Selby, clothier, of Arbroath, deposed that, having employed Bennett for two months during 1886, he had found him regular in his attendance, and honest; and, whether any evidence was given to show that Bennett's conduct had been other than honest whilst in Mr. Selby's employment, or at any other time during the last 18 months?

Mr. H. F. Pease

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): James Bennett was apprehended on the 26th of February, and on the 28th of February he was sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment in Arbroath Police Court. He was charged under the 15th section of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, by which any suspected person or reputed thief, frequenting any street with intent to commit a theft, may be apprehended and committed to prison, with hard labour, for a period not exceeding three months. The presiding magistrate was satisfied that felonious intent was established. Bennett has all the characteristics of a suspect. Between 1863 and the present date he has been convicted more than 20 times—in the Criminal Courts in Dundee nine times of serious offences, and seven times of theft, one of these thefts being by housebreaking. He has also been frequently convicted in other places. He came to Arbroath from Dundee about a year ago. He worked for Mr. Selby in June and July last; but Mr. Selby gave no evidence, as stated in the Question. Except for those two months he has had no lawful means of subsistence, and he was notorious as associating with thieves and bad characters. On the night in question he was found going in a direction which led away from his residence. It was suspected that he was watching an opportunity to commit theft, and he was arrested. I cannot tell whether his frame of mind would have led him to go home if told to do so. Evidence of Bennett's previous character was fully laid before the magistrate, and this evidence could not be in favour of his mode of life during the last 18 months; though, so far as I am aware, no absolute charge of dishonesty has been made against him during that period. He was twice recently suspected of assault and robbery, and in January last was apprehended on one of the charges. The report in the newspapers, which seemed to form the basis of the Question, was most inaccurate.

POST OFFICE—LEASEHOLD INSURANCE.

COLONEL MAKINS (Essex, S.E.) asked the Postmaster General, If he will consider the practicability, and, if practical, the advisability, of instituting in connection with the General Post Office, a system of National insurance, by the issue of policies to secure the return of the value of leasehold premises to insurers on the termination of their leases, so as to enable thrifty artisans and others to set aside a safely invested sinking fund to recoup their outlay on houses or shops (including goodwill) when the leases fall in?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAINES) (Cambridge University): I have considered the suggestion of my hon. and gallant Friend, but do not think that it would be advisable for the Government to apply to Parliament for legislative sanction to enable it to embark in such a business as that to which he refers. The scheme could only be attempted through the medium of the Post Office Savings Bank; and, if adopted, would involve for a specific purpose the abolition of the limits now imposed by law in regard to the amounts which can be deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank.

ROADWAYS AND STREETS (METROPOLIS)—CANTERBURY ROAD, CAMBERWELL.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham) asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether the Metropolitan Board of Works have ordered the Canterbury Road, situate between the parishes of St. Giles's, Camberwell, and St. Paul's, Deptford, should be, for the purpose of paving, under the exclusive management of the Vestry of Camberwell; whether the Metropolitan Board have ordered and directed in what proportions the cost of paving and making the roadway should be borne by the Camberwell Vestry and the Greenwich District Board; whether he is aware that Canterbury Road is still unpaved and an insanitary swamp; and, whether the Metropolitan Board of Works will compel the Local Authorities to put the road into a proper condition?

THE CHAIRMAN (SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG) (Middlesex, Hornsey): The position of the parishes of St. Giles, Camberwell, and St. Paul, Deptford, with reference to the Canterbury Road, is one, I am informed, of considerable legal difficulty; but, as a matter of fact, the Board made an Order on July 31, 1885, vesting the care and management of the whole road in the Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell, with the direction that one-half of the expense of the maintenance and repair should be paid by the District of Greenwich to the Vestry of Camberwell. The Metropolitan Board is advised that it is for the Vestry of Camberwell to enforce the terms of this Order, and take steps to recover from the District Board of Greenwich their share of such expense; and I am afraid that the Board has no power to move further in the matter.

NAVY — DOCKYARDS — DISCHARGES FROM HAULBOWLINE.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) (for Dr. TANNER) (Cork Co., Mid) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Government intend discharging 80 men on the 1st June proximo, from the works now being carried on at Haulbowline; whether any steps have been, or are about being, taken to make a channel from the main river channel to the floating dock; when will this work be actually commenced; when will the new coaling wharf be commenced; and if it is a fact that £5,000 has been advanced for the construction of the said wharf; and, whether, taking into account the depression of the times and the work still to be done in connection with the completion of the Haulbowline Docks, the Government will continue to employ the men whose services it was proposed to dispense with on the date in question?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Eighty men, having finished the particular work they are engaged on at Haulbowline, will be discharged, there being no longer any need for their services. A channel from the main river to the floating dock will be commenced this summer. Three thousand pounds has been taken for the construction of a coal wharf in the Estimates for 1887-8. Local men will be employed, as far as is possible, to complete the work; but the men under discharge cannot be retained, as there is not work for them to do.

Subsequently,

DR. TANNER apologized for not being present when the Question was asked, and he would feel greatly obliged if the noble Lord repeated his answer in reference to the paragraph in the Question asking whether it was a fact that £5,000 had been advanced for the construction of the new coaling wharf?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, a Vote for £3,000 was down on the Estimates for next year for the work.

DR. TANNER: When will the work be commenced?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I cannot state exactly the week or the month when the work will commence.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE LAND TAX.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) (for Mr. DILLON) (Mayo, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that the Land Tax has been reduced in Egypt in accordance with the Earl of Northbrook's recommendation, which was agreed to by the Financial Convention; and, if so, where information concerning this reduction is to be found?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): A reduction of £450,000 on the Egyptian Land Tax was recommended by the Earl of Northbrook. There is no mention of such a reduction in the Financial Convention. Still, it was tacitly accepted by the Powers. Soon after the acceptance of the Convention the Egyptian Government proposed that the greater portion of the £450,000 should be devoted to the abolition of the corvée, in lieu of the reduction of the Land Tax; and a discussion ensued between the Egyptian Government and the Powers, reference to which will be found in many despatches in the Blue Book "Egypt, No. 4, 1886." Ultimately, all the best authorities being agreed that this was the manner of reduction best calculated to benefit the cultivators, £250,000 was devoted to hiring labour in place of the corvée. The Commissioners of the Caisse, to whom the question had been referred by the Powers, refused to allow any permanent remission of the Land Tax beyond this £250,000. The Egyptian Government has, however, with the concurrence of the Commissioners, refrained from enforcing payment of about £100,000 of the Land Tax due in 1886. This remission was, I presume, as in the case of a similar remission of £189,000 in the preceding year, made principally in respect of the poorer land.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Government propose to ask the House to appoint the Committee on Indian affairs promised last Session?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GOSST) (Chatham): Since last Session a very important Commission, to which I have several times alluded in answering Questions, has been appointed in India, and is now engaged in making a comprehensive inquiry into the organization of the Government Departments in India. Until this Commission has reported, the Secretary of State does not intend to ask Parliament to appoint a Joint Committee on Indian Affairs.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—MANOR-HAMILTON DISTRICT, CO. LEITRIM.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) (for Mr. CONWAY) (Leitrim, N.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the repeated complaints of the inadequate deliveries of letters at the rural post office No. 3, Gurteen, Manorhamilton, County Leitrim; whether the inhabitants have been put off repeatedly, on the plea of insufficiency of number of letters; whether the deliveries take place on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays only; whether the village of Lurganboy, consisting of six houses, and which is in the neighbourhood of Gurteen, has bi-daily deliveries; whether the letter carrier receives 6s. per week for his bi-daily deliveries at Lurganboy, with a slight monetary recognition for the additional journey to Gurteen tri-weekly; whether an improvement in wages of letter carrier would suffice for a daily delivery of letters at the last-named place; and, whether he will recommend that this course be adopted for the convenience of the inhabitants of the district?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): There is no record of any recent application for a more frequent delivery of letters at Gurteen; but I will have inquiries made whether the circumstances will admit of the improvement desired being incipally in 1. It is the case that there are liveries a day at Lurganboy.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER—THE MIDDLEMAN SYSTEM.
MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rush-ffe) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the middleman system of letting the land prevails on other portions of the Duchy Estates than the 6,000 acres in the North Riding held by a gentleman residing near Pickering; and, if so, how many acres are so let; and, how many middlemen are there as tenants of the Duchy?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: The practice of the Duchy has for many years past been to get rid of the old system of middlemen, and at Lady Day next there will only remain four such tenants of about 2,900 acres.

COAL AND WINE DUTIES (METROPOLIS).

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether the annual sum levied for Coal and Wine Duties on the Metropolitan Police Area in 1861 was about £230,000, and now is about £450,000; whether such Duties are yearly increasing, and what proportion is levied on the area not represented by the Corporation and Board of Works; and, whether the present annual rateable value of the area of the Corporation and Board of Works is £30,856,472?

THE CHAIRMAN (Sir JAMES M'GARRL-Hogg) (Middlesex, Hornsey): My hon. Friend is quite correct in stating that the Coal and Wine Duties have increased from about £230,000, in 1861, to about £450,000 per annum in the present year, during which time the population has also increased by about 1,500,000. No doubt, the Duties, if renewed, will continue to increase with the population; but I am unable to state what proportion is levied outside the Metropolis. My hon. Friend is also correct in the amount at which he places the present rateable value.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1877—LUNACY DISTRICTS.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill during the present Session to restore the means for the division of lunacy districts in Scotland, which were accidentally abrogated by the Prisons (Scotland) Act of 1877?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities), in reply, said, it was intended to deal with this subject, and a Bill would be shortly introduced in "another place."

INLAND REVENUE—STAMP DUTY ON YEARLY LEASES IN SCOTLAND.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Oamlachie) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the Stamp Laws at present existing in Scotland, If he will make further inquiries so as to determine as to the desirability of introducing a Clause into the Annual Revenue Act, to legalize written missives for annual lets, where the rent exceeds £10, upon a nominal stamp of 1*d.*, with the view of affording a safer method than the legal custom of annual leases without writing, and which would constitute, at the same time, a new source of revenue?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes. I am making inquiries into the matter; but I do not want the hon. Member to infer that, because I am making inquiries, it will be possible for me to give effect to the desire expressed in his Question.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—CORONER'S WARRANT.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to state whether, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, the Coroner's warrant lately issued by Mr. Coroner Rice to commit Constable Bulmer, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, is legal or illegal? As the Chief Secretary, to whom the Question is addressed, is not in his place, I will ask the Attorney General for Ireland to answer it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University), in reply, said, he had only seen this Question within the last two or three minutes; but he

Question asking whether it was a fact that £5,000 had been advanced for the construction of the new coaling wharf?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, a Vote for £3,000 was down on the Estimates for next year for the work.

DR. TANNER: When will the work be commenced?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I cannot state exactly the week or the month when the work will commence.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE LAND TAX.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) (for Mr. DILLON) (Mayo, E.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that the Land Tax has been reduced in Egypt in accordance with the Earl of Northbrook's recommendation, which was agreed to by the Financial Convention; and, if so, where information concerning this reduction is to be found?

REPORTEDLY, to which the warrant was handed, to put it in execution, leaving the question of the legality of the warrant to be decided by the Law Officers?

MR. HOLMES said, it was certainly the duty of a Sub-Inspector of Police to take instructions from the Heads of Departments, who would take the opinion of the Law Officers in the ordinary course, with whom rested the question of the legality of the warrants. The matter not having been brought to his notice, he took steps to ensure that it should be brought to his notice as soon as possible.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked, who in Ireland was responsible to the Chief Secretary for informing him of these irregularities before they were brought up in the House of Commons by hon. Members? Was it General Buller's duty?

LONDON COAL AND WINE DUTIES CONTINUANCE BILL—PUBLIC PARK IN TOTTENHAM.

MR. J. HOWARD (Middlesex, Tottenham) asked the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London, Whether, if the Bill for the renewal of the Coal and Wine Duties should pass the Second Reading, any guarantee can be preceding year, made principally in respect of the poorer land.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Government propose to ask the House to appoint the Committee on Indian affairs promised last Session?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): Since last Session a very important Commission, to which I have several times alluded in answering Questions, has been appointed in India, and is now engaged in making a comprehensive inquiry into the organization of the Government Departments in India. Until this Commission has reported, the Secretary of State does not intend to ask Parliament to appoint a Joint Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am afraid I can hardly fix a day. The Bill is in the hands of the draftsmen, and I will lose no time in pushing it forward.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1886 — PLEURO-PNEUMONIA (SCOTLAND).

SIR CHARLES PALMER (Durham, Jarrow) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in view of the continued prevalence of pleuro-pneumonia in the United Kingdom, especially in Scotland, What steps are being taken by the Government to check the spread of the disease and stamp it out; and, why the amended Act of the 25th June, 1886, has not been put in force by the Privy Council?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: Pleuro-pneumonia only prevails to a serious extent in Scotland, and the Privy Council have recently declared three Scotch counties infected areas, in the hope of checking the spreading of the disease. The question of applying provisions of the Act of 1886 has been under consideration; and it has been decided that before making any attempt to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia in Great Britain it is that means should be adopted at its re-introduction from Ireland the Privy Council are in common with the Irish Government subject.

ANCE—TREASURY BILLS.

ALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rolded Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer): Whether Treasury Bills for £100 were sold on the 9th instant, when the Government balances Bank of England amounted to £1,000,000; and, whether a consequence saving to the Exchequer (of £100,000 pounds annually) would result, when the Government balances are reduced, the floating debt were reduced, the payment of Treasury Bills fall-the grievances which that Bill proposed to remedy?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): Owing to the lateness of the hour at which the House adjourned, I was not aware that the Question had been put down on the Paper for to-day. But I hope the hon. Member will be satisfied with the assurance that the matter is receiving our careful consideration; and, in the course of a few days, I hope to be able to tell him precisely what we propose to do.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—MR. KNIPE'S REPORT.

MR. COLERIDGE (Sheffield, Attercliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Report of Mr. Knipe will be in the hands of Members of the House; what is the cause of the delay in the printing; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will postpone bringing in any measures for coercive legislation in Ireland until the Members of this House have had an opportunity of studying its contents?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said, he had no knowledge of the facts of the case; but he understood the reason of the delay was that Mr. Knipe did not himself return the proof of the Report to the Secretary of the Commission until within the last day or two. It had now been received by Her Majesty's Government, and was laid on the Table of the House last night.

MR. COLERIDGE said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the last part of the Question.

MR. W. H. SMITH: No; we are not in a position to do what is suggested.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) said, the newspapers had been furnished with a synopsis of the Report, although it had not been put into the hands of Members.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that was a matter which rested with Mr. Knipe. The Government was not responsible in any way for the newspapers obtaining a surreptitious knowledge of the documents.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Square): I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman has called attention to the facts which are stated in the Report. My attention has been pre-called to the same matter. The principle of the transaction is this—that a principle of English finance is that an Executive Government—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer—should not increase the debt permanently year without the special sanction of Parliament. The powers under which obtain temporary loans, such as the Treasury Ways and Means advances, are strictly limited, as those advances are repaid within a very limited period. In accordance with this principle the Chancellor is only permitted by the Treasury to issue Treasury Bills or Exchequer Bills in the same financial year as in which they have been paid off—that is to say, he is not allowed to use his Ways and Means in any year by the issue of fresh Exchequer or Treasury Bills without the assent of Parliament, previously obtained.

CONVEYANCING (SCOTLAND) ACT (1874) AMENDMENT BILL.

MR. J. B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan, Perth) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he intends to introduce a Bill, similar to the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act 1874 Amendment Bill of last year, or other measure, directed to redress

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
ACT, 1886—ANTHRAX IN CHESHIRE.

MR. TOLLEMACHE (Cheshire, Edisbury) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the attention of the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council has been called to the serious outbreak of "anthrax" in Cheshire; and, whether they will consider the advisability of extending the powers of Local Authorities under the Animals Act, 1886, so as to empower them to order the slaughter of animals affected with this disease, and to pay compensation for animals so slaughtered?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: The Government do not propose to treat anthrax in the same manner as pleuropneumonia, as they are advised that the two diseases are of a totally different character. Slaughter in anthrax would, in most cases, be impracticable, as animals are usually found dead without any warning, or die very quickly after the symptoms become apparent. Further, as the disease does not spread by association of diseased with healthy animals, as is the case with pleuro-pneumonia, slaughter and compensation would only be for the benefit of the owner, and not for the community.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) asked, What steps Her Majesty's Government have taken, or intend to take, to stamp out the recent outbreak of anthrax, which is committing such ravages in the county of Cheshire?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The recent outbreak of anthrax in Cheshire has apparently been confined to one farm, and chiefly affected swine, of which 34 are reported to have died, and also three sheep. No cases have been reported since March 19. Immediately the disease was recognized the Local Authority took action under the Anthrax Order, and prevented the movement of animals from the farm. An Inspector of the Privy Council has visited the farm, and from his Report it does not appear that there is anything remarkable in the outbreak of anthrax, which disease, it is said, occurs every year on this farm, and is accounted for by the existence of insanitary conditions which are most favourable for the development of the disease.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—MR. SHIRLEY'S FARNEY ESTATE, MONAGHAN.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received any information that Mr. S. E. Shirley intends evicting 32 families on his Farney Estate, in the County Monaghan, on the 22nd instant; whether it is a fact that the tenants to be evicted offered to pay one and a half year's rent before eviction proceedings were instituted, which offer was refused by Mr. Shirley; whether it is a fact that the tenants on this estate have served Mr. Shirley with the necessary originating notices, preparatory to going into the Land Court to have fair rents fixed; whether it is true that, since the service of these originating notices, Mr. Shirley has caused 200 additional processes of ejectment to be served; and, whether it is true that an extra force of 200 police has been drafted into Carrickmacross for the purpose of turning these 32 families out of their homes in this inclement season and, if so, whether, pending the decisions of the Land Court in their cases, he will withhold the sanction to the forces of the Crown being used for the purpose of carrying out the eviction of the tenants on this estate, which numbers 2,000, and represents about 12,000 persons?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) (who replied) said: The hon. Gentleman knows that many Questions are on the Paper to-day of which no Notice has been given. I believe that this Question only appeared on the Question Paper at 2 o'clock this afternoon. It is, therefore, impossible to answer it.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I may inform the right hon. Gentleman that the Question was on the Paper two days ago. I received a very characteristic evasive answer from the Chief Secretary; and put it down again on the Paper of yesterday, having intimated to the Chief Secretary that I would do so. As the evictions are taking place to-day, the right hon. Gentleman might have taken the trouble to send a telegram to that place.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!
DR. TANNER: Hear, hear!

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—DELIVERY OF LETTERS AT NEWTOWNARDS, &c.

Mr. MC CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has yet completed arrangements by which the people of Newtownards, Downpatrick, Newcastle, and intermediate towns, will be enabled to reply to letters from England on day of delivery; and, if not, whether, considering the urgent necessity for the increased postal accommodation, he will take steps to have the new arrangements made and entered into without further delay?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I am fully alive to the importance which the localities interested attach to an improved service; but it is necessary that further information, which is now being collected, shall be in my possession before a definite decision can be arrived at. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Down (Colonel Waring) some weeks ago called my attention to this matter, and I have since been giving it my careful consideration

ANGLO-AMERICAN FISHERIES CONVENTION, 1818 — PURCHASE OF ARMED CRUISERS.

Mr. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the statement that the Canadian Government is negotiating for the purchase of armed cruisers for the purpose of enforcing the Anglo-American Fisheries Convention of 1818, as interpreted by the Dominion Government; and, if so, whether the proposed proceedings have the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I only saw the Question on entering the House, and I beg to submit to the House that a somewhat longer Notice of such Questions should be given than even one night. No information on the subject had reached the Foreign Office; and the Secretary of State for the Colonies informs me that he has not heard of it. I may add that the purchase of cruisers is a matter within the discretion of the Canadian Government.

Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) asked, If they were to understand that the Canadian Government had power to set up armed cruisers without the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

Sir JAMES FERGUSSON asked Notice of the Question.

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL —MOTION FOR URGENCY.

[FIRST NIGHT.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Sir, I rise to move—

"That the introduction and several stages of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion, including the Rules of Procedure, whenever the Bill shall be set down for consideration by the Government as the first Business of the day."

I dare say I shall be asked why I move for precedence for this measure. It is because the country is in a state of disorganization, because the ordinary law is not enforced, and because it is the duty of the Government to see that the law of the land is observed, and that the machinery by which the law of the land is enforced is in complete and successful operation. That has been recognized as the duty and responsibility of all Governments at all times and under all circumstances in this House. It is our duty simply to maintain and to carry out the law of the land, and the Government which failed to do this would obviously be perfectly unfitted to discharge the duties for which it is responsible. Sir, if we have formed a wrong judgment as to the powers which we require to enable us to enforce the law, or if we are asking for powers which are unnecessary, there is an alternative which the House possesses and which it is its duty to exercise. But we are bound to act upon our sense of public duty. Our sense of public duty is informed by facts which are known to everybody in this House and to the whole world. Those facts amount to this—that juries are intimidated, and that criminals notoriously guilty of acts inimical to the best interests of society pass scot-free from the dock, against the declaration of the Judge and to the distinct prejudice of the best interests of the community. I have read very lately an extract from a speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), made in 1881, under circumstances like these, in which he said—

"When the Executive Government of the country have arrived at the conclusion that there is sufficient evidence to convince Parliament that a demand for extraordinary powers ought to be made and acceded to, it becomes the duty of the Executive Government—and I would also humbly presume to say the duty of the House of Commons in conjunction with the Executive Government—to use every lawful and proper means for giving due despatch to the consideration of that demand."—(3 Hansard, [257] 1316.)

That is the position we take. We believe—we know—that there is evidence which ought to convince Parliament that the demand for extraordinary powers ought to be made and acceded to; it is our duty to place that demand before the House of Commons; and I humbly say, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman, that it is the duty of the House of Commons to use every lawful and proper means for giving due despatch to the consideration of that demand. I again say, without entering at all upon the details of the measure which it will be the duty of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to explain to the House, that we have arrived at the conclusion that the measure is in itself necessary for the public safety and for the security and happiness of the law-abiding people in Ireland; and we claim from the House of Commons that they shall give despatch to the consideration of the demands we are now making. The speech from which I have quoted was made in January, 1881, when an association called the Land League was in existence in Ireland. There is now an association called the National League. [An hon. MEMBER: "The Loyal and Patriotic League."] It is a conspiracy. To use the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), the one is in apostolical succession to the other. Our case, to use the language used in 1881, is—

"That the state of Ireland is one in which the administration of justice has failed, and in which, to a very considerable extent, the influence of terror places in abeyance the discharge of civil duties and the exercise of civil rights."—(Ibid.)

The powers we ask for are necessary to maintain social order; they are necessary to maintain the very existence of society upon the conditions enforced and recognized by every civilized community. They are not in the full sense of the word, political, unless it be a political duty to maintain order, to respect the rights of property, and to secure to everyone the enjoyment of complete personal liberty. We may say that the object we have in view is political in the sense that it is the highest duty of those engaged in politics to see that all subjects of the Queen are personally secure in every part of Her dominions. It is not a Party question, but it is a duty which the House of Commons owes to society in Ireland as much as it owes to society in England or in London. If there were persons in any part of London organized for the purpose of robbery or spoliation, it would not be called a political or Party object if we found it to be necessary by direct legislation to secure to the law-abiding portion of the citizens of London peace in their own dwellings and the absolute control of their own property. That is the object which the Government feel it their duty to press now upon the attention of Parliament. But I am told in the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) proposes that—

"This House declines to set aside the business of the Nation in favour of a measure for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland, while no effectual security has been taken against the abuse of the Law by the exaction of excessive rents."

This Amendment is almost identical with the one moved in 1881 to the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. But, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman then saw no reason for giving way to the Amendment proposed or for departing from the course of action and duty which he had laid down for himself. The right hon. Gentleman used these words—

"From our point of view the question presents itself thus: that the state of Ireland is one in which the administration of justice has failed, and in which, to a very considerable extent, the influence of terror places in abeyance the discharge of civil duties and the exercise of civil rights . . . but there are some Members of Parliament . . . who say that the Government has made a great mistake in giving the first place in the deliberations of Parliament—at least, the first place in the proposals laid before Parliament—to a subject of this kind, and that they ought to have commenced the Session by an attempt to deal with the intricate question of a Land Bill in all the manifold points of view from which it has been approached during the last few months. Well, it is impossible for us to accept any proposal of that kind." (3 Hansard, [257] 1316-7.)

That, Sir, is our view of the case. The Government had in contemplation an extensive scheme of what they believed to be land reform dealing with that land question which was the subject of the agitation of the Land League. The Government on their responsibility declined to take up the land question first, but insisted that the law should be maintained, and that the lives and property of the subjects of Her Majesty should be preserved and protected, and then they undertook and dealt with the land question. Well, Sir, I have stated in this House, and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has stated, that we are prepared and are dealing with the land question. There are two Bills in preparation. One is in print and will be introduced immediately; another dealing with the subject of purchase is in an advanced stage of preparation, and will, I hope, very shortly see the light. But, Sir, what was the attitude of Her Majesty's Government in 1881, and what was the position they took up? I will read another quotation. The words are so apt and express so completely the sense of duty which the Government of to-day feel, that I can without the least hesitation appropriate and use them as arguments in support of our own case. The Solicitor General for Ireland stated in the debate on this very Motion that—

"It was his conviction that no Land Bill could be presented to Parliament framed in accordance with the principles of honesty and justice, which would satisfy the members of the Land League." —(Ibid 1688.)

Now, Sir, I venture to say that the present Government cannot present any measure to Parliament which is not framed upon principles of honesty and justice; and I am afraid also that I must say that no measure which is likely to be framed upon those principles or which we can present to Parliament will satisfy that apostolic successor of the Land League which is now the source of so much terror and disorganization. Let us go back to the simple duty of the Government—of the Government represented by the right hon. Gentleman opposite as of Governments under any circumstances in this country. I say it is the duty of the Government to maintain the law and to secure the liberties of the people. Dare we stand by and see juries intimidated and prisoners acquitted who, by the declaration of the Judge on the evidence adduced, ought under all the circumstances to have been found guilty? Dare we stand by and see the country disorganized and do nothing? I say we cannot and we will not. If this is wrong, and these things are to go on, let the House and the country relieve us of our responsibility. I beg to move the Resolution that stands in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the introduction and several stages of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion, including the Rules of Procedure, whenever the Bill shall be set down for consideration by the Government as the first business of the day."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne), in rising to propose the following Amendment:—

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'This House declines to set aside the business of the Nation in favour of a measure for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland, whilst no effectual security has been taken against the abuse of the Law by the exaction of excessive rents;'" said: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury appears to me to have taken up a very extraordinary position in endeavouring to institute any comparison whatever between the state of affairs on which the Government base their proposals and the state of affairs which prevailed in 1881. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that Ireland is in a state of disorganization. With all deference to the facts which the right hon. Gentleman may afterwards produce, I venture to traverse that proposition absolutely. You may from the area of exceptional disorder exclude the Provinces of Ulster and Leinster; also Tipperary, Waterford, Leitrim, and Sligo—in all 25 counties. Now, of the remaining seven counties, you may treat as partially disturbed Kerry and Limerick, the half of Galway, the half of Roscommon, one-third of Clare, one-sixth of Cork, excluding the City, and possibly one-sixth of Mayo. Thus you have, taking in the whole of that area, one-eighth only of the population of the country which the right hon. Gentleman says, without any qualification, is in a state of complete disorganization. Then, there is another point of difference between what is happening to-day and what happened in 1881. In 1881 the demand for precedence for the Motion taking the time of the House did not, as to-day, precede, but followed, a very ample and elaborate statement by the Chief Secretary of that day on the state of things which was thought to justify his demand. How is it then that the right hon. Gentleman has asked the House to surrender all its time, before the Chief Secretary has made a statement of the facts upon which the Government base so important a demand? Will the right hon. Gentleman who talks of the "complete disorganization" of Ireland lay upon the Table of the House a comparative Return of the outrages in January, 1881, and of outrages reported to the Chief Secretary during this last month? If he will do that, we shall have a means of measuring how far there is a parallel between the state of things which was thought to justify the demand for coercion and for the whole time of the House in 1881, and the same demand for the same policy and similar legislation proposed in 1887. Sir, the Amendment which I have put down is meant to dispute the necessity for urgency: it disputes the priority of the Coercion Bill over other measures for Ireland. I am aware, therefore, that in discussing that Amendment I shall not be able to cover the whole length and breadth of the objection which many of us sitting on this side feel, and shall continue to feel, to the kind of legislation which the right hon. Gentleman is going to propose. This Amendment, with which we meet the first stage of what is likely to be an arduous and protracted discussion, only deals with one particular aspect of this great controversy; and our position in moving this Amendment is that the Government are going to work in an inverted order—that they are beginning with a policy which will aggravate the existing evil, and will weaken and spoil the operation of whatever future remedies they may be able to propose. We take the very earliest opportunity, and shall to the very end take every other legitimate opportunity, of protesting against a policy of that kind. We are not acting without a precedent, because in 1846 so staunch a stickler for Parliamentary and Constitutional usage as Lord John Russell took the same course as we are now taking in demurring to a demand for the whole time of the House for a Coercion Bill. He did it, too, upon grounds very similar to those which I myself wish to press upon the House of Commons this afternoon. Lord John Russell said—and it shows how our Irish dealings are constantly repeating themselves—

"That he felt that more useful effects would be likely to follow from this measure (the Coercion Bill of the day) if Her Majesty's Government had an opportunity of producing some remedial measures at the same time. He thought that they were bound to consider whether there were not measures that would lessen the causes of this crime."

Then Lord John Russell, along with Mr. Cobden and my right hon. Friend the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), went into the Lobby against the very same demand as that which the right hon. Gentleman has now made. We are not, therefore, without a precedent. As to the point with which I began, I must ask what excuse there is for the proposal of the Government? We are told that disorder is triumphant. I venture to repeat that outside that very narrow area to which I have already alluded, Ireland has seldom been quieter than it is to-day. The evidence of this is to be found in the Judges' charge, outside the districts I have spoken of. It is to be found in the testimony before the Commission that I shall presently have to deal with. It is to be found even in the evidence given before the Commission by an hon. Member whom we always listen to with interest on the Irish Question—the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald). That hon. Gentleman was asked whether the powers of the League had diminished, and he said "That is a very hard question to answer." But he then went on to say this—

"If you ask me pointedly whether I am in favour of the immediate suppression of the League by force of law I should say No, because I think it is gradually losing its power."

But he said more; he was asked by one of the Commissioners about the forcible prevention of the meetings of the League. His answer was this—

"I do not know that you can forcibly prevent people from giving bad advice. It is a difficult question; but I do not think that direct interferin the Land League such as the passing of special legislation would be advisable in the state present. What should be done in parts of the country where extraordinary occurrences I am not capable of offering an opinion, but I do hope that no such measure extended over the whole of Ireland."

as further asked if it would be as unfair to treat the whole of Ireland as if it were one—and to treat the whole of the United Kingdom as one, deserving of exceptional legislation—and the hon. Gentleman, in answer, said, "Quite so, there are many parts of Ireland as quiet and well-governed as any portion of the United Kingdom." That is the opinion of the Member for Cambridge. What is the real reason for the Bill? There is no beating about the bush. Hon. Members opposite will not agree with me, but I hope they will listen to what is the real reason. What are you actually doing at? You are not aiming at putting down rebellion. You are not aiming at quelling sedition. You are acting not as a combination to protect the tenants—to protect the tenants against rents which you know, and which you yourselves will admit—are now coming to admit—to be excessive and oppressive, and against which these combinations are the only existing safeguard. That is the proposition, and it is one of the foundations of our argument against urgency. We have now before us, not only the charges of the judges describing the state of the country, but we have the Blue Book, with regard to which I do not scruple to say it is one of the most important documents issued since the Devon Commission in 1844. We are charged with raising over again the question which was supposed to have been settled last September, and again last month, on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). Yes, because we have new proofs, and a fresh body of evidence. I do not doubt that anyone who will read, or even dip into, this voluminous Blue Book will see that not only the Report, but the whole mass of the evidence in that Book, supports every one of the leading propositions which we, on this side of the House, endeavoured to press on the Government as soon as this Parliament was elected in 1886. I am going to trouble the House with as few extracts as possible from that document; but they shall be such as to have really an important bearing on this debate. Our first proposition was, and has been throughout, that there has been so serious a fall in prices as to interfere with the payment of judicial rents. In September that was denied on those Benches, above and below the Gangway. Well, the Commission reported on that. They admit to the full everything that we ever said as to the effect of the fall in prices upon the ability of the tenants to pay their rents. And they overthrow all the propositions that were advanced by right hon. and learned Gentlemen from the Benches opposite. The Commission say that this sudden fall in prices has been aggravated by a gradual deterioration going on in the quality and produce of the soil. And here I cannot help noticing an illustration of the spirit in which the "landlord party"—I do not say it offensively—endeavour to mislead official opinion. Mr. Kavanagh, in his evidence, says that the agitators tell the people that there has been a gradual deterioration of the soil, and he would lead you to think that there was nothing in it. It is not the agitators who tell us this; it is your own Commissioners who tell you. Then the next point is the great increase in the cost of cultivation. But I will not labour that, but leave it. Sir, they also say that this state of things is the secret, in fact, of the formation of these combinations against which your proposed legislation is to be directed. They use moderate language. They say the refusal by some landlords to grant reductions may explain much that has occurred. "May explain!" They say that the formation of these combinations has doubtless been facilitated by the circumstances which it is now proposed to consider. The plain English of that is, of course, that in the opinion of the Commissioners these combinations arising in localities had their root in the inability of the tenants to pay excessive rents, and, what is still more to the point, in the resolution of many landlords—I do not say all, but of many—to exact those excessive rents which they can only collect when armed with sufficient power to do so. You need not go, as my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) went, as far as the Chicago Convention for an explanation of the rise of these combinations. They have had their rise in the natural necessity of the Irish tenants. That is my first proposition. The second proposition is that the evidence given before Lord Cowper's Commission is conclusive, and shows that, but for these combinations, many of the landlords would not have made the abatements which the late Chief Secretary and others, after fair and impartial inquiry, knew to be just and reasonable, and required by the circumstances. I am not going to draw up an indictment against the Irish landlords. I am not very fond of drawing indictments against any class. I suppose there is as much human nature in the Irish landlords as in the National League. Only do not let us overlook the motives that impel them to screw out high rents. The Irish landlords are in a terrible fix, and there is one very remarkable point bearing upon the probability that they would press their claims if they could. Many Gentlemen are acquainted with Mr. Hussey, the land agent. He made this statement. He said he collected a rental of £250,000 a-year, and he was asked how much of that £250,000 was intercepted before it gets to the landlord, and he said, "I should think four-fifths." Then a landlord with a rental of about £5,000 a-year gets for himself about £1,000? To this Mr. Hussey replied, "About that." Well, that remarkable admission as to the landlords for whom Mr. Hussey was agent is typical of too many landlords, and it explains the pressure that is put on them, and that they in their turn put on the tenants. I should be forbidden by you, Mr. Speaker, if I attempted to discuss the Act of Union now, and I have no desire to discuss it; but I will make one remark on a fact of this kind revealed by the Blue Book, that landlords only draw one-fifth of their rents, is very remarkable proof that the Act of Union has led the Irish landlords into habits of extravagance in their emulation with the richer landlords in England, and that they have been left in a very desperate condition—a condition in which they will be very little likely to do much good for the country in which they live. There is evidence to show what would have happened if pressure had not been put on the landlords. Mr. Hussey was asked why he made a certain abatement. He said, "Why, the lawlessness of the country prevented me asserting my right." He was then asked, "It was in consequence of the utter absence of any power to enforce it, that you felt incumbent upon you to make this abatement?" "Yes, that is so." He was glad to get any money he could. This was in the face of what the Commissioners called the inability of the tenants to pay even the judicial rents. I submit that what Mr. Hussey calls the lawlessness of the country was natural combinations of the tenants to resist payments which they could not make. This Bill, Sir, is a Bill for enabling landlords to exact exorbitant and excessive rents. There is one other witness who is much too important for me to pass over, because his evidence is of the first significance—I refer to Sir Redvers Buller. He is perfectly impartial, and not likely to over-state the case against the landlords, nor take an unjust view against that class. I will read a few words here and there from his evidence. He says—

"My view of the country is this, that the majority of the tenants meant to pay the rents, and, where they could pay them, did pay them; but the rents have been too high. I do think they are too high."

He said—"Nobody"—and this is of the first importance—"Nobody did anything for the people until the League was established."

"And when the landlords could not let their farms, then they were forced to consider the question of rents."

I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, if they are not too biassed by Party feeling, whether these combinations in preventing the landlords from exacting rents, which Sir Redvers Buller declared were too high—whether a service was not being done to the tenants of the country, and indirectly to the Government of the country. Then Sir Redvers Buller says—

"I think it was the pressure of high rents which produced the agitation and the intimidation against the payment of rents."

Mark that. It was not the Chicago Convention; it was the pressure of high rents. Then Sir Redvers Buller said—

"Unfortunately, the tenants had been led to think that the law was only on one side; they were an ignorant, poor people, and that the law should look after them, instead of which it had only looked after the rich."

Yes, and your Bill is a measure for throwing the law more than it has ever been on the side of the rich. Sir Redvers Buller said—and this is the last quotation I shall make—

“I should like to have a Court which would have a certain amount of coercive power on a bad tenant, and a very strong coercive power on a bad landlord.”

The effects of this Bill will be to remove all the coercive power that General Buller wanted to put upon the landlord, and to put all the coercive power upon the wretched tenants. There is other evidence in this Book which hon. Gentlemen opposite will be still less likely to deny than that of Sir Redvers Buller, as to the contention that combination is justifiable directed against the payment of excessive rent. I refer to the evidence of Lord Milltown, who is by no means a revolutionary person, and to the Ulster evidence. Lord Milltown denied in his dissentient Report the position taken up by the Commissioners—namely, that the refusal of abatements by some landlords might explain much that had occurred. Lord Milltown did not assent to that; and, with an ingenuousness that is really admirable, he proceeded—

“The chief refusals to grant abatements have been in Ulster, where combinations do not as a rule exist.”

That is the very point. Abatements were refused exactly because combinations do not exist. Of course, Sir, in that proposition Lord Milltown was admitting, in the plainest manner possible, the very proposition which in an earlier paragraph he denied. He was admitting that where combinations did not and do not exist abatements against excessive rents were not theremade. I do urge hon. Gentlemen opposite to read about 100 pages of the Ulster evidence, because they will there find what harsh landlords are capable of doing when they are free from the pressure of popular opinion and of these combinations. No more painful evidence has been laid before this House for many a day than the evidence as to the treatment of the Ulster tenants. Mr. Dickson, who was formerly Member for Tyrone, gave some very interesting testimony, and there is one sentence which struck me as very important. He said—

“The question is how long the tenants in the North of Ireland will pay what I regard as impossible judicial rents, fixed between 1881 and 1885.”

Then he was asked what he thought the effect would be on the tenants if the landlords continued to refuse to sell—as they do in the North of Ireland, for the very good reason that they get their rents—and he replied—

“I believe that if land purchase goes on very extensively over the South and West of Ireland at low prices now prevailing, and if reductions are made on judicial rents in the South and West of Ireland, and if no purchase is permitted in the North of Ireland, and no abatements on judicial rents, I believe we will have the agrarian question breaking out in all its intensity in the North of Ireland.”

That means that the agrarian combinations in the South and West of Ireland are in effect fighting, not only their own battle, but the battle of the North of Ireland. I should like, in passing, to give the House some idea of the struggle which the Irish tenant farmer has to carry on in the face of present difficulties. I will refer the House to the evidence of a Mr. Charles Dennis, a tenant farmer of Waterford, who referred to a danger to the whole of Ireland, which is in process of realization, and which the Commission recognized. The Commissioners say that to force the tenants to sell their working stock in order to pay full rent would be fatal to their future prosperity. But it must be perfectly clear, even to an Englishman who reads the evidence, that this very process of the impoverishment and ruin of Ireland by forcing the tenants to sell their stock are at this moment going on at a rapid and an advancing rate—

“We have,” he says, “to keep this stock from month to month, and already we are overstocked. They are depreciating. We have offered them to the landlord.”— and this is a most important point of evidence—

“and the landlord would not accept them. Some time ago I stated publicly in print the names of my neighbours who offered their stock to the landlord, and proposed to charge half the cost of keeping them sooner than sell them off—he place. If the landlord will not do that at the present time, he must only expect to impoverish the tenants further by obliging them to sell off their stock at any price to save eviction more than seizure. The land then becomes unstocked, and the consequence is that the tenant is left no means at all then of paying the rent.”

Now, I desire to give a picture from Mr. Dennis's evidence of the struggles that a tenant sometimes has to go through in order to do what he believes to be honest and right—

"Only this time 12 months," says Mr. Dennis, "walking before my gate by accident on the public road leading from Waterford to Dunmore I picked up 15 pawn tickets. I looked at them, and on some of the tickets was marked 'cash,' and on others was a certain name that I happened to know. There were a great many persons of that name in the place. I went to one, and I did not think it could be him; but he said, 'I am so much obliged to you for bringing me these tickets, because if you told anybody it would ruin me. I went to the fair to raise my rent, and I could not sell a single thing, and I brought in these things to pawn them.' Among the things was his own coat, his son's coat, a splendid-made coat of frieze, a horse collar, and a shawl belonging to his wife. With the exception of this last article, no exception could be taken to any of the articles. On the whole he had received a sum of £4 3s.; and he said to me, 'You see I have two horses; I have two for working, and a yearling. I have six or seven yearling calves, 16 sheep, and several pigs—I have all that, and yet I cannot raise the money, and if I wanted £5 to-morrow you know I could not raise it. So I had to take these clothes and pawn them.' I said to him, 'Why did you do it?' I spoke to him like a first-class Land Leaser. His answer to me was, 'I have a good landlord. He reduced my rent considerably upon the last gale day, and if I told him I was not able to meet my reduced rent now he would not believe me, and sooner than that he should disbelieve me, or think I had cheek to go and ask him to make any further reduction, I went and pawned these things.'"

I can only say that man excites my deepest commiseration, and I am sure he will have the sympathy of Members in all parts of this House. I say that that case is an illustration of what I believe to be the position of the great majority of the tenant farmers in Ireland. And we are so often reminded, Sir, of the villainy of the character of the Irish nation, that I rejoice to be able to bring these facts forward. The whole of this Bill is based on the theory that the Irish people are incorrigible. The Commissioners have put upon public record that the Irish people are naturally honest, hard-working, and deeply attached to their country. And I say, Sir, that a man of this kind who makes such a sacrifice—and there are thousands of them in Ireland—excites my pity quite as much—as the victim of a moonlighting outrage. I say I am less anxious—anxious as I am—to secure vengeance upon 100 or 200 ruffians than I am to secure rightful and humane treatment for the thousands of poor tenants in Ireland. There is the difference between Gentlemen opposite and us on this side of the House. I will now proceed to one or two interesting matters which ought to be brought to the notice of the House as illustrating the meanness landlords are not above resorting to, and which come out in a very clear light in the Blue Book as showing the value of combination. As hon. Members from Ireland are aware, there is a device in operation in Ireland called joint tenancy. In one part of the Blue Book there is an account of a combination in a certain part of the country—I think Galway—not to pay rents until joint tenancy was broken up. The House will be able to judge whether these joint tenancies ought to be broken up or not. In this case there were five or six tenants on each holding—that is to say, these five or six men are made joint tenants, and are severally responsible for the whole rent. But that is not all. This is a device for bringing the rent above the significant figure of £4, for if the rent is over £4 the landlord pays only half the rate, while if it is below £4 the landlord pays the whole rate. By this precious manoeuvre, although a tenant has a holding which is really under the value of £4, and ought not, therefore, according to the intention of Parliament, to pay any poor-rate, he yet is made to pay that which the Legislature never intended him to pay. I say that this is a fraud upon Parliament. It shows that some landlords practise what I may call a Plan of Campaign of their own, which is quite as immoral as that which Lord Salisbury described as ardent swindling. There is another much more important complaint to be made against the action of the landlords which these combinations in Ireland have endeavoured to meet, I mean their mode of dealing with their tenants in the matter of the purchase of properties. One subject referred to the Commissioners was whether combinations prevented the operation of the purchase clauses of the Act of 1881, or Lord Ashbourne's Purchase Act of 1885. There is plenty of evidence on the subject. What, for instance, does Mr. J. G. MacCarthy say? As hon. Members are aware, he is one of the Commissioners under the Act of 1885—

"The operation of the Act has been hindered by an unwise attempt on the part of some land agents to coerce tenants into buying, and as to the terms of buying. How does he exercise the pressure? By telling the tenant he must either sign a contract for sale or go out. I have seen letters of this class. I have a letter in my possession from an extensive land agent, telling the tenant that the sheriff could not be put off beyond to-morrow, but that if she handed the sheriff the contracts for purchase, duly executed, he would not take possession. Surely a contract signed under such circumstances could not be free."

I hope the House understands the drift of that. English Members and English taxpayers are not entirely uninterested in these transactions. You see what the device means. It means that a tenant under the threat of being turned out, whatever for, agrees to purchase terms practically fixed by the coercive agent or landlord. Then the Commissioners, when they inquired into these cases, have constantly found that the price so fixed was a most monstrous price, which would have left us, the British taxpayers, completely in the lurch. These combinations, against which the Bill to be introduced by the Government is directed, rightly set their faces, and rightly set their faces, against coercive operations of this kind, which would have had the effect I have stated. See what is the landlords' Plan of Campaign for which you, by your proposal, demand urgency to-night. Their Plan of Campaign is to force a tenant to pay an unreasonable rent, with the delightful alternative of driving him to purchase at an unreasonable price, thus exposing the British taxpayer to an unreasonable risk. You are asking for urgency to make Parliament an accomplice in that benevolent design. It is the old story. This is Irish history in a nutshell—what it has been too long—unredressed grievances, moral wrongs without legal remedy, then illegal acts to secure something like moral rights, and then Coercion Bills with the admirable purpose, as righteous as it is statesmanlike, of driving just discontent beneath the surface. I know what I shall be told by one of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I shall be told that the Government are going to bring in land proposals; but it is useless to bring them in while these combinations exist. I reply, there is abundant proof to be got from the Blue Book that the unwillingness, for example, of the Irish tenants to avail themselves of the purchase provisions of the Acts of 1881 and 1885 is due to other causes far more potent than these combinations. It is impossible to read the Blue Book without seeing that the mass of tenants holding aloof from purchase are influenced by the consideration of the possibility of a still further fall in prices; by the apprehension that taxation may be increased; and by other apprehensions of one kind and another, and that combination is one of the least of the forces that are now operating upon the tenants and making them afraid of purchase. Therefore it will not do for the Government to say that they are prepared to bring in land proposals, but that they must first get combination out of the way. I go a little further, and I say that to give urgency to coercion will do no good. It will do no good in the way of meeting the evils of which you complain. I will take the evidence of Captain Plunkett on Boycotting. I daresay I shall be told that although there is active disorder only in a very small part of Ireland, yet that Boycotting prevails over a large area. Well, but it is the opinion of one of the most experienced magistrates in all Ireland, that Boycotting will not be affected by such coercion as the Government have in view. This is the evidence of Captain Plunkett, when under examination by the President of the Commission—

"Boycotting went on under the Crimes Act? —Oh, yes. As strongly as before?—It was as strong, I think, then as it is now."

Is not that a warning to the right hon. Gentleman not to hope that by coercion Boycotting will be put down? Captain Plunkett tells you stringent coercion was ineffectual against Boycotting. There is another point I will notice in passing. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) the other night gave us some horrible figures of the murders committed in the disturbed times of 1881-2. He is going to vote for a Coercion Bill, and yet, let me tell him, in spite of two Coercion Bills, 75 per cent of these murders remain undetected, and their perpetrators unpunished, to this day. Do not think, therefore, that a Coercion Bill, however strong, will, in the future, give you any security that you will detect the perpetrators of these crimes, or that you will be able to bring them to justice. I regret that the Government have addressed themselves to their task in this way. It is, I repeat, an invested order. Here is a single instance to show what I mean. There has been no worse or more disturbed district in Ireland than Castleisland since these troubles began some years ago. This is the evidence of a land valuer who knows it well—

“I attribute the difficulties of a district I am well acquainted with, the Castleisland district, which has unhappily had a very evil notoriety, to the fact that the Land Act operated to a very limited extent there, owing to a very large proportion of the tenants there being leaseholders. Their rents are high, but abatements have been made in some instances.”

What is the use, I would ask, of our spending weeks to drive the discontent of Castleisland below the surface, when the same weeks that we shall spend in passing a Coercion Bill would suffice to cut off the root of the disorder in Castleisland? If you suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, will you have more power to deal with the disorder of which the First Lord of the Treasury complained? Will the Bankruptcy Court have more power to compel persons to give evidence? If mobs resist, you have all the military forces of the Empire at your back. Why do you need more? What is the case? There are sinister signs that the temper and spirit of the Irish Government are not improving. There are signs that they are not to be trusted. I am perfectly sure that they, like their Predecessors, when they have been armed with these weapons, will inevitably be drawn into attacks upon their political opponents, and when that happens, depend upon it, we shall again be in quite as deep waters as we were in 1881-2. The events of 1881 are fresh in our minds, and I may perhaps refer to them with the more freedom because I was not then in this House. What happened after the House had assented to the Motion the right hon. Gentleman referred to, and the House had passed the Bill in favour of which the Motion was made? You were always talking about restoring law and order. It was argued then, as now, that you must restore law and order before you bring in remedial legislation. What was the effect of that measure for restoring law and order? This is not inapposite. In the fourth quarter of 1880 the number of evicted persons was 954. In the first quarter of 1881, when coercion was on the stocks here, they increased to 1,732, and in the second quarter, when the Coercion Bill had been passed, they rose to 5,500. Certainly, I should not be surprised if something of the same kind were to follow now. If you suppress these combinations, if you rouse the temper and excite the passions of the Irish people by this kind of legislation, I should not be surprised if the same thing occurs again. And not only did evictions go up—I implore the House to remember what passed in 1881—but outrages, which in February, 1881, the month when the Coercion Bill was before the House, were 170, by January, 1882, when these exceptions powers were in full force, had risen to 479, and by March to 531. Why, what did that come from? It came from striking at the tenants' organization before you struck at the land system which that organization was directed against. Well, that is all past. I will venture to quote a passage from a very wise man Mr. Burke said—

“I have constantly observed that the generality of people are 50 years at least behind in their politics. In books everything is settled for them without the exertion of any considerable diligence or sagacity. For which reason men are wise with but little reflection, and good with but little self-denial in the business of all times except their own. Few are the partisans of departed tyranny.”

We now can see the iniquity of the penal laws of the 18th century. Yet I declare, Sir, I am with those who doubt whether the penal laws of the 18th century were more iniquitous, or brought greater woe on the population of Ireland than the landlord system of the 19th century. We are very astonished that a Coercion Bill should have been brought in in the year 1846, when the Devos Commission had just reported, and when the astounding evidence of that Commission ought to have been deep in all men's minds. We are amazed that the Parliament of that day, and the Leaders of Parties in that day, could think of nothing better than a Coercion Bill. But are we sure that we are acting more wisely to-day in this House than our forefathers acted then? I do not wish to leave off with any particularly bad language against the Irish landlords. I do not want to introduce at this very early stage what is only too likely to be a protracted discussion anything like passion. But I must point out finally what is in my view the object of the legislation which the right hon. Gentleman is about to propose, and the acceptance of which will mark an unwisdom compared with which that of any generation of our forefathers will be alight. Sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the evidence of Captain Hamilton. Captain Hamilton, as many hon. Gentlemen know, is the chief director of the Landlords' Defence Association. What he says is this:—

"His view was"—they are most remarkable words—"that in dealing with the tenants there should be no door of hope. If the man goes out he should only be able to come back again on making terms with his landlord. The whole cause of the troubles and evictions is the idea that is in the minds of the Resident Magistrates and others who go in charge that they are to settle between the landlord and tenant. At nearly every eviction the Divisional Magistrate and Resident Magistrate, and very often the District Inspector, all bear down upon the landlords' representative the moment he goes in, to make terms with the tenant, and, as it were, put themselves on the side of the tenant as against the landlord. I have never seen trouble at an eviction that has not been caused by delay and that idea among the people. My plan has always been to take one or two of the tenants and evict absolutely, but there must be no settlement except through the solicitor, and probably if that idea was carried out, and the duty of the Resident Magistrate was simply to preserve order, there would be no trouble about evictions; and I think that is doing a great deal of mischief at the present time, because the people are taught that the Government are on the side of the tenants against the landlords, and you cannot get that out of their heads."

What he wants us to get into their heads is, I suppose, that the Government is on the side of the landlords. This, Sir, is a Bill for placing the Government on the side of the landlords, and in Captain Hamilton's very expressive words, it is a Bill for shutting the door of hope. I do not say that I would never in any circumstances or in any emergency or in any crisis assent to increasing the stringency of criminal procedure either in Ireland or anywhere else. This I do say; considering the just odium with which exceptional criminal legislation has come to be surrounded in Ireland, I would put it off to the extreme moment. I would be very sure that the emergency was so perilous, the crisis so pressing, and the circumstances so overwhelming in their character, that no other less costly or less perilous instrument would enable me to grapple with it. Sir, I am expressing my deliberate conviction when I say there has never been a more wanton, a more gratuitous, and a more unjustifiable resort than on this present occasion to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) once called "the ever-failing and ever-poisonous remedy of coercion." I do not deny for a moment that the Executive are bound to enforce the law. But we who are Members of the Legislature are bound, when we are deliberating on these great issues of policy, to see that the law is brought into harmony with the just claims of honest and industrious men. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to set aside the business of the Nation in favour of a measure for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland, whilst no effectual security has been taken against the abuse of the Law by the exaction of excessive rents."—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): In rising to reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I find myself under the necessity of asking from the House even a greater measure of that kindness and indulgence which they have often been pleased to extend to me, for I speak under considerable difficulties on this occasion. It was only about 24 hours ago that the right hon. Gentleman gave Notice of this Amendment. I make no complaint. I merely state the fact. Since that time, Sir, I was in the House till a quarter to 4 this morning, and I had to return at 10.30, and had to make two speeches before breakfast. The House did not rise till past 1.30, and at 1 there was a Cabinet. In these circumstances, the House will understand that I approach the consideration of a large, complicated, and difficult question under conditions less favourable than usually attend a Minister of the Crown replying to what is in reality a Vote of Want of Confidence in the Government. The right hon. Gentleman has, I suppose, got some scheme in his head to deal with the present difficulty which he alleges to exist with regard to the payment of rent in Ireland. To that scheme, whatever it is, he has made no reference from one end to the other of a long speech. What he has referred to are measures which we propose to bring in, which he has not seen, of which he knows nothing, but which he criticizes in advance with no possibility of knowing whether when he does see them they will or will not deserve the strictures which he has passed upon them. As an illustration of that position, I recollect that the right hon. Gentleman began his speech by giving us his views as to the precise area in Ireland which was, in his opinion, disturbed, and which, he said, was a very limited area. I do not mean to criticize those views now. But how does the right hon. Gentleman know that if the disturbed area is limited, our Bill is not limited too? There are parts of Ireland, as the House perfectly well knows, in which law is at this moment as well obeyed as in any part of the United Kingdom. But if the right hon. Gentleman supposes that is a scintilla of argument against our Bill for restoring law and order in those parts which are disturbed, I feel myself unable to agree with him. The right hon. Gentleman not having heard the case of the Government considers, I suppose, that he is peculiarly well qualified to criticize their acts and to give his view as to the exact amount of disturbance which does exist in Ireland. I am not going into that question now, and I shall reserve my defence of the Bill which we are going to introduce until that Bill is before the House. But I may remind the right hon. Gentleman, who places so much reliance upon statistics of crime as affording proof or disproof of the necessity for a Criminal Law Amendment Bill—I may remind him of the words of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). [Home Rule Cries of "Oh!" and cheers.] Since when have hon. Members opposite learnt to treat quotations from the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman with derision and contempt? In introducing one of his Coercion Bills the right hon. Gentleman used these words—

"We have never said that the amount of this crime, taken by itself, was the basis of our propositions. That is not the case. You must consider the amount of crime in conjunction with its source, with its character, with what it indicates, and what it means."—(3 Hansard, [257] 1897.)

That which was the view of the right hon. Gentleman in 1881 is the view of Her Majesty's Government now, and that is all which I think it necessary to say upon the condition of Ireland as far as crime is concerned. It is an unpleasant and a melancholy subject upon which I shall have to detain the House before long at no inconsiderable length. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley) based a large part of his argument upon the extreme difficulty of paying rents owing to the fall in prices. Now, if my memory serves me right, the reduction in rents consequent on the fall in prices is estimated in the most recent decisions of the Land Court at between 14 and 18 per cent. Let us take 16 per cent as the mean figure between these two extremes. Now, 16 per cent is about one-sixth part of the rent, and while I do not say that a rent which is one-sixth too high is not a rent which ought to be altered, I do say that the fact that some rents are too high by so much is not a reason for a social revolution. If the right hon. Member is going to apply a parallel rule in every part of the United Kingdom to every suffering interest, this country will be landed in a chaos such as no civilized country has ever been landed in before. I suppose right hon. Gentlemen opposite have not so far thrown over the Land Act of 1881 as to suppose that rents now fixed, or which were fixed before the agricultural crisis, are grossly unjust. Just before I came down to the House I looked at some statistics with regard to evictions, and made some hasty calculations. There were in the last quarter of last year 522 cases of eviction. Of these under 50 were for less than one and a half-year's arrears of rent. The remainder were for arrears varying from one and a half-year's rent to 10 years' rent. The total number evicted for owing more than one and a half-year's rent was 456. Of these only 132 were judicial rents. Therefore, of the tenants evicted for non-payment of rents due for more than one and a half year, no fewer than 324 were evicted for non-payment of non-judicial rents, and every one of those tenants could have gone into Court and had a judicial rent fixed. [Home Rule laughter and cheers.] Is that proposition denied? [Cries of "Yes!"] On what ground? Am I to understand that the Act of 1881 is, in the opinion of its authors, not only a total failure on account of the length of the period fixed, but also because the tenants who have a right to go into Court cannot or will not do so? If my calculation is et, it will go far to prove that it is true with reference to the majority of tenants, that they are due to the fact that judicial rents were fixed at a time when prices were different from what they are now. When you consider that there were only 132 cases of eviction in which the arrears were for more than a year and a-half—and in which the rents were judicial rents—you must consider also that only one-fifth of these tenants will have been finally turned out of their holdings. That greatly reduces the magnitude and proportion of the grievance on account of which the right hon. Gentleman wishes to disturb the settlement solemnly made in 1881. Before I pass from that part of the subject, let me say a word with reference to the attack made by the right hon. Gentleman upon the Irish landlords. Of course, we need no prophet to tell us that there are bad landlords in Ireland; we need no carefully-prepared and elaborate Reports to prove to us that where there are 500,000 tenants some rents will be too high. Of course, some are too high; but, on the other hand, some rents are too low. Are right hon. Gentlemen so sanguine that they conceive you will be able to have a system which works with such absolute mathematical exactness that when you have a vast number of transactions to deal with, everyone of those transactions shall be exactly in accordance with the dictates of conscience and of the most strict morality? The country and the system have not been found, nor ever will, while human nature remains as it is, in which you can hope to have a perfection such as I have vindicated. I turn to another part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. He told us that he and his Friends had been occupied ever since this Parliament met in pressing the claims of tenants whose rents were judicially fixed before the fall in prices for some reconsideration of the bargain which the State enforced on them. Ever since this Parliament met he has been taking that course, and ever since this Parliament met he has been in Opposition. But the crisis began in 1884, and prices were as low as they are now in 1885 and 1886. During a large part of that time the right hon. Gentleman was in Office. When did he first think of carrying out the scheme which he now thinks so absolutely necessary? Was the case of the Irish tenants not pressed upon the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends by hon. Members from Ireland below the Opposition Gangway?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: The first vote I ever gave was in 1883 in favour of the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell).

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am only alluding to the right hon. Gentleman in the character of spokesman for the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian and the right hon. Gentlemen who sit near him. The right hon. Gentleman told us that ever since this Parliament met he had been pressing the claims of the tenants to a reconsideration of the bargain made for them in 1881. But why did he only begin to do this when in Opposition? The evil, so far as it is an evil, is one which has existed ever since the fall in prices—in other words, since the beginning of 1885. The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends cannot claim that the case was not pressed upon them at a time when they could have dealt with it. In January, 1886, the hon. Member for Cork brought forward his case and made almost the same speech which he made last autumn when right hon. Gentlemen came from all parts of the country to support him. The hon. Member for Cork said that the condition of the Irish tenants was desperate in consequence of such a reduction in the prices of agricultural produce as had not been known for many years. Was he to understand that the excuse which was about to be made for their inaction by right hon. Members opposite was that the speech of the hon. Member for Cork was made five days before the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) came into Office? Did right hon. Gentlemen hold that that fact entitled them to treat the speech of the hon. Member for Cork as if it had not been delivered?

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I do not know whether it is necessary to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the speech to which he refers was delivered at a moment when coercion was threatened by the Conservative Government.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no objection to the interruption of the hon. Gentleman, though I think it is hardly relevant, unless I am to understand that the hon. Gentleman does not consider that he is bound to a statement of fact made in opposition to a Conservative Government which brings in a Coercion Bill. He made the statement, and pressed it upon the House as true; and, therefore, I ask why did not right hon. Gentlemen opposite take up the case and deal with it in their own manner? [An hon. MEMBER: They did.] I think I heard some hon. Gentleman say that they did deal with it. That is perfectly true; but in what manner? What they proposed was that Irish land should be bought from the Irish landlords for the Irish tenants, and at a valuation based on the rents fixed in 1881. ["No, no!"] It is true that that was in 1885; but the rent in 1885 was in many cases the rent fixed in 1881. The right hon. Gentleman opposite took the rent fixed in 1881 as the basis on which he asks the British taxpayers to lend £160,000,000. I do not wonder at the hesitation which the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends have shown in becoming converts to the doctrine of the hon. Member for Cork, because their conversion is the most humiliating confession of their failure with regard to the Irish Land Question ever forced from any Administration. In 1881 they solemnly passed an Act establishing contracts in regard to rent for 15 years, and before that Act has been six years in force you say that these contracts must be broken. Nor can right hon. Gentlemen opposite say they had no warning. I myself, in the debate that took place on the Land Bill of 1881, called attention to the danger that there was in establishing contracts for 15 years in view of the possible fall in prices. I turn now to what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle called the central part of his argument; and what is it? It is that in all cases of this kind, before you make the Criminal Law, as he calls it, more stringent, and, as I term it, more perfectly adapted to the end of punishing crime, you ought to pass remedial measures, according to the old formula, to which I have not the slightest objection. Remedial measures should precede repression. I consider that formula a most valuable truth, if it is properly limited and properly understood. Let me remind the House that my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury has informed the House that we intend, not in the dim and distant future, but in the immediate future, to bring in a Bill in "another place," where work can be more expeditiously transacted; and we intend, as quickly as possible, to carry our views into effect. I do not know whether I shall be in Order in indicating very faintly what those views are. We consider that, under the circumstances, two Bills will be necessary. The first Bill will not alter—and does not profess to alter profoundly—the system established by the right hon. Gentleman in 1881; but we think it will make the working of that system more smooth, more equitable, and more beneficial to all concerned in the great agricultural interests of Ireland. The Bill, among other things, will deal with leases, and give to the tenant some equitable relief such as was given to debtors in the Bankruptcy Act of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). It will have other provisions which we think of a valuable kind. But we do not suppose that a Bill of these comparatively humble proportions can possibly solve the great Irish Land Question. That question, we believe, and we have always believed, can only be solved by a large measure dealing with purchase. ["Oh!"] Every Party in the House and every section of every Party is, I think, agreed on this. ["No no!"] Well, with the exception of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). That measure, as may be conjectured, is of too large proportions to be passed immediately unless hon. Gentlemen opposite are prepared to pursue very different tactics with regard to the Business of the House from those with which we have been made painfully familiar this Session. We shall be ready to bring in that Bill as soon as they are ready to allow that Bill to be discussed. Having thus stated in the rudest and barest outline—for I should not be justified in going more into details—the remedial measures which we propose to bring in, let me meet directly the argument that these measures ought to precede the criminal measure for which we are now asking urgency. I do not think there is a single man in this House who knows what he is saying who will not admit that the prime necessity in every society is that the law shall be effective. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite

cannot for a moment doubt that the primary necessity for society is a stable and acknowledged system of law. If that be admitted, I, on my side, am ready to admit that if you can get your law effective, not by increasing its stringency or altering its machinery, but by remedial legislation, you had better do so. If the effect of passing our Land Bills or any Land Bill would lead to such a change that juries would cease to be intimidated, and that witnesses would come forward and give their evidence—then every one of my Colleagues would hasten to bring forward such a measure. [Cries of 'Try it!'] But what chance is there that if we put off this Criminal Bill, when Ireland is weekly going from bad to worse, when society is crumbling into its original atoms, we shall restore the sanctity of contract and respect for law by introducing any Land Bill? The hope that now exists, provided we take measures in time, would be finally destroyed, and it would be useless to try and battle with the forces of anarchy. We should have to give up the task in despair. The right hon. Gentleman based his argument upon the view that the Land League—I have used the wrong alias, I mean the National League—corresponded with and resembled a combination of trade unionists in England for obtaining fair and equitable terms from their masters. But that is a total misconception. Since when have the Opposition come over to the doctrine that the National League is this innocent form of trades union, organized in order to obtain for the tenants fair and equitable terms? I have not taken the trouble of reading the cartloads of speeches in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) denounced the Land League, which, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, is the same thing as the National League except in name. In 1881 the right hon. Gentleman said that the Land League organization was “really Fenian in its character”—in other words, that it was a treasonable organization which carried out its treasonable designs by murder and outrage. Is the right hon. Gentleman and are his Friends converted to the idea that the National League has cast off its “original sin” and has come out in the new guise of an innocent combination, with no other object than to enable tenants who were asked to pay an excessive rent to resist their landlords? Have right hon. Gentlemen studied the recent speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite who sit for Irish constituencies? One speaker had said that the time would come when rent would be abolished altogether, not all at once, but step by step. Is that the advice of an innocent combination to enable tenants to exact a fair rent? In November last, another speaker said—

“We are not only working to abolish the landlords; we are also working for the holy cause of Irish nationality, and if to-morrow every landlord were swept out of the country, we still should have to work in order to realize the dream of the Irish martyrs in the past to make Ireland a nation with her own flag among the nations of the world.”

I could multiply quotations such as these; but they are sufficient to prove my propositions, which are these—in the first place, that the League aims at political objects wholly alien—in my opinion treasonable—to the question of a combination for the purpose of exacting a fair rent; and, in the second place, that it aims at these treasonable ends by the spoliation of one particular class—those who support the Union. If these propositions are true—and they were believed to be true by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby one year ago, and they are proved to be true by the quotations of speeches made only a few months ago—then what becomes of the contention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle that we are here dealing with an innocent trade union organization. The truth is that the source of our disorders is not the exaction of extreme rents by the landlords. The tenants of Ulster and the leaseholders of Ulster are in some ways more hardly treated than any other tenants in Ireland. The case of the leaseholders of Ulster was before the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman opposite Session after Session in 1882, and they never lifted a little finger to relieve them. The case is, in my opinion, far harder than that of any other tenants in Ireland; but they have not, under the temptation which the right hon. Gentleman thinks adequate to justify a socialistic revolution, engaged in any of these nefarious schemes. I shall often have to talk of the National League, but there is one epithet which fell from the right hon. Gentleman opposite to which I must call attention now. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of it as a spontaneous combination of the tenants of Ireland. Sir, is the right hon. Gentleman so ignorant of the country which, not eight months ago, he was occupied in governing, as not to know the species of terrorism by which the tenant is brought into the network of this organization, from which he only longs to be free as soon as the law will allow him to free himself with impunity? My first answer, therefore, to the question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite as to why we did not bring in remedial measures before criminal measures, is that to do so would not have had the effect which he thinks it would have had—namely, to restore respect for law and order in Ireland, to enable peaceable men to go about their business in peace, to give freedom under the law, and to enable the Courts of Law to carry out the law of the country. But I have another argument in favour of the course which we propose to pursue. Not only would the order which the right hon. Gentleman proposes with regard to our measures fail in its effect, but if we were to follow his advice and put off day after day the measure which we think necessary to restore respect for the law, it would render the effect of every future remedial measure absolutely nugatory, and destroy at its very source and beginning every hope of a better state of things for the Irish tenantry. I have already told the House that the Government are of opinion that the only hope for the ultimate settlement and solution of the Irish Land Question is a scheme of purchase. What hope would there be of the success of any scheme of purchase if, at the bidding of an agitation like this, you broke a solemn contract entered into only five years ago? Would any tenant in Ireland believe that a settlement guaranteed by Parliamentary pledges would be a lasting one, and if any tenant in Ireland did believe that, would he not be an idiot to believe it; would he not be a fool, in the face of what Parliament has done, in the face of the readiness of Parliament to stultify itself; would he not be a fool if he believed that the contract which he entered into with the State would be a final contract, and that it would not be in his power by using the same machinery of agitation which had been so often found effective in the past to wring what new terms he chose out of the British Government and the British taxpayer? It is because I know that if you begin now; if you precede the restoration of law and order by what you call remedial measures, every tenant in Ireland will believe that he has only to go upon the same lines which they have been pursuing, and the property of every landlord will be whittled down, and that ultimately by slow but sure degrees he will get his land for nothing. This is the creed, and these are the sentiments, preached by hon. Members opposite in Ireland. Is that the policy of the legitimate Opposition? If it is not, I wish to ask how they can possibly justify this alteration in Parliamentary policy adumbrated in the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman opposite? I speak as one of a Government determined to preserve the Union, and possibly many may have thought that the arguments I have used can only be properly addressed to those who agree with me in that broad policy which we think ought to guide the common destinies of the two countries. But, Sir, that is not my opinion. I believe that every man in this House who wishes to stop short of absolute separation is perfectly mad if he follows the policy suggested by the right hon. Gentleman in his Resolution. [Opposition cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Withdraw!"] I do not think there is anything disorderly in using the word mad; but if the delicate sensibilities of hon. Members opposite are offended, I will say that any such man must be singularly unwise if he follows that policy, because every scheme which the ingenuity of man can suggest which stops short of absolute separation involves some kind of arrangement and some kind of bargain between the people of Ireland and the people of England. If in your madness—[Cries of "Order!"]

—well, if in your folly you break the contract entered into by Parliament in the most solemn manner, how can you possibly imagine that the great international contract which some of you desire will remain inviolate a moment longer than suits the convenience of hon. Members opposite? Of course the screw will be put on then as now. The people of Ireland from one end to the other would know that however firmly you have appeared to put your foot down, the smallest touch will shake you from your balance; and with that conviction deeply rooted in their mind, do not suppose that any arrangement that you may enter into—fence it round with all the securities you like—can possibly cause you to pause for more than a few brief years at any point on the inclined plane down which you will inevitably slide towards absolute separation, if you once leave the present united Constitution of this Empire. For these reasons, not certainly in the interests of the landlords, not even in the interests of the Unionist Party, but in the interests of every man in this House who desires some kind of link to be kept up between England and Ireland, I earnestly press the House not to accept the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, and to allow us as soon as may be to take those steps which we think necessary for the restoration of law and order in Ireland.

Mr. ALLISON (Cumberland, Eskdale) said, the Report of the Royal Commission amply justified every one of the allegations made by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) last autumn as to the necessity of reducing agricultural rents in Ireland. He had to complain that now that the Commission had reported the Government took no notice of the Report, but were proceeding on the old path of coercion, which had so often failed before, and which he predicted would undoubtedly fail again. The Report contained a lesson for their Liberal Unionist Friends. If any Party insisted more than another on public platforms in this country upon the duty of remedial measures it was the Liberal Unionist Party. They constantly spoke of the manner in which this Parliament could redress the grievances of Ireland, and said a great many things could be done by this Parliament better even than by an Irish Parliament. Instead, however, of proceeding to assist in redressing grievances the Liberal Unionists intended, it seemed, to support those measures of the Government which were intended to put down agitation sprung from the very grievances which the Royal Commission had exposed. They were told that the land measure would be produced almost immediately. That was rather a vague phrase, and he should like to know how far the "almost" was to qualify the "immediately." It was, it appeared, to be produced in "another place," where land measures had been known to fail before, but where he doubted not the Coercion Bill would go through quickly enough. If one thing could make the Government's policy more suicidal than another it would be the idea of attempting to put down the National League after the statement of their special Commissioner, Sir Redvers Buller, who had declared that the "great majority of the Irish people thought the National League had been their salvation." The tenants were right in their supposition. He challenged denial of the statement that there was not a single concession but had been wrung from reluctant landowners by the operations of the League and the agitations it had set afoot. In the face of the Report he could not conceive any body of men "mad enough" to go forward with a policy of coercion at the present time. He confessed, after the promises which had been given deliberately to the people of Ireland, it was simple madness to abandon those promises and resort to a policy of coercion, which had failed in the past, and which he was certain would fail in the future.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN (Kent, Isle of Thanet), said, in answer to the challenge of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Allison), he would point out one Act which had not been got from the Government by the action of the Land League—he alluded to the first Act under which the relations between landlord and tenant was first disturbed in Ireland—the Land Act of 1870; for he would remind hon. Members opposite that at that time, thank God, neither the Land League nor the National League existed. He did not believe for a moment that that Act had been extorted by the Clerkenwell outrage or the Manchester murder. The hon. Member referred to Mr. M'Carthy as an absolute judge of the state of Ireland. With respect to the action of Lord Ashbourne's Act, that gentleman might be a good judge in his way; he was a solicitor in practice in a small town in the South of Ireland; but he could not agree that he knew more about the land question than the landlords. Mr. M'Carthy was a Sub-Commissioner under the Act, confined mostly to his office or Court; but the landlords heard all that was going on. He (Colonel King-Harman) considered that the attack made on the landlords by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) was uncalled for, cruel, and unjust; and when the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the landlords as a body oppressing the poor, he must remind him that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), on a memorable occasion, declared that the Irish landlords had been tried, and that they had not been found blameworthy. Ireland was now organized from one end to the other by the National League against English rule, against loyalty, law, and order; and men, through fear of the power of the League, led the life of dogs, hunted and boycotted. Talk about evictions by landlords, had there ever been an eviction so cruel as the case of the Misses Curtin—driven out of the country by the hell-hounds of the League because they nobly stood up to defend their father from the assassins of the League, paid by American dollars? [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen thought this a laughing matter? Was it a laughing matter to drag a girl out by the hair, and pour tar on her head? It might be a laughing matter to those who knew more, thank God, than he did how those things were got up. Any man who stood up for what he conceived to be his duty in Ireland was made to suffer for it. In the course of his speech, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley) had referred to the state of Ireland in 1846, when Lord John Russell and Mr. Cobden were taking a leading part in Irish affairs. True, Ireland was in a fearful condition then. But in that year no remedial measures had been passed, the deepest distress existed, famine stalked the land, the people were poor, and the emigrant ships were leaving Ireland with thousands of emigrants, many of whom died. Now, however, matters were different. There was more money deposited in Irish Savings Banks now than there ever had been. The Dublin Stocks were largely invested in, but not by the landlords, because the National League took care that the Irish landlords received no money. The League coerced the people, and were it not for the League they would be as peaceful and as law-abiding as the people of any other part of the Three Kingdoms. Those who had been murdered, wounded, and terrorized over were not of the landlord class. The landlords were pretty well able to take care of themselves, as they had done up to the present time; but they were of the tenant class, and the nefarious combination which had been spoken of in such laudable terms was not intended to protect but to coerce the tenant. The majority of the tenants of Ireland wished to pay their rents honestly when they could do so; but in thousands of cases they had been prevented from doing it by the system of tyranny which overshadowed and controlled them. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted from the evidence of Sir Redvers Buller. Now, he admitted that Sir Redvers Buller was an able and a gallant soldier, but he was unaware that that officer had had sufficiently long and wide experience of land and of the value of land to be able to give a standard opinion on the subject. This he did know—that on one occasion, when Sir Redvers Buller was talking to a landlord friend of his in the County Kerry about land matters, he pointed to a field belonging to the landlord and said, "Your land is over-rented. You are charging 25s. an acre for that land, while only 21s. would be charged in England." The landlord asked him whether he knew that there was any difference between an English acre and an Irish acre. "No," said Sir Redvers Buller; "is there any difference?" The landlord told him how much larger an Irish acre was than an English acre, and showed him that this would far more than account for the difference in price. So much, then, for the evidence of Sir Redvers Buller in regard to land questions; the right hon. Gentleman was quite welcome to what he could get out of it to strengthen his case. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary next said that all the Irish legislation that had been passed of late years had been against the tenants, and he intimated that hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House were always harping for increased powers in favour of the landlords. He emphatically denied both assertions. What the Government were now asking for were increased powers in favour of maintaining law and order—powers which landlord, tenants, and all classes alike in

Colonel King-Harman

Ireland would have to submit to and obey. As to legislation for the landlords, he would ask whether any law was ever enacted which weighed more heavily on any class than the Act of 1881 weighed on the landlords of Ireland, both in regard to their power and their pockets. It was a law which would never have been passed in any foreign country, and he was certain it would not have been passed by England for Englishmen. In respect of the evidence of Mr. Dickson, all he would say was that that gentleman told a different story now, when he wanted to get into the House as a National Leaguer, to that which he gave when he was the Liberal Member for Tyrone. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of landlords giving time to their tenants to pay. Doubtless there were bad landlords, just as there were bad men in every class; but, as a rule, the landlords of Ireland have not been such fools as to refuse to give time wherever and whenever it could be reasonably granted. In their own interests they had done so, and would continue to do so. The right hon. Gentleman wound up his speech with a remark in which he entirely concurred. He said that we wanted to protect the good, honest tenants from the ruffians. Just so. They believed the majority of the tenants to be good and honest men, but that those tenants were tyrannized over by a body of lawless ruffians who were subsidized by American dollars; and they wanted to protect the honest, law-abiding men from those whom the late Mr. Forster termed "the village ruffians." With respect to rent and prices, he might remark that Griffith's valuation in 1854 was made for a basis of taxation and not for rent. The valuation was 25 per cent below what he considered to be the value of the rent, and when the agitation was first begun the cry all over Ireland was for Griffith's valuation. Moreover, prices in 1852, 1853, and 1854 were considerably lower than they were at the present time. For example, in 1852, in the part of the country to which he belonged, milch cows sold for £8 to £14; at Boyle Fair, in March last, similar animals sold for £10 to £19; in 1852 two-year-olds sold for £4 to £8 10s.; at Boyle Fair for £8 to £11; in 1852 one-year-olds fetched £2 10s. to £3 10s.; at the Fair referred to £4 to £7; in 1852 lambs made from 18s. to 26s. each; at Boyle Fair in March 36s. to 42s. was obtained. He was entitled to argue from this that in regard to Griffith's valuation, tenants did not now pay too high rents, at all events in the part of the country he referred to; still, the Sub-Commissioners made a considerable reduction below what Sir Robert Griffith deemed a fair valuation in 1854. When the prices of produce rose, landlords did not raise their rents in anything like the same proportion; and, therefore, when prices fell, rents ought not to be lowered to a ridiculous extent. He should be as slow as anyone to ask for a measure of coercion; but when he saw honest and law-abiding people unable to follow their lawful vocations, the whole country disturbed, and much-needed capital being driven out by the action of a few lawless men, and when he saw that—because juries were terrorized, verdicts could not be found and ruffians could not be punished—he felt it was time to ask the House to strengthen the hands of the Executive in such a manner that justice should be done speedily and surely, so that Ireland might be saved from the worst oppressors and the greatest destroyers that ever ruined any country.

Mr. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) said, that possibly the fact that the Land Commissioners had reduced considerably the rents of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman's) tenants, accounted for that hon. Gentleman's opposition to the Land Act of 1881. Was not the fact that the Commissioners had reduced the rents by 45 per cent a sufficient proof that rents were too high before? That seemed to him to be the case, especially as Lord Cowper's Commission reported that in many parts of the country rents were still 17 or 18 per cent too high. Our troubles in Ireland had mainly been produced by the oppressive conduct of the landlords; and when the right hon. Gentleman asked them to believe that the Irish landlords had never done anything wrong, he put a strain on their credulity which it would not bear. The value of the land of Ireland had been mainly created by the tenants, who had not received the reward of their labour, but had, on the contrary, seen its results confiscated by the landlords. The Act of 1881 perpetuated the feeling that it was a very great wrong; but it was to expect too much to think the Act would remove the stain of centuries, the removal of which must be a gradual process. Why, every west wind of the last few centuries had roached England laden with sighs, sorrows, and tears, and he rejoiced that he had lived in a time when the Liberal Party had made strong efforts to wipe out these sorrows and lessen these tears. Notwithstanding their position, he could see that circumstances were working in favour of the Irish tenant. Before long we should see still greater remedial measures passed for Ireland; and he had strong hope that he should live to see the day when Ireland would be cemented to England, not by force, but affection; not by law, but love. Listening to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), he (Mr. Handel Cossham) came to the conclusion that the Tory Party had no solution of the Irish problem to offer but the old-tried and found-wanting system of coercion, and he looked to see the early retirement of the Tory Party from Office—and the earlier the better. Errors might have been made by the National League. Organizations of the kind were prone to err; but recollect what reform that organization had accomplished. Had it not been for organization the English ports would have been shut against foreign corn. Force was no remedy. The people of Ireland held to their right to live on their native soil, and the world being made for the many not the few—their claims could not be denied. The Government had got as far as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) had six years ago; and even yet he did not lose hope that strenuous persuasion might induce the Government to retrace their steps along the mischievous road of coercion.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) said, I have listened this evening with very great care to the remarks that fell from the Chief Secretary for Ireland in reply to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley). I must say that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland in case before this House able clearness and force, following him so careful remarks was to discover, grounds upon which Her Government rely in coming House a second time this asking hon. Members to at their disposal the whole House. I confess, Sir, reason that I was able was that the right hon. G sidered that as a Member ment it was his duty to Union. coercive measure is introduced. House for Ireland until some measure has been adopted by Her Majesty's Government. If Her Majesty's present Advisers had deemed it expedient to introduce remedial measures, I should not have hesitated to give every assistance it was in my power to give in carrying their remedial measures successfully through this House. But when they come down to the House and tell us that their only remedy for Ireland is to increase the stringency of the Criminal Law in that country, then I at once unhesitatingly refuse to sanction that policy, and to step up to the time of the House to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Why do I hesitate, Sir, to place at the disposal of the Government the whole time of the House? Why, there are industrial questions that are ripe for solution—questions that affect most closely and deeply the industrial classes of the country. No one Member of this House could be more painfully aware of the urgency of these questions than I am myself. I have the honour to represent in this House a constituency amongst whom considerable suffering exists to-day on account of certain industrial restrictions that are placed upon the product of their labour; and I and my Friends have been anxiously awaiting and wishing for an opportunity to discuss these questions in this House, and to bring under the notice of Her Majesty's Government questions that affect most closely the working classes of this country, and we have not had up to the present moment an opportunity of so doing. And with these questions ripe for solution, and demanding the immediate attention of the Government, we are asked to sacrifice the time of the House to Her Majesty's present Advisers, in order that the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland may be increased. If the Government, I repeat, are prepared to introduce remedial measures, based on the recommendations of their own Commission, to alleviate the condition of the suffering tenants in Ireland, however sincerely we may desire the passing of industrial measures, I am prepared to say that the working classes of this country are prepared to waive their claims on the attention of the Government, if the Government will give to the House an assurance that, instead of a measure of coercion, they will at once proceed with remedial measures for Ireland. Coercion, Sir, has been tried in the past, and admittedly has failed—admitted by Her Majesty's present Advisers. In 1885 they resolved to rely on Constitutional law—the ordinary law—for the maintenance of social order in Ireland. Why, then, do they now revert to the old policy of coercion? If they had been successful in the Election of 1885, when they had behind them the full strength of the Irish vote, they would not now be asking us to increase the stringency of the law in Ireland. The full strength of that Irish vote was given against the Liberal Members. Its full strength was given against me in my constituency at that time; but, notwithstanding the strength of the vote being given against me, I then pledged myself in favour of Home Rule. The problem that the Government has to solve to-day is still the problem laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in 1885. The right hon. Gentleman said the problem we had to solve was the conciliation of the national sentiment of the Irish people. That is still the problem that remains unsolved; and if Her Majesty's Government expect that they will be able to solve it by an increase of the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland, I venture to predict for their action an ignominious failure. I would remind them that law and order can only be maintained in Ireland by Constitutional means, and I would assure them that, if they will at once set themselves to pass remedial measures, they may hope to earn the gratitude of the Irish people, and hope to make this year of Jubilee one of real and true union between the people of Great Britain and Ireland.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): I would congratulate Her Majesty's Government, when bringing in the measure to strengthen the law, in not having hesitated to shadow forth their intention of dealing with the Land Question in Ireland, and I believe that, by the policy they are about to pursue, they will not only give security to Ireland generally, but will be giving security to the labourer there to earn his livelihood. We must recollect, in speaking of the landlords of Ireland, how little many of them are masters of their own estates. If these estates were mortgaged as were estates in Great Britain, the probability would be that they were mortgaged at one-third, or possibly 40 per cent, before the judicial rents were fixed. These judicial rents lowered the value by 20 per cent, so that little margin, if any, was left to the landlord; and, depend upon it, over a great part of Ireland the landlord is hardly a free agent. But, while I would urge upon Her Majesty's Government to persevere in grappling with the Land Question, as they have shown it to be their intention to grapple with it, I would earnestly ask them to turn their attention to another matter about which I must say that, as a listener in this House, I entertain the strongest opinions. I firmly believe that when the history of our time comes to be written that this Irish Question which looms so large and separate to our eyes will be regarded as the first acute symptom of the congestion of population in the British Isles. Our population is now 37,000,000, which is within a million or two of that of France. In order to feed our large towns we have to allow bread to be imported free, and a very good thing too; but the effect of that has been to depopulate our agricultural districts. There has been less land ploughed up, less crops, and many of those crops which have been gathered have been gathered by mowing machines and reaping machines. Ireland has felt this more even than our agricultural counties. Irishmen used to flock over to this country in large numbers, and used to carry back to their little holdings large sums of money, having lived, while working here, on the smallest amount of sustenance. These means of earning money have been cut off, and not only have the Irish lost that, but they have lost the power of labouring in our large towns to the extent to which they used to. Many of the agricultural labourers in our country districts here now flock into the towns, and are unable to find employment in them; consequently the Irishmen who now come over meet with their competition. All this, depend upon it, has affected Ireland most severely, and if you will trace the history of that country you will find her downward progress began in 1846, after those two years of the potatoe famine. You will observe a depletion of population, and that, notwithstanding that there has been no proper system of emigration. The system of emigration—if it can be called a system—has been the departure of the least fit. The men who have left Ireland have departed from their native land for America, Australia or some other Colony as best they could, almost like men who have been pushed overboard from the deck of a crowded vessel. No wonder there has been disaffection in Ireland; but you may depend upon it that disaffection has been caused in this way, and has had its root in poverty. I recollect being told years ago by a distinguished Irishman that poverty was at the root of Irish disaffection. I believe that to be the case, and I would therefore strongly urge upon Her Majesty's Government to consider the advisability of adopting some system of State-directed Colonization, not only for Ireland, but for the United Kingdom generally.—

MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. and gallant Member; but the point before the House now is whether or no the House shall give precedence to the consideration of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, whilst no effectual security has been taken against the abuse of the law by the exaction of excessive rent. The general question of the condition of Ireland is not before the House.

COLONEL BLUNDELL: I believe, Sir, that Her Majesty's Government, in grappling with the Irish Land Question, will give security against the exaction of excessive rents. When the Irishman feels he can own his bit of land he will work with much greater will than when he feels that the product of his labour is not his own, and that a bad season may make it impossible for him to pay the rent of his holding. I will say no more on that subject, but will urge the Government to persevere and to bring forward both their measures contemporaneously, and to persevere with them; and I firmly believe that if the Government will do that the country will support them, and that this year will yet prove a year of peace for the United Kingdom.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I think the House will be of opinion, at all events those of us who sit on this side of the House, that we have listened to a very remarkable speech this evening from the First Lord of the Treasury. There have been many occasions when the House of Commons has been invited to give precedence and to grant urgency for the introduction of Bills of the character of that contemplated by the Government in respect to Ireland; but I venture to say that any person will search the Records of the House without success to find any such request made as inadequately as was the right hon. Gentleman's this evening. Not only were the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury of the briefest possible nature; but I venture to assert with confidence that when they come to be read to-morrow morning, no one will find in them any facts or arguments warranting the tremendous conclusion that he asks us to arrive at in the Motion that he has submitted to us. On the other hand, I think that no one can have listened to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, whether sitting on this side of the House or on the other, but will admit that his speech from beginning to end was full of facts and saturated with argument such as we expect from such a quarter on a matter of this kind. I am not now dealing with the correctness of these facts, or the soundness of the arguments; but I maintain that no hon. Member on the other side of the House will be able to go through the right hon. Gentleman's speech to-morrow and say that it was devoid of fact and wanting in argument like that of the First Lord of the Treasury. The Bill that has been shadowed forth this evening by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant is, according to the Notice Paper, "to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of crime in Ireland." Well, now, crime in this connection always means crime which springs out of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland. Now, it is a remarkable fact, as the House will be aware, that in Her Majesty's Speech we are emphatically told that great crime has decreased in Ireland; but I find, on reference to the figures that have been supplied to Members, that the word "great" might have been dropped out of them, for crime—that is to say, agrarian crime, which is the only description of crime we are speaking of at this moment—has largely decreased in Ireland. For the last three months of 1885 there were

279 agrarian offences committed in that country; but during the last three months of 1886 they have fallen to 166, which is not far short of a half, and this, Sir, in spite of an increase in that which is always the parent of crime in Ireland, and always will be the parent of crime in Ireland so long as it continues—namely, evictions. Whereas the number of crimes fell to nearly half, the persons evicted during the last six months of 1885 numbered 5,470, and in the last six months of 1886 had increased to 9,295. So that whereas evictions nearly doubled, crime fell to nearly one-half. That, I maintain, is a remarkable testimony to the law-abiding sense of the people of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle very justly pointed out to the House that some Judges have been declaring that, as compared with the condition of things 12 months ago, the state of the country is vastly improved. I should like here to call attention to some very remarkable testimony that was given by Inspector Davis in the district of Castleisland, which we have been reminded was one of the most disturbed districts in the country. I was in that district myself at the end of last year, and I know that what I say is the fact—namely, that it was considered one of the most difficult districts to govern in the whole of Ireland. I will read an extract from the evidence given by Inspector Davis before Lord Cowper's Commission; and, if I may be allowed to make a short digression, I would invite the hon. Members who sit on those Benches opposite to read the Blue Book published by that Commission; and, if they do so, I venture to say that we shall hardly have a repetition from them of some assertions which have fallen to-night from the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Mr. William Davis, District Inspector of Castleisland, in Answer 21,444, said—

"My Lord, there were English gentlemen came round and denounced outrages in Kerry, and said they were a disgrace to Ireland. Mr. Davitt came round and denounced outrages, and appealed to certain persons against them. That had a very great effect indeed in preventing them.

"21,483. I am glad to hear from you that Mr. Davitt had denounced outrage?—Oh, yes; he came down specially to denounce outrage.

"21,489. At any rate your evidence goes to prove, and I have unfeigned delight to hear it, that Mr. Davitt did what he could to put a stop to those fearful outrages?—He did, and there were

[First Night.]

English gentlemen went down there, amongst them a clergyman, I do not know their names, who denounced outrages; but there was a Mr. Fagan, an English clergyman. I think some of them were Members of Parliament."

I would invite the attention of the House to Question 21,446—

"Is there much Boycotting?—To a certain extent there is, my Lord; but it is practised in such a way that the law cannot get hold of it. In fact, there are only what might be called two people who are suffering very much from Boycotting in the district of Castleisland. They are subject to some annoyance, but not so much as they were. One of them is a very recent case."

I think you have here some evidence out of the mouth of District Inspector Davis to prove that in this very disturbed district there are only two persons suffering from Boycotting, and that the sufferings of even those people are less than they were. I entirely agree with what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, that the upshot of this Bill is to enable landlords in Ireland to collect excessive rents. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland let the cat out of the bag in almost his first sentence. Referring to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, who had just sat down, he said, "He has not developed to us his scheme, and I suppose he has some scheme for the better payment of rent;" as if the whole object of our proceeding was to adopt a scheme for bringing about a better payment of rent. I think that is very remarkable evidence as to what is in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. He thinks of nothing apparently but what will conduce to the better payment of rent. I must say I was very much astonished, when listening to the two speeches which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland told us he delivered before breakfast the other day, by some of the statements which he made, for they seemed to my mind to show an extraordinary want of acquaintance with the present circumstances of Ireland. After all, I do not know that there is anything to be surprised at. When history comes to record the manner in which we are governing Ireland, nothing will be more remarkable than the fact that a right hon. Gentleman who has never made Ireland a special study, and who, perhaps, has hardly been in the country half-a-dozen times in his life, should be pitchforked at the request of a noble Relative into the position of Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Royal Commission had declared that the fall in the price of gross produce was from 14 to 18 per cent—which was about one-sixth. He maintained, therefore, that rents ought only to fall one-sixth. But, surely, in making that statement he must have been aware that a fall in the price of a commodity affects the producer in this respect—if his expenses remain the same, the reduction all comes off the margin of profit. The right hon. Gentleman's argument would lead to this, that the whole of the loss owing to the fall in the price of agricultural produce is to be borne by the tenant, and none of it by the landlord. Anyone who has worked out the sum will know that a fall of one-sixth in the price of produce implies the necessity for a much greater reduction in rents, in order that the tenant may be in the position he occupied before the reduction took place. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the solemn compact of 1881, and enlarged upon the direful consequences which would ensue if we attempted to meddle with the settlement brought about by that Act. He seemed to be ignorant of the fact that Earl Cowper's Commission speaks of revision of rents, but he will find that it does do so. The assertion of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) is, that the Business of the nation should not be set aside in favour of a measure for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland, while no effectual security has been taken against the abuse of the law by the exaction of excessive rents. Now, I am not going into that at any length; but I wish to quote one or two figures, because it seems to me that figures are worth consideration in these matters. Does anyone deny that rents in Ireland are excessive? Why, judicial rents, by the admission of Lord Lansdowne and others, are excessive, and rents fixed during the first three or four years of the operation of the Land Courts have turned out to be entirely inadequate. I believe the last statements that have been circulated amongst Members contain most emphatic testimony to that effect. If hon. Gentlemen will refer to those statements they will find that in the province of

Donnaught, there were 99 tenancies during the month of October in which the rents which had been £2,600 were reduced to £1,077—that is to say, it was declared that for every 20s. exacted only 1s. was due. I find, also, that in the case of 35 of the tenants of a certain Colonel King-Harman, rents were reduced from £669 to £409; and with all respect to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who is at present in his place, I would venture to say that he may expect that he will deal with some reluctance with this subject if he should happen to touch upon it, looking at the predicament he and his Friends are in with regard to it. I was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle refer to the system of joint-tenancies in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman used the word "mean" as to that, and I do not believe the expression a bit too strong. There is no more fruitful source of mischief and injustice in Ireland than this system of joint tenancies. What do we find about it? Why we find that four men may be put down as joint and several tenants of four adjoining plots of land the books of the estate, and if one of the four does not pay his share of rent all of them are liable to eviction. Landlords favour that mode of tenancy, because, if the rent is more than £4, the landlords are relieved from half the poor rate, and by granting one joint tenancy instead of four separate ones the rent is kept above that sum. Not long ago, on the shores of Clew Bay, there was a remarkable example of another great grievance of Irish land system on the estate of Lord Lucan. In this case, although the tenants had all paid their rents to the day, owing to the seconding of a middleman, a number of men were evicted from their holdings. That system of joint tenancies and the middleman system are fruitful sources of mischief and disorder. Not only is this rating manoeuvre—for I can tell it nothing else—of joint tenancies lieve the landlords of the legal obligation to pay the poor rate, but it gives no security for the payment of rent against the poor class of tenantry, while it imposes upon that tenantry the serious liability that, if one of their number falls behind with his rent, the rest may be evicted. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury used an expression which I think he will ponder over when he sees it in print. He said the object of the Government was to give the people "peace in their own dwellings." I listened to the words which fell from the right hon. Gentleman, and there came back to my mind a case about which I asked a Question only this week—namely, the case of John McNulty. That was a case in which a man, indeed, had peace in his own dwelling. What happened in that case? Why, it was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that, under the order of a District Inspector of Royal Irish Constabulary, a certain sergeant went one Sunday evening with a force of men outside McNulty's house, and, according to the sworn evidence in Court, when he heard coin passing inside he made a forcible entry, searched the persons of men he found there, and took them before a magistrate who was a brother of Lord de Freyne, whose tenants the people were, and whose rents the people were unwilling to pay without an adequate reduction. All this was done—the forcible entry, the searching, the drawing of the revolver upon the men, the arrest, and the taking off of the prisoners before a magistrate without any warrant whatever. It was all in absolute defiance of the law, and that is what you call giving men "peace in their own dwellings." Now, I should like to say a word or two as to the National League. I have referred to this subject outside the House, and as it is a principle with me never to say outside the House what I will not say inside it, I desire to repeat the remarks I have made elsewhere. I took some pains to investigate the National League, and inquire into its working. I went to its head office in Dublin, where I spent several hours. I was very courteously received by the secretary—who represents in this House one of the Divisions of Dublin—although the hon. Member had no knowledge of the fact that I intended to call. During the time I was at the office I saw every letter that had been received there that morning, and investigated the books from top to bottom; and in every place I went to in Ireland I endeavoured to find out the officers of the National League, and put myself in communication with them in order to get what information I could. I will not detain the House upon this point, but I will merely say in one word that the impression left upon my mind after the most painstaking investigation I could make, was that the National League is a perfectly Constitutional association; that those who guide its policy are anxious to prevent outrage; and that if you attempt to suppress it, discontent will be driven within and below the surface, and the results will be very serious. I believe that those who talk against the National League in the way that I hear right hon. Gentlemen opposite speak of it, are merely walking in the footsteps of Lord Sidmouth and Lord Castlereagh after the unfortunate massacre of Peterloo in 1819. They may have reason to regret their efforts to put a stop to a perfectly legitimate and Constitutional organization. I thank the House for having given me its attention, and I will merely say in conclusion that I come here with the most emphatic mandate from my constituents to oppose on every possible occasion this coercive policy, the first step in which is being taken by Her Majesty's Government this evening. I do not join battle with them with a light heart, and I am certain that from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) down to the humblest of his Followers, all are in the same mood. It is in no light spirit that we enter upon this contest against coercion, and we are determined to use every effort to secure that Ireland in the future shall be treated in a very different way from that which has characterized its Government by England during the present century, and that the past policy of coercion shall, indeed, be a policy of the past.

Mr. PINKERTON (Galway) said, he considered it was a good admission of weakness on the part of the Government that they had not sufficient knowledge among themselves to originate a Land Bill for Ireland, and had to be indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) for their ideas. If the Land Bill was one of the same shreds-and-patches principle as the Provincial Councils proposed by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, it would not be received with satisfaction by the people of Ireland. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) showed that the Government had resolved to resort to limp Cromwellianism with all the starch left out. Mr. John George M'Carthy, one of the Land Purchase Commissioners, had, in his evidence before Lord Cowper's Commission, stated that, in his experience, he had known rack-renting to "prevail to an extent simply shocking," and from other evidence it was clearly shown that rack-rent and outrages went hand-in-hand. Yet the Government had resolved on a policy of eviction and conviction. He denied that the agitation was confined to the South and West of Ireland; it was active in Ulster also; and in County Derry, upon the estates of the Salters' and Skinners' Companies, the Plan of Campaign had, under another name, been adopted. Reference had been made to the introduction of remedial measures; but he mistrusted any such measures which were introduced in the House of Lords; for that House, owing to its landlord prejudices, would not pass any measure which was of real benefit to the Irish tenant. English capital had never been employed in Ireland, except as a decoy duck; and no single penny of English capital had been employed in Ireland, except for the purpose of earning twopence. It was a well known fact that the voluntary reductions of rent in England and Ireland amounted to the sum total of the rent of Ireland. The reductions in rent effected by the Land Act in Ireland amounted only to £600,000, while the voluntary reductions in England exceeded £16,000,000. It should also be recollected that English farmers had good markets for their produce, while from places in the North of Ireland carriage to London was as dear as freight to New York. He would urge the Government to lay aside all Party considerations, and to try and treat the Irish Land Question in a broad and statesmanlike manner. They should treat leaseholders and the unfortunate tenants who held under judicial rents in a generous fashion, while if they proved to them that they must pay their rack-rents and receive no reward for their loyalty, they would be driving them into the arms of the Nationalist Party. Even remedial measures of that kind would not be able to check the growth of Nationalist sentiment in the North of Ireland. But, to give this policy a chance, a Bill should be introduced immediately for the benefit of leaseholders.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) said, that they had been accused of aiding and abetting in outrages and with not having denounced them. This was not the case. He had himself denounced them, and other Members of the Irish Party had done the same. These outrages checked and hampered the cause which they had in hand, and they desired to dissociate themselves from them. He had been foolish enough to expect that in his statement the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) would have advanced some reason why this Motion should be carried, and that the right hon. Gentleman would have hurled at them quotations from their speeches; whereas he had simply quoted from two speeches, one of the hon. Member for East Galway (Mr. Harris) with reference to the abolition of rent, and the other of a gentleman who had formerly been a Member of that House (Mr. William O'Brien) with regard to Ireland having her own flag. He thought that that was a laudable ambition, and it had been no danger to England that in the time of Grattan Ireland had had her own flag, upon which there was no stain. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had endeavoured to hold up to the horror of this country the condition of Ireland if mistress of her own destinies, and the injustice which would take place to the British taxpayers when the Irish people would decline to fulfil its obligations. But no complaint has ever been made with regard to the repayment of money for purchase under the Church Disestablishment Act or the Bright clauses of the Land Act. They had other reasons for believing that the Irish people would fulfil their obligations, and that they did not deserve the aspersions which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had that night passed upon them. Was it not the fact that the Local Government Board advanced money to the Irish fisheries, and that there had been no complaint with regard to the return of principal and interest? The statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was not borne out by the facts of the case. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the same machinery would be employed for the repudiation of the debt to England as was now in existence. That was most inconsistent on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, because, if he thought so, why did he bring forward measures by which he would of necessity be obliged to trust to the Irish people? Then, again, they had been told that the international contract would not be respected. That might be the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, but he (Mr. J. O'Connor) did not think that it was the opinion of the great English democracy. They had heard a great deal of abuse of the Irish National League; but, strange to say, all that abuse had not caused those Members of that House who belonged to that association to blush in the slightest degree. They looked upon it as the very salvation of the people of Ireland. General Redvers Buller had said so, and he was a good authority. It had stepped between the people and the evictor, and had saved them not only from evictions but from the outrages which generally followed in the wake of those evictions. The number of outrages depended very much upon that of evictions. In 1850, 104,163 persons had been evicted in Ireland, and the number of outrages of all kinds had been 136,200; in 1852, 32,495 persons were evicted, and the outrages numbered 913; in 1856, the number of evictions and outrages respectively were 5,714 and 283; in 1866, 3,671 and 86; in 1879, 4,515 and 870; and in 1881, 17,341 and 4,439. Looking at the present time, in the quarter ending in June last year, the evictions in Kerry alone had been 2,481, and it was there that Moonlighting was most frequent. These facts and figures ought to be taken into the serious consideration of the Government before they enacted coercion for Ireland, and before they pressed forward their Motion for Urgency for that Bill. The Irish Members supported the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) because they believed that it was conceived in the interests of peace, harmony, and contentment in Ireland. They believed that if the policy foreshadowed by the right hon. Gentleman were carried out it would also have an effect in sweeping away that nefarious system of landlordism which had so long prevailed in Ireland, and which had produced so much suffering among the Irish people.

Coercion would fail in Ireland again, as it had always failed before, because it had no terrors for the Irish people. What fear could the Irish people have of coercion when arrested priests were borne in triumph to the prison gates by an enthusiastic crowd? When people rejoiced in, rather than were dismayed by coercion, depend upon it the game was up. But as coercion of the Irish people had been the cause of disaster and defeat to the Conservative Government in the past, so their present attempt at it would result in their eventual and speedy discomfiture.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had characterized his statement of the remedial measures intended to be introduced as the barest and crudest outline, but not even that limited description could be applied to the information the right hon. Gentleman had given of his threatened Coercion Bill, for which he was now asking the whole time of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had given no details whatever of the Bill, and he had refused to give the House any explanation of its provisions. The Government were not following the precedent of 1881, when Mr. Forster introduced his Bill. Mr. Forster made out—or at all events attempted to make out—his case; and it was not until after the Coercion Bill of that year had been before the House for some days that the then Prime Minister had made a Motion of urgency and precedence for it. If the present Government had simply asked precedence for the Motion for bringing in the Bill, perhaps there might have been some justice in the Chief Secretary's criticisms; but the Motion on the Table was for precedence for all the stages of a Bill which was not even before the House. In the circumstances, he thought the House was entitled to some fuller and more complete information.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has accused me of not having given an explanation of my Bill. At the present stage I could not have entered into a full explanation of the details of the Bill without being grossly out of Order.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he was not blaming the right hon. Gentleman for not having entered more fully into the details of his Bill, but for making a Motion for precedence for all stages of a Bill that was not before the House. The present Motion was entirely without precedent. The right hon. Gentleman had criticized very trenchantly and acutely, as he always did, the Report of the Commission of his own Government with reference to the present state of things in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman had put the amount of the reduction in value in crops in Ireland at 16 per cent; but he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had had time to look at the Report of the Commission of his own Government. It was evident from the statistics upon which the Commission had founded their Report that the value of the crops in Ireland in 1855 was £63,000,000, that it was £46,000,000 in 1881, that it was £35,000,000 in 1885 and only £31,000,000 in 1886. The same fall equally applied to the value of cattle. The right hon. Gentleman said that the average reduction of rent by the Land Commissioners was 19 per cent, but in the months of November and December last the gross value of the rents brought into Court was £7,930,000. The Commissioners reduced them to £5,583, a reduction of 30 per cent which he thought was a very considerable indication of the enormous fall in the value of produce in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman had complained that the Irish tenants did not go into the Land Court. But did the right hon. Gentleman know that although the Land Court had dealt with 176,000 cases in five years, there still remained some 150,000 cases to be disposed of. It was, therefore, a physical impossibility that all the Irish tenants could go into the Land Court for years to come. The right hon. Gentleman had, doubtless, indicated that two Land Bills were about to be introduced into Parliament; but he was afraid that one of them at least was not to be introduced into the other House of Parliament. They had had already sufficient experience to know how the House of Lords would treat an Irish Land Bill. It would certainly be a delicious experience to have a tenants' compensation or disturbance Bill coming down from the Upper House. The Liberal Party had sent one up to them in 1880; but it had never come back again, and Land Act was emasculated in other House. In 1882 the Act was all but destroyed; therefore, it was a matter of historic interest to find that a great measure of reform, at the instance of the native Party, was to be initiated in another place." But the House of Commons was not left without one crumb of comfort; it was to have a Purchase Bill, and he could not imagine that hon. right hon. Gentlemen, who so censured the late Government for their Purchase Bill, because it possibly incurred some risk to the English taxpayer, would themselves propose a Bill tainted with the same heresy. But passing on the Land Bill, the right hon. Gentleman told the House of Commons that a prime necessity of a civilized State was the effective support of the law. He was not going to quarrel with the definition, though he thought he could add to it; he thought the prime necessity of a civilized State was not only an effective law, but its perfect and absolute justice. Justice as well as law was an essential element in the problem. The right hon. Gentleman drew rather a sad picture; a said society in Ireland was crumbling to its original atoms. If that was so, they wanted some very severe and drastic legislation to remedy that state of things; and that was why he was rather surprised the right hon. Gentleman did not give the House any figures. He remembered that when the late Mr. Forster introduced his Bill in 1881, he mentioned, as a most startling fact—on which, indeed, he based his proposal—that in 1880 the agrarian outrages in Ireland amounted to 2,590, of which threatening letters—which he himself regarded as somewhat insignificant—numbered 1,337, leaving the net outrages of the year 1880 at 1,253. Of these 719, or two-thirds of the whole, had been committed in the months of October, November, and December. Now, what was the number of outrages in 1886, exclusive of threatening letters? Only 607, and of these 94 were in October, November and December. He maintained that figures like these proved to a demonstration that there never was a case in the whole history of coercive legislation in Ireland where there was less ground to justify the application than existed at the present moment. In 1881, again, there were 5,300 persons committed for trial; while in 1885 the number was only 2,800; a fact which went to prove that the state of Ireland in regard to general crime was not unsatisfactory. Instead of an increase there was a decrease of ordinary crime, and the country in that respect compared most favourably with England and Scotland. That brought them at once to the land question, which was if not the only, at all events, the main question in any consideration of the Irish problem. In that connection the Government were bound to pay some little attention to the Report of the last Royal Commission, and to favour the House with some comment upon it. The Commission had found not only the fall in prices and the deterioration in the soil proved, but it had also found that the average fall in the last two years as compared with the average of the four preceding years in the value of the agricultural capital of Ireland amounted to 18½ per cent. And what was the conclusion the Commission gathered from those facts? It was—

"The necessity of a further reduction in the judicial rents, and the absolute impossibility for the tenants to pay the present rents."

Therefore the rent which the law in the Act of 1881 fixed as "fair" was now found to be unfair. Was the House of Commons bound, then, to enforce a landlord's claim to an unfair rent? The tenants could not pay the present rents, and it was a monstrous injustice to enforce them and still more to confiscate their property by evicting them from their holdings. Why, then, should not the Government legislate? He ventured to say that there would be no objection to giving the right hon. Gentleman the whole time of the House for that purpose. Not only duty but justice and public policy combined to enforce that such a course should be taken before proceeding to a measure of coercion. What the Government were asking the House to do was to deprive Ireland of her Constitutional rights in order to enable the landlords to appropriate their tenants' property. One of the peculiar glories of the present Administration, was that there was to be perfect identity between the two countries—that they were to treat England and Ireland alike. Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to extend this measure to England? He would recommend him to try the experiment. If he desired a speedy termination of the present state of affairs, he did not know anything which would more rapidly conduce to that result than to deprive the people of England of any of their Constitutional rights. But, said the right hon. Gentleman, "the Land League is a treasonable association."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I said was that the right hon. Member for Derby had said so.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he had put two propositions before the House—that the Land League was a treasonable association, and that it secured its treasonable ends by the spoliation of other people's property; but, whether it was said by the Chief Secretary, or by the right hon. Member for Derby, the point was whether the same measures could be applied to England as were proposed for Ireland. Was there no law against treason in Ireland? Any rising against the Queen could be dealt with as effectually in Ireland as in England. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen said "No"; but what did Lord Salisbury say at Newport? He showed how powerless the Crimes Act would be against the Land League, and he said that a thousand branches of the Land League had sprung up under shadow of the Crimes Act. What did Lord Salisbury say with reference to Boycotting? He said that the effect of the Crimes Act had been very much exaggerated; that Boycotting was a crime which legislation had great difficulty in reaching; that it was the act of persons proposing to do things which in themselves were legal, and which were only illegal because of the intention with which they were done. Lord Salisbury said that not long ago a Boycotted man went into a Roman Catholic Church and everyone left it. The priest said to the man, "I will go on with the service if you like and finish it for you alone—but I recommend you to go away;" and Lord Salisbury added, "What is the use of an Act of Parliament against a system of that kind." And now the right hon. Gentleman proposes to grapple with combinations of that kind. Why was it that the people of Ireland were outside of sympathy with the administration of the law? The right hon. Member for Derby had said that trial by jury was taking a sample of the whole mass of the population. The Government said they could not get verdicts in Ireland. Why so? Because the people were not in harmony with the law. Could not the law be altered? Let him remind the House of what Lord Russell said on a similar occasion. He said that Government in Ireland was a Government of force, and government in England was a government of represented opinion. Let them give Ireland the same Government as England and they would have the same result. Their own Commission had told the Government that the law in Ireland was unjust and its working unfair. His right hon. Friend had said that what Ireland had suffered from was moral wrong without any legal remedy. That was what their Blue Book was filled with. Where there was moral wrong and no legal remedy outrage was always the result. His right hon. Friend asked the House to go to the root of the matter. Let them do justice to the tenants of Ireland and not allow their property to be taken from them, and then they would get the people in harmony with the law. The problem of dealing with the present state of Ireland was the gravest which had come before the present generation, and it was worth while for the Government to settle it on the lines which were suggested by Lord Carnarvon, their own Lord Lieutenant, two years ago, when he said it was time to have done with the weary round of coercion and try something else. He hoped that that House would lend their ears to the just claims of the Irish tenant; that before making the law more stringent they would make it more just, and if they did there would be more hope of the dawn of a better state of things in the future of Ireland.

MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.) said, that no one could have listened to the able speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down without feeling that his support of this Amendment had been of a somewhat half-hearted character. That speech, he thought, showed that in supporting an Amendment of this character, the right hon. Gentleman felt himself somewhat in a false position, and he honoured him for that feeling. The only criticism the right hon. Gentleman had made on the proposal now before the House was this—he said that they ought to know something of the details of the measure for the House was asked to grant precedence over other Business. He (Finlay) would like to know what, at this stage, they had to do with de-

It was enough for him, at least, to know that this was a measure for restoring authority of law and order in Ireland. They knew that, and in his humble opinion that was a sufficient reason for granting precedence for this measure. If he believed that this measure could be properly described as one of the coercion of the people of Ireland, he would certainly pause long before he would support it in any shape or form; he did not believe that that description—often as it had been repeated in various forms this evening—was a just description of the measure which Her Majesty's Government proposed to introduce. He believed that the measure ought to be more justly described as one of the deliverance and enfranchisement of the peaceful and law-abiding people of Ireland from the tyranny of secret societies. Would anyone who knew what was going on in Ireland rise in this House and say that it was not the case that tenants in Ireland, tradesmen, men of all sorts and conditions in Ireland, were not compelled to join illegal societies by the dread of outrage and violence. There was no tyranny on the face of the earth which was comparable to that of a secret society, and believing, as he did, that this measure was one of the effect of which would be to deliver the peaceful and law-abiding people of Ireland from a tyranny of that sort, he would certainly vote for giving it precedence on the other Business of the House. They were told that there was an occasion for giving it precedence. He would like those who used such language to recollect what was said by those who had studied the Irish Question, and who had the interests of the Irish people at heart—he meant the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). That right hon. Gentleman had been the friend of Ireland long before many who now posed in that attitude had taken up the rôle; and what the right hon. Gentleman said about it? He had told them that the difficulty in Ireland was an economic difficulty, and that what was wanted was employment for the people, encouragement to their industries, and the restoration of the physical well-being and prosperity of the people of Ireland. He should like to know how it was to be expected that capital would flow into Ireland, or how anyone could expect that the industries of Ireland would be developed if the law was not respected and obeyed. On what did the fabric of the industrial prosperity of this country rest, except on the supremacy of the law. But they were told there was other Business more pressing, and in the Amendment the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) said—

"It is undesirable to set aside the Business of the nation in favour of a measure for increasing the stringency of the criminal law in Ireland."

He should like to know what the "Business of the nation" was to which the right hon. Member for Newcastle referred. On this subject he had preserved a most discreet silence. He had very great respect, as he ought to have, for the rights applicable to private Members, and he should not suggest that any of the time devoted to private Members was otherwise than most admirably spent. But he asked what were the measures which the right hon. Member for Newcastle thought would be passed in furtherance of the Business of the nation if the House declined to accede to the request of the Government for precedence to this measure? He ventured to say if they declined the request of the Government, they should not find that they had passed one measure, they should find that they had not given time for restoring the authority of the law in Ireland, but that, in other respects, the Business of the nation would not have been in one single point advanced. Another, and most formidable, indictment had been preferred against the measure which the Government proposed to bring in. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down said the measure might be characterized as one to deprive Ireland of her Constitutional rights in order that the landlords of Ireland might deprive the tenants of their property. [Home Rule cheers.] Those who seemed to be ready to believe anything of any measure of which they as yet knew nothing which Her Majesty's Government might propose, might applaud that statement. If he believed that were a just description, or anything like one, of the intended measure, he certainly should not only decline to support it, but would oppose it by every means in his power; and so, he believed, would the great majority of Members on both sides of the House. He believed that the Land Question lay at the bottom of all the difficulties of Ireland. He rejoiced that the Government intended to deal with that question. He rejoiced to hear that they meant to extend the benefits of the Land Act of 1881 to the leaseholders; and he would venture to submit for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government that if ever there was a class of men who deserved more gratitude than another, and some recognition of their behaviour under most trying circumstances, it had been the class composed of the leaseholders of Ulster. He rejoiced to know that the leaseholders of Ulster—and the leaseholders generally throughout Ireland—were to have remedial legislation for the purpose of admitting them to the privileges enjoyed by other tenants in Ireland. He rejoiced to know from the statement made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that provision would be made for relieving tenants, to some extent, who were unable, in consequence of the great fall in produce, to pay their rents from those liabilities which at present pressed upon them with a crushing weight; and he rejoiced to know that a scheme of purchase was in contemplation by which, it was to be hoped, the tenants of Ireland would, in time, to a great extent be converted into owners. He believed, if the Land Question in Ireland were solved, the back of the Irish difficulty would be broken; and he did not think anyone could have followed the movement for what was called Home Rule without realizing that all the motive power which that movement possessed was derived from the grievance under which the tenants of Ireland had suffered in respect of their land. He believed if those grievances were redressed, as he hoped they soon would be, by a comprehensive measure, the agitation for what was called Home Rule and a Parliament for Ireland would subside as completely as a sail when the mast was broken. But because they ardently and passionately desired such legislation for the tenants of Ireland, were they in the meantime to suspend the enforcement of law and order in Ireland? The late Lord Macaulay used words which had special application to the present situation; and he was one who, had he been alive, the Liberal Party would not have desired to draw out of their ranks. Lord Macaulay said—

[First Night.]

“The grievances of Ireland are doubtless great, so great that I never would have connected myself with a Government which I did not believe to be intent on redressing those grievances; but am I, because the grievances of Ireland are great and ought to be redressed, to abstain from redressing the worst grievance of all? Am I to look on quietly while the laws are being trampled on by a furious rabble, while houses are plundered and burnt, while my peaceable fellow-subjects are butchered?”

He should like to know now when it became the doctrine of the Liberal Party that the enforcement of law was to be stayed until all grievances under the law had been redressed. Had all things become new since the General Election of 1885? It used to be thought the duty of a Government to enforce the law, and they were proud to claim for the Liberal Government that, while it enforced it, it took steps to redress any grievances which existed under the law. But he never before heard the suggestion that the Liberal Party were to abstain from the enforcement of the law, because they felt that there were some things under the law which ought to be altered. They were told in the Amendment that it was inexpedient to postpone the Business of the country for such a measure, whilst no effectual security had been taken against the abuse of the law by the exaction of excessive rents. He should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley) what he thought would happen if, instead of introducing this measure, the Government had brought forward a measure of land reform for Ireland? Would they not have been met—if not by the right hon. Gentleman, by some of his right hon. Friends near him—with an Amendment stating that it was no use their attempting to do anything with the Land Laws of Ireland, and that everything of that kind ought to be postponed until Home Rule had been established? He ventured to think that that was the course which events would have taken. He ventured to think that those very Members who were going into the Lobby in support of this Amendment were the Members who

Government had taken the course right hon. Gentleman the Member Newcastle had endeavoured to lure into. Then they were told that measure for restoring law and order in Ireland was not needed, and that all parts of Ireland were now in a peaceable and quiet condition. He was glad to hear that; but was it not true that in many parts of Ireland the people were peaceable and quiet from the fact that there was no disposition in these parts of the country to break the law? He would point out, however, that the absence of actual outrage did not always indicate a state of peacefulness. The absence of outrage sometimes meant that the authority of secret societies was so thoroughly established that they did not need the sanction of outrage to enforce their demands. Before he acquiesced in any argument drawn from the quietude of certain parts of Ireland, he should like to be satisfied that that was not the explanation of the absence of outrage. Reference had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) to the difficulty, if not impossibility, of dealing with Boycotting, and he should like to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman as to whether to effectual Boycotting must not be unanimous in a district; and he should like to ask him whether he thought that in every district there would not be found a minority to hold communion with a Boycotted man, and so render Boycotting ineffectual, if it were not for the knowledge that such communion would be visited by outrage or by death? He might be told of a congregation leaving a church when a Boycotted member entered. That might be so; but he should like to know how it was that the congregation became unanimous? The people of a district became unanimous because they knew that any minority who ventured to disobey the decree by which the offender was Boycotted would be subjected to consequences of the most unpleasant character. That was the simple explanation of the efficiency of Boycotting; and so long as the ultimate sanction of Boycotting, as was conveyed in most forcible terms by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol East (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), of outrage, or something of the kind, the law was capable of dealing with Boycotting, and that such measures as they hoped would be introduced by the Government might have the effect of putting an end to that which was a disgrace to any country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) said that he would put off to the very last any proposal for increasing the efficiency of the Criminal Law in Ireland. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman would put it off until it was too late to be of any good. He always thought it was the duty of a Government to intervene at the earliest possible stage, and to suppress all disturbance before it had reached such a head that extreme measures were wanted. Would the right hon. Gentleman wait until it became necessary to proclaim martial law? Were they to refuse to pass measures of this kind, introducing changes into the machinery of the Criminal Law of Ireland for the purpose of enabling justice to be done, on the plea that they had better wait a little while, and yet a little while, until the evil had reached such dimensions that none but the most extreme and heroic remedies were appropriate? He submitted that that was not statesmanship, and he rejoiced to know that it was not the course which Her Majesty's Government intended to take. Did the right hon. Gentleman believe that the effect of this measure when it became law would be to convict innocent people in Ireland? [An hon. MEMBER: Yes, it will.] There were one or two cries in the affirmative, which emphasized the silence of the rest of the House. Everyone knew that the only effect of any measure such as they understood to be proposed would be to free the course of the law from those impediments which had prevented justice being done. Was it not a scandal that a man should be tried before a jury who were known to be under such influence that they dared not, however clear the evidence was, bring a verdict in against him? He believed that the people of England and Scotland were a law-abiding people. He believed that they desired to see the law enforced and obeyed in Ireland, as they desired to see it enforced and obeyed in England and Scotland; and he believed this—that those who consciously or unconsciously seemed to be endeavouring to make all law and all order in Ireland impossible would find that they had a heavy reckoning to settle with the people of England and with the people of Scotland.

Mr. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) said, he felt he must congratulate the Government upon their defenders, who came in the shape of Liberal Unionists from the camp of the enemy. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) said that the Law of Treason in Ireland was the same as the Law of Treason in England. That, however, was not so. The Law of Treason in Ireland was more stringent than the Law of Treason in England. In England 35 peremptory challenges were allowed to persons accused of treason, whereas in Ireland the number of challenges was limited to 20. He (Mr. Mac Neill) wished to support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) for the following reasons:—He believed that Amendment embodied the great principle that you ought not to rob the poor for the benefit of the rich. He felt likewise that it involved this principle—that legislation should not be in the interest of one class, and against another class, but that legislation should be in the interest of the whole community at large. He likewise supported it for this reason—that it embodied this principle, that when the people were in opposition, and in conflict with their rulers, the chances were strongly in favour of the rectitude of the people's cause. There was such a thing as rack-renting in Ireland, and that rack-renting was legalized. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary spoke of the sacredness of contracts. Contracts ought to be sacred; but to be sacred contracts should be made by persons in equal positions and with equal rights. In Ireland those who had to submit to rack-renting were not in an equal position with the landlords who fixed them. The case of Ireland was peculiar; land there was the only means by which the people could subsist—their trade and manufactures having been purposely destroyed by England's oppressive legislation in their restraint for 200 years. The starving people competed with each other for the land, and promised to pay a rent for it which could not be produced. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman might almost be framed from a letter addressed about 15 months ago by Archbishop Walsh to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian—then Prime Minister—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone). In that letter the Archbishop made the following observation:—

"In point of fact, every disturbance of social order which has appeared amongst our people has arisen from a sense of wrong entertained by a large majority of the occupiers of the soil, owing to the merciless exactions of unfeeling and extravagant landlords."

The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) might well say—"Save me from my friends." The speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) recalled the recollection of Irish loyalty at the close of the last century, which was thus described by Lord Cornwallis, when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—

"The violence of our friends, and their folly in endeavouring to make it a religious war, added to the ferocity of our troops, who delight in murder, most powerfully counteracts all plans of conciliation."

Again—

"The conversation of the principal persons of the country (Ireland) tends to encourage this system of blood; and the conversation even at my table, where you will suppose I do all I can to prevent it, always turns on hanging, shooting, burning, &c., &c., and if a priest has been put to death the greatest joy is expressed by the whole company."

The contention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Morley) that conciliation should be tried before coercion, is only an echo of the great argument of Mr. Burke, in his speech on "Conciliation with America," and in his "Thoughts on Present Discontents." It also reminds us very forcibly of the address of Henry Grattan, in 1797, to his constituents, on his temporary retirement from the Parliament of Ireland, when he found himself unable to stem the tide of coercion. Referring to the Irish Minister of that time, Mr. Grattan said—

"This churl went forth—he destroyed liberty and property; he consumed the Press; he burned houses and villages; he murdered; and he failed. 'Recall your murderer,' we said, 'and in his place despatch our messenger—try conciliation.' You have declared you wish the people should rebel, to which we answer, God forbid! Rather let them weary the Royal ear with petitions, and let the dove be again sent to the King; it may bring back the olive; and as to you, thou mad Minister, who pour regiment after regiment dragoon the Irish, because you have forfeited our affections, we beseech, we supplicate, we entreat—reconcile the people, combat revolution with reform; let blood be your last experiment."

The present Prime Minister had made many mistakes. The futile attempt to agitate the Irish people would be his own error.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—CORONER'S WARRANT.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What steps have been taken to obtain a legal opinion upon the alleged informality in the warrant, issued by Mr. Coroner Rice, to commit Constable Bulmer to gaol for contempt of Court; whether District Inspector Smith, immediately he received the said warrant from the Coroner, put it into his pocket and informed the Coroner that he would produce Constable Bulmer when necessary; whether District Inspector Smith on that occasion made any allegation that the warrant was illegal; when was such allegation made to Mr. Coroner Rice; and, what is the alleged illegality?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, after yesterday evening's Questions, he received a Report in reference to this matter, in reply to a message sent by the Government immediately their attention was called to it. The Report showed that the District Inspector—

MR. CHANCE: Who sent the Report?

MR. HOLMES: The District Inspector sent the Report. It appears that on receiving the warrant and on perusal of it he was of opinion that it was illegal. He spoke to a solicitor on the subject, and he was advised that the warrant was illegal. He determined to call the attention of the Coroner to an informality in the warrant. He did so on the first opportunity. The Coroner saw that it was illegal, and I need hardly say if he had executed it he would have had no protection. The new warrant has been executed.

MR. CHANCE: When was it executed?

MR. HOLMES: The new warrant was executed immediately after the Coroner gave the order, and when the Report was sent by telegraph the policeman was in custody. I see by this morning's papers that he was released at night.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) wanted to know whether the law in Ireland was different to what it was in England, where no objections were entertained as to the execution of criminal warrants?

MR. HOLMES: The law of England and Ireland is the same; but I may tell the hon. Member that if a warrant is illegal in form, it affords no protection to the officers who execute it or the Judges who issue it, should the matter come before the Judges of a Superior Court.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ARREST OF FATHER KELLER—VALIDITY OF THE WARRANT.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any legal opinion was taken by the police authorities as to the validity of the warrant issued by Judge Boyd for the arrest of Father Keller, and since withdrawn because informal; and, whether it was to aid the attempted execution of the warrant so withdrawn, the police charged with the murder of Hanlon proceeded to Youghal?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, no such opinion was, or could have been, taken by the police in reference to Judge Boyd's warrant. Such warrant was not addressed or delivered to them, nor was any duty or responsibility in connection therewith imposed on them. Their duty was confined to protecting the person of the messenger of the Bankruptcy Court from attack or violence, and to preserve the public peace. It was for this purpose the police were sent to Youghal?

MR. CHANCE: May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether it is true, as stated in this morning's papers, that District Inspector Somerville, and Police Constable Ward have both had a verdict of wilful murder found against them by the Coroner's Jury at Youghal, and whether they are now in custody?

MR. HOLMES: I have no reason to doubt that what appears in the morning papers is perfectly true, as read by the hon. Member; but, naturally, I have not received any official information on the subject.

MR. CHANCE: I beg to give the right hon. and learned Gentleman Notice that on Friday I shall again raise this Question.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—MOTION FOR URGENCY.

RESOLUTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Amendment proposed to the Question [22nd March],

"That the introduction and several stages of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion, including the Rules of Procedure, whenever the Bill shall be set down for consideration by the Government as the first business of the day."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Mr. Chance

And which Amendment was,

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, he could claim to be in an impartial position on this question. When the Liberal Government brought forward their first Coercion Bill in 1881 he opposed it, because he thought it a bad Bill. That measure was unfortunate, because it did not attain the objects for which it was intended, and he thanked God he was one of the few Liberals—in fact, perhaps the only Liberal—who consistently, and throughout, opposed that Bill. But when the Liberal Government introduced their second Coercion Bill in 1882 he supported it, because he thought the circumstances of Ireland at that time rendered the Bill necessary, the most serious crimes being then rampant in that country. He thought that Bill in the main a good Bill, and it seemed to him that the result of the wise administration of Lord Spencer under the power of that measure was that serious crimes were stamped out in Ireland. That Bill was a success. Therefore, while he was thankful that he opposed the first Bill, he was also thankful that he supported the second one. Then came the present Bill; and, taking the impartial view which he was able to take of it, it seemed to him that the circumstances of the country at the present moment were not such as to demand such a Bill. Therefore he could not support it, and he meant to give his determined support to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. He could conceive that there might be arguments brought forward in favour of subjecting Ireland to a despotic Government; but that course had not been taken by the Government. If they were to have a despotic Government, they ought to make it thoroughly despotic. On the other hand, if they were to have a free Government, they should make it

oroughly free; and they should not ve with the one hand what they took ay with the other. It seemed to be mitted that at the present moment ere was no serious crime in Ireland, d the country did not suffer under that rious form of crime with which the iberal Government had to deal in the me of Lord Spencer. The only ques- on with which the present Government oposed to deal in their criminal legis- tion was the combinations of tenants gainst the landlords. In his opinion, combination of tenants against land- rds to protect their own rights was istifiable. They had, he said, been mpelled to abandon the law against eaceable combinations in this country; nd he maintained boldly that the com- ination in Ireland, known as the Plan f Campaign, was not properly criminal, ny more than trade unionism was in this ountry. What the Government could ot enforce against the trade unions of his country ought not to be enforced against the tenants of Ireland. This was not the first experience he had had f a tenants' Land League. Hon. Mem- bers from Ireland supposed they were the originators of the system. They were not. It was the ryots of India. When he was in Bengal he had to deal with a Land League, and combinations of tenants against landlords, quite as difficult to grapple with as that which existed in Ireland. The ryots of Eastern Bengal rose in combination against the exactions of the zemindars, and, re- fusing to pay what was asked, resolved that if the zemindars, who were a powerful class, would not accept reason- able offers, they should have no rent at all. But in India the sympathy of the Government was with the ryots, whose agitation, so long as it did not lead to crime outside the combination, was not discountenanced by the authorities. The zemindars of Bengal were powerful, like the Irish landlords; and they used every engine of force and litigation to break down and ruin the ryots, so as to make an example of them. The ryots, accordingly, combined against the land- lords, and they said—"Fight one, fight all." The law against combination did not extend to India, and peaceable com- bination was not an offence then. Why should it be an offence in Ireland, unless, along with the combination, they had violence? A peaceable combination of poor tenants against powerful land- lords ought to be legal. It was an abuse of the law to make it illegal; and he was not inclined to assist the Govern- ment to put down combination of that kind. If the Government, by the aid of the Criminal Law, succeeded in putting down fair combinations of poor tenants, oppression would follow, and the tenants would be deprived of the joint property in the land which the law had given them. Then, here was the question of Boycotting. It was, after all, doubtful whether Boycotting could be considered a criminal offence—that was to say, whether the refusal to deal with a man, or hold so-called intercourse with him, was criminal. Amongst the upper classes of this country there were such com- binations against members who had offended against their class; they sent to Coventry those who did not conform to their standard and usages; and he had never heard that spoken of as a criminal offence. If they were to strengthen the Criminal Law at all, it ought not to be by giving summary and severe remedies against combinations of tenants and Boycotting, but against clear breaches of the peace and illegal acts of violence. Before strengthening the law in any respect, he thought it was in- cumbent upon Parliament to remedy the acknowledged grievances of the Irish people. On that point he was extremely disappointed with the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It was a new departure—a new and unexpected policy—entirely of the nature of "No sur- render." The Chief Secretary rode the high horse of political economy and sanctity of contract. The right hon. Gentleman threw over the Commission appointed by the Government, and argued against their recommendations. So far as he could gather from the speech of the Chief Secretary, the immediate remedy for the grievances of Ireland was to be of a homoeopathic nature—a remedy which the right hon. Gentleman himself seemed to admit would not meet the disease. Up to a certain point he had no fault to find with the Govern- ment. He thought they were right in appointing a Commission, and in using moral force to prevent the hard land- lords exacting what was looked upon as unjust rent until the Commission had reported. But when he came to the present time, and when they had the

Google

Report of a Commission by no means favourable to the tenants, he said it was madness on the part of the Government to refuse to carry out the recommendations of their own Commission. He admitted that rents judiciously fixed ought not to be lightly set aside, provided there were only the ordinary ups and downs of prices to contend with; but here was a case in which there had been an extraordinary fall in regard to prices, and where the tenants were absolutely unable to pay the judicial rents. As the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Richard Temple) knew, there had been precisely similar experiences in India, and the Government stepped in and revised the settlements in the case of the ryots. In the same way he thought rents in Ireland ought to be revised, and that it was madness on the part of the Government to refuse to do so. The Government said they had behind their coercion proposals what they believed to be the only radical remedy for the grievances of the Irish tenants—a great purchase scheme. As a matter of economic doctrine, he confessed that he had doubts as to whether an out-and-out purchase scheme, as distinguished from a scheme of fixed rents, would be beneficial to Ireland, and whether they would not, under such a system, possibly constitute a new body of landlords. But of this he was sure—that the Irish tenants did not want an absolute ownership, which should only come into operation some 49 years hence. What the tenants of Ireland wanted was an immediate reduction of their rents. He was opposed to the Purchase Bill of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), because he proposed to use the credit of this country. Recently they had been told that the matter could be so settled as to avoid the loss of 6d. to the taxpayer. He should like very much to know how this end could be accomplished. In his judgment, the only way in which immediate relief could be afforded to the Irish tenants under the guise of a scheme of purchase was to pledge British credit, and to lend money at 3 per cent; otherwise they would leave the tenants to pay more than they did now in order to create a sinking fund to make good the loans. If the Government, however, adopted such a scheme, he defied them to bring forward a proposal which would satisfy either the Irish tenants or the landlords. He wholly disbelieved in the possibility of settling this matter by a mere purchase scheme. If an angel came down from heaven, with £200,000,000 for the purpose of buying out the Irish landlords he would be ready to accept the gift. But when Her Majesty's Government proposed that the British taxpayers should find the £200,000,000, he would oppose it to the very last. They must be told how the British taxpayer was to be freed from liability. He viewed the speech of the Chief Secretary with regret, not only for his own sake, but also for the sake of the Government. He did not think that the late Chief Secretary would have been a party to the "No surrender" policy on which the Government had embarked. He was sorry to see the right hon. Gentleman the champion of such a scheme. As a Scotchman, they were proud of him. They knew he was a clever man, although sometimes he thought the right hon. Gentleman was wanting in discretion. It seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman was now leading the Government on to the rocks where they would inevitably suffer shipwreck. The right hon. Gentleman had a clear head, and he strongly recommended the Government to send him back to the Currency Commission, where he might do some good, and not to keep him at the Irish Office, where he could only do mischief. The Government were undoubtedly entering on a bad course. He regretted this, because he felt that the Liberals were not sufficiently united to be able to take their places. The House had been favoured the previous evening with an eloquent speech from a Liberal Unionist champion of the Government. But there were Liberal Unionists and Liberal Unionists; and he expressed the earnest hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) would consider his course in this matter. He was one of those who admired the right hon. Gentleman, and hoped to follow him. He wished again to see his great talents and his great power put at the service of the Liberal Party. He was not one of those who would ostracize Liberals because they did not agree with the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian in regard to Home Rule; but he could not, at the same time, refrain from saying that a great Liberal Leader like the right hon.

Member for West Birmingham, who was thorough Radical, would imperil his position in the Party if he went too far in support of the coercive action of the Conservative Government, who had thrown over the Report of their own Commission, and who took their stand upon contract and political economy.

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, that hon. Members found themselves placed in a very unjustifiable position owing to the action of the Government in taking the whole time of private Members for the furtherance of Government Business. The Government had prevented the possibility of any private Member raising a question of grievance, except in some form which was liable to be characterized as disorderly. It had by its action compelled private Members to raise questions in which their constituents were interested on the Estimates or by Motions for Adjournment; otherwise they found themselves gagged by the consumption of the whole time of the House by the Government. If the Government used the time it had taken wisely or providently there would, at least, be some little justification for the course on which they had entered; but he asserted that there had been many days on which the whole time of the House had been wasted because the Government had insisted, according to their lights, upon the adoption of a particular course, this course being subsequently altered in deference to the better counsels of their Friends on the Liberal Benches, leading the Government eventually to recall the whole of their previous speeches, and to modify the whole of their previous conduct. The measure for which the Government demanded urgency was intended, as everyone understood, to prevent a certain agitation by tongue and pen from being carried on in Ireland. That measure was not rendered necessary because the Irish people were in arms, or even because there were armed secret organisations which were resisting the authority of the Government. There was no pretext for saying that the Queen's writ would not run in Ireland. On the contrary, the Government told them that so much was the law obeyed that even an order of the Bankruptcy Court issued in Dublin was submitted to voluntarily, and a man who was much esteemed by his Church and his neighbourhood was taken in procession to gaol, the people offering no resistance whatever. Therefore the Queen's writ did run; but the Government wanted more power to terrify tenants who were miserable and impoverished, so that they might not resort to what all men had a right to resort to—namely, the highest degree of passive resistance to the wrongful enforcement of a cruel contract. The Chief Secretary for Ireland complained that the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) had alleged that there were difficulties with respect to the payment of rents in Ireland. He did not think that the allegation rested upon the statement of the right hon. Member for Newcastle. It had been proved in evidence before the Commission issued by the Government; and in the famous Dartford speech which had been trumpeted forth on containing the thorough programme of the Party opposite those difficulties were admitted, and it was there stated that they could only be removed by changing dual ownership into single ownership, and that they could never have peace in Ireland until that question was dealt with. Although ample opportunity had been afforded there had been no attempt to introduce remedial measures for the wrongs which the Irish tenants suffered, and now they were threatened before any remedy was applied. Those difficulties had also been sworn to by a high official of the Government, Sir Redvers Buller, who declared that the men of Ireland were not so bad; that their badness came from misery; that they had appealed in vain to the law, and that they had found help only in the National League. The Government had leisure and a huge majority in the other House which would, no doubt, rapidly pass any Land Bill they chose to submit to it. Why, then, had they not before now introduced such a measure to that Assembly? Why must they threaten the people with coercion first? Why make their subsequent remedial legislation unpalatable to them by first giving them sword and fetter. He deeply regretted that the illness of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland had removed from the Cabinet an obstacle to the enforcement of bad laws. The present Chief Secretary had given no reason why the House should take away from private Members all the time which fairly belonged to them. He could not find a solitary passage in the whole speech bearing on that point. There was nothing to show that the time at the disposal of the Government would not be enough to carry the measure. With the new Closure Rule, if it were worth what the Government thought it was worth—although he had never thought it worth much himself—they had now a means of pressing this Bill through with the most extreme rapidity on the nights properly belonging to the Government; but he, as an English Member, protested against the indefinite postponement of all important questions affecting the welfare of the working classes of England and Scotland simply because the Government wanted to have a whip and a scorpion with which to lash and sting the unfortunate Irish people. The Government asked for the time of the House, because they believed they were in a position to take it; but they could not take it without the support of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and his followers. He would, however, remind those hon. Members on the Liberal side of the House who intended to support the Government in the attempt to close the mouth of every private Member until after Whitsuntide that their constituents would call them to account before re-electing them, if they ever re-elected them, for putting it in the power of a Conservative Ministry to retard the consideration of all legislation for ameliorating the condition of the industrial classes. The Chief Secretary for Ireland suggested that the Bill might be found to be limited in its application to only a small area in Ireland. But was that true? And if it was, did the Government intend to set aside the claims of every other part of the United Kingdom because there was a small portion of Ireland in which the law was incompetent? It was said that Irish juries were perverse; but were the Government themselves not acting perversely in their treatment of Ireland? At the present moment the state of that country was more orderly on the whole than it had been for years past. It was true that meetings were held there; but those meetings were not disorderly if the Government did not make them so.

Mr. Bradlaugh

Why should not men agitate within the limits of the law? The Chief Secretary for Ireland said the fact that men paid too high rents was not a reason for a social revolution. It was, however, a reason for social resistance—it was a reason for such an agitation as should raise the feeling of the country to the highest pitch within the limits of the law. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) had taken part in many such agitations in his life—fortunately, not in Ireland. In this country the law was fair and its administrators were just in dealing with any agitator, however unpopular; and if only the same thing held good in regard to the administration of the law in Ireland, they would get rid of much of the present agitation. They could not prevent agitation by putting the gag in the mouths of the agitators and locking up their bodies. Bayonets and fetters, and the suppression of free discussion by tongue or pen, had never answered before, and they would not answer now. Force was the old brute remedy. Had it ever succeeded with Irishmen? There was a change in the fashion of Irish agitation. Was it a change for the worse? Compare the condition of Ireland now, when Irishmen had the right to elect their Representatives freely, with what it was before. They complained of 85 Obstructives. Well, he had experience of a larger body obstructing one Member. They complained of an Irish Member if he blocked their Business; but they thought nothing of blocking an Irish Bill. Bills which would have removed many an Irish grievance had been blocked by Members of that House. It was true the state of Ireland was a state which had often been characterized by events which they must all deplore; but take the state of things now and as they were. Boycotting and agrarian crime were not things of to-day; they had existed for generations. They and their fathers could have cured it if they would. Instead of doing so, they had tried 80 Coercion Acts. [An hon. MEMBER: 86.] Well, he should throw the Tory Government the six; it made little difference. He liked to be under the mark; but they had all failed, and this one would fail too. Well, the Conservative Party might desire to hold Office; but they surely had not fallen so low as to want to hold Office by keeping down an unfortunate people whose only crime was that they were born on the land on which they exercised no choice of birth, and on which they lived under conditions that rendered it impossible for them to live comfortably in order to maintain a spendthrift tenantry and an oppressive aristocracy. Compulsion in Ireland had always been sealed with blood. They had never legislated for Ireland except in fear. When they had made a gift, which might have been valued, and brought pleasure and sunshine into thousands of homes, it had always been rendered valueless by the rest of their actions. There was no need for the Chief Secretary for Ireland to tell them there were bad landlords in Ireland; their own witnesses told them that; and to carry out the evictions the British taxpayer was sometimes put to an expense 20 times the value of the wretched rent of the landlords. Troops of soldiers, hundreds of constables who were military, with rifles and bayonets, were required to turn the people out on a winter day, and this was to protect "the sanctity of contract." Did they call those men dishonest who came over here to earn their rent—men whose clothing was a bundle of rags? Irishmen always responded with gratitude to justice. The very men whom they sent to prison went out and fought England's battles for her. He thought they were foolish. When they complained of American gold, did they forget that it came from Irishmen? If evidence of the generosity of the Irish people was needed, all they had to do was to turn to the records of the Post Office. Their Irish brethren in Indiana sent home money to pay the rents in Kerry; and the landlords, taking all that came, asked for more, and sometimes seized the opportunity to raise the rent. The Chief Secretary talked about people being fools. Well, they would be fools and idiots if they continued to devote money thus received to such purposes. The Chief Secretary had been rather hasty in prophesying what the conduct of landlords might be by and by. In the past the landlords had exacted rents from the wretched tenants, rents that never belonged to them, and that had never accrued until the tenants reclaimed the land from the bog. The landlords had taken advantage of wretched contracts made with hungry, untrained men, and entered into in despair. What was wanted was to revoke the old legislation made when the landed aristocracy were omnipotent in both Houses of Parliament, and to give life and opportunity of asserting its sanctity. The Government knew all about land purchase last year. Why did they not introduce their Bill last Session? The land campaign had not then begun. Did the Government think they would get off without a land scheme, or were they disagreed about it in their own happy Cabinet? It was known that they began to disagree about the month of August, so acutely, indeed, that their own Leader was obliged to say in public that there was not one solitary Member amongst them upon whom he could rely. Happy, well-led Cabinet, who could not govern themselves, while claiming not only to govern the nation, but to take away all the time of the House! The Chief Secretary, after indulging in rhetoric, came to logic, and advanced several important propositions. The right hon. Gentleman said that the prime necessity in every society was that the law should be effective. Yes; that was true, but the primary necessity in every civilized society also was that the law should be just. The law was effective in Russia; it was effective, he believed, in Persia, where an inconvenient opponent might be bowstrung; it used to be effective in Egypt. But in a civilized community law could only be effective with the consent of the governed, and if it appealed to the best natures of the mass of the population. It could not be effective when the great majority of the people believed that it was chiefly directed against them and on behalf of a class who did not live among them, whom they never saw, with whose signatures only they were familiar. He was not making a general attack upon all landlords. There were many landlords who deplored the present state of things; but the class he was referring to were the class who had made all the mischief and whom the Government were now seeking to protect. The Chief Secretary put forward another proposition, that a primary necessity for society was that there should be a stable and acknowledged system of law. He admitted that at once; but he was in some certitude as to the meaning "stable." The meaning used by the head of the Gc consistent with a change every 20 minutes. That noble Lord had spoken of a stable and firm Government which was to last for 20 years before any kind of concession was made. But if the noble Lord meant that, what was the meaning of the Land Bill which the Government were about to introduce? But suppose the word "stable" was used in its dictionary sense, and it was admitted that Ireland wanted a "stable and acknowledged" system of law. Acknowledged by whom? Why, by the people who were called upon to obey it. In that sense he accepted the proposition. The Chief Secretary said that law ought to be stable. The Leader of the House said there was a law which was not acknowledged—which wanted amendment—which they were going to amend; but they would enforce this law before amending it. The Chief Secretary asked what chance there was of improving the state of Ireland if they put off this "Criminal Bill?" It was a Criminal Bill, and those who introduced it would hereafter be described in terms which he could not employ consistently with the Rules of Debate which were very properly enforced in the House. The Chief Secretary called his opponents madmen, and then substituted the words "singularly unwise," and then again returned to the word "madmen." The right hon. Gentleman was speaking under a condition of excitement which ill befitted the introducer of a Criminal Bill. He asked what chance there was of putting off this Bill when Ireland was going from bad to worse. But was it so; was Ireland as bad as she used to be? Speeches were made and writings published against the Government in Ireland. So they were in England. Why, then, did the Government not try to get an English jury to convict for such speeches or for such publications? What had been said against the rents now exacted in Ireland which was not fully borne out by the Commission which the Government itself had appointed? Then they were told that the Government wanted this Bill lest Ireland should go from bad to worse. Thus this utterly incapable Ministry, not content to rely on what the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) called its "crutch," wanted also the crutch of coercion. That was really too much.

Then it was urged in justification that one speaker had said that the day would come when rent would be abolished altogether, and that they were working for the holy cause of nationality. Did the Government really mean to ask the House to give up the whole of its time because those speeches, even if they were rash, had been made? A man thought that rents should be abolished altogether. Well, he (Mr. Bradlaugh) would not be surprised if rent were some day abolished, and when political economists preached the doctrine that the holding and cultivation of land should go together, and that the rights of non-cultivating landlords should, with or without compensation, be destroyed by the same High Court of Parliament which had created them. He would not, if he held such opinions, have the smallest hesitation in expressing them in any part of England, Scotland, or Wales. Did they want to prevent the growth of such opinions as that by arresting men before they made their speeches? Then, was it so very wicked to talk about the nationality of Ireland? He was not great on nationalities. Greater follies and crimes had been committed for the cause of what were called nationalities than for any other cause. Foolish men of one nation were matched in ruinous wars against their fellow-workers of other nations. But it did not lie in the mouth of an English Government to denounce the doctrine of nationality after the encouragement which England had given to the nationalities of Poland and Italy, Greece and Bulgaria. We might have nationality without rebellion—without even separation. The Chief Secretary had called madmen those who followed the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. He was willing to support any well-considered scheme of Home Rule proposed by the Member for Mid Lothian. But he was not one of the followers of that right hon. Gentleman. He had preached the doctrine of Home Rule for 25 years. He preached it in New York in 1873, when he was attacked by Irishmen in a perfectly friendly spirit because, though he supported Home Rule, he declared that he would resist separation by force, if force were employed to bring it about. He was not defending or trying to prove the correctness of his opinions; he was only trying to show that he had been consistent. It was complained that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle had spoken of the tenants having acted spontaneously, and it was asserted that the tenants had been driven to combine by a species of terrorism. If hon. Gentlemen opposite would read the history of Ireland for the last 85 years, and particularly the trial of Daniel O'Connell and the other traversers, they would find the refutation of that argument. Men could not be terrified into joining any such movement. If they joined it, it was because they felt the fetter and believed they would thus obtain release. He would tell them how to break up the combination on the part of the tenants—it could be done by giving to Ireland the duty of finding remedies for its own wrongs. It would be no light duty for anyone to undertake, and it was one which he should not like to take up; because with the influence of crimes, which were the fruit of generation after generation of misgovernment, the probability was that many honest men of their own opinion, who accepted the duty of finding a remedy, would themselves be broken and crushed by the men they had most tried to serve. In conclusion, he contended the Government had made out no case why the House should give up its whole time for the purpose for which it had been asked.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) said, he begged to apologize to the House for not having been in his place to continue the debate. He was under the impression that the Orders of the Day would not be reached before half-past 12 o'clock, at which time he was in the House. After a careful study of this question generally, and of many speeches made upon it both in and outside the House, he found himself unable to recognize any reasonable ground for the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley). He (Colonel Hughes-Hallett) had been under the impression that hon. Members who represented the Irish Party in that House were anxious to see not only a satisfactory but a speedy settlement of that great question; and that they were desirous of seeing all classes in their country, except the landlords, brought into a contented state of mind. But when Her Majesty's Government offered to bring forward measures relating to Ireland and asked that they should be treated as urgent, hon. Members below the Gangway cheered the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle for bringing forward an Amendment suggesting delay! That Amendment deprecated setting aside the Business of the nation; but surely the first business of the nation was to endeavour to promote peace, security of property, and security of life in Ireland, and, consequent upon those, the contentment and prosperity of the Irish people. One would suppose that those who represented the Irish Party in that House were not anxious to see a speedy settlement of the Land Question and an early arrangement of the difficulties of the Irish people. Was that so, and, if so, why? Was it that they feared that if peace were restored in Ireland, if property and life were made secure, and if law and order were once more supreme in that country and the people contented, their whole occupation would be gone? Did they fear, too, that the contributions from the other side of the Atlantic would cease to flow? As a dispassionate observer that, and no other, was the conclusion he drew. He had failed to gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle that he was at all anxious to see a speedy and satisfactory settlement of that great question. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of a reduction of rent; but it was not for a mere reduction of rent that that agitation had been going on in and out of Ireland—that agitation favoured, not low rent but no rent. That was only the penultimate object of the agitation; its ultimate object was the separation of Ireland from this country. [Cries of "No, no!"] It was of no use for hon. Members opposite to deny that, unless they were also prepared to repudiate the speeches delivered by their Leader the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his able lieutenant the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), not only in England and Ireland, but also in America—at Cincinnati, Chicago, and Castlebar. [An hon. MEMBER: Read them.] They had, unfortunately, heard the speeches read too often. Those speeches made it impossible for the Parnellite Members to conceal what was their real object in Ireland.

[Second Night.]

With respect to the grievances of Ireland it seemed to him that the only hope of arriving at a satisfactory solution of them was by firmly suppressing, by every legal means in existence or which might come into existence, the power of those combinations, associations, and secret societies, whose object was to set class against class; by a settlement, also, of the questions between landlord and tenant through the intervention of an authority that knew how to respect the general principles of justice, and not of an authority self-elected, or elected by Irish farmers or labourers, whose main desire was to wage war against and to dispossess the Irish landlord. A great deal had been said about the fall in the prices of produce being the cause of the agrarian difficulty; but would hon. Members belonging to the Nationalist Party be content if produce went back to the prices of 1882? He (Colonel Hughes-Hallett) rather thought that if those prices were restored, if tenants were able to pay their rents and did pay them, and if life and property were made secure, those hon. Members would not be content, for the simple reason that the occupations of a great many political Othellos would be gone. It seemed to him that the root of the whole of the Irish evils lay, not in the fall of prices, but in the chronic poverty of that country. That had not arisen, as the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) seemed to suggest, from Tory misrule, because for the greater part of the last 40 years Ireland had been governed by the Liberal Party. Then it could not be said to be high rents, because rents in Ireland were lower than in France, Belgium, Holland, England, Wales, or Scotland. This was proved by statistics. It was not over-population in Ireland, because while the population in England per square mile was 369, in Ireland it was only 169. They heard a great deal about bad landlords and absentee landlords; but the latter certainly did not occasion the distress in Ireland, because, as a matter of fact, it was the properties of absentee landlords which showed the greatest prosperity. Then they heard a great deal about political coercion and political tyranny; but political liberty in Ireland was the same as it was in England, Scotland, and Wales, and that, therefore, could not be the cause of the present condition of Ireland. The real responsible cause was the removal of the protective duties on the produce of England and foreign countries. Up to the year 1800 these protective duties obtained; but after the Union they were reduced, and in 1821 they were swept away. The consequence was that in less than 20 years only one-tenth of the former number of men were employed in manufactures in Ireland. In addition to that America had gradually encroached and ruined the agricultural interest in Ireland. It was very well to say that a good political administration was required to establish the status of a nation; but good fiscal administration was necessary for maintaining the prosperity, happiness, and contentment of a country. It was clear, therefore, that it was not an unjust rental which was the cause of Ireland's present distress, but poverty; but, as he had before observed, that poverty arose from the abolition of the protective duties on foreign produce, when—

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. and gallant Member that the question of Protection in Ireland does not seem relevant to the Question before the House.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT said, he had transgressed most unintentionally, and begged to express his regret for having done so. With regard to the measures the Government sought to introduce he hoped—wishing as he did that prosperity and contentment should be restored to Ireland—that there would be some indication of an intention to stimulate Irish industries, by which alone, in his opinion, those happy results would be produced.

MR. BOWNTREE (Scarborough) said, as a new Member he was desirous to protest against this attempt to obtain urgency for a Bill to render the Criminal Law of Ireland more strict. If the terrible poverty of the people of Ireland was the key-note of the situation, surely they were wrong in putting in the forefront increased stringency of the Criminal Law rather than remedial measures. This question was a most serious one for the whole Empire. It was impossible for the opinions of Liberal Members to change again—as they had undoubtedly changed in the past—because the English people now knew more about Ireland than they had ever done before. The knowledge of the English people was now so complete that they would never again permit the burning down of the houses of evicted tenants, houses which they had themselves built; and the system of jury-packing, which for many years had been in vogue, was becoming a thing of the past. The onus of proof of the necessity to introduce such a measure lay upon Her Majesty's Government. It was a singularly unfortunate circumstance that in the Jubilee year of Her Gracious Majesty's Reign the first great measure which they were asked to put on the Statute Book should be one to draw a distinction between Ireland and England, and to inflict a specially stringent and severe Criminal Law upon the poorest parts of the population of these three Kingdoms. In every Colony of this great Empire there would be men who would look with sorrow and grief at the condition of things in this country this year, and who would feel that instead of the people of the Empire being brought nearer together, this measure, if ever it should come to be put on the Statute Book, would be a lasting stain and disgrace to the history of England. It was easy to say that the laws were broken in Ireland, and that juries could not be got to vindicate justice. But the laws were broken in England every day, and they knew that many of the greatest and most happy reforms in the English Criminal Law had been brought about by juries refusing to find convictions. It had been said not many weeks ago that the Legislature had built a triple wall of protection around the favoured Irish tenant. But the evidence given before the Commission showed that this triple wall did not extend round more than one-third of the Irish tenants. Farmers in the North of Ireland had passed resolutions declaring that the landlords, by a mischievous combination, were preventing the Land Courts from settling fair rents. It appeared, then, that there was a good deal of combination on both sides. Mr. Cunningham, of Tyrone, stated before the Commission that the reason tenants had not sought the relief of the Land Court was the disadvantages under which they would labour if they did. They would at once lose the right of cutting fuel, and they had always the fear of eviction before them as a reprisal on the part of the landlord. In a miserable cabin which the tenant had built 27 years ago, the wife told him that she and some of her neighbours had brought the clay; that they had cut off 2 feet of the bog; that there was still 6 feet of bog below; that they had been paying at the rate of £1 per acre for that bog for which the landlord had never done anything, and they were afraid to go into the Land Court lest they should be evicted. They had since, he was informed, been turned out on the roadside. He wished, when any Liberal Member spoke in support of the proposal of the Government, that he would not say that the Bill which the Government were about to introduce was not a measure of coercion, but was intended to make justice more rapid. That was what tyranny said over and over again in defence of such a policy as that which the Government were pursuing. But it was one of the greatest honours of those who had attempted to uphold Liberal principles that they were not satisfied with the cry of law and order. They said that law was tyranny unless founded on justice, and that order could not be permanent unless it was based upon the free will of the people. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay) had said that the Government measure would be a protection against secret societies. But it would be just as reasonable to call Liberal and Radical Associations secret societies as the National League. Its meetings were open. Anyone might go to them. The Resident Magistrate in the Bantry district said that there was no secrecy, and that everything was above board. Mr. Ponsonby, Resident Magistrate, said that for the last 12 months the Central League had done its best to put a stop to outrages, and General Buller had stated that you never could have peace in Ireland unless you created a central Court or some legal equivalent to arbitrate between landlord and tenant. Hon. Members who thought that secret societies were the greatest curse to a country were bound to vote for the Amendment. In many parts of Ireland there was a conflict between secret societies and the League. In Kerry there was a difficulty in inducing people to join the League, because they did not consider it powerful enough. They said that one man out on the hills did more good than all your Constitutional agitation. There were many other matters requiring urgency more than this. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) told his constituents at Bristol, when speaking on the Irish Question, that—"There was no greater foe to the rights of property than he who attempted harshly to exact its right and failed in its duties."

Then, why did not the Government deal with those foes of property before they came down on the poor peasants of Ireland? A more remarkable statement was never made by a Minister responsible for the Government of Ireland than that uttered by the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary when he said that the law was so greatly disobeyed among Irishmen because they had no confidence in the justice of its administration, and the reasons for that want of confidence were now growing stronger day by day. Cases of flagrant injustice were constantly occurring, and how could they expect the people of Ireland to respect the law when they were compelled to look upon it as the oppressor of innocence and not as the avenger of wrong? The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Hughes-Hallett) and the hon. Gentleman who spoke before him (Mr. Bradlaugh) had said that the terrible state of poverty in Ireland was the great difficulty. Why, that had been stated again and again, and yet in this Session of the new Parliament they were asked first of all to give urgency for increasing the severity of the Criminal Law in that country so as to make it bear more heavily on those poor people. Turning to the Poor Law statistics of Ireland, he found that they were most appalling. There were 24,000 more people in the workhouses in Ireland last year than there were the year before, and the state of pauperism was worse now than at any time during the last 26 years, with the exception of 1879, 1880, and 1881, when special measures were taken. At the same time there was a vast increase in the number of persons receiving parish relief, and yet in the face of this they were asked, not to provide some relief for the Irish poor, but to increase the severity of the Criminal Law. The hon. and learned Member for Inverness, who spoke from those Benches the previous night, concluded his speech by saying that the people of England and Scotland were a law-abiding people. But the hon.

and learned Member need not have drawn the line where he did. The House had heard a great deal about the failings of the Irish people; it was time now that they heard something of their good points, and one of them was that, however poor a cabin home might be, so long as there was a potato or a bit of food in the place they would never allow a member of the family to go the workhouse. The state of things in Ireland was becoming more like a general state of bankruptcy, and yet larceny, crime, and drunkenness did not increase. And the Commissioners appointed by the Government had come back after their full inquiry and reported that the Irish people were naturally honest, hard-working, and deeply attached to their native land. To that every hon. Member would, no doubt, be ready to add that they were as warm-hearted a people as any on the face of the earth. Yet there was this most sad and pitiable fact—that the Irish people had been the most wronged and sinned against of any civilized people in Europe. While, however, Members on his side of the House were compelled to be parties to giving up the whole time of the House to the purpose the Government had in view, they could, at any rate, go back to their constituents and say they had done their best against it.

Mr. MILVAIN (Durham) said, that most of what they had heard from the other side was of a partizan character. He agreed with the concluding words of the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Rowntree) in his expression of sympathy with the Irish people, and deplored that Ireland and her grievances should continue to be made the sport of Party, and he earnestly wished that means could be found for agreeing upon some policy which would for ever settle the government of that country. In addressing himself to the Motion and the issue before the House he should not enter into the controversy whether rents were too high or too low, or whether the Irish people had a plausible grievance or not. It was his hope that this difficulty regarding Ireland might have been met by the existing law of the Constitution—by the law that was now applicable to conspiracy and to bankruptcy in Ireland. But recent events had proved that the present law in both respects was unworkable, and certain Members below the Gangway opposite had rejoiced in the fact that juries could not be got to convict in Ireland, and that witnesses could not be got to give evidence on which convictions ought to take place. It was not necessary for him to go further with regard to the condition of the law and its administration in Ireland than to quote a remark by Baron Dowse at the Kerry Assizes in 1886 when the prisoner asked the Judge for counsel to defend him. Baron Dowse said to the man—and he presumed the learned Judge would repeat it now—"You need have no fear; I know this country well, and the safest place for a man to be is in the criminal dock." In those circumstances he could not help thinking that something was necessary to be done in order to enforce obedience to social law and the laws of the Constitution in Ireland. But if it was now the intention of the Government to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, to apprehend persons upon the mere suspicions of a policeman, to put them in gaol upon no charge and for an indefinite period, he would be one of the first to resist to the utmost of his power any such legislation. He would draw the attention of the Government to what was called "Palmer's Act," which had for its object the protection of the prisoner, and which provided for the removal of the venue from one place to another if the prisoner desired it. That Act had been not only in the interests of a prisoner, but also in the interests of the prosecution. If the measure of the Government were unconstitutional, if it suspended the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, he would resist it, unless for stronger cause than at present existed, as long as the Members for Ireland remained Members of the House. The proposition that Ireland was in a state of disorganization could be traversed, because Ireland was in a condition of complete organization in being subject to the authority of the National League, which set at naught law and order, despised Constitutional law, and deprived law-loving and law-abiding subjects of their privileges. In proof of this he might refer to the case of one Conway, who was cited before a Court of the League because he claimed the privilege of cutting peat on a reclaimed bog, and who attended the Court after Mass on Sunday, asserted his claim, denounced the League, and threw upon the table his ticket of membership.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, the National League expressed its condemnation of what was done, and the hon. Member was entirely misinformed as to what occurred.

MR. MILVAIN said, he was glad the hon. and learned Member had supported him to the extent of not denying that the man was, at any rate, cited before the local branch of the League. And what followed? Within 10 days his house was attacked at night, he was pulled out of bed, and a bullet was shot through his leg. Between that occurrence and the following Sunday the outrage was denounced by the National League. That, he admitted, was plausible. That Sunday the outrage was denounced at Mass; but after Mass the man appeared before the same Court which had denounced him two Sundays previously, expressed regret for what he had done, declared that he had no intention to disregard the jurisdiction of the Court, and he was then exculpated by the Court. Did hon. Members think for one moment that this country would believe that they who exculpated the victim of that outrage were not parties to it?

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON rose to Order, and asked whether it was in Order to impute to hon. Members that they were parties to the shooting of a man in Ireland?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has not imputed outrage to a Member of the House; he was speaking constructively.

MR. MILVAIN said, he was obliged for the ruling. Experience showed that a man who was hard hit invariably made some apology for getting rid of his responsibility. He did not impute that the hon. Member was a party to this outrage; but he did make an imputation constructively. On the face of it, there was a connection between the League which condemned him and the League which afterwards received his submission. [MR. E. HARRINGTON: The League did not denounce him.] In that morning's paper there was an account of an outrage upon a man named Macnamara, who was knocked under the table, and whose life was threatened. No matter what the ulterior object might be, this was a condition of affairs which ought not to be allowed to continue in a civilized community. In answer to the question why Returns were not issued to show how the crimes perpetrated in 1881 compared with those of this year, he would refer to The Irish World, which had said—

"The old method, which made the name of Tipperary a terror, has given place to the passive resistance that neither law nor authority can grapple with. The new system is a thousand times more effective than the blunderbuss. It has the great advantage of being safe and sinless."

This, he presumed, referred to Boycotting; and it showed that Ireland was in the condition of organization which he had described, in which, while outrages were fewer, the law was defied in a manner that was said to be safe and sinless. It was said that the object of the proposed Bill was to exact extortionate rents, and this statement was made on the authority of General Buller. Now, this passage occurred in the evidence of General Buller—

"On the whole, have you found the landlords to be considerate? I think, on the whole, they have been considerate—indeed, I may say that most of them have made great sacrifices."

Why did the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) omit to quote this answer when he quoted the statement that "nobody did anything for the people until the League was established?" It must be presumed that the right hon. Gentleman meant that it was the opinion of General Buller that nobody had done anything for the tenants until the League existed. He asked again whether the evidence of General Buller had escaped the right hon. Gentleman's memory? It had been said that General Buller was an important witness upon this question, and that there was no exceptional legislation required for Ireland to enforce the law. Did General Buller say so? He said—

"I think the League would, if they could, prevent payment of rents, and are now endeavouring to the utmost to prevent rents being paid; but the improvement in the payment of rents is due to the tenants, who are getting reasonable allowances."

And again—

"I believe that the great majority of those who have not paid are anxious to pay. They are anxious to pay?—Yes, I say they are anxious to pay. There are many who do not require an allowance to pay who would pay if they dared."

And he gave reasons why they did not—

that it was partly owing to bad advice and to the teaching of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and others. Upon the evidence of General Buller it must, then, be perfectly apparent that there was a system of terrorism throughout the whole of the Sister Isle which was deeply to be deplored, and which ought, if possible, to be removed. If he might venture to offer the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle a word of advice, he would ask him not to entrust himself too far upon the slippery path upon which he had proceeded. He would tell hon. Members opposite what his own experience had been. There had been, throughout the length and breadth of the land, certain parts of the United Kingdom held up to praise and adoration, such as "poor little Wales" and "dear old Scotland," and last, but not least, there was a portion of the United Kingdom which, for the purpose of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, was called intelligent and civilized, but which, for the purpose of remedial and exceptional legislation, had been denounced as the most depraved and drunken—he referred to the North of England. He believed it to be intelligent and highly civilized, and it was for that reason he denounced exceptional legislation regarding it; but, at the same time, he would remind hon. Members who were venturing upon the slippery path he had alluded to of the experience of the hon. Member who preceded him in the representation of Durham. Mr. Thompson was a Member who allied himself with those who were then denounced by right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench as rebels and assassins, and that was the reason why he was refused re-election at the polling booths in 1885. He (Mr. Milvain) repudiated the name of "coercion" for the Government policy; it was not a policy of coercion. Ireland was at present suffering from coercion. She was now deprived of her Constitutional privileges by the action of the National League. It was to unfetter them, the loyal, law-abiding subjects of the Queen in Ireland, from the thralldom of the National League that he believed the Government wished to press forward their Bill, and for that reason he would support the Motion placed upon the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury.

Mr. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.) said, he desired to state why it was that he would oppose most strongly the Motion for urgency of the right hon. Gentleman. It was not the case that there was any sympathy or any toleration of outrage or violence among Members of the Liberal Party, whether they were the old Members or the newer Members of that Party. He believed it was the desire of the Liberal Party to put an end to outrage, violence, crime, and breaches of the law, where they found them to exist; but what, he should like to know, were the grounds or the facts for claiming priority for a Bill for which there did not appear to be any necessity whatever on the present occasion? He should like to remind the House that the Government had already occupied the whole time of the House so far as the Session had gone. It was, he believed, an absolutely unprecedented thing for a Government, during the first two months of a Session, to occupy the whole time, without allowing private Members any opportunity whatever, either by Motion or Bill, to bring before the House the different questions in which their constituents were interested. He could understand, and he admitted, that there might be circumstances so serious as to justify the Government in asking a still further extension of that indulgence. But before it was done, at least they ought to have some information as to what was the serious condition in Ireland demanding so heavy and so great a sacrifice. What was the cause for coercion? The hon. Gentleman referred to some newspaper paragraph. He should have thought the hon. Gentleman had a pretty good warning as to the value of newspaper statements. The other day there appeared in The Times—a newspaper that they all desired to treat with respect if they could—a statement about an attack upon a man's house in Ireland, with the additional aggravation that a woman had been outraged in the presence of her own father or one of her own family. That statement was actually made the subject of a Question in this House by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), when it turned out that the thing was an absolute fabrication. Notwithstanding, he believed it was the case that in the weekly issue of that same paper, after the admission of the Government that it was false from beginning to end, the statement was repeated and reprinted without a word of qualification, still less of apology. It was therefore incumbent upon them to take the statements made by newspapers with the greatest caution. He did not for a moment impute corrupt motives to the newspapers, but a most deliberate bias and prejudice, a determination to see only one side of a case, and a perfect disregard of logic and of the statements of sensible men on the other side. Now, what were the figures with regard to this matter? There never had been since the Act of Union a proposal of the nature of coercion which had not had at least ten times as strong evidence in support of it as the present. He would not refer to the year 1833, when there were something like 170 or 180 murders actually undetected before the Liberal Government of the day moved for the purpose of bringing in a Coercion Bill. Their predecessors in that House were more jealous of the liberties of the subject than they, in these degenerate times, had become. He would confine himself to the last two occasions when Coercion Bills were brought in. In 1881, the late Mr. Forster brought in a Bill which seemed destined to show how little could be done by coercion for the repression of crime. Mr. Forster then presented a Report of all the outrages in Ireland from 1844 to 1881. Never, since 1845, said Mr. Forster, had there been so many outrages in any year as in 1880. The Report presented by Mr. Forster was, he believed, in many respects erroneous and misleading. During the year 1880, Mr. Forster said, there had been 2,590 outrages, and of those 1,696 had taken place in October, November, and December. More than that, he stated that in the month of December there were more outrages than there were in October and November put together. Thus there was an increased and an increasing amount of crime. Further, it was said that the area of crime was increasing—that crime was spreading to the East of Ireland. That was the case put forward in January, 1881, and it was accompanied by the promise that if the Bill passed no more coercion would be required. The result was that in 1882, when the whole of this country and, he believed, the whole of Ireland was saddened by the Phoenix Park tragedy, another Coercion Bill was introduced by the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). Subsequently Sir George Trevelyan took office as Chief Secretary and explained the case for the Bill. It was that since 1844, in which period the highest amount of crime was 2,590, it had risen in 1881 to 4,439, or nearly four times as much as in 1844. Sir George Trevelyan went further, and stated that for the first four months of 1882 there were 1,879 instances of crime reported to the police. That was the case upon which the Coercion Act of 1882 was based. He was prepared, if necessary for the purpose of maintaining law and order—if there were outrages to any tremendous or alarming extent—to pass the necessary laws for either England, Ireland, or Scotland; but there never yet had been a Ministry who would have dared, on the facts he was now going to refer to as to the existing condition of Ireland, to come forward and ask for such powers for either England or Scotland as were now to be asked in the case of Ireland. What was the case for coercion now? The hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Milvain) had told the House of two outrages which, with an excess of zeal, he had endeavoured to associate with hon. Gentlemen opposite him. He believed that he (Mr. R. T. Reid) had often in former times done injustice to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, although he had never said hard things of them either in or out of the House. The case for coercion now was that during the last three months of 1886—the worst months in the year, the winter months—there had been only 94 outrages, and, further, that there were not so many murders nor so much life lost during that time as there were in the Belfast riots. Yet no suggestion was ever made of bringing forward coercion because of the Belfast riots. He did not doubt that the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) must regret having to bring in coercion. He could not help wishing that the right hon. Gentleman, instead of yielding to the clamour, which he believed came more from his (Mr. R. T. Reid's) side of the House than from the Ministerial side, had had the courage to defy the Unionist Party, and to leave them to the fate which would inevitably come upon them, and which must come to men who would not take the side to which they really belonged, and who would not sit side by side with the men with whom they agreed. What was the condition of Ireland according to the opinion of the resident magistrates? Four Resident Magistrates were called before the Commission. It was impossible to read their evidence without being convinced that they were very strong partizans. Witnesses were not tendered to the Commission by the Nationalist Party, and only to a small degree by the tenant-right party. Yet all these four Resident Magistrates gave evidence which was perfectly inconsistent with there being any necessity for a Coercion Bill for Ireland. Mr. E. R. Warburton, Resident Magistrate at Bantry, a port not far removed from a district supposed to be the worst in Ireland, was asked, Question No. 1,088—

“Have there been many outrages committed in your part of the country on people who have paid their rent?”

He answered—

“There is a kind of system of Boycotting kept up; my district has not been very bad; there have not been many evicted in my part of the country.”

Then he was asked, Question 1,090, “Those who have paid, have they been subject to actual annoyance?” The answer was, “I could not say they have; some few may, but not generally.” There was not much encouragement for coercion from that gentleman. Another witness, Mr. A. Newton Brady, employed as Resident Magistrate in Connemara, had the following Question (1,169) put to him:—

“I gather from the rents being pretty well paid that there is not much combination against their being paid in your district?”

His answer was—

“There have been several instances within my experience; there was one recently.”

And then he went on to refer to an instance where there were joint tenancies; but he gave no evidence to show that there was any such thing as combination; on the contrary, he said the state of his district was very much better than it was four years ago. Then Mr. Francis Blackburne Henn, Resident Magistrate at Ballina, County Mayo, being asked if the landlords were getting their rents without reduction, answered—

"Yes, I think so, fairly well. Question.—That looks as if there was not much combination in the part of the county? Answer.—I consider that no combination exists at present against the payment of rent in the whole of my district."

Mr. H. F. Considine, Resident Magistrate at Kerry, on being asked a similar Question, said—

"I do not know that he (the tenant) is subject to outrage at the present moment, but he is looked upon with disfavour by his fellow tenants—that is, if he pays at a reduction which they consider unfair. Insufficient?—Yes. He is subject to be Boycotted?—I would hardly say Boycotted; he is looked upon with disfavour."

Those were the four gentlemen occupying the position of Resident Magistrates, and the only four Resident Magistrates who were called before the Commission. Now, it seemed to be absolutely clear that this Bill was not levelled against outrage at all, because there was no outrage, but against the National League. They were asked, therefore, to sacrifice all the Bills they took an interest in for the purpose of declaring war against organized opinion. It was for the purpose of putting down, if possible, the National League. Now, he did not believe for a moment that it was desirable to put down the National League. If they could put down the National League he would not put it down, because he believed that the National League was the sole power strong enough to stand between the tenants and unjust evictions and unjust rents. At the same time, he would not hesitate to give the Government power to put down lawlessness if anything like general lawlessness prevailed. The Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) last autumn had been a warning to the Government to provide some remedy; for the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) had told them, with characteristic candour, that he and his Friends would stand by their people, so as to prevent tenants being driven from their farms for non-payment of rents which it was impossible for them to pay. He would have thought that the then Leader of the House (Lord Randolph Churchill) would have extended some consideration to the proposals of the hon. Member for Cork; but that noble Lord had been over-ruled, and the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) made a speech in which he denounced as Socialistic, Communist, and lawless, the idea that a really fair rent ought to be ascertained and enforced, instead of a rent which, though supposed to be fair when fixed, had turned out not to be so; and the noble Lord asked them to have confidence that the landlords would not rigorously exercise their powers. He wondered whether the noble Lord, when he next spoke on the subject, would say so still. Whatever outrage there had been last winter might, he believed, have been averted if the Government had only seen their way to propose some remedy. He did not over-much blame the Government. They were more in the hands of others than in their own; but the alliance was one that could not last for very long. There were opposing forces in this. They would have, he hoped, the honesty of conduct to fight it out when they got rid of those Gentlemen who were neither on one side of the question nor the other; or when they had, as he hoped they might, succeeded in absorbing them on one side or the other, according to the tendencies of their minds. But he could not help thinking that, if the Government even now would endeavour to dispense—though he was afraid it was hopeless—with coercive laws, and would endeavour to bring in Bills for having a purely fair rent fixed, and for dealing with leaseholders, and if they would show some confidence in the people of Ireland, they would be far more likely to carry their point, and establish law and order, than they would be by any number of coercive Bills, however stringent they might be. He felt humiliated to think that, after 80 years, the country at large seemed to have shown itself not able to learn wisdom from experience. They had had Coercion Bills before; but, as he had tried to show, in all the instances of these Coercion Bills there had been proof put forward by the Government of strong disorder prevailing over large parts of the country. The Liberals of those days—many of them—resisted coercion; and he was sorry that, in 1881, he voted for it. If he had known then as much as he knew now he would not have done so; but, at all events, at that time there was a pretence of showing that there was necessity for coercion, and it was difficult for young Members like himself to resist, when it was said that 36 years had elapsed since anything like the crime then existing had been experienced. But it was admitted that Ireland had since been, and was now, comparatively tranquil; and in present circumstances it would be absurd to accuse as sympathizers with outrage those men who declined to place the freedom and Constitutional liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland in the hands of the Executive. He believed the effect of such a proceeding would be to irritate, exasperate, and drive into a temper of ferocity the people of Ireland. But he did not believe that this would take place, because there were a great many Englishmen and Scotsmen who would stand by the Irish Members; and because there was a large and increasing number of men throughout the country who were determined to see that the law in Ireland should be really the same as that in England and Scotland. If it were not for that he should be really afraid; but he could not help believing that hon. Gentlemen, looking forward to the early triumph of the opinions they held in common—that triumph as inevitable as it was near—would counsel their countrymen with all the authority they possessed, and would use all that authority to prevail upon their countrymen to maintain order, and to keep peaceful and quiet, in this, one of the most trying, but, he thought, almost the last, struggle they would have.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK), (Surrey, Guildford), said, he felt sure no one would complain of the tone of the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down. It was not, however, very easy to reconcile the conflicting statements of the hon. and learned Gentleman, who, at one moment, told the House that he was ready to take whatever measures were necessary to maintain the law, and, in the next, regretted his votes in support of the preservation of the law in 1881 and 1882. He (Mr. Brodrick) could not help calling the hon. and learned Gentleman's attention to the fact, that the great number of outrages which occurred in 1881 and 1882 preceded, and did not follow, the measures of coercion, the introduction of which he now deprecated. In 1881 and the beginning of 1882, a variety of crimes and murders of the very worst description were committed which remained undetected until the measure of coercion had been brought in, and, in his opinion, would have remained undetected until this date, but for the measure which the right hon. Gentleman opposite carried into law. The hon. and learned Gentleman now told the House he regretted the vote he gave on that occasion—in other words, he regretted the vote by which the Phoenix Park murderers were convicted; he regretted the vote which restored order to Ireland under Lord Spencer as he was then, not Lord Spencer as he was now—who deprecated any measure which it was proposed now to introduce to restore order and law in Ireland. He (Mr. Brodrick) would call the hon. and learned Gentleman's attention to the fact that some of the quotations he had made as regards intimidation were not entirely borne out by other witnesses. But the case of the Government was not that the number of outrages which had lately taken place was so greatly in excess of those in other years, as alone to justify a measure of an exceptional character; but that there was a gigantic combination, boasted of by its promoters, and acknowledged by its members, which executed its own orders, sentences, and punishments, and which held, in a bond of terrorism, a large number of districts in Ireland. The hon. and learned Member had quoted various passages in order to prove that there was no such combination. The House had heard a great deal about General Buller's evidence before the Cowper Commission in the course of this debate; and the hon. and learned Member seemed to think that he was justified in quoting Sir Redvers Buller's evidence when his authority was found to be on his side, but in abstaining from quoting his remarks when, as Under Secretary, he gave his opinion as to the actual state of order in the country. He ventured to call the hon. and learned Member's attention to a statement in the evidence of Sir Redvers Buller—

"Q. I understand you to say that there is a complete system of intimidation prevailing in this country?—A. There is."

Again, the question was asked by the President of the Commission—

"They are still in fear of the League?—A. They are coerced, and in fear of the intimidation that is rampant in this country."

MR. DILLON: Did he say "country" or "county?"

MR. BRODRICK said, the gallant General spoke of the country generally, and the word used was "country." Now he wished to know, in the face of these facts, whether the observation of the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Rowntree), which was loudly cheered by hon. Members from Ireland and by those hon. Members who sat around him, to the effect that the National League was an organization for which he could find no word of reprobation, and which was every bit as legal and as proper as the organizations of the Liberal and Conservative Parties in this country, was not a comparison which reflected on the intelligence of the House? He asked the House whether they were to accept some portions of the Blue Book, and to ignore all the other portions which bore on the question? Her Majesty's Government had admitted that in the Report of the Commissioners reasons were found for introducing a measure with regard to the land; but, at the same time, he asked whether they were to ignore all those portions of the Commissioners' Report which clearly indicated the lawless state of the country. He called attention to the passage in the Commissioners' Report describing the effects of Boycotting. The Commissioners said—

"This unwritten law in some districts is supreme. We deem it right to call attention to the terrible ordeal that a Boycotted person has to undergo."

The hon. Member for Scarborough said, that he would not support a law which was the oppressor of innocence and not the avenger of crime and wrong. He (Mr. Brodrick) would ask the hon. Member whether, in the case of the Curtin family, the law had been the oppressor of innocence? Why, a more terrible case of oppression of an innocent family never disgraced the annals of the Irish people! Mr. Curtin was not a landlord; he was a member of the Land League. The evidence states—

"There was no antecedent animosity to him?—None that I am aware of. To what do you attribute the ill-feeling raised against this unfortunate family?—Because, in the first place, Curtin defended his house and shot this man Sullivan"—

[MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Who is the witness?]

"and because his family had the courage to come forward and give evidence against those concerned."

MR. T. M. HEALY: Who says that?

MR. BRODRICK said it was immaterial. It was well known that the statement was correct.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Who says so?

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I rise to Order, Sir. I want to know whether the hon. Member is in Order in reading quotations, and in refusing to give the names?

MR. SPEAKER ignored the question, and called upon Mr. Brodrick.

MR. BRODRICK said, that as hon. Members were anxious to know the name of the witness, he had no objection to mention it to them; it was that of Mr. Heffernan Considine.

MR. T. M. HEALY: He is a Resident Magistrate.

MR. BRODRICK said, none the less the statement was true, and it was to this effect, that the Curtin family attempted to defend their father when attacked by Moonlighters; they were threatened with violence and treated with disrespect at church on Sundays; the police had to charge the people and disperse them when the Curtins attended mass, and they were molested and ill-treated by their neighbours in every possible way. The House would see, and everyone would also see, that the animosity in this particular case had not been directed against a landlord or a Protestant, but was a deliberate persecution of a family who had been deprived of their parent, and who, not even so, could escape the vengeance of the people. It would also see that there was at present no power in the law to protect these people; and, in these circumstances, and in face of such statements, he wished to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. R. T. Reid) whether he could say that there was no combination or terrorism, no difficulty in enforcing the law, and nothing which called for an effort to see that the law was administered as it was in this country? If they were to accept as true that there was no terrorism, because there were no outrages, they would have to ignore the statement made by hon. Members below the Gangway—that they would find a more formidable weapon than outrage, which it was impossible for the tenants to disobey. The hon. and learned Gentleman had read to the House one question with regard to outrages, leaving out the two preceding questions. He would read those omitted questions to the House. Mr. Warburton was asked—

“With regard to combination to prevent the payment of rent, if a man does pay his rent, is he subject to annoyance?—Most certainly; I have known tenants’ wives come at night to the agents and give money, and they would not even take a receipt for fear the receipt would be seen with them. What are they actually afraid of—being outraged or Boycotted?—Afraid of the National League hearing it—they think it undesirable.”

Yet the hon. and learned Gentleman quoted the succeeding questions, in which something was said about Boycotting not being bad in the district, as proof that it was not a question of combination at all.

Mr. R. T. REID said, he had never suggested that. He was trying to show that there was no outrage according to the statements of the Resident Magistrates, and the question he quoted dealt with that charge. He had not denied that there was some combination. The National League was a combination, and he had spoken of it.

Mr. BRODRICK said, the hon. and learned Member had quoted evidence given on the 15th of October to show that there was no combination in the district, and argued from that that there was no combination now. He (Mr. Brodrick) would point out to the hon. and learned Member that the Plan of Campaign was published on the 23rd of October; and General Buller, in his evidence on the 11th of November, distinctly stated that, although there had been no combination in the district, yet, after the visit of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and his Friends, the combination began and terrorism immediately ensued. He presumed that the learned Member would not get up and tell the House that terrorism should be allowed to prevail unchecked, so long as outrages did not mount to the requisite level. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), who moved the Amendment, had assumed that the main difficulty was to be found in the question of rents. Did the right hon. Gentleman attempt to present to the House any case as to the general harshness of the landlords on which his Amendment appeared to be founded? No; but he had taken a few isolated and individual instances, and his proposition appeared to be, that no matter how bad the seasons, no matter how broken the tenant, or how incapable, or how thriftless, or how unable he was to do his duty by the soil, or in any future year to pay his rent, supposing that he had not paid it at this moment, the landlord was bound to continue him in his holding. A proposition more disastrous for the interests of the country he (Mr. Brodrick) could not imagine. The House was told that owing to the existence of a species of terrorism the tenants had been prevented from going into the Land Court; but since 1881, 176,000 tenants had gone through the Land Court, and this number was largely in excess of those who might have taken advantage of the Act, but who had not done so. He never believed that the Land Act could possibly succeed in producing general contentment, because it perpetuated a dual ownership which had broken down, and made it worse by setting up the system of tenant-right—set up where it had not existed before. The contention put forward in 1881, by all who had studied the laws of political economy, was that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was putting the landlord in a position which no man on earth ought to be asked to occupy, and that the advantage given to the tenant, though very substantial in the case of the present tenant, would be a heavy burden on the future tenant. The further you got from the Land Act of 1881 the heavier would be that burden as the present tenants died out. He might illustrate his argument by a reference to an estate with which he was intimately acquainted. The rent of the farm was £60, and the Commissioners refused to make a reduction, on the ground that this was a fair rent. At the same time, though the man had not had the holding more than two years, and proved no expenditure of any sort on improvements, the Commissioners gave him £300 for his tenant-right. [An hon. MEMBER: They were bound by law to do so.] The succeeding tenant borrowed, and the interest on the purchase-money, added to the rent, making his rent £84, instead of £60, drove him to the landlord with a request for a reduction of 40 or 50 per cent in his rent. He (Mr. Brodrick) was not defending landlords who demanded rents which were paid in more prosperous years; but when rents had been fixed by the Courts, and the tenant had chosen to pay a large sum for nothing but the privilege of paying that fixed rent, then they had no right to make the landlord the only loser. There were good landlords and bad landlords; but no case whatever had been made out to show the universality of a system of exaction, on which the right hon. Member for Newcastle asked the Government for the time being to interfere with the due administration of the law; and that debate was not likely to improve the chance of arrangements being come to between landlords and tenants in Ireland. It might be a necessary debate, in order that the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian should establish his case against the landlords. But he would ask the House whether the hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay) did not strike the right chord last night, when he told them that, if the Government had undertaken to deal with the rent question as their first and only measure, they would have been met by the right hon. Gentleman opposite with an Amendment on the question of Home Rule. The Irish landlords were to bear the brunt of the battle, and it was just as well that they should know what they were to suffer. He knew of nothing that had occurred since 1881 which should have changed the opinion then expressed by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, when he said that the Irish landlords had stood their trial, and that, as a rule, they had been acquitted. He repeated that he knew of nothing which had occurred since 1881 to cause a change in the right hon. Gentleman's views. Was there anything in the evidence before the Royal Commission?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Yes, a great deal; in the whole of the judicial rents.

MR. BRODRICK said, there were no judicial rents in those days.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: But since.

MR. BRODRICK said, he must confess that he did not entirely follow the right hon. Gentleman in the distinction he made, because the judicial rents which were now said to be exacting were infinitely less, and the reductions voluntarily given by landlords, were infinitely greater than was the case before 1881. They had, however, gone to school again in morality since 1881, and they had got on to a fresh tack, in which they were told that if they only did justice Irishmen would meet them, and always would endeavour to meet them, halfway. Well, he would investigate for a moment the justice of that contention. Parliament, in 1881, made a great attempt to do justice to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman opposite led the way. The Land Act was passed in August, and what was the answer? Why, in October they were met halfway, for they had a response in the shape of the No Rent Manifesto of the hon. Member for Cork, who immediately commenced marching through rapine to the disintegration of the Empire. In the face of that experience, he (Mr. Brodrick) was curious to learn whether the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would get up in his place and ask the House to confide in the generous feeling of the Irish people, as a ground for putting off all measures for the maintenance of law and order, and to set themselves vigorously to work again to secure, as in 1881, the settlement of the Land Question, in the hope of a general pacification of Ireland. The question seemed to be whether, not having been able to carry the country with them, right hon. Gentlemen opposite thought they could persuade Parliament to govern Ireland as they wished to govern it, or that they would be allowed to make all government in Ireland impossible until they had attained the end at which they were aiming? They asked the Government not merely to make a compromise with crime, but to subordinate law to the conception of justice which was held by a minority in that House. He hoped that the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt)—to assist whom they had sat up so much at nights when he occupied the Treasury Bench—would explain to them how he was going to reconcile his present attitude with the contention he used to put forward, that remedial measures might follow, but that the law must first be maintained. How was that quandary now to be got rid of? Not that he would himself found any argument on such a moving monument of inconsistency.

ency as the right hon. Member for Derby; but that right hon. Member's declarations would remain fixed in the memory of the House, however often his opinions might be changed. And when the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) threatened them with the vengeance of their constituents if they took the course which the Government were determined to pursue, he (Mr. Brodrick) told the hon. Member, that if they neglected the primary duty of enforcing an equal observance of the law in all parts of the United Kingdom, they might then justly fear to face their constituents. The Government had no apology to make for the way in which they had presented that Resolution to the House; but they felt that they should have had to apologize, and would have failed in the performance of their duty, if they had not placed before the House the serious state of Ireland at this moment. He believed the grave facts which his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland would place before the House would be ample justification, to all who took an impartial view of the situation, for the Government asking for the whole time of the House. It was in that conviction that they would submit their proposals to the House, and would expect to earn, as he believed they would deserve, the confidence of the House and the country.

Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) said, he thought that it would not be right that the whole of the time of the House should be given to the Government, as now demanded, unless they first made out a very strong case of urgency. Such a strong case had not yet been made out, and, therefore, he and his hon. Friends felt bound to resist that demand. The hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Brodrick) had mistaken the contention of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid). They did not deny that some combination existed in Ireland; they did not maintain that the law was everywhere perfectly enforced, or that the present state of that country was in all respects satisfactory; but they said—and it was proved by evidence in the Cowper Commission Blue Book as well as by facts known to them all from the ordinary public channels—that that state was not an exceptional one, but a state in which the elements of good and the tendencies to improvement were overcoming the effects of the evils which remained from a former time, and that it was certainly unlike any previous state of Ireland upon which had been grounded the application for a Coercion Bill. His right hon. Friends the Members for Wolverhampton and Newcastle (Mr. H. H. Fowler and Mr. John Morley), on the previous night, had shown how exorbitant rents were in Ireland, and how that Bill would not be so much a Bill for the repression of disorder as one for the better recovery of unjust rents. He would leave that part of the case where his right hon. Friends had left it; but he would invite attention to another aspect of the question. They must look at the proposal of the Government that the House should give all its time to a measure of coercion as part of a general scheme. It was part of a scheme, the essence of which was that the House should make its choice—its inevitable choice—between coercion and conciliation in favour of coercion. They stood now, as they had often done before, at the separation of two ways; they had now the choice between governing Ireland with the will of the people with them, and governing Ireland against the will of the people. The Government asked Parliament to choose the course of governing against the people. This was, he supposed, to be taken as the beginning of that 20 years of firm government which Lord Salisbury had announced as his specific for Ireland. He did not desire to indulge in any of the conventional recriminations of the Front Benches. The case was too serious, too melancholy. He would assume that the Government desired to do right, and believed that the course they proposed was the best. He agreed with them in attaching the highest importance to restoring law and order in Ireland. The basis of the proposals of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) last year was the restoration of social order in Ireland, which was one of the greatest needs in Ireland. But the question he desired to put was this—Would the Government policy of coercion restore law and order? Was there any probability of its achieving this or changing the minds of the Irish people? Would it, in the long run, work for peace and union? Let them answer these questions by the light of experience. Neither the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) nor the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) said one word last night as to any previous Coercion Bills, and an intelligent foreigner listening to them would have have supposed that they were proposing for the first time an exceptional measure of this kind. But since the Union in 1800 there had been 86 Coercion Bills, and this was the 87th which was being introduced in the year 1887. During those 86 years there had not been three consecutive years during which Ireland was free from exceptional repressive legislation. But it was admitted that this legislation had failed—the fact that another of these Bills—an unusually severe one—was being now introduced was proof of this. The condition of Ireland was now described by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in much the same terms as those used by the previous Chief Secretaries who introduced the previous Bills. It was not alleged by him that the Irish people had been rendered any better disposed to law and order now than at any time since the Union, or less averse to combination against the land laws. The case now put forward was that the tendency to combination was stronger than ever, which was tantamount to saying that the people were more united against the English Government than ever they were before. If all these Bills had failed, was there any ground for believing that this Bill would succeed any better than its predecessors? There were, at any rate, three requisites for any measure of this kind. In the first place, it ought to be a permanent and not a limited Bill. Nothing could be more ill-advised than the past system of alternate blows and caresses. He did not know whether it was the intention of the Government to make this Bill permanent or to limit its operations to a certain period, but even if it were made permanent in form, it could not be maintained permanently. There might be a General Election in a few months—there must be one before very long—and it was perfectly certain that the country would not keep a Conservative Government permanently in power for the purpose of keeping up coercion. The temporary majority of the Government would disappear, and the 86 Home Rule Members for Ireland might again hold the balance between Parties. What would happen in that case? The Conservative Party would act as they acted in June, 1885, when they stated that they had discovered that the time for Coercion Bills had passed, and when Lord Salisbury, in his speech at Newport a little later, pointed out that Coercion Bills were useless against illegal combinations and associations. On the other hand, if the Liberal Party came into power its course would be clear. They condemned this policy of coercion and could never return to it, and they had declared that the only policy in which they saw any hope was a policy of conciliation. They would, therefore, take the first opportunity that fortune and Providence threw into their hands of giving effect to that policy. Even if the English and Scottish people were as anxious to maintain the present form of the Union as the Tory Party believed, they would not give impunity to right hon. Gentlemen opposite for all the other mistakes in their home and foreign policy which they were likely to commit, and which every Government must commit. The day of power of the Conservative Party could not be very long, and when it came to an end so would coercion. It was impossible, therefore, to look forward to a sustained course of repression. It must also be borne in mind that it could not be said that at the present moment public opinion was in favour of coercion. That question was not before the electors at the last General Election in July last. Indeed, not a few of the Members sitting behind the Government then declared that they were opposed to coercion. Coercion required also to be unshrinkingly administered, and this it was not likely to be so long as it was liable to be impeached by hon. Members for Ireland sitting in that House. If they desired to make it thoroughly effective, why did they not propose to suspend Irish representation? It would be easier for them to work their will in Ireland if they were exposed to no questionings here. To enable repressive legislation to bring about any permanent improvement in the attitude of the Irish people, large discretionary powers should be given to the Government, which purpose of compelling landlords to act equitably and generally for mitigating the harshness of the law. Coercion such as this Bill proposed was really an exercise of despotic power, wholly inconsistent with the genius of the British Constitution. For its due administration there ought to be large discretionary powers in the hands of the Executive Government. In all despotic Governments the Executive was armed with discretionary powers against the rich as well as against the poor. Every Indian official would tell them that the Indian Government reserved to itself large discretionary powers in the application of the laws of that country. It did not allow the landlords to exercise with severity their legal powers against their tenants, but restrained them when it saw that the enforcement of the legal right was likely to work a moral wrong. That was essential to the proper action of a despotic Government; and in this case also the Executive must have a discretionary power to mitigate the harshness of the law. The revenues of the Roman Empire were largely derived from the land tax, and the Imperial Government when a bad year came remitted the Land Tax. The gravest charge made against a harsh Emperor was that he neglected to make these remissions. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had tried to put in force a discretionary power, and he hoped the stern logical consistency of his right hon. Friend opposite would not prevent him from following so good an example. It might happen that this Bill would succeed better than previous Coercion Bills if the circumstances under which it was introduced were more favourable to coercive legislation than the circumstances of former times. Let them cast their eyes back to the year 1833, when the first Liberal Government, after a long Tory reign, introduced a Coercion Bill; or let them look at the year 1846, and ask whether the chances for the success of a measure of coercion were greater now than they were then. The circumstances differed in every point for the worse, that is, they were altogether against the prospects of a successful and permanently beneficial coercive measure. In 1833 and 1846 the people of Ireland were feeble and disheartened, whereas now they were strong and emboldened by the recollection of their recent successes. At the former periods they stood alone in the world; but now they appealed to the Irish people all the world over, and derived a moral as well as a pecuniary support, which was of the utmost importance in reference to this question. In 1833 and 1846 little was known in this country about the way in which the Irish Government was conducted; but now they knew that those about the Castle, and, to a large extent, those who conducted the Irish Government throughout the country, were discredited before England and distrusted by the Irish people. Again, in 1833 and 1846 the Irish Party in that House was small, whereas now it constituted five-sixths of the representation of the country. Then the two great English Parties were practically agreed in supporting coercive legislation; but now one of those Parties had condemned coercion, and chosen a policy of conciliation. He believed there never was a time when a Coercion Bill passed by a purely Party Vote. Again, in 1833 and 1846 the electoral power of this country was in the hands of the upper and middle classes, and the middle classes were accustomed to take their lead from above. Now, however, we lived in a very different time. Our electorate consisted of the great mass of the working people all over the country. It was in their hands that the ultimate power of this country lay, and they knew that those people regarded repressive legislation with the greatest dislike, and disapproved exceptional legislation for one part of the United Kingdom, because they thought the same laws ought to prevail in England, Scotland, and Ireland. In every point, therefore, the prospect of the success of coercion was worse than it was in 1833 and 1846. He might also add the experience of 1881 and 1883; but he would not do so, because that subject had been dealt with by his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries. He might, however, remind the hon. Member who answered his hon. Friend's speech that the outrages in that year did not diminish under the operation of the Coercion Act. There could not be a man better fitted to work coercion than the late Mr. Forster, and there could not be a Government fitter than the Government of 1881 to see that the powers given to them should not be abused. Well, under Mr. Forster's administration, the number of arrests increased till at last 1,000 persons were imprisoned in Ireland without any trial.

MR. BRODRICK said, that he spoke of the Coercion Bill of 1882, which Mr. Forster had not to administer.

MR. BRYCE said, he could tell the hon. Member that, under Mr. Forster's administration of the Coercion Act, while 1,000 persons were imprisoned without trial, the outrages which numbered 200 in February 1881, had risen to 500 a-month in 1882. As to the Crimes Act of 1882, if the present Government thought so well of it, why did they refuse to renew it in 1885; why did they take credit that autumn for not having renewed it? If hon. Gentlemen opposite had so much regard for the Act of 1882 why did not they renew it in 1884? Cromwell succeeded in a resolute policy, but he looked among hon. Members opposite in vain for a Cromwell. Nor, if he turned to the other House, did he find a Cromwell in their fitful and impetuous Prime Minister. The difference between Cromwell and Lord Salisbury was this—Cromwell spoke badly and acted firmly, Lord Salisbury spoke brilliantly and acted weakly. There was none of the spirit of Cromwell in hon. Members opposite, and the less they attempted to wear the armour of that hero the better for themselves. He thought no case could be pointed out in which a democratic Government had succeeded in coercing into friendship and love another nationality which formed a part of the same democracy. The case of Switzerland and the Sonderbund war of 1846 could not fairly be cited as a case in point. When it ended in the victory of the Protestant Cantons, self-government was restored to the defeated cantons, and they again became responsible for law and order in their own territories. Perhaps the case of the United States would be quoted. But after the North had conquered the Southern States they set up governments of their own in every State. Those governments were supported by large armed forces, and under those governments and under those armed forces there broke out a series of horrible outrages far worse, far more frequent, and far more atrocious in their circumstances than any which had occurred in Ireland.

Hon. Gentlemen would find if they read the American reports of that period that there were Southern States where outrages were more serious and more numerous than those which any Chief Secretary of Ireland had ever had to deal with. They were continued and carried out by secret associations similar to those which had frequently given trouble in Ireland. In one State—Tennessee—there had been within one period of six months an average of one murder for each day, and many of the other States were not much better. The Reports he had referred to read exactly like the speech of a Chief Secretary asking for a Coercion Bill. The Northern States perceived that secret combinations were more and more supported by the people, that juries would not convict, and, in short, that all the circumstances which characterized Irish disorder existed. They then, with the characteristic practical good sense of the American, at last changed their course, and in 1876 President Hayes withdrew the Northern Armies from the South, genuine self-government was restored, the outrages ceased, and from that time till now the Southern States had been a peaceably-governed country. He challenged hon. Members to look into this case of America, which had been so often quoted, and he believed that the more they looked the more they would find that one Democracy could not govern another except upon the principles of self-government. Never were the teachings of history more plain and simple than in the matter of Irish government, and the most curious point about it was that at all times the wisest men had pointed out the true course. He might give many an instance of the warnings given by those who knew Ireland and the wants of Ireland; but he would content himself with two only—Edmund Burke and Lord Wellesley. Burke spoke words as applicable to Ireland now as then. He said—

“The people ought to look well about them, and that the physicians ought to take care not to irritate the patient. It was foolish to have the better of a patient in a dispute; the complaint and its cause ought to be removed and wise lenient arts ought to be employed; those lenient arts ought to be the primary object of the Government. . . Call the process what they pleased it would consist of cavalry, infantry, and artillery and nothing else.”

The words of Lord Wellesley in 1834 were—

[Second Night]

"The truth is Ireland will never be quieted by these annual expedients of suspending the laws and constitution of the realm. We must endeavour, as soon as possible, to return to the ordinary laws and to be satisfied with a vigorous and pure administration of justice. Until we are fixed on that rock we shall never know genuine peace or security."

Those warnings from the men who knew Ireland best had been neglected. They might be renewed now. The Act of the Government would not have the effect of securing social order and a due observance of the law, any more than the Acts of previous Administrations. It would have some effect, no doubt. It would have the result of making things worse. It would drive discontent underground; it would substitute conspiracy for agitation; it would substitute midnight conclaves of desperate men for the free meeting on the open hillside; and it would embitter the feelings of the English and the Irish people against one another. The Government asked the House to look down a long vista, in which could be seen crime, outrage, hatred, revenge, and murder in many an abhorrent form; but there was one thing which could not be seen—no, not even at the end of it—and that was peace or order. If they wanted peace and order, the Government should see that the law—which they themselves confessed was not just—was made just. Let them begin by making it just, and enlist upon their side popular sympathy, confidence, and support—support which would never be given to an unjust law, and without which no law could ever strong.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.) said, that if he understood the object of the Government aright it was not so much to increase the stringency of the present Criminal Law as to increase its efficiency. It was the desire of the Government that the Criminal Law as at present existing should be more efficient in its working, so that the conviction of offenders should be obtained. He proposed to follow the Government in this Motion by voting for urgency, not so much on the ground of urgency in connection with the Criminal Law Amendment Bill which was to be introduced, as on the ground that it was the easiest and the simplest way of obtaining access to that remedial legislation without which it was impossible to see Ireland once more in a settled condition. What remedial legislation could be more necessary than to endeavour to make the law operative in Ireland? At the present moment it was not operative, and if the proposals of the Government tended in the direction of making the law operative, he thought that would be a distinct step towards remedial legislation—to be followed by remedial legislation in the shape of an improvement in the land laws, which was very much needed. If the proposed Bill of the Government, the details of which were as yet unknown to them, was coercive in the bad sense of the term, it would meet from him determined opposition. [Laughter.] Had hon. Members below the Gangway seen the inside of the Bill? If they had not, then what right had they to laugh? He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the statement he made to the House last night that he would introduce, either in that House or in the "other place," legislation of a remedial character in connection with the Land Question. He thought a firm administration of the existing and amended law, combined with a judicious removal of all admitted grievances, would be the best way, and the only effective way, of producing peace in that unhappy country. He was glad to find that amongst the grievances it was proposed to remedy was that in connection with the leaseholders, especially in the North of Ireland, to whom most of the happiness and prosperity of the country was owing. He hoped the remedial measures of the Government would include some assistance to those tenants who had purchased their holdings under the Bright clauses of the Land Act, and also to those tenants who had purchased their holdings under the Church Act. These measures were only alleviative, and he believed the real method of settling the Irish Land Question was to be found in the abolition of dual ownership. While, in the present condition of Public Business, it was difficult to introduce and pass a Bill dealing with that subject, he trusted that such a measure would at no distant date be introduced and pushed forward; and that they should see a fair and honest attempt made by the Government to put an end to the dual ownership of land in Ireland. There had been an attempt made by the Conservative Government in this direction by the Land Purchase Act of Lord Ashbourne; and he thought that was an Act the operation of which would be of advantage to the country in time to come. He said that, notwithstanding that he was opposed to the purchase scheme proposed by the late Prime Minister. One advantage of Lord Ashbourne's scheme was that it was on a small scale, and that purchase would be gradual over the entire country. He believed a larger system of purchase, such as was proposed by the late Prime Minister, was accompanied with difficulty connected with State ownership of land, which would vanish or become extremely small when land purchase was carried into effect by a series of smaller schemes. It was said that no purchase schemes would be carried out until rents were finally fixed at their proper level; but, where rents were too high, if the number of years' purchase was reduced, a fair price would thereby be obtained. The Party of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) did not appear very anxious to see the Land Question settled; but this was probably due to the fact that they recognized that if the Land Question was settled there would be an end to the agitation in the country. A Bill had been introduced by his hon. Friend one of the Members for Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), and that had met with but scant courtesy at their hands, though it dealt with the question of leaseholds in a way that would have assisted the House in deciding the question. If they could see the Land Question settled, he believed that the whole of the question of Home Rule would be settled along with it. [A laugh.] That did not seem to meet with the approval of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, but he thought they ought to give the matter a trial. It had frequently been said that the question they had to decide was justice to Ireland, but that was not altogether the case. The question was not alone justice to Ireland. It was almost impossible, from the circumstances of the case, to render justice. The circumstances under which they were surrounded were those created by past injustice, and when the past injustice had existed for a certain length of time, that length of time mellowed the injustice. No evil could ever be entirely undone. If we endeavoured to produce that state of things it would be sure to create a new state of things from which fresh injustice would arise, and he therefore asked hon. Members when they took up this question to consider it was not only to do justice to Ireland that they wanted, but to see how to do the greatest amount of justice with the least amount of injustice. The question they had before them in solving the Irish problem was how to do that which was best, and at the same time to do as little evil and wrong as they could. He hoped the Motion for urgency would be carried by a large majority, and that they would get a happier subject for discussion, and if that were so, then this Session of Parliament and this Jubilee year of Her Majesty would be signalized by an endeavour to redress some of the evils of the past, and would be a happy omen and augury for the future.

Mr. LOCKWOOD (York) said, they had heard a good many reasons for passing a measure of coercion for Ireland; but the hon. Member who had just sat down was entitled to the credit of suggesting an entirely new one—namely, that as this was the Jubilee year, therefore it was a pity there should not be a Coercion Bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR said, the ironical expression of the hon. and learned Member for York was not in any sense attributable to himself. He had merely suggested the occasion of the Jubilee year as a reason for passing remedial measures.

Mr. LOCKWOOD said, he thought when the hon. Member referred to the Jubilee year, he referred to it in connection with some matter relevant to the subject of debate; but now it appeared that he was referring to it in connection with some matter not relevant to the debate, and he appeared to have concealed that fact from the Speaker, or he would have, no doubt, been called to Order. It was, to say the least, an unfortunate expression. The position of the hon. Member, however, was somewhat peculiar. The hon. Member was, as far as he (Mr. Lockwood) could understand, in a somewhat peculiar position. He was, he believed, a Scotch Unionist-Liberal. [An hon. MEMBER: Irish-Scotch.] Well, perhaps he (Mr. Lockwood) had better not inquire too closely what the hon. Member was; but, before leaving the hon. Member, he might say that his hon. Friend seemed not to be quite sure of his position in regard to the ment measure, and he (Mr. Lockwood) would advise hon. Gentlemen opposite not just yet to reckon on the hon. Member's support. He appeared to retain an "open mind." He had not seen the Bill; none of them had seen it; and he was not quite sure whether the Government were going to do an act of justice, or what he called mellowed injustice. His advice to the Government seemed to be—"Try justice; and if that does not do, try your old mellowed injustice." But with regard to the Bill not yet having been seen, he (Mr. Lockwood) wanted to know whose fault was that? If, when he was moving for urgency, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had laid the Bill upon the Table, hon. Members would have known what it was, and would have been able to make up their minds whether they would support it or not. But he ventured to say that, after all, when the hon. Member (Mr. Sinclair) saw the Bill, he would give his vote against it, and with the Party to which he had once the honour to belong. [Mr. SINCLAIR: And still belong.] The hon. Member made one other observation to which he must allude. He said that to vote for the Motion of urgency would be the easiest and quickest way of getting the Bill before them. But if the Government, and if the Chief Secretary for Ireland knew what the Bill was to be, why, in the name of all that was wonderful, could they not tell the House at once? If they had made up their minds, why could they not say so without any further beating about the bush? The Chief Secretary for Ireland, last night, reproached the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) for having criticized a Bill which he had not seen. Well, of course, he had not seen it, as the Government had not produced it; but he (Mr. Lockwood) ventured to say that the right hon. Gentleman had a much shrewder and more correct idea of what the Coercion Bill would be than the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself had of what was the nature of the remedial measure which the Government premised, and would be forthcoming some day. They had been told that, at the earliest possible moment, information would be placed before the House of the serious condition of Ireland which rendered coercion necessary. Why then, he asked, did not the Chief Secretary for Ireland last night place before the House the facts, if they were in the possession of the Government, to justify the course which the Government were taking? The Financial Secretary to the War Office sought to justify the course which the Government was taking by calling attention to the Curtin murder; but hon. Members had not yet forgotten the discussion in that House in reference to that unhappy murder, and how it was shown that, though the murder took place before the General Election, not a word was said about it till after the Election was over. If the Curtin murder justified a Coercion Bill, it justified it last November as much as it did now. Reference had also been made to the dispute between Conway and the National League; but he thought it was clear beyond dispute that the local branch of the National League passed a resolution of sympathy and condolence with Conway in respect to the outrage. ["Oh, oh!"] He considered that charges such as had been made against the National League should not be made when the foundation for them was so base as it was in this case. But to return to the question of urgency. He believed that what the Government asked them to do was practically to postpone all legislation in that House, for the purpose of enabling the Government to bring in a measure of coercion against Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had complained of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, not only for criticizing the unseen Bill, but for not making any suggestions himself for alternative legislation for Ireland. He (Mr. Lockwood) thought that if there was one Member in that House against whom such a charge should not have been made, it was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, who was intimately associated with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in the preparation of the Home Rule Bill, which would have given peace and contentment to Ireland by satisfying the national and natural aspirations of the people. There was one other subject to which he (Mr. Lockwood) wished to allude—it was to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay), which was delivered last night. The hon. and learned Member called the attention of the House to a statement made by Lord Macaulay; and he (Mr. Lockwood) was anxious to see under what circumstances Lord Macaulay had made the statement quoted. He knew his hon. and learned Friend sufficiently well to be certain that if he had known the circumstances under which those remarks of Lord Macaulay were made, he would have informed the House of them.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood further adjourned till To-morrow.

MOTION.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL — DEBATE ON THE MOTION FOR URGENCY.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): On the Motion for Adjournment, I wish to express a hope that there will be no undue delay, and that the House will come to a speedy conclusion on the preliminary debate on the Motion before it. The Government, as I stated, attach great importance to the measure which they propose to introduce. It is one upon which the existence of the Government is at stake; and, therefore, an early decision on so grave a question is one which we invite the House to take in the interests of the country at large. I have observed with regret that hon. Gentlemen representing, in a more prominent measure, the views of a large section of the Representatives of Ireland have not yet taken part in the debate. I hope they will not refrain from doing so, if it is a question in which they take an interest. I am sure my hon. Friends on this side of the House will refrain, if it be needful for them to do so, so as to afford an opportunity for hon. Members from Ireland taking their full share in the discussion which is now proceeding. At the same time, I am sure the House will admit that this preliminary discussion should be brought to an end without undue and protracted debate; and I believe it will be for the convenience of the House that that course should be taken. I had hoped, from the communication which had passed, it would be possible to have arrived at that conclusion to-morrow evening; but I understand that is not now the view at present held by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I am most anxious to consult the convenience of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, and the House generally; but the interests of the country are at stake. [Laughter.] Yes, I say the interests of the country are at stake, and, under the circumstances which I have stated to the House, I trust there will be no undue delay in arriving at a decision.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I cannot complain of the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has addressed the House; but I am sorry that he has thought it necessary to complain that many Gentlemen from Ireland—

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I did not complain, but regret—

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Well, regret that they have not spoken in this debate. I must confess I think it would have been an unfortunate circumstance if the conduct of the debate had been mainly left in the hands of those who do not represent that country; and I also think there would be a great advantage in the intervention of Representatives from Ireland in the discussion. I certainly should have been very glad to see this debate brought to a close at an early period. But I do not feel that I can go now, without irregularity, into an explanation of the circumstances which, in my opinion, have led to its prolongation. I shall endeavour to do that in the course of the debate. I am afraid it is not possible to come to any understanding that the debate shall close to-morrow. While I hope there will be no disposition on this side of the House to undue prolongation of the debate; on the other hand, I hope right hon. Gentlemen will recollect that the Bill is important, and the fate of the Government is staked upon it; these are reasons why the discussion should not be unduly restricted, and why sufficient intervals should be allowed for the consideration of the Bill before the House is called upon to pronounce a definitive judgment upon it.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) has noticed that none of the more prominent Members from Ireland have spoken in the debate. They have not done so for three reasons. In the first place, my hon. Friends have been kept up all the night before the introduction of the Motion in order that money should be voted for the Government. They cannot be expected, therefore, to have spoken yesterday in the discussion after an All-night Sitting. Another reason is that with regard to this day it is not usual for prominent Members of any Party to speak on a Wednesday, unless a private Member's Bill is before the House. We do not desire, many of us, to speak on this Motion; but there are five or six of my hon. Friends, including myself, who desire to have something to say before the Question is put from the Chair. I make this statement on behalf of the Party.

QUESTION.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— THE DISTURBANCE AT YOUGHAL— THE INQUEST ON HANLON.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he is aware whether the Coroner's Warrants, which had been issued yesterday for the arrest of Inspector Somerville and Sub-constable Garrett Ward for the wilful murder of Hanlon during the recent disturbances at Youghal have been executed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): My knowledge is confined to what I have seen in the newspapers. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; it is not usual that these things should be communicated to the Attorney General. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will get a report on the subject in due course.

MR. SEXTON: Can any Member of the Irish Government assure us that the warrants will be executed?

MR. HOLMES: Yes. I assure the hon. Member that the warrants will be executed.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—AFFAIRS OF SWAZI- LAND.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON, in rising to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the probability of a filibustering attack being made upon Swaziland; whether any communications have been made to the Transvaal Government on the subject, or what other steps the Government propose to take in the matter? said, he would briefly state the reasons which had induced him to place the Question on the Paper. It would be in the recollection of their Lordships, that, after the Convention of London, a line of frontier was traced by competent Commissioners with great accuracy, and marked out with large cairns of stones; and so it remained until about a year ago. Papers had since been placed in the hands of their Lordships which showed that a Boer, who was known only by his Oaffre name, but whom there was no difficulty in identifying, had removed the boundary stones, and had substituted others at a very considerable distance from the true boundary; and a messenger from the Transvaal Government had demanded that the people within the altered boundary should admit the Suzerainty of the Transvaal Government. The reply was, that they relied on British protection. But they were reminded that the British Forces had been beaten not so long ago at Majuba Hill, and that there was not much to be expected from that quarter. The people of Swaziland then sent to the Acting Commissioner at Natal, stating their grievance, and asking for advice. A remonstrance was sent to the Transvaal Government, who took no notice of it. A telegram was then sent, and the reply was, that the matter was still under consideration, and that the facts had not yet been ascertained. A despatch had been sent from this country approving the action of the Natal Government; but he wished the despatch had gone further, and urged more energetic action on the part of those who had an opportunity of dealing with the subject, and that they should be enjoined to bring the matter to a conclusion at the earliest possible moment. The longer the question of this dispute with the Transvaal Government was allowed to go on, the greater would be the difficulty of dealing with it. It would have been much easier to settle the matter at first, because at that time the Transvaal Government were in financial difficulties; but since then it had transpired that Swaziland was very rich in gold, being probably the richest of all the Gold Fields discovered in South Africa, and the discovery of gold within this territory had made a considerable difference to them, and would explain the reason why the Boers had cast longing eyes upon it. The information which he had received was that there was a probability of a filibustering attack on Swaziland; and it was believed that the expedition would receive, if not the active encouragement, at least the tacit assent, of the Government in Pretoria. What was absolutely necessary now was, that we should send a British Resident to Swaziland, which the Swazi King seemed inclined to consider the best course; or, if we did not do that, we should notify very plainly to the Government of the South African Republic that we would not tolerate the invasion, whether on a large or small scale, of a territory which was virtually under our protection. We should further declare that if, in spite of our remonstrances, any Transvaal subjects were found fighting in the ranks of those who invaded Swaziland, a considerable fine would be imposed on everyone so found; and, if we should be driven to extreme measures, we should take possession of the Gold Fields on the frontier of the Transvaal, and retain them, as security, until a considerable indemnity was paid. Unless we spoke out clearly, distinctly, and in a manner which could not be mistaken on this subject, we might find ourselves landed in serious trouble. The information had reached him from a person on the spot, who had had many years' experience of these frontier troubles, to the effect that not only did very great anxiety exist on the subject within the borders of the Colony, but that the preparations which were being made in the Transvaal territory for the purpose of taking advantage of any weakness on our part were perfectly notorious and undenied, even by those engaged in them; and he asked whether the attention of the Government had been called to what was going on, and what steps they proposed to take in the matter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of Onslow), in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government were fully alive to all that was going on in South Africa at the present moment. The description given by the noble Viscount as to the course of events, up to the publication of the latest Blue Book, was entirely accurate; but since that publication was issued the Government had received information that four Swaziland Chiefs had received a message from the Landrost of Wakkerstroom, stating he would march into and annex the country. A communication was immediately sent to the Transvaal Government, in reply to which they denied having given any such authority to the Landrost. Sir Hercules Robinson had since been asked to call the attention of the Transvaal Government again to the subject, and ask for an explanation, and to point out that, pending that explanation, any violation of the territory of Swaziland, except with the consent of the Swazi King, would be considered as an infraction of the Convention of London. The Transvaal Government again denied the truth of the statements which had been made with reference to a probable expedition against Swaziland, and had furnished proofs in support of their denial. They said that if encroachments were made they would be found to be acts of individual Boers, who were beyond the jurisdiction and control of the Transvaal Government. There could be no doubt that the discovery of gold in Swaziland had brought into it a very mixed and somewhat turbulent population, and that the state of the country was far from settled; but, as far as the action of this Government was concerned, it was entirely governed by the terms of the Convention of 1884, which echoed the provisions of the Convention of Pretoria, and stipulated that the independence of Swaziland, within the prescribed bounds, would be fully recognized. The annexation of Swaziland by this country had been proposed in some quarters. It had been said that, inasmuch as the settlement of Zululand had been accomplished without any cost to the British taxpayer, it might reasonably be hoped that a settlement of Swaziland might be accomplished on similar terms. That might be so; but such a proceeding would be in direct violation of the Treaty. No doubt, if any attempt were made to violate the independence of Swaziland, and a request were made by the Swazi King, Her Majesty's Government might be justified in affording him such assistance as might be necessary to protect the independence of his country. The King had himself, of his own accord, invited the assistance of Mr. Shepstone, a gentleman exceptionally well acquainted with the affairs of South Africa, who was now with the King, not as the Representative of Her Majesty's Government, or of the Colonial Government, but at the King's own request; and it was sincerely to be hoped that his presence in Swaziland would be of much use. The noble Viscount had said that, virtually, Swaziland was under the protection of England; but he (the Earl of Onslow) could not quite agree with that statement. The only authority for such a statement was contained in the Second Article of the Convention of London, which said that Her Majesty's Government might, if they deemed it necessary, appoint Commissioners in the Native territory outside the Eastern and Western Borders of the South African Republic to maintain order and prevent encroachment. It was perfectly clear, therefore, that power was possessed by Her Majesty's Government to go to that extent; and at the present time the question of appointing such Commissioners was receiving their very serious and anxious consideration. With regard to what fell from the noble Viscount, as to the possibility of any interference in the country between Natal and Delagoa Bay by any of the Great Powers of Europe, as far, at any rate, as Germany was concerned, to which Empire he presumed the noble Viscount alluded, his apprehensions might be safely set at rest by the exchange of communications which took place between Earl Granville, when Foreign Secretary, and Count Münster. In those communications Germany declared herself ready to withdraw her protest against the hoisting of the British Flag at St. Lucia Bay, and her intention not to establish any Protectorate over the territory between Delagoa Bay and Natal. But as to the apprehension of filibustering expeditions, there was, no doubt, considerable foundation for alarm, and Her Majesty's Government were considering the matter with very great care, especially with regard to the appointment of Commissioners under the Convention of London.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — HELMETS FOR THE MILITIA REGIMENTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD FITZGERALD, in rising to ask the Under Secretary of State for the War Department, Whether it is intended to supply helmets for the use of the privates of the several Militia regiments so as to enable them to take part in the training and celebrations of Her Most Gracious Majesty's Jubilee year in full and proper costume? said, that for some time the anomaly had been presented of the officers of Militia wearing helmets and of the non-commissioned officers and men wearing the Glengarry. When the present territorial system was instituted, and Militia regiments were constituted third and fourth battalions of Line regiments, there was an understanding that they should be placed as nearly as possible, so far as dress and accoutrements were concerned, on the same footing as soldiers of the Line. Notwithstanding this, the rank and file of the Militia had been kept for years without helmets, and with no other head-dress than the ordinary Glengarry bonnet. That they had to wear in all weathers, and under all circumstances, although the Glengarry was very little protection from the rain, and none at all from the wind and sun. It was especially hard on men, usually in civil attire, to have their hair cut close, and to be compelled continuously to wear a cap which was no protection from the weather. Moreover, it was highly objectionable in a military point of view that on field days, when the troops had to be in review order, the Militia could not turn out properly dressed. While both the Line and the Volunteers appeared on such occasions in helmets, the Militia, although they might be in the same brigade, could not wear the same headdress. There were plenty of helmets which could be served out, and he trusted that, at least on the occasion of Her Majesty's Jubilee, the 10,000 Militia who would take part in the Review would not be allowed to appear without helmets.

The Earl of Onslow

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord HARRIS), in reply, said, that with regard to the supply of helmets to Militia regiments taking part in the Review to be held on July 9 the arrangements for that Review were not yet complete in detail; but in making the arrangements the point referred to by the noble and learned Lord should not be overlooked. With regard to the issue of helmets to Militia regiments during their training, it had been laid down by Lord Cardwell and Lord Cranbrook that, while disembodied, the Militia should wear undress uniform of the territorial regiments to which they were attached, and the Secretary of State was of opinion that to change this order would be inadvisable at the present moment.

THE EARL OF STRAFFORD said, that formerly the Militia wore the shako in full dress, and he could see no reason why they should not now wear the helmet.

LORD HARRIS said, that the question of the issue of helmets to the Militia had been gone into at full length by a Commission and decided in the manner he had stated.

NORTH-EASTERN ASIA—THE COREA— FOREIGN OCCUPATION OF PORT HAMILTON.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, in rising to move for copy of any written pledges, should such pledges exist, on the part of the Empires of Russia and China with the Government of this country in reference to the occupation for military or naval purposes of the harbour of Port Hamilton or any portion of the territory of Corea, said, that their Lordships would remember that, although naval testimony was unanimous as to the insufficiency of the harbour, yet there was no doubt that it only required money to be spent at Port Hamilton to make it a very important naval and military position. Although this country might be unwilling to lay out the money for this purpose, yet other nations might not object to spend the money necessary to make Port Hamilton an impregnable fortress if they obtained the chance. He ventured to urge upon the Government, in view of the importance of the rapid development of China by way of the North Pacific, that they should apply themselves to discover some place which might be used as a great naval depôt and harbour in those seas. The noble Viscount concluded by moving for the Address of which he had given Notice.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copy of any written pledges, should such pledges exist, on the part of the Empires of Russia and China with the Government of this country in reference to the occupation for military or naval purposes of the harbour of Port Hamilton or any portion of the territory of Corea."—(The Viscount Sidmouth.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK), in reply, said, that the Papers to which his noble Friend referred contained a statement, and a very full written statement, on the part of the Chinese Government, giving the guarantee in question, which was not a mere verbal statement by the Chinese Government, but was a very deliberate Note. It was found that the Chinese had received from the Russian Government a guarantee that Russia would not interfere with Korean territory in future if the British did not; and the Chinese Government, on the faith of that guarantee, had given the British Government a written guarantee that neither China nor Russia would interfere with the territory in question. That was accepted by Sir John Walsham, who telegraphed home, and received the assent of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) to the guarantee, as coming from the Chinese Government.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked, whether her Majesty's Government had a guarantee from the Russian Government?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, the guarantee, as far as England was concerned, was from the Chinese Government, who had the Corea under its Suzerainty. They had received a guarantee from Russia; but with Russia Her Majesty's Government in this matter had no concern.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, that a war between Russia and China was not a very impossible event, and that, therefore, the guarantee was worthless.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked, whether China had received a written guarantee from Russia?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I cannot tell that.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: As there are no more Papers to be produced, I must ask leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

KENSINGTON VESTRY BILL [Lords] (by Order).

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): This Bill, as hon. Members will see, has passed through the House of Lords, and, having been read a second time in this House, has also passed through a Committee upstairs. It is, therefore, a somewhat strong measure to ask the House to reject the Bill under such circumstances, on what is practically the third reading; but I think I shall be able to show the House that in this case they ought to do so. I have no doubt that the Committee upstairs carefully examined the provisions of the measure, and that, under the Chairmanship of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), they have made their Report most conscientiously. But they only heard one side of the case. The other side was not heard at all, and, in point of fact, at the present moment, and since this Bill was brought into the House of Lords, the Kensington Vestry themselves have declared that they are opposed to it. We are, therefore, asked to pass a Kensington Vestry Bill against which the Kensington Vestry have pronounced. The Bill was brought in last Session, and came under the Resolution which provided that Bills which had passed through certain stages last Session should be carried forward to the present Session. I propose to state very briefly what is the opposition of the Kensington Vestry in regard to this Bill. The Bill originated with a Joint Committee of Works and Wharves of the Kensington Vestry, who were appointed to consider the best means of disposing of the refuse of the parish. The Report of the Joint Committee was agreed to in November, 1885, and on the same day a Motion was passed by the Vestry directing the present Bill to be prepared. The Bill was accordingly deposited, but at the election of Vestrymen in May, 1886, there were 26 vacant seats in this particular ward. I may explain that there are three wards in the district which are treated by this Bill; but there is only one particular ward in which it is proposed that this dust destructor should be erected. Out of 26 Vestrymen returned in the month of May, 19 were persons who were opposed to the Bill. In June last a Motion was made in the Vestry itself to rescind the Resolution which ordered that the Bill should be prepared. That Motion was supported by 42 votes against 30, or by a large majority against those who were in favour of the Bill in the Vestry itself. Nevertheless, the Resolution was not carried, because one of the bye-laws of the Vestry requires that there shall be a two-thirds majority in order to rescind any Motion previously passed. The consequence was that the Bill came before the Committee of the House of Commons. Having already passed the House of Lords it was also carried through the

Lord Ellenborough

Committee of the House of Commons, and it was called the Kensington Vestry Bill, although, in point of fact, the Kensington Vestry were opposed to it. I have just this moment presented a Petition against the Bill from the Kensington Vestry signed by 55 members. They state in that Petition that they and a large body of the parishioners object to the erection of a destructor as tending not only to destroy the value of property in the neighbourhood, but also to injure the health of the inhabitants. They further point out that it will seriously affect the trades and industries of the neighbourhood, and they submit that the ratepayers should be directly consulted before Parliament is asked to inflict such a serious and improper expenditure upon the district. This Petition is signed by 55 members of the Kensington Vestry who are supposed to be promoting the Bill, and they wind up their objections by the prayer—

“That the Bill may not receive the sanction of your honourable House, and may not be passed into law.”

The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Barnstaple Division of Devonshire (Mr. Pitt-Lewis) has placed an Amendment on the Paper which declares that no destructor shall be erected until the opinion of the owners and ratepayers of the parish of Kensington shall have been taken by means of a poll. Now, if the Bill is to pass at all I am certainly of opinion that it is desirable it should pass with the Amendment proposed by the hon. Gentleman; but I do think that, looking at the fact that the Kensington Vestry themselves are opposed to the Bill, and that the people of Kensington, and especially of this particular ward—Notting Hill—have declared themselves strongly opposed to the Bill, it would be a far more sensible course, instead of tinkering the measure and amending it, to throw it out altogether. I do not propose to go into the merits of the question. I am perfectly willing to admit that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chaplin) and the Committee carefully examined the matter, and received technical evidence as to the best means of destroying refuse of this kind. It is proposed to cart the dust and refuse from all parts of the parish of Kensington to a particular site in North Kensington, where the poorer portion of the population live. The area from which the dust is collected is a very large one, and it is contended by persons who have looked into the matter, and who live on the spot, that the health of the inhabitants will be destroyed if the Bill is allowed to pass, owing to the smoke and the fumes from the noxious gases which will be emitted. It is maintained that it would be far better to cart all this refuse away, as is done at present. I do not, however, so much dwell upon that point; and I own that there is always some difficulty in inducing the House of Commons, upon the third reading, to throw out a Bill which has already passed through a Committee. In asking the House to take that course, I will only dwell upon the special fact that a considerable time has elapsed since the Bill was brought in by the Kensington Vestry. It was ordered to be prepared at a very small meeting of that Vestry, and since that time not only have the people of the parish opposed the measure, but the Kensington Vestry themselves, in the Petition I have presented to-day, oppose it. I have already pointed out that the Vestry would themselves have rescinded the Resolution directing the preparation of the Bill if it had not been for the fact that to do so required a two-thirds vote. Nevertheless, at this moment, the House will find that 55 members of the Kensington Vestry are asking that the Bill shall not be proceeded with. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will consent to throw out the Bill; and I beg to move that the Bill be considered upon this day six months.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to second the Amendment; and, in the first place, I would ask what are the proposals contained in this Bill? I think it is desirable that the House should understand that the parish of Kensington is a very large district of some three and a-half miles in length from North to South. Its widest part is in the South, where it is nearly two miles in width; and its narrowest part is in the North, where it is only half-a-mile wide. At the extreme northern, or the North Kensington part of the district, it is proposed that the whole of the refuse of the parish of Kensington should be collected and destroyed in a destructor by means of a huge furnace. Now, Sir, the refuse of the parish is of a very varied description.

It consists not only of road sweepings, but of such matters as dead cats, dead dogs, decayed fruit and vegetable matter, sardine tins, dead rats, brick bats, oyster shells, jam pots, dress improvers, crinolines, pails, broken bottles, and many other miscellaneous articles. On the other side of the River, where something of the same kind has already been attempted under the direction of the parish officers, the experience has been by no means satisfactory, although, in that case, there is the River Lea and other means for carrying away any of the refuse which is not absolutely got rid of in the destructor. Now, in Kensington, where it is proposed to put up this destructor, there is no such thing, and the Kensington Vestry have selected this point, although there were many other places which were much more suitable. There are wharves in the South of Kensington, near Warwick Road, which are easily accessible by railway, and there is also a canal wharf in another part of the northern district. Nevertheless, it is proposed to take this refuse away from all the well-to-do portions of the parish, and send to the poorest district this miserable tribute of the rich to the poor. Now, Sir, I would ask the House to consider what would be said if it were proposed to erect in the southern portion of Kensington any such structure. Suppose, for instance, it was proposed to take a portion of the Horticultural Gardens or a portion of Kensington Gardens, and devote them to the purpose of getting rid of the refuse of the parish of Kensington. We know very well what an outcry would be raised, and how the idea would at once be scouted, and yet at those places the erection of a destructor would do comparatively little harm. But what does it matter to some 100,000 or 200,000 well-to-do people if the poorer portion of the inhabitants are to be incommoded by smoke and noxious gases so long as they can find an easy means of getting rid of their refuse? What is now proposed is, that this hideous collection of all sorts of refuse is to be carried over an area of six square miles, trundled through the streets, and conveyed upon a point which is the narrowest in the district. But that is not all. The point selected is just on the borders of the parish of Hammersmith; and I, as an inhabitant of Hammersmith, object to the Kensington Vestry bringing their refuse to the borders of that parish. This parish contains a population of 106,000 persons, and the refuse of all the streets in the parish is to be carted away to this district of the North, principally occupied by the poor. A large number of the population are engaged in the smaller industries—chiefly in the industry of washing. For about a mile to the North, a mile to the South, and a mile to the West the laundry establishments are very numerous, and a large population have to depend entirely, for their means of livelihood, upon this particular industry. There can be no doubt that the whole of the immediate locality will suffer very much in times of foggy and heavy atmosphere from the soot which will be distributed around, and it is only when there is a strong wind that there can be any reasonable hope that the fumes and smoke arising from the furnace will be got rid of. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that to establish anything of this kind in this particular locality will destroy this washing industry. [Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Why?] The right hon. Gentleman is not acquainted, probably, with anything so low as a laundry business, or he would be aware that if the washing is dirtied by soot or dust of any kind it has to be re-washed, and that would be a very great loss to the poor people engaged in this industry. Clause 10 of the Bill provides that the Vestry shall not, under the powers of the Act, take more than a limited number of houses belonging to the labouring class; but what is the use of preserving their houses if you deprive the people themselves of the means by which they live? Then, again, we are told that the Vestry is to be required to lay out a certain portion of the land they take under the Bill for the purpose of forming a recreation ground. I expect that was an afterthought on the part of the promoters put in somewhat late; and I confess that on reading it it suggested to me very much the smile of a death's head on a coffin. What is the use of talking of a recreation ground when such ground must depend entirely upon the extent of the land required for the purposes of the Bill itself, and when the purposes of the Bill are satisfied? There would certainly be very little land left which could be devoted to the purposes of a recreation ground. Most of the poor people of the district live in squalid houses, and within 500 yards of this site there are board and other schools attended by 6,000 children. The nuisance arising from the offensive smells given off by this collection of refuse must be very great indeed. It is idle to say that there would be no offensive smell, and that the health and comfort of these children would not be very much interfered with. There are hundreds and thousands of carts constantly travelling through this locality, through narrow streets that are not particularly well drained, and the annoyance and nuisance arising from this objectionable addition to the traffic would be very serious indeed. It is pretended that all the refuse from Kensington can be got rid of in this way; but the pretence is an utterly false one, as experience has shown. I have here a tabulated list in regard to the destructors already in operation in different parts of the country. I will not trouble the House by going into the details supplied in this long and formidable document. I will only say that the result is this—that in very few places at all, and only such as are favourably situated, is it attempted to get rid of all the refuse. In Lambeth, at Betts's Yard, the official in charge states that the parish is obliged to incur very heavy expense—I believe at the rate of £4 per barge load—in order to get rid of the refuse they dare not keep on the premises and are unable to burn. So far as the destructor is concerned it has failed absolutely, owing to the slow burning of the furnace. Therefore, I think I am justified in saying that the Kensington Vestry would not be able to get rid of all the refuse of the parish when it comes in. It must also be borne in mind that the refuse does not come in regularly, and not in exact quantities, day by day; but in certain circumstances of the weather there is a larger deposit and delivery than at other times. Consequently there would be an accumulation of this abominable material for many days in the neighbourhood. The officers in charge of Betts's Yard have been good enough to allow a friend of mine to inspect the process, and while he was there there came in a large load of rotten oranges. He expected to see them put into the furnace at once, but the man in charge told him that it was impossible to get rid of that kind of refuse by burning. As a matter of fact, it is perfectly impossible to burn refuse of that kind; and yet from Kensington High Street and the streets in the neighbourhood there will be a large amount of refuse fruit thrown from time to time on the hands of the Vestry which will have to be got rid of somehow. It is pretended that the ratepayers of Kensington will be able to save a large amount of money if this Bill is adopted. I think, however, that the figures are altogether illusory, because they do not take into account the expense of getting rid of the refuse which cannot be disposed of by the destructor alone. No doubt the saving to the ratepayers is a very reasonable and proper object to have in view; but, unfortunately for this plan of erecting a destructor, I may say that the difficulty has already been solved in another part of London with perfect success, without employing any destructor at all. The Newington Board have arranged for getting rid of their refuse by railway, and the system has been so thoroughly successful that, although the population has increased enormously, the expense to which the Board is now put is actually less than it was before the system was adopted. I am told that the Newington Board are in reality making a saving of money as compared with their expenditure years ago, when the population was much less, and as compared with what the expenditure would be if the old system had been continued. The saving is something very remarkable indeed. Under these circumstances, because I believe that the erection of a destructor at North Kensington would not be true economy; because I believe that the work of getting rid of the refuse of the parish can be better carried out by other means; and because the plan adopted is cruelly unjust to the poor and labouring population, and is only supported by those who have regard to the convenience of the richer portion of the parish, I hope the House will assent to the proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and decline to proceed further with the Bill. I beg to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," in order to add the words

"this day six months."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): It is under some physical difficulties that I rise for the purpose of supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton for the rejection of the Bill; but I do so with all the earnestness in my power, fully recognizing the sense of the responsibility which attaches to myself as Member for North Kensington. I believe that the Bill, if it is allowed to pass, will act most prejudicially against the interests of a large portion of the parish and the most defenceless class in my constituency. I am aware that in coming to ask the House to reject this Bill at this late stage we are taking a most unusual course; but I would venture to submit that, so far as my opposition is concerned as a Representative of the district affected, I was seriously ill at the time of the second reading, and for some time before, and that I was actually ignorant of its being brought forward. Further than that, since the time the Bill was read a second time the whole conditions of the case have been altered in regard to the constitution of the Kensington Vestry. It has already been pointed out that the nominal promoters of the Bill are now really in a considerable minority, and that the majority of the Vestry are bitterly opposed to the measure. That state of things has been brought about by the result of the last Vestry elections in North Kensington. Those elections took place in May last, and the House will remember that the Bill was read a second time in March. That fact has entirely, I venture to submit to the House, altered the complexion of the case. Who now are the promoters of the Bill? They are only a small faction in the Kensington Vestry. It has been pointed out to the House that this very question has been brought before the Kensington Vestry since the last elections. I myself was present in the Vestry at the time the division took place, and I can confirm the statement of the hon. Member for Northampton that in that division 43 members voted against the Bill and only 30 were in favour of it. The hostility of those 43 members was complete.

They objected to the Bill altogether; and, consequently, the House is now asked to pass a Bill against which its nominal promoters, or those who were its most active supporters, are now petitioning. It may be asked, of course, why the Bill has not been withdrawn; but it has already been explained to the House that the bye-laws which govern the Kensington Vestry, and, I believe, other Vestries also, are such that it is necessary, when any resolution of the Vestry has once been adopted, that a two-thirds majority should vote for its rescission. Up to the present moment I am free to admit that such a very large majority as that of two-thirds has not shown itself in the Kensington Vestry, although, nevertheless, there is a large majority in the Vestry against the Bill. As a resident for some years in Kensington, and as one who is thoroughly acquainted with the opinion of the great bulk of the inhabitants, at least of North Kensington, and to a large extent of South Kensington, I am prepared to say that the whole feeling of North Kensington, the inhabitants of which district are the most nearly concerned, is dead against the Bill, and bitterly antagonistic to it. I believe that already the conscience of South Kensington has been touched in regard to the gross injustice which will be inflicted upon North Kensington if this Bill be passed. I gather that their conscience has been touched because the number of Vestrymen who have signed the Petition presented to-day by the hon. Member for Northampton actually exceeds the whole number of Vestrymen returned to the Vestry by North Kensington. Fifty-five members have signed the Petition, and in order to obtain so large a number it must have been necessary not only to include every member who represents North Kensington, but also a considerable number of those who represent the richer and more powerful Division of South Kensington. I hope the House will remember that North Kensington is essentially a working-man's constituency; but for parochial purposes it is tied up with the vastly richer and more powerful Division of South Kensington. That attachment has long been a source of serious grievance to my constituency in North Kensington. It may be within the knowledge of some hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench that repeated Petitions have been presented by the ratepayers of North Kensington praying that there may be a separation between the two Divisions of the parish for parochial purposes, principally on the ground that the material interests of the two Divisions very frequently clash. This Bill, I think, shows that the interests of the two Divisions do entirely clash on certain occasions. Now, what is proposed by this Bill is simply that the refuse of the entire parish—all the horrible filth produced throughout Kensington—should be carted away without any question as to the convenience of cartage, but should be carted away, not to an open district, but to the very centre of the most densely-populated and most crowded and poorest district that is to be found in the West of London. That circumstance, I think, shows that the interests of North Kensington are seriously affected by this measure; and I do, myself, earnestly hope that the House will take into consideration the points which have been laid before it this afternoon, and will reject the Bill. I do not propose to enter into any details with regard to the measure, because they have already been dealt with by the hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor), who seconded the Amendment. I should, however, like to mention one or two points in connection with a statement in support of the Bill which has been circulated, as I understand, to a large number of the Members of this House. It is there stated that the combustion in the proposed destructor, which is to be placed in the midst of this poor and densely-crowded population, will be so complete that the whole of the noxious gases will be destroyed in the furnace itself. Now, I do not pretend to be a great scientific authority; but I would ask any hon. Member whether it is possible that all the gases can be utterly destroyed? No doubt, they may be modified, and be made to take other forms, and possibly rendered innocuous; but I maintain that they cannot be altogether destroyed. It is further stated in this document that the Medical Officers of Health strongly recommend the destruction of refuse of this kind by fire. Yes; but their recommendation is that the destruction should be carried on by fire, not in densely-populated localities, but as far as possible in open spaces, where the fumes given off in the operation will hurt nobody. Lastly, this statement, put forward, I presume, by those who are promoting the Bill, asserts that the evidence given before the Select Committee shows that the site now selected is the only one that was available for the purpose. Now, I would venture to ask whether it is meant by that assertion that the site selected in this poor and densely-crowded part of the parish is the only site that can be had for money? No, Sir; I am afraid that the only reason why this site is called the only available site is this—that the people who live in close proximity to it are so poor as to be defenceless in the matter. Therefore, I call upon the House with the utmost confidence to show that it is prepared to act as the defender of the poor in this question, and that it will at once throw out the Bill.

MR. PITT-LEWIS (Devon, Barnstaple): As I have placed an Amendment on the Paper in reference to this Bill, I think it is desirable that I should be allowed to say a few words. I have also the honour to be a resident in Kensington, and I may say that this Bill would have passed through this House on a former occasion if I had not interposed in order to prevent it. Having taken, therefore, some action in conjunction with several of my neighbours in Kensington in regard to the Bill, the promoters approached me in order to ascertain what my objections were; and they have undertaken, in the event of the Bill passing, without reservation, to accept the clause which stands in my name upon the Paper. I may point out that the clause I propose to move provides that the Bill, if it is passed into law, shall not be acted upon so far as the erection of a destructor is concerned, if a demand in writing, signed by not less than 30 members of the Vestry or not less than 300 of the owners and ratepayers of the parish of Kensington, be made that the question shall be decided by a poll of the owners and ratepayers of the parish, until such a poll shall have been determined in the same way as is determined by the Public Health Act of 1875. By that means the clause makes provision that, before the erection of a destructor is commenced, the opinion of the whole parish shall be taken on the subject. That is certainly a compromise, but it is a compromise which has been accepted by the promoters of the Bill. Therefore, opposed as I am to the erection of this destructor, I shall feel it a matter of honour to vote in favour of the Bill. I may be allowed to point out that, in arriving at this compromise, I bore one or two things in my mind. In the first place, there is nothing to prevent any person from purchasing this land, erecting a destructor upon it, and then making a contract with the parish for the use of it. In the next place, the site consists of some four acres, and if bought by the parish at least a portion of it will be appropriated for the purpose of a recreation ground. It seems to me that it would be better for the parish to have the land in its own hands than that it should fall into the hands of some speculator, who may use it in an objectionable way. There will be this further advantage—that if this Bill passes with the modification I have suggested, in the event of the provision relating to the erection of a destructor being refused by the owners and ratepayers on a poll, it will be in the power of the Vestry to secure the whole of the land for public purposes. I have thought it right to explain the part which I have taken in the matter. Although I regard the erection of a destructor as objectionable, I shall consider it my duty, under the circumstances, to vote for the consideration of the Bill, trusting to the good sense of the inhabitants of Kensington and the members of the Vestry to prevent the Bill from being converted into a nuisance.

MR. R. CHAMBERLAIN (Islington, W.): I was one of the Members of the Committee who inquired into the merits of this Bill, and I think I am able, not only from the evidence given to the Committee but from my own personal knowledge, to give a satisfactory answer to the fears which have been expressed by the hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor) in reference to the evils which are likely to arise from the erection of the proposed destructor. First of all, in reply to the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), let me point out that the Bill was brought in originally by the Kensington Vestry, and that if the additional provision proposed by the hon. Member for the Barnstaple Division of Devonshire (Mr. Pitt Lewis), and accepted by the promoters, is assented to, the Vestry will be precluded from erecting a destructor unless they obtain the consent not only of the Vestry, but of the owners and ratepayers. The hon. Member for East Donegal has told the House that the whole of the refuse of this large parish will be brought to the destructor, and that the inhabitants will be annoyed by the perpetual passing of carts conveying objectionable refuse through the district. The hon. Member has been misinformed. Only one-half of the refuse of the parish will be conveyed to this particular spot; the other half will continue to be conveyed to a more convenient site down the River, near the old Cremorne Gardens. It is idle to suppose that the works will be a nuisance when the products of combustion are to be carried away by a chimney 180 feet high. It is, therefore, impossible for the soot to settle down in the middle of the laundry yards adjoining; and, instead of affecting the comfort of this poor neighbourhood, I am inclined to think that it is rather a matter which may concern the wealthier portion of the inhabitants of the parish, who live a little further off, who will be within the radius of the influence of the destructor, and who will get the effluvia, if there is any effluvia, and most of the blacks that may be floating about. If the objectionable particles which are supposed to be given off when the destructor is in full force descend anywhere, it will be in the richer portion of the parish that they will find a settlement. Again, it has been said that after the erection of the destructor there will be no land left for the purpose of providing a recreation ground. The Committee foresaw that objection, and they took special care to provide that three-quarters of an acre of this ground shall be laid out for the purpose of a recreation ground. It is said that it is impossible to provide a recreation ground in similar circumstances; but the experiment has been tried in Birmingham with successful results. Reference has been made to the existence of schools in the locality, and it is said that the health of the school children will suffer. Nothing of the kind has occurred in Birmingham, and there are a large number of schools in the vicinity. No effluvia or noxious gases are given off either to the injury of schools or private residences. The hon. Member for East Donegal stated that it will be impossible to get rid of the whole of the refuse by means of a destructor. Again, I say that the hon. Member is misinformed. From my own personal knowledge, and from the evidence given before the Committee, I can assure him that there will be no difficulty whatever in dealing with the refuse. It might be so in the case of a small destructor, where you have vegetable matter to deal with; but with a destructor on the scale proposed in this Bill there would be no difficulty at all. With regard to the question of accumulation, the hon. Member for East Donegal must be unacquainted with the fact that the Committee dealt with that matter by inserting a clause that no accumulation shall be allowed, but that everything brought to the destructor shall be destroyed at once in the furnaces. The hon. Member denied, further, that there would be any saving to the parish. I believe that there will be a considerable saving; but I would ask the House not to look upon a question of this sort as a question of economy, or of the saving of money. As the member of an important Corporation which has dealt with the subject on a large scale, I feel that there are many things more important to be considered than the mere question of the money involved, and it is upon that ground that I ask the House to pass the Bill, and do all in its power to assist the Vestry of Kensington in getting rid of this refuse in a proper manner—namely, by combustion. The difficulty of getting rid of it is a growing evil in our great towns, especially in connection with small house property. In Birmingham we have no fewer than three separate destructors, and from neither of them is any nuisance whatever experienced. One of them is in the immediate neighbourhood of the general hospital of the town, and there would have been a loud complaint if it had been found in any way to interfere with health. It is quite possible that a destructor may be converted into a nuisance; but the Committee upstairs carefully considered that point, and inserted a clause in the Bill to prevent the possibility of a nuisance being created by requiring the plans to be approved by the Local Government Board. It is further provided that any destructor to be erected upon the lands taken under the Bill shall be constructed in accordance with drawings signed by the Chairman of the Committee and deposited in the offices of the Vestry, or on such other system or with such modifications or illustrations as shall be approved by an engineer or other fit person appointed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. I believe it is impossible for any noxious gases to escape from the destructor, and any fumes which might otherwise escape from the burning of vegetable refuse will be deodorized and consumed in another way. In Birmingham, although much worse substances are passed through the destructor, there is found to be a total absence of offensive smell. I ask the House to pass the Bill, because it was carefully and honestly considered by the Committee, and because I am able to speak from my own knowledge of the beneficial effects of the working of similar destructors in my own district.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): As the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) has stated, it was my misfortune to preside over the Committee which sat upon this Bill, and it becomes my duty, therefore, as briefly as I can, to state the view at which the Committee arrived. The hon. Member has informed the House that, although the Bill was originally promoted by the Kensington Vestry, the majority of the members of that Vestry now dissent from it. Of course, I have no knowledge of that fact; but if the hon. Member be correct the matter rests entirely in the hands of the Vestry, because the Bill is purely permissive, and there are only three years allowed in which it can be put in force. If the Vestry are opposed to it, it is not necessary that they should take any further action in the matter, and the Bill will naturally drop. The hon. Gentleman says that the ratepayers have nobody to defend their interests. Now, what has happened? An Amendment has been moved by the hon. Member for the Barnstaple Division of Devonshire (Mr. Pitt-Lewis). [Mr. LABOUCHERE: It has not been moved yet.] Well, an Amendment has been placed on the Paper, which the promoters have declared their readiness to accept, to the effect that if the Vestry propose to act on the power which the Bill confers upon them, a plébiscite of the owners and ratepayers shall be taken. I confess that I do not see how the wishes of the ratepayers could be better consulted. Perhaps I may be allowed to say what, in the view of the Committee, was the case which had to be dealt with. In some way or other this refuse must be disposed of; and it was admitted on all sides—even by those who gave evidence in opposition to the Bill—that the difficulty of doing that was increasing very much. At one time it was easy to dispose of, and the refuse itself was valuable; but the opposite is the case now. The hon. Member talked about the interests of the poor and the interests of the rich; but can he be seriously aware that under the proposals contained in the Bill it is estimated that, at least, £2,000 a-year will be saved to the ratepayers of North Kensington—the people whom, he says, are going to be so much injured by this Bill? What are the objections of which we have heard so much in the course of this debate, and in the course of the evidence which was given upstairs? The hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill carefully abstained from entering into details. I think he was wise in doing so. First of all, he said that the destructor it is proposed to erect must give out noxious gases. All I can say is that the scientific evidence, given by expert after expert, and never in any degree shaken, proved beyond the possibility of doubt that there would be no escape of noxious fumes or gases at all. The hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor) told the House that it would destroy the laundry industry of the district. I asked him why? Question after question was put in the Committee on that point, but we failed to discover that there was any ground for the apprehension. He said the clothes must be injured by dust and the escape of smoke and noxious gases; but no such escape can occur, and the destructor, it must also be remembered, is to be placed in the centre of four acres of ground. The refuse, when taken there, will be immediately put under cover, and shot into a furnace; and how dust and gas are to escape it is difficult to understand. I have endeavoured to give the subject all the consideration in my power, and I have arrived at the conclusion that the opposition to the Bill, and the objections which have been urged against it, are baseless, and are founded either on prejudice or very imperfect information. Neither the hon. Member for Northampton nor any other hon. Member who has spoken against the Bill has gone into any details, or attempted to explain in what way the injuries they speak of are to follow; and I venture to submit to the House, in justification of the course taken by the Committee, that it is only by a careful study of the details of the question that a right appreciation of the matter can be arrived at. I do not think it is necessary to detain the House longer, although I might say a great deal more upon the subject if it were necessary. No evidence of any other site being available for the purpose was offered to the Committee; and it was proved that the proposed site would cost a great deal less than any other. It was further proved, beyond the possibility of doubt, by the evidence of experts, that no injury would result from the escape of gas, soot, or smoke. It was also shown that in the case of Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, and 20 other large towns which I could name, where these destructors are in work, they are found to answer admirably, and that no possible injury can be done. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will support the decision of the Committee.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I do not intend to enter into the question whether or not this Bill should be read a third time, as it is not a matter that comes under the Local Government Board at all, except that the Local Government Board have given their sanction to the erection of destructors in other parts of the country; and I am informed that, so far, they have been working admirably well, without creating any nuisance at all. It must also be borne in mind that Clause 22 of the Bill provides that—

“Nothing in this Act shall exonerate the Vestry from any indictment, action, or other proceeding for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused by them.”

What I desire to say has reference to the clause which the hon. Member for the Barnstaple Division of Devonshire (Mr. Pitt-Lewis) has placed on the Paper, to provide that after the Bill has been passed a poll of the owners and ratepayers shall be taken before it can be put in force. I would ask hon. Members seriously to consider what they are about to do before they vote with that intention in their minds. It is the introduction of an entirely new principle that powers should be conferred upon a Local Authority, and at the same time that it should be intended that the Local Authority should not put such powers in force until a vote of the inhabitants had been taken. I think that to pass such a clause would be to establish an exceedingly bad precedent. As far as I know, there is no more reason why a power of this kind should require the assent of the inhabitants than any other power conferred upon the Local Authority. I desire, therefore, to point out to the House that in my opinion it would be bad policy for the House to assent to a clause which says that in the event of certain powers being conferred upon the Local Authorities under certain circumstances they shall not be exercised.

MAJOR GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I would ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I explain the reasons which induce me to oppose the Bill. My constituents will be greatly affected by it, for the locality in which it is proposed to erect this destructor is an exceedingly poor one. It is close to the parish of Hammersmith, near Latymer Road. During the Session before last I attended a large public meeting, at which it was decided to oppose this destructor, and an important Petition, very numerously signed, was got up and presented to this House by me. So poor, however, are the inhabitants of the district that they have not the same opportunity of bringing forward scientific evidence as the Kensington Vestry, and I regret to say that, in consequence of my having been obliged to obtain leave from this House, I was prevented from attending before the Committee and giving evidence on behalf of my constituents. I had hoped, however, that the Committee would have taken into consideration the feeling among the poorer inhabitants of Hammersmith and North Kensington, and the fact that they were being imposed upon by the richer people of South Kensington. A Report has been presented by the promoters of the Bill in which they state that the refuse will be destroyed at a distance of half-a-mile from the parish of Hammersmith. On receiving that Report, I went down to the Sanitary Inspector and he told me distinctly that he preferred the present system, as far as Hammersmith is concerned, to the system that is now proposed to be substituted for it. He told me that it is all nonsense to say that you can get rid of these gases; and, therefore, on behalf of Hammersmith, and also on behalf of that part of North Kensington which is affected by the Bill, I earnestly implore the House to throw out the measure. I regret that we have not been able to put forward the scientific evidence which would have satisfied the right hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin); but I may say that an hon. Member of this House (Mr. Isaacs) to whom the House is much indebted for what has been done in regard to its sanitary improvement, and who is a resident of North Kensington, has kindly told me that, in his opinion, the effect of having this destructor will be most injurious to the neighbourhood. I will leave my hon. Friend to speak for himself, for he is fully qualified to inform the House on the subject. I believe, however, that I may safely leave the matter in the hands of the House in the conviction that they will not permit the poor of North Kensington and Hammersmith to appeal to them in vain. We have been asked what is to be done with the refuse. I see no reason why it should not be put in barges and sent down the River.

MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board if he can inform the House whether, in the event of the clause proposed by the hon. Member for the Barnstaple Division of Devonshire (Mr. Pitt-Lewis) being adopted, the Local Government Board will allow it to form part and parcel of the Bill, because I gathered from his remarks that it would be imprudent on the part of the Government to allow an innovation of that kind? I do not think it necessary to avail myself of the invitation which has been thrown out by the hon. and gallant Member for Hammersmith (Major General Goldsworthy) to state my views on this Bill, because they have already been ably expressed by the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment.

Although I may have considerable knowledge as an expert in this matter, it is unnecessary to detain the House with a statement of those views. I will only say that I fully support the view which has been taken by the hon. and gallant Member for Hammersmith, because I believe that the parish of Kensington, in which I reside, has acted in a most selfish manner in regard to the selection of a site for the destructor. I should not have objected had it been proposed to put up this objectionable machinery in the centre of the parish itself, but to select the confines of the parish, and the poorest part of it, where numerous industries are being carried on, which are sure to suffer from this structure, appears to me to be the most selfish principle any rich parish could adopt. I trust the House will take this view of the case, and will say that the rich parish of Kensington shall confine its operations to its own parish, and shall not seek to impose a nuisance on the adjoining parish of Hammersmith. I shall heartily give my vote for the rejection of the Bill.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): Perhaps I may be allowed to say a word in consequence of the remarks which have been made in regard to the question of the treatment of the poor by the rich. Now there is no such question involved in this Bill. The fact is that the whole of the refuse of South Kensington at present finds its way into the Thames by Chelsea, and will continue to do so. North Kensington, however, does invade a neighbouring borough, and as a matter of fact sends the whole of its refuse to Wood Green, where at present it is burned in the open. The hon. and gallant Member for Hammersmith (Major General Goldsworthy) seems to infer that the operation of the destructor must necessarily be a nuisance in the neighbourhood in which it is erected. I can only say that I have been down to Whitechapel to see the destructor there. I had some difficulty in finding it, and it certainly did not seem to be a very great nuisance, seeing that so very few people knew where it was. When I succeeded in finding it, I made it my business to visit the small shops in the district. I also saw a score of children playing about the streets close by, and in answer to my questions I could not find that any one complained of a nuisance or hardship arising from the existence of this destructor. I hope at South Kensington when the time comes we may have a destructor of our own. At the same time, I may say with regard to North Kensington that the site which has been selected is at present a brick-field—a place certainly not full of the most savoury odours, and I consider that if the Vestry are permitted to put up its destructor it will not be a nuisance, but, on the contrary, will prove a great benefit to the ratepayers and the poor of the district.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin): I do not propose to detain the House for more than a few minutes, because the subject has been practically threshed out. The hon. Member for Newington (Mr. Isaacs), when appealed to to give his opinion as to the scientific aspect of the question, very wisely declined to do so. The hon. Member gave his evidence before the Committee, and it would have been a very bad precedent to appeal from those who heard him and the other side upstairs to the House below. This is a Bill which was originally promoted by the Vestry of Kensington, and it has passed through Committees of both Houses. It has come down now for the consideration of the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, and the proposal made by the hon. Member for Northampton is that it should be rejected on what is practically the third reading. Now, I confess that I have heard nothing to lead me to reject the opinion of a Select Committee of this House. No doubt there is a fact which to some extent is material, and that is that the majority of the Vestry which originally promoted the Bill are at present opposed to it; but it must be borne in mind that the Bill only gives power to the Vestry to do certain things permissively, and if hereafter a majority of the Vestry should object to carry into effect the provisions of the Bill it would be impossible to put it into operation at all. There will be a further guarantee in the clause which is suggested by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Barnstaple Division of Devonshire (Mr. Pitt-Lewis), which has been accepted by the promoters of the Bill—namely, that, even if there should be in future a majority of the Vestry in favour of putting the scheme into operation, the owners and ratepayers may be appealed to by a demand, in writing, signed by 30 members of the Vestry or by 300 owners and ratepayers of Kensington, and it will then be necessary to take a poll of the inhabitants. Now, that appears to me to be a complete and efficacious power to place in the hands of the inhabitants in order to prevent any abuse. As the Bill has passed through the ordeal not only of a Committee of this House, but of the House of Lords, I have no hesitation in voting for it.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): The right hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) has relied very strongly upon the evidence of expert witnesses. I wish to say that, in my opinion, expert witnesses are the most unreliable that can be obtained. I believe that if it were necessary I could obtain the evidence of experts upon every side of an abstruse question. Of course the counsel for the promoters know exactly what kind of expert evidence it is desirable to call on their own side of the question, and they take care that no other experts are submitted for examination. I may say that I know nothing of this Bill; but from the knowledge I have of the neighbourhood in which it is proposed to erect this destructor, I think the Kensington Vestry have selected the very worst site that could possibly be obtained. The brick-field they have proposed to take is situated in a complete swamp, and the lowest site which could have been found in the whole district has been pitched upon. I am afraid the result will be that, if this destructor is erected, the entire district will be affected by the fumes of the noxious gases thrown out. I am told that the original promotion of the Bill was carried in the Vestry by a snap-division at a small meeting, but that at the present moment there is a very large majority of the Vestry entirely opposed to the project.

The House divided:—Ayes 190; Noes 170: Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 81.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

MR. PITT-LEWIS (Devon, Barnstaple) moved to insert the following clause:—

Clause 4a.

"No buildings or machinery for the destruction by combustion of the refuse or other materials from streets or houses, which are mentioned in section four hereof, shall be erected on the land taken under this Act, unless and until a resolution that buildings and machinery for the destruction by combustion of such refuse and materials be erected on the said land shall have been passed by the Vestry, at a special meeting convened for that purpose, in the manner provided by the Metropolis Management Acts, which meeting shall not be held before the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven, and shall not in any year be held at any time between the fifteenth day of July and the twenty-fourth day of October. Provided that, if within fourteen days after the passing of such resolution, a demand in writing, signed either by not less than thirty members of the Vestry or by not less than three hundred of the owners and ratepayers of the parish of Kensington, that the question shall be decided by a poll of the owners and ratepayers of the parish of Kensington, shall be served on the Clerk to the Vestry, then the question whether or not such resolution shall have effect shall be decided by a poll of owners and ratepayers of the said parish of Kensington, such poll shall be taken by voting papers, with the same incidents and conditions (so far as applicable) as to the qualifications of voters and scale of voting, as to notice to be given by the summoning officer, delivery, filling up, and collection of voting papers, as to the counting of votes, and as to penalties for neglect or refusal to comply with the provisions herein incorporated, as are contained in and in all other respects so far as practicable in the same way as is provided by the Third Schedule to 'The Public Health Act, 1875,' with respect to the taking of a poll of owners and ratepayers. The summoning officer for the purposes of taking such poll shall be the Clerk to the Vestry. The expenses of any poll taken under this section shall be deemed to be, within the meaning of section twenty-four hereof, expenses in relation to this Act."

New Clause (Consent of Vestry to erection of destructors).—(Mr. Pitt-Lewis.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) moved the adjournment of the debate.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Chance.)—put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's):

I really must protest, notwithstanding what the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees has stated in reference to this clause, that it is an absolutely new thing to confer by special enactment power upon a Local Authority, and at the same time to say that that power is not to be exercised until there has been an opportunity afforded to the inhabitants for deciding whether it is to be exercised or not. There are many cases in which the Local Authorities cannot avail themselves of the benefit of certain Statutes—as, for example, the Free Libraries Act—without first consulting the ratepayers; but, so far as I know, there is not a single instance in which a Local Authority dealing with powers which have been conferred on them by Statute have had imposed on them the duty of going to the ratepayers and asking them for a vote as to whether or not those powers shall be exercised. In my opinion, that change is most undesirable, and therefore I oppose the Motion.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The circumstances of the case are somewhat peculiar, and I must say I cannot but feel that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has touched a matter of great importance. It is one of those matters which, perhaps, the House is necessarily exposed to have raised in connection with Private Bills, but which really involves public principles. Now to me the proposal of the hon. Member has all the appearance of a startling novelty, that the House, in granting powers to a Local Authority, should likewise insert a condition that the Local Authority should go before its constituents before it can be allowed to exercise those powers. [Mr. COURTNEY: That is not accurate.] If that is so, I am glad to hear it. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees will have the goodness to explain afterwards the exact position; but I must say, if the case were as I have represented it, I think it would be a very dangerous precedent, and would go far to make the House of Commons responsible for all the abuse of power, or misuse of power, by Local Authorities. However, I am glad to find from my hon. Friend that the case is not as I had put it. At the same time, I think there should be a clear understanding on the subject.

Mr. Ritchie

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin): The state of the case is this. The duty imposed upon the Vestry of consulting their constituents is not imperative, but only in the event of a certain proportion of the Vestry objecting to the exercise of the powers. In that case it is proposed that a vote of ratepayers shall be taken. I think that is a material alteration, and I cannot discover the grave objections which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has raised against that limitation, more especially as there is an analogous provision in the Borough Funds Act, which requires, under certain circumstances, the sanction of the constituency to be given by a poll. If there were a matter of doubt it might deserve arguing; but I do not feel that there can be the slightest doubt in the matter, and, therefore, I fail to see why the right hon. Gentleman opposite should oppose the clause.

MR. PITT-LEWIS (Devon, Barastaple): As I drafted the Amendment, perhaps I may be allowed to explain the peculiar circumstances of the case. Of course, I was aware that no Vestry has a right to ask from Parliament anything beyond the statutory powers it is entitled to have. I have already stated that the residents of the parish were utterly unaware of what the Vestry of Kensington were doing. Happening myself to observe on the Papers of the House this innocent-looking Bill, called the "Kensington Vestry Bill," I obtained a copy of it at the Private Bill Office, and found, to my amazement, what it was. I had never heard of it before, and I immediately took action, and the result was that as soon as the constituents found out what the Vestry were doing the public opinion of the parish was organized, and a strong Committee formed to oppose the Bill. By their exertions they succeeded in turning out every member of the Vestry who came forward to support the Bill; 19 members who went out had been supporting the Bill, but the 20th was retained because he had behaved properly and had opposed it. That shows that the constituency do not want the Bill. It is not quite accurate to say that no precedent can be found for a clause of this kind. There was a precedent in the case of the St. Helen's Improvement Bill, in which exactly the same thing I now propose was done. In that case power was given which was only to be exercised in a certain contingency. If the expenditure was likely to be exceeded, the Local Authorities were to go back to the constituency and obtain their consent. The effect of the compromise which is suggested by the present clause is that the Vestry will be enabled to buy the land, and if it cannot be utilized for the erection of a destructor, they will have power to lay it out as a recreation ground, or to devote it to other parochial purposes. Now, the erection of a destructor is a new thing, and I think it is not too much to ask that the Vestry, before proceeding with such an erection, should ascertain whether they have the consent of the inhabitants, and whether the majority of the owners and ratepayers are desirous of exercising the power with this Bill sanctions. I think that the analogy of the St. Helen's case is perfect, and that when it is proposed to go beyond ordinary matters it should be necessary to consult the constituents. I believe that this House has again and again adopted the principle. For instance, there is a clause in the Public Health Act under which fairs and markets can only be established by means of a proceeding something like this; and there is a common instance in the case of the application of the Free Libraries Act. That Act cannot be adopted without previously obtaining the consent of the parish. So also in regard to the Borough Funds Act, which Act indicates the mode in which the opinion of the constituency shall be obtained—namely, by voting papers. I have adopted the machinery of the Borough Funds Act in this clause. I appeal to the House to accept the clause, because it has been accepted by the promoters of the Bill, and is, in fact, the result of the withdrawal of a considerable amount of opposition. Therefore, under the very peculiar circumstances of the case, I hope the House and the right hon. Gentleman opposite will allow the clause to pass. Until the President of the Local Government Board rose a few minutes ago and expressed the disapproval of the Government, I had received no intimation that it was intended to throw any opposition in the way of the clause.

COLONEL MAKINS (Essex, S.E.): I think it is a very inconvenient proceeding, to introduce into a Private Bill any new principle affecting our local legislation. I was glad to hear the remark which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in deprecation of this clause. I can perfectly well understand why the clause has received the support of the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney). It is because it is the introduction of the thin end of the wedge of that scheme of proportional representation in which the right hon. Member takes so great an interest. I think that if we are going to deal with questions of this kind which are questions of great principle, it should be done by means of a Public Act and not by a clause dragged into a Private Bill. I hope the House will reject this clause.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I wish to support the Amendment, and in doing so I should like to point out that a considerable number of Members have probably been induced to vote in the majority in the recent Division on the supposition that this Amendment would probably be accepted by the House. Such an inducement was certainly held out to hon. Members. The right hon. Member for the Liskeard Division of Cornwall (Mr. Courtney), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin)—to whose powerful and clear speeches I have no doubt the success of the Bill has been due—distinctly alleged that this clause had been put down, and stated that when it came on it would remove a large number of the objections which had been raised to the Bill. I think that the fact of this clause being on the Paper, together with the speech of the right hon. Gentlemen, induced many hon. Members to vote as they did just now, and to constitute the majority of 20 by which the Amendment was rejected. This clause is one which does not in every respect meet all the objections which are felt in North Kensington to the Bill itself. That has been pointed out, and is, I think, admitted even by the hon. Member who proposes the clause. I think the House ought certainly to give the Vestry of Kensington and the ratepayers of Kensington a chance of reconsidering their position. Whether they will exercise the option given to them will depend very largely on the amount of conscience that may be developed on the part of the ratepayers of South Kensington in regard to their treatment of their poorer neighbours in North Kensington. For my own part, I trust that their consciences will be touched, and, therefore, I urge the House to accept the clause.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): If this clause introduced any new principle I should regard it as very serious, and a matter that would require further and careful consideration; but I do not understand that that is the case, although I am unable to state the fact of my own knowledge. I am informed, however, that the same principle has already been embodied in other Acts. It is quite true that I did hold out this clause as an inducement to the House to vote for the Bill, and I did so on the ground that the promoters had agreed to accept it. Under such circumstances, I shall feel bound to accept it myself. It may have the effect of inducing the Vestry to make up their minds more clearly than they have hitherto done.

MAJOR-GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): The clause does not remove my objection to the Bill, seeing that it proposes that the question shall be decided solely by the vote of the ratepayers of the parish of Kensington. Now, I am interested for the parish of Hammersmith—which has no voice in the matter—and therefore I feel obliged to vote against the clause.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am the representative of humanity. We lost the last Division because the hon. Member for the Barnstaple Division of Devon (Mr. Pitt-Lewis) said that, although he disapproved of the Bill, he should vote in favour of it, so that he might put in this clause. Now, I am entirely opposed to the Bill itself, and also to the clause of the hon. Gentleman; and I am opposed to the clause because a right hon. Gentleman of the highest experience—the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone)—says that it raises an objectionable principle. It seems to me, therefore, that we ought, as practical persons, to vote against the clause of the hon. Gentleman, and the clause having been defeated, then take a Division on the Main Question. The hon. Gentleman will then vote for us, because he said he would if he did not get this clause, and then we shall do all we can to throw out the Bill.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I regard the elections for Vestrymen which occurred in May last as decisive of the question locally, so far as North Kensington is concerned; but the clause of the hon. Member for Devonshire enables the whole of the people of the parish of Kensington, including North, South, East, and West, to vote. That is not, I think, a fair issue to raise, seeing that the people who are locally concerned are those who are outside South Kensington. I am an inhabitant of a neighbouring parish, and I shall certainly object, whatever other people may do. I am satisfied that if it had not been for the interposition of the hon. Member for Devonshire, who, of course, is in love with his own clause, the House would never have been induced to give the vote they did a short time ago. His proposition is a perfectly inadmissible proposition, and it will be necessary to take another Division even if the hon. Member persists in dividing upon the clause.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause be added to the Bill," put, and negatived.

An Amendment made.

Bill to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

ACCOMMODATION FOR PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL—SCOTLAND AND IRELAND.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the recent revelations respecting the very unsatisfactory condition of the accommodation for prisoners awaiting trial in many of the Court Houses of England and Wales, the Government will institute a similar official investigation in reference to the Court Houses in Scotland and Ireland?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E): I have consulted the Lord Advocate and the Irish Government on this subject, and I am informed by them that, while they are not aware of any deficiencies in the accommodation for prisoners awaiting trial in Scotland and Ireland, yet, in order that any public anxiety on the subject may be allayed, inquiry will, nevertheless, be made, and I will communicate the results to the hon. Baronet as soon as they are received.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS—NEWPORT PAGNELL.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been called to the recent inquest, at Newport Pagnell, on a boy named Harry Pack, and to the following facts:—That it was found that Harry Pack had died from inflammation of the membrane of the brain; that evidence was given that the assistant master of the National School had struck Harry Pack on the back of the head with a ruler; that, although the assistant master stated that "he was certain he did not strike one of the lads with a ruler," he admitted that "he had touched them with his hands;" that the jury appended to their verdict the rider—

"That, though there is not sufficient evidence to prove to the jury that a blow had been struck, they wish to record their opinion that corporal punishment in schools should not in any case be inflicted by any other than the head master;"

and, whether he will, in view of such cases, further strengthen the Revised Instructions to Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools on the subject of corporal punishment, and take any further steps necessary to prevent corporal punishment being inflicted by assistant masters, and especially to prevent punishment in the form of blows on the heads of children?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): My attention has been called to the case referred to, and I desire to point out to the hon. Member that the present Instructions to Her Majesty's Inspectors contain an expression of opinion precisely similar to that placed on record by the jury. Where such a rule is not observed, it would be the duty of the Inspector to take it into consideration in assessing the "merit" grant; and in gross cases it would be competent for the Department to suspend the certificate, or refuse all recognition of the teacher.

INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX IN CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is a fact that Chambers of Commerce are being assessed for duty upon their income, which is provided by voluntary contributions, in the interests of the trade and commerce of the country; and if, having regard to section 11, sub-section 6, of "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885," this is a legal or proper assessment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1885 a duty is levied—with certain exceptions—in respect of all real and personal property belonging to any body, corporate or incorporate; but it is not leviable if such property be acquired out of funds voluntarily contributed. It is held that annual subscriptions to Chambers of Commerce do not constitute property, real or personal, within the meaning of the Act; and, therefore, no duty is levied on Chambers of Commerce in respect of their income derived from such subscriptions. On the other hand, the subscriptions are not regarded as voluntary in the sense in which the word is used in the Act; and, consequently, in the few cases where the subscriptions have been invested in real or personal property, the income derived from such investment has been brought into assessment. A case involving the legal interpretation of the term "voluntary" is now pending in the Court of Queen's Bench, and a decision is shortly expected.

CIVIL ESTABLISHMENTS—THE COMMISSIONERS, SCOTLAND.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Commissioners on Civil Establishments are to hold sittings in Scotland; and, if so, how soon they may be expected in Edinburgh?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I am unable to give a definite answer to the hon. Member's Question. As he is aware, a visit to Scotland does not rest with the Treasury, but with the Royal Commission itself; but I am informed that the Civil Establishments Commissioners may, probably, before concluding their inquiry, find it necessary to visit Scotland, but the date of such visit, if it is eventually made, cannot be fixed at present.

SCOTLAND—SASINE OFFICE, EDINBURGH.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If there be no separate Account showing a surplus of revenue in the Sasine Office, Edinburgh, as recently stated by him, upon what data did the Treasury authorize the reduction, in 1885, of the fees of searching in the General Register of Sasines; whether such reduction of fees has not caused a deficit against the Office; and, out of what funds is that deficit met?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The data upon which the Treasury reduced, in 1885, the fees for searching in the General Register of Sasines had no direct reference to the amounts previously collected. The chief reasons for the reduction in 1885 were that the high rates previously charged operated to some extent as an impediment against using searches, and that a considerable reduction in the rates would bring searches for incumbrances into more general use, and operate as a security and convenience to the public. The amount of fees received for searches has been less since the reduction than previously; but the orders for searches are now increasing in number, and it is anticipated that the annual amounts received at the reduced rate will ultimately exceed the amounts previously drawn at the higher rates. The fees received are paid over to the Exchequer, and no fund is charged with the deficiency. The whole charges applicable to the Registrar House are defrayed from Votes of Parliament.

SCOTLAND—GENERAL REGISTER HOUSE, EDINBURGH.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the reduction fees for Searchers in the General Register House, Edinburgh, gazetted 6th October, 1885, was laid before The Lord President, Lord Clerk Register, Lord Advocate, and Lord Justice Clerk, in terms of Section 25 of the Act 31 & 32 Vict. c. 64.

Mr. Jackson

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): This document was laid before these officials. As regards the Lord President, the Lord Justice Clerk, and the Lord Advocate, their attention was not called to any special matter contained in the document, which was simply transmitted to them for signature in ordinary course.

SCOTLAND—SASINE OFFICE, EDINBURGH.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he is aware that there is no separate account kept of the Revenue and Expenditure of the Sasine Office, Edinburgh; if he will state from what source did the Crown Agent for Scotland prepare the Return of Revenue and Expenditure of the Sasine Office, presented to Parliament in August, 1877, and are the same means still in existence; if they are, will he cause the Return of 1877 to be brought down to 1886-7; and, what means he possesses of ascertaining that the fees drawn are not greater than may reasonably be held sufficient for defraying the expenses of the Department, as provided for by Section 25 of "The Land Register (Scotland) Act, 1868?"

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: Separate sub-heads of Votes and accounts for each of the several offices of the Register House have been discontinued since 1862-3, in accordance with the Report of a Departmental Committee on the Register House. The Return presented in 1877 of the Crown Agent was prepared by the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer from information received partly from other Departments and partly through the books of his own Department, which then contained separate accounts for the Sasine Office. I am informed that, though these separate accounts are no longer kept, yet from memoranda as to the amount of stamps cancelled in each Department, a similar Return brought down to 1886-7 can be prepared with approximate accuracy; and if the hon. Member will move for it after the 31st instant, there will be no objection on the part of the Government to giving it. The Treasury believe that the fees are not more than sufficient to cover the whole cost of the Department.

RAILWAYS (ENGLAND AND WALES)— TOTON SIDINGS ON THE MIDLAND RAILWAY.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether the attention of the Board of Trade has been given to the mode of working at Toton sidings on the Midland Railway; and, whether it is true that at the north end there are nine roads without fixed signals, and that the only signals given are given by hand or by lamp; and, if so, whether any communication has been, or will be, made by the Board of Trade to the Company on the subject?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The connections between the sidings and the main line at Toton on the Midland Railway were inspected and authorized to be opened in 1882. There are nine sidings at the north end; but the inspection made by the Board of Trade only related to the connections between them and the passenger lines. It is not necessary, under the Regulation of Railways Acts, nor is it usual, that an inspection should be made of the arrangements in the yards for working or signalling such sidings. It is, however, usual and preferable to work such sidings in the yards from a separate box, and not by hand signalling.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRE- LAND)—WORKS AT GREYSTONES.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) (for Mr. W. J. CORBET) (Wicklow, E.) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he is aware that little or nothing is being done towards the completion of the harbour works at Greystones; whether it is a fact that the term of the contract expired on 1st November last, and that it was then stated the work would be finished by May next; whether he is aware that the fishermen have no shelter for their boats; and, whether he will take any steps with a view to the completion of the harbour in a reasonable time?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I am informed that—(1) The present contract is engaged in preparation work. (2) The original contract expired on the first of November; the present one will expire on the 1st of May next, but no statement was made that the works would be finished on that day. (3) The works do not interfere with the shelter previously existing, and the hon. Member is aware that, so far as the funds available allow, the additional shelter asked for by the fishermen will be provided. (4) I am informed that every effort is being, and will be, made to hasten the completion not only of the works originally designed, but of the additional shelter to which I have just referred.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACTS, 1885-6— {RETURN.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) (for Mr. W. J. CORBET) (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as President of the Irish Local Government Board, If he will give a Return showing the working of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts 1885-6, from the commencement up to the present time, giving the number of cottages erected, and the expenses connected therewith?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Returns giving the information as to the working of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts up to the end of last March are already before the House in the Annual Report of the Local Government Board, and they will be continued to the end of the present month in the Board's next Annual Report, which is in course of preparation. Under these circumstances, the hon. Member will probably agree with me that nothing would be gained by laying a special Return on the Table.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—MILL- TOWN.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If a large force of Constabulary, accompanied by the County and District Inspector, was drafted into Milltown on the 6th and 7th instant; if such a large force was necessary; and, if its presence there will entail any expenditure on the barony or on the County of Galway?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Reference to the locality mentioned has been made with the view of obtaining the information asked for; but there has not been time for the receipt of a reply.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—MR. J. M'NULTY, OF LOUGHGLYNN.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, inasmuch as the prosecution of Mr. J. M'Nulty, of Loughglynn, has been abandoned by the Government, the money taken forcibly and without warrant from his person by Sergeant Wharton, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, has been restored to M'Nulty; and, if not, how soon this will be done?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I understand that, the Crown having decided not to proceed with the prosecution, and the Assizes for the County of Roscommon being over, the money will be returned to the person from whose custody it was taken.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—HEAD CONSTABLE O'HALLORAN, OF ENNIS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the case of Head Constable O'Halloran, of Ennis, Whether the present Inspector General of Irish Constabulary, when a Divisional Magistrate, forbade the Head Constable to visit the district of Teakle (where he had been stationed), on the ground that his visits there were succeeded by crime and outrage; whether the late County Inspector of Olare made a like order for an identical reason; whether, during the time when Head Constable O'Halloran was quartered in the district of Teakle, disorder and crime prevailed there; and, whether the district had been peaceable and free from crime before his arrival, and again became so after his departure; whether the Irish Government have had brought to their notice the dying deposition of a man named Slattery, accusing Head Constable O'Halloran of having induced him to procure a witness to give false evidence against the brothers Delahunty, now suffering penal servitude for life; whether inquiry has been made of Patrick Loughrey, as to his declaration that Head Constable O'Halloran gave him

£10 to induce him to procure the commission of crime; whether inquiry has been made, or will be made, into the charge that Head Constable O'Halloran forged a letter, in the name of the Member for East Clare, enclosing the £10 note; and, whether the £10 note given by Head Constable O'Halloran to Patrick Loughrey had been supplied to the Head Constable, or was repaid to him, out of any public fund; and, if so, out of what fund, and to what official the money may be returned?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am informed that there is no ground for the allegations in the first three paragraphs of the Question. The declaration made by Slattery was under the consideration both of Earl Spencer and the Earl of Carnarvon when holding the Office of Viceroy of Ireland. They both fully investigated the statements made therein, and neither of them saw any reason to take any action in consequence of them. No such inquiry has been made, or will be made, as is suggested in the fifth and sixth paragraphs of the Question. The circumstances under which the Head Constable used an assumed name do not in any way support the construction attempted to be put upon them. I cannot make any statement as to what source the money came from. It is open to Loughrey to return it to the Head Constable if, as is probable, he thinks he has no right to keep it.

MR. SEXTON: As the money was abstracted from the public purse, and as I have the £10 note here, will the right hon. Gentleman name the official to whom it should be returned?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be very happy to receive it from the hon. Gentleman.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—REFUNDING THE FIVE PER CENT. COUPON TAX.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Egyptian Government has instructed the Caisse of the debt to commence refunding the Five per Cent Coupon Tax; and, if so, how soon he can undertake to lay before the House Papers containing the facts on which this decision was arrived at?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have been informed by telegraph that instructions have been given by the Egyptian Government to the Caisse to refund the Five per Cent Coupon Tax. A despatch on this subject will be included in the Papers now about to be presented to Parliament, and further statements of the accounts will be added when received. I may, in the meantime, state that it has been known for some time that the funds in the hands of the Caisse to be applied to this purpose, according to Article 21 of the Decree of July, 27, 1885, were more than sufficient.

METEOROLOGICAL OFFICIAL REPORT —WEATHER FORECASTS.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether, considering the advantage such information would prove to farmers and others, he will cause the latest available weather forecast to be daily exhibited at all post offices throughout the country?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I have been requested by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to reply to the Question of the hon. Member. I believe that the desired object can be secured, inasmuch as the Meteorological Office is willing to supply the forecasts at a nominal charge to anyone who is willing to pay the expense of telegraphing, which need rarely be more than 6d. for each message. If the persons interested in forecasts in each town or district jointly subscribed, the expense to each would be inconsiderable; and there will be no objection to the exhibition of forecasts at the local post offices, provided space is available, if the persons to whom the telegrams were addressed desire them to be so exhibited, instead of being delivered.

FUNDS IN CHANCERY.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the recently published list of Chancery and other funds which have not been dealt with for 15 years, Whether he can state the total amount of the balances standing to the credit of the accounts; whether the whole of this money has been unclaimed during the period mentioned; and, whether, having regard to the prevailing misconception as to the amount of these funds, he will consider the propriety of publishing additional information, showing the balance on each account, the order of Court affecting the account, and such other particulars as it may be practicable to publish?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The total amount of the balances referred to by the hon. Gentleman is about £1,000,000; and the number of the separate accounts to which these balances relate is about 3,000, showing an average balance of between £300 and £400. The whole amount represented has been unclaimed not less than 15 years. There have, however, been constant applications during the period for information in regard to many of these accounts; but no claims have been substantiated resulting in any order of the Court for the disposal of any part of the funds. In the recent publication of the list additional information of a general nature has been given for the purpose of removing a large amount of misconception which appears to prevail with regard to the magnitude of these unclaimed funds. Thus, as stated in The Gazette, out of the whole of the accounts cited in the list only 1-19th of the balances exceed £1,000, and only one-third exceed £100. The Treasury is of opinion that the extended information given to the public with the list just published is sufficient for the object in view, and that it is not desirable to give further details.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND) — LIFFORD ASSIZES—HANNAH O'DONNELL.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the information before, and the evidence at, the trial of Hannah O'Donnell, at Lifford Assizes, for alleged forcible entry, and the informations in several similar cases, disclose the fact that the police entered the houses of the defendants, interrogated the inmates, asked them to quit, and that, for over a month, they had been watching the houses from which these defendants had been evicted; whether the houses were for most of that time lying open; whether any bailiff or other person, on behalf of the landlord, was in possession, or watching the houses; whether anything was done from the day of the eviction by the landlord to secure the possession; whether the houses were built by the tenants; whether their time for redemption, after eviction, had expired; whether the police receive any remuneration for their services from the landlord in such cases; whether Sergeant Mahony was directed by the Lord Chief Baron to say if he had a Circular of Instructions for doing as above, and whether he claimed privilege for not producing it through claiming that he acted under a Circular issued several years before; and, whether he will call for further explanations as to this case?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Answers to these several details as to alleged matters of fact cannot be given without reference to the locality, for which the hon. Member has allowed no opportunity.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Question appeared substantially in another form nearly a week ago?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Question appeared in so substantially another form that no part of it resembled the Question now on the Paper. I did answer, as a matter of fact, the former Question.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—PROTRACTION OF ASSIZES—QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the great waste of judicial time, the undue protraction of the Assizes in populous places, and the heavy expenses thrown upon the country by a practice introduced of recent years, whereby the Judges of Assize try prisoners committed by the magistrates to take their trial at Quarter or Adjourned Sessions of the Peace; whether he is aware that the ancient form of the Commission of Assize for the County of Lancaster was altered a few years ago, to enable this change to be effected, and that Grand Juries in Lancashire have made presentments against the new system; and, whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared, by legislation or otherwise, to procure that prisoners committed to take their trial at Quarter or Adjourned Sessions of the Peace should (unless otherwise specially ordered) be tried there, and not elsewhere?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The whole of this subject, including not only the times and places of holding the Criminal Assizes, but also the times for holding Sessions, has been for some time under the consideration of a Committee of the Judges, at the request of the Lord Chancellor and the Council of the Supreme Court. Their Report is very soon expected, and will receive immediate attention.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DISCREPANCY IN AMOUNTS OF EXPENDITURE.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can explain the discrepancy between the sum of £1,411,539, given in Return 28, printed 11th February, 1887, as the total expenditure on the Royal Irish Constabulary for the year ended 31st March, 1886, and the sum of £1,387,169, given in the Appropriation Accounts, Civil Service Estimates, Class 3, Vote 29, p. 342, as the total expenditure on the Royal Irish Constabulary for the same period; and, if the sum in the Return is incorrect, whether he will cause a fresh one to be made?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): There is no real discrepancy between these Returns. The difference falls almost entirely under the head of the cost of barracks, and is caused by the fact that in the Appropriation Accounts credit is given for the sums repaid by members of the Force for lodging accommodation; while in the special Return prepared last August the gross rent of barracks is included, as the Inspector General believed that to be in conformity with the intention of the Return. There are also some smaller items, chiefly under the head of pensions paid in the Colonies, as to which the necessary documents had not been received from abroad when the Return was prepared. I shall be happy to give the hon. Member the detailed figures, if he wishes to see them.

Mr. O'Doherty

POST OFFICE—THE POSTAL UNION—
THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General, in reference to his recommendation to the Australian Colonies to join the Postal Union, Is he aware that the postage to India, which is only half way to Australia, is 5*d.*, though it is in the Postal Union; what guarantee have we that, if the Australian Colonies joined the Postal Union, the charges would be reduced, and better rates obtained than now exists to India; and, is it a fact that nine-tenths of the British Countries and Colonies which have joined the Union are charged for postage 5*d.* or 4*d.* from Great Britain, and 2½*d.* from France, Germany, or Italy?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The postage of a letter to India is 5*d.*, and if the Australian Colonies joined the Postal Union they would probably adopt the same charge for their letters to Europe. To most of the British Colonies which are members of the Postal Union the charge for a letter from England is 4*d.* or 5*d.*; because beyond the fundamental union rate of 2½*d.*, the British Post Office charges an extra rate for sea or foreign transit. Italy charges, as we do, a surtax of 1½*d.*, in addition to the fundamental union rate, for all letters sent to places beyond sea. But France and Germany, in the exercise of their right to levy or not to levy the sea surtax, limit their charge to the rate of 2½*d.* to all countries of the Union. The French and German Governments pay much higher subsidies relatively for their Packet Services than the British Government do. The considerable loss in point of postal revenue consequent thereon must be thrown on the taxpayers of each country, an arrangement which I apprehend would not be a generally welcome innovation in our fiscal system.

EGYPT (THE MILITARY EXPEDITION)

—R. A. CATHIE, GUNNER OF THE "SPHYNX."

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If Mr. Richard Cathie, Gunner in the Royal Navy, has been in any way rewarded for his conduct in the field at the Battles of El Teb and Tamai in the

Soudan; and, if not, if it be intended to confer any special reward on him for his services, as shown in the following extract from The Royal Navy List, p. 309:—

"R. A. Cathie, Gunner of Sphynx, served during the operations in the Eastern Soudan, 1884. Landed with Naval Brigade and present at Battles of El Teb and Tamai, mentioned in despatches; during the engagement of El Teb he had more than one hand-to-hand encounter with the enemy; for the gallantry he displayed both in bringing his gun into action, and for his bravery in his personal encounters with the enemy, he was strongly recommended by General Buller, and was also thanked on the Field by Commander Rolfe the next morning; on his returning afloat he was specially thanked by Admiral Hewett for his bravery at El Teb. At the Battle of Tamai he was recommended by General Graham for his bravery. (Egyptian Medal, Khedive Bronze Star, El Teb and Tamai Clasps.)"

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The Admiralty are not responsible for the services recorded in The Royal Navy List, the information there given being supplied by the officers themselves. Mr. Cathie's recommendations from official sources are good; and, as in the case of all officers who are specially mentioned, are duly recorded in his favour. As to any "special reward," I can only refer to the reply given by the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) on the same subject, when Civil Lord of the Admiralty, on March 9, 1885.

IRELAND—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, GALWAY.

Mr. PINKERTON (Galway) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the President, Members of Council, and Office-bearers of Queen's College, Galway, are, without a single exception, Protestant; whether appointments in the Royal University, with which the College is connected, are regulated by the principle of securing a Catholic element to the extent of at least one-half in all offices and Examinerships; and, if the Government is prepared to make such appointments and changes in the College Statutes as will insure the presence of Catholics on the Governing Body and Staff of a College intended for the higher education of a Province containing 783,000 Catholics and 35,000 Protestants of all denominations?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have no

official information on the subject of the first paragraph of the Question. The hon. Member is, I think, under a misapprehension as to the connection which he suggests between the Royal University and the Queen's Colleges, although, no doubt, the officers of the former are, to some extent, selected from among the College Professors. The Government are not prepared to make such a change in the College statutes as is proposed; such a change would be contrary to the spirit of the Act under which the Colleges were founded.

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS— LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS AND CHILDREN.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, What arrangement has been made, since last year, to provide for the better education of the children of lighthouse keepers in Ireland, and to enable the lighthouse keepers to attend Divine Service on Sundays; and, what rock stations have been, or are to be, made relieving stations?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Since the hon. Member raised this question last year the Board of Trade have collected from the General Lighthouse Authorities of England, Scotland, and Ireland certain detailed information upon the subject referred to in the Question. If the hon. Member desires to move for a Return of the questions put by the Board of Trade to these Lighthouse Authorities, and a synopsis of their replies, there will be no objection to give it. But as the matter is of no general public interest, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be content with obtaining the information he requires from me at the Board of Trade Office.

THE WRECK COMMISSION—RETURN OF INQUIRIES, 1885.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether he can lay before the House a Return giving the number of inquiries held, during the financial year 1885-6, under the Wreck Commission, specifying where each inquiry was held, and whether before the Wreck Commissioner or a magistrate?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The information as to inquiries under the Wreck Commission will be included in the Wreck Abstract for 1885-6, which will be presented as soon as it is completed.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—PILOT CERTIFICATES TO FOREIGN SUBJECTS.

MR. C. H. WILSON (Hull, W.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, How many certificates as Pilots in British waters granted to foreign subjects are now in force.

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): There are now in force five pilotage certificates granted to masters or mates of foreign vessels, all in the Hull district. In 30 other cases the annual renewal of similar certificates has been suspended, pending the decision of Parliament on the Bill introduced by the hon. Member's Colleague (Mr. King); 28 of these are within the jurisdiction of the London Trinity House, and two within that of the Hull Trinity House.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ELECTIONS (IRELAND)—MOUNTMELICK UNION.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the following 10 ratepayers in the townland of Derrygrule, in Mountmellick Union, have for years voted in all the elections in the electoral division of Mountmellick until 1885, namely, John Quigley, Mary Meehan, James Brien, James Quigley, Edward Jones, William Tanner, John Conroy, Richard Dickenson, Bridget Bergin, and John Walsh; whether the newly appointed clerk, acting as Returning Officer, has disallowed the votes of the ratepayers mentioned, although they have paid the rates assessed on their holdings; and, whether the Local Government Board will take steps to protect the rights of the persons in question at the present election?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Local Government Board have communicated with the Returning Officer, and have ascertained that he has issued voting papers for the present election to all the persons mentioned, except two, who are not rated.

THE MAURITIUS—CONSTITUTION OF THE LATE COMMISSION.

Mr. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) (for Mr. Cox) (Clare, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he has received a Memorial, signed by certain Catholics of the Mauritius on behalf of the Catholic population of the island, protesting against the constitution and mode of procedure of the late Commission, sent to report on the affairs of the Mauritius, and sit in judgment on the Governor of the Colony; whether the Catholic population numbers 108,000, against 8,000 Protestants; whether Sir John Pope Hennessy was the first Catholic Governor sent there by Her Majesty's Government since the conquest of the Seychelles; whether the Head of the Commission, the Secretary, the Law Adviser, and the two other Members of the Commission were all Protestants; whether the Members of the Commission were unable, or unwilling, to make use of the French language, and refused to take the evidence of several of the Mauritians because they could only speak French; whether French is the language of the Catholics of the Colony; and, if the use of it was guaranteed to them as their chief National custom by the terms of the Treaty of Capitulation of 1810; whether Sir John Pope Hennessy was condemned unheard; whether, a few days before, General Hawley (the officer at present administering the Government) was called upon to take up the reins of office, he presided at a meeting of the members of the Bible Association, at which proselytism by the Protestant clergy amongst the Catholic children of the community was referred to in terms of congratulation; whether he has any information to show that the proceedings of the Commission, the suspension of Sir John Pope Hennessy, and the appointment of General Hawley, have caused much anger and resentment on the part of the Colonists towards England; and, what action Her Majesty's Government intend taking in the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): I have received such Memorial, signed by 10 inhabitants of Mauritius, who appear to be Roman Catholics, but do not profess to have signed it on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Mauritius. The numbers stated are substantially correct, according to the Census of 1881; but it may be added that two-thirds of the population are neither Roman Catholics nor Protestants. I cannot say positively; but probably Sir John Pope Hennessy was the first Roman Catholic Governor of Mauritius. Sir Hercules Robinson, who was the sole Commissioner, the Secretary to the Commission, and the Legal Adviser to the Commissioner, were Protestants. The persons referred to as the two other members of the staff are probably Sir Hercules Robinson's private secretary, and the shorthand writer employed to take down notes of the evidence. The former is a Protestant; as to the latter, I cannot answer. The proceedings of the Commission were conducted in the English language, which is the language used in the Law Courts of Mauritius. The witnesses who gave parole evidence were examined in English; but witnesses who preferred to make written depositions in French were allowed to do so. French is the language spoken by the bulk of the Christian inhabitants of the island. The Treaty of Capitulation provided that the inhabitants should preserve their customs, including, no doubt, the custom of using the French language, which they have ever since retained. Sir John Pope Hennessy has not been condemned unheard. He was temporarily suspended by Sir Hercules Robinson, because Sir Hercules Robinson considered that, even if the result of the inquiry should be to clear him from blame, he could not remain in the administration of the Government without danger to public interests; but no final decision will be taken without giving him the fullest opportunity of explanation, for which purpose he has been summoned to England. General Hawley did preside at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, shortly before he was appointed Administrator. I have no authentic report of the proceedings of that meeting. It has been the custom, for many years past, for the Governor, or the officer commanding the troops, to preside at the annual meetings of the Society; and it has always been understood that it was not intended thereby to express, on the part of the officer so presiding, any political or religious bias. Some of the newspapers published in the Colony have expressed resentment, on account of the suspension of Sir John Pope Hennessy. Lastly, the matter is under consideration.

MR. O'KELLY asked, would Her Majesty's Government take into consideration the desirability of requesting officers not to preside at these meetings?

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, Her Majesty's Government would not do so.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked, was the right hon. Gentleman aware that several witnesses were unable to give parole evidence, because the Commissioners would not, or could not, use the French language; and that the intending witnesses had to put their evidence in writing?

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he believed that to be inaccurate.

LICENSING ACT—DOGS.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a case reported in Lloyd's Weekly London News of 13th March, of a fine having been inflicted by a magistrate at Westminster Police Court, because a dog was kept without a licence to lead a blind girl about; and, whether there is an exemption in the Licensing Act in respect of dogs kept to lead blind persons?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Commissioner of Inland Revenue that if the case of H. Sullivan is the one referred to he was fined 2s. by the magistrate at Westminster Police Court on March 12 for keeping a dog without a licence. It was alleged by Sullivan that the dog was given to him to train to lead his blind sister; but it transpired that she was quite capable of going about the streets without being led. No licence need be taken out for any dog kept and used solely by a blind person for guidance.

ADMIRALTY—THE INDIAN TROOP-SHIP "JUMNA."

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether all work on the Indian troopship Jumna, in preparation for next trooping season, is to be stopped; whether the other Indian troopships Euphrates, Serapis, Malabar, and Crocodile are to be still employed on the trooping service, or are to be sold as reported in The Times of the 22nd instant; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to make any change in the port at which troops for and from India now embark and disembark?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): It has been decided not to incur the very large expense that would be necessary to put the Jumna into a fit state to take her turn in the relief duties of the next trooping season. The other four Indian troopships—Euphrates, Serapis, Malabar, and Crocodile—are sufficient to carry out the relief service of the next season, and they will be used for this duty. The Admiralty are not aware that there is any intention to change the present ports for embarking and disembarking the troops.

SEED SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT—REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What percentage of the money advanced for seed in Ireland has been repaid; if the balance is due by unions situated in the poorer districts, and with a large population; if he would institute an inquiry to ascertain if such balances were chiefly uncollectable from causes arising from hurry in issuing the seed; and, if an inquiry would also be made as to the possibility of remitting a portion of the said balances?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have already answered so much of this Question as relates to the amount of the outstanding debt—namely, that it is about 7 per cent of the entire loan. I doubt if, at this distance of time, any advantage would be gained by the suggested inquiry as to alleged mistakes in the issuing of the seed seven years ago. With regard to the outstanding balance, I understand that a considerable portion, though collected, has not been paid over to the Board of Works; and until this is done, the Irish Government cannot further approach the Treasury on the subject of remission.

COLONEL NOLAN asked, if it were a fact the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill) had promised such an inquiry; and, whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief

Sir Henry Holland

Secretary would inquire why the inquiry had not been held?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. and gallant Member was aware he could not make any inquiry on the subject now, as the noble Lord the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer was not there.

IMPERIAL AND COLONIAL DEFENCES —HONG KONG.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the War Office has been in communication with the Admiralty, in reference to the fulfilment of the arrangement come to by the Government of this Country with the Colonial Government, in relation to the defences of Hong Kong?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. H. S. NORTHOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: As all the remaining guns for the armament of Hong Kong are expected to be supplied during the ensuing financial year, it has not been considered necessary to make any communication to the Admiralty on the subject.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—CORONER'S WARRANT.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, the Coroner's warrant lately issued by Mr. Coroner Rice to commit Constable Bulmer, of Royal Irish Constabulary, is legal or illegal?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am informed that the attention of the Coroner having been drawn to the irregularities in the warrant, an amended warrant, which was duly executed, was substituted by him. There seems, therefore, to be no necessity for taking the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on a matter which is now of no practical importance.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to intimate that the constable in this matter was committed to gaol?

[No reply.]

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the alleged irregularity consisted of printed words forming part of the usual formality of the warrant being allowed to remain on the face of the document; and that when the Coroner's attention was called to the matter he simply drew his pen across the printed words, and not across anything that had been written?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The fact that the Coroner issued a new warrant appears to indicate that, in his opinion, the old warrant was irregular.

Several Irish MEMBERS: He did not issue a new warrant.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I wish to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, whether we are to understand that if a policeman is of opinion that a warrant is irregular he has a right to refuse to execute it for a week, and to take that time to inquire whether the warrant is irregular or not? For future guidance it is desirable that we should know.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): By a regulation that was given to the police long before the present Government came into Office, the District Inspectors were directed not to execute a warrant they had reason to believe was irregular. When such a warrant is issued they are expected to call the attention of the persons issuing it to the irregularity. In pursuance of that order the District Inspector, seeing certain matters in this warrant which were not in accordance with the fact, sought for the Coroner, in order to call his attention to it. But the Coroner was unable to be found until the next sitting of the Court, when the District Inspector called the attention of the Coroner to the irregularity, which was then corrected, and a new warrant issued. The first person to be consulted in such a case was the person issuing the warrant; and this was necessary not only for the protection of the Constabulary, but also for the protection of the Magistrate or Coroner who issued it.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell us what the alleged irregularities were?

MR. HOLMES: I can do so. It was stated upon the face of the warrant that the grounds on which it was issued were, first of all, that it was sworn in open Court that a summons had been served on the constable; and, secondly, that he had declined to attend. As a matter of fact it was not sworn in open Court that the summons had been served; and, in the second place, the constable had attended. The contempt was a refusal to answer a particular question. These were the matters to which the District Inspector desired to call the attention of the Coroner. This course was perfectly reasonable, and the Coroner agreed to issue a new warrant.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether these two informalities were not on the printed form of the warrant; and, whether the error was that the real cause of the order of committal was not filled in the ordinary warrant?

MR. LANE (Cork Co. E.): May I also ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether the Coroner did not leave the town on the following day, so that the District Inspector could have approached him and have corrected the warrant did he choose to do so?

MR. HOLMES: I cannot say what was printed on the warrant; but everyone knows that a warrant must be irregular if it does not state the reason for which it was issued. In reference to the other Question, I am informed that the District Inspector on the very earliest opportunity went to look for the Coroner, but did not find him.

LAW AND JUSTICE — RIOTS AT YOUGHAL — DISTRICT INSPECTOR SOMERVILLE AND CONSTABLE WARD.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, as the inquest at Youghal terminated in a verdict of wilful murder against District Inspector Somerville and Constable Ward, he will take measures to have those prisoners brought to trial at the next Cork Assizes?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am advised by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland that the case of the prisoners referred to will be dealt with in the ordinary and usual course.

Mr. Holmes

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) asked if the Inspector and the constable were out on bail; and, if so, on what security?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They are both in custody.

Subsequently,

MR. LANE: I wish to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland a Question of which I have given him private Notice. If he has received any communication from the Inspector General of Constabulary in Ireland as to admitting to bail District Inspector Somerville and Constable Ward, now in gaol on a charge of murder; and, with a view to such an application being made to Mr. Justice O'Brien at the Cork Assizes, whether the authorities are prepared to agree to such an application; and, whether it is unusual for a Judge of Assize to entertain an application of the kind?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I did not receive any communication from the Inspector General of Constabulary; but before coming down to the House I received a telegram from the Under Secretary, which had been sent to him from Cork by the County Inspector of Constabulary, stating that District Inspector Somerville and Constable Ward had been advised that they might make such an application to the Judge of Assize. If I should get Notice, I shall certainly oppose such an application until I have an opportunity of reading the informations in the case and the affidavits on which the application is to be made.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Arising out of that answer, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary whether he will give an undertaking that these two prisoners will be suspended from active duty until their case has been finally disposed of by a jury?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know what the ordinary rule in such a case is; but I have no doubt it will be followed.

MR. MACNEILL: I wish to ask the Attorney General, whether it is usual for a Judge of Assize to admit to bail prisoners committed for wilful murder?

MR. HOLMES: It would be exceedingly improper for me to give an opinion on the matter. It is entirely outside my duty.

WAR OFFICE — MOBILIZATION OF FIRST AND SECOND ARMY CORPS.

GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.) asked the Secretary of State for War. Whether the reduction in the Horse Artillery being proposed, in view of effecting economies to enable the Government to have everything ready for the First Army Corps to be increased to the War Establishment to take the field at once on the orders being given, and for the mobilization of the Second Army Corps, arrangements have been made in the Estimates for equipment, stores, transport, waggons; and also for store accommodation at the several stations where troops are to be mobilized for the embarkation of even one Army Corps?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): The conversion of the batteries of Horse Artillery is being made, not for the object stated by my hon. and gallant Friend, with the view of effecting economies; but, as I have on previous occasions explained, because they were in excess of our requirements, while it was necessary to increase our Field and Garrison Artillery. It is, however, the fact that steps have been, and are being, taken to enable the First Army Corps to take the field, when necessary, without any delay; and I shall be glad of the assistance of my hon. and gallant Friend in pushing forward these very necessary measures as much as possible.

IMPERIAL AND COLONIAL DEFENCES — SINGAPORE.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid) asked the Secretary of State for War. Whether the War Office has been in communication with the Admiralty, in order to arrange for the provision of adequate and localized naval defences at Singapore, until the armaments, agreed upon in 1884 with the Colony to be completed in 1887, are provided; and, whether, if this be impossible, the Government are prepared to hand back to the Colony some part of the capital, together with a fair rate of interest on the £81,000 spent by the Colony, for the years intervening between 1884 and 1889, or such further periods during which the obligations of the Imperial Government shall remain unfulfilled?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: As it is not admitted that there is any very serious deficiency in the defences of Singapore, the contingency stated in the Question of my hon. Friend does not arise. But, in any case, it would not be desirable for me to explain the nature of the precautions which the Admiralty may think it right to take. With the permission of the House, I will take this opportunity of correcting an error in my reply of the 18th instant on the same subject. I stated then that the two guns which would not be ready for Singapore in 1887-8 were in course of manufacture at Elswick. It appears now that I was inadvertently misinformed, and that though guns for Hong Kong and Aden are being made at Elswick, the two for Singapore are in hand at the Royal Gun Factory.

THE RIVER THAMES (THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE BOAT RACE)—THE POLICE.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the publication of a placard with reference to certain steamboats on the river on the occasion of the University Boat Race, which states that, in certain contingencies, the police will "chuck overboard" from the steamers any person who, in their opinion, is not behaving himself; whether he is aware that this placard is published by Unwin and Company; and whether the police have orders to carry the same into effect?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have no information as to the publication of the placard referred to; but I am informed by the Chief Commissioner of Police that certain Steamboat Companies have applied to him for police to go on board their boats, and he has in all cases declined.

MR. W. REDMOND: May I ask, whether it is not a fact that the First Lord of the Treasury is a member of the firm of Unwin and Company, which published the placard; and, if so, what steps the Government will take to prevent Ministers publishing such documents?

[No reply.]

ARMY—CONTRACTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether the Government will consent to the issue of an annual Return showing what contracts were during the past year thrown open to public competition, and what contracts were offered to only a limited number of firms—namely, those on the selected lists of the Director of Contracts; whether, in such Return, he will also publish the names of the firms in each of such lists, and state which of such firms received contracts, which tendered and did not receive contracts, and which sent in no tender during the year included in the Return; and, whether he will take care that no firm shall continue upon any such list who have for some time ceased to tender, and who may use the fact of being on such list as contractors to the British Army mainly as an advertisement for procuring other contracts elsewhere?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHCOOTE) (Exeter): The detailed Return asked for would involve great labour, and, so far as can be seen, would answer no correspondingly useful purpose. The average number of tenders issued yearly from the War Office during the last five years has been 16,667, to which 9,313 returns with quotations of prices have been received, or 69 per cent. As regards the range of competition, Commissariat and Engineer contracts, and the more important contracts for stores and clothing, are, as a rule, given by public or advertised competition. As regards contracts which are offered to a restricted list of firms, care is taken that those firms who cease to tender are, after a year, removed from the list. The list is constantly under revision, and each failure to tender in reply to an invitation is noted against the manufacturer.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—CONTRACT FOR CARTRIDGES—MESSRS. LATIMER CLARK, MUIRHEAD, AND CO.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether the contract entered into by Messrs. Latimer Clark, Muirhead, and Co., for the manufacture of 500,000 cartridges, the date of delivery for the last of the four instalments being 18th March, has been duly carried out; whether the first instalment, due 25th February, has yet been delivered; and, if so, what portions of it were manufactured at the Millwall works of the contractors, or were supplied from some other source; and, if so, by whom; whether a portion of the delay in this instance is excused, on the ground of the omission by the Ordnance Department of an important portion of the specification, that relating to gauge; and, whether, and to what extent, the Penalty Clause, or other such safeguard, in this and similar contracts, is rendered nugatory by the fact that the Ordnance Department accepts a tender without supplying an adequate specification of the article required?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHCOOTE) (Exeter): The contract has not been carried out. The sample delivery has been rejected, principally because of the failure of the caps, which it is understood were of English make, and were purchased by Messrs. Latimer Clark, Muirhead, and Co. The cartridge cases and bullets are good, though the cases are rather light, and both were made at Millwall. The cartridges were filled by Messrs. Dyer and Robson, of Greenwich, gunpowder being supplied by this Department. The target was satisfactory. A complete specification and drawing accompanied the acceptance of this firm's tender. The non-issue of gauges to govern manufacture caused a delay of 16 days. Allowing for this delay, two instalments are overdue; and as it is evident that some further time must elapse before perfect cartridges can be produced, the contract has been reduced by 300,000 rounds, and the execution of the balance will enable Messrs. Latimer Clark, Muirhead, and Co. to show that the defects in the sample delivery can be overcome by them.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—BI-LINGUAL INSTRUCTION—THE WELSH LANGUAGE.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the population of districts of Scotland and Ireland, where the Government makes provision for bi-lingual instruction, and for the utilization of the home language of the children, is comparatively small; whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of the Departmental Committee on Welsh Education, in which is stated that,

"out of a population of 1,426,514 in Wales and Monmouthshire, no less than 1,006,100 habitually speak Welsh ;"

and, whether he can state to the House the reasons why he should refuse to the million Welsh-speaking population of Wales the educational rights and advantages which are accorded to the small Gaelic-speaking population of Scotland?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford), in reply, said, that, assuming the facts stated in the Question to be accurate, the inference suggested in the latter part of it involved matter of argument which, he thought, it would be more convenient to deal with on the Estimates.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (WALES)— WELSH TRAINING COLLEGES.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been called to the following paragraph of the Scotch Education Report for 1886:—

"The system of combining attendance at University classes with the efficient course of practical professional training provided by the Colleges under our inspection was first introduced by the Code of 1873, and is now producing very satisfactory results. In 1884, 119 students took advantage of this arrangement, many of whom passed with great credit the examination for certificates held last Christmas. All the Training Colleges for masters are now availing themselves of this provision of the Code ;"

and, whether he will make similar provision for the students of the Bangor Training College to avail themselves of the classes and courses of lectures at the University College of North Wales at Bangor?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The expediency of connecting the existing Training Colleges with the University Colleges now found throughout the country by means of out-students on the Scotch system is a subject of great importance, upon which the Royal Commission is now collecting evidence, and I can assure the hon. Member it shall receive the careful attention of the Department.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND) —SENIOR INSPECTORS OF SCHOOLS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) asked the Lord Advocate, The amount payable during the past year to each of the three senior Inspectors of Schools in Scotland as salary, as allowance for personal expenses when travelling, and as re-imbursement of actual cost of travelling and incidental expenses?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The salary of the Chief Inspectors are, as stated in the Estimates, £950, with £9 9s. in the case of Dr. Kerr for the inspection of evening schools. The amounts paid for the year ended December 31, 1886, as personal allowance and re-imbursement of travelling expenses respectively were:—To Dr. Wilson, £51 9s. and £54 9s. 1d.; to Dr. Kerr, £58 16s. and £91 8s. 7d.; to Mr. Ogilvie, £68 5s. and £55 0s. 10d. These items are regulated entirely by the amount of absence from home, and by the nature and amount of travelling required by the Department.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— OMAGH WINTER ASSIZES.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Is it the fact that he went down special to the Omagh Winter Assizes to prosecute the two Walkers for the murder of the soldier and policeman at Belfast; is it intended to send any special counsel to prosecute them in Belfast at the forthcoming trials; was the report correct that Judge Lawson, on the trial of one of the prisoners, refused to accept a verdict of manslaughter which the jury brought in; and, as he specially prosecuted in this case himself at Omagh, has he given any special instructions with regard to the course of the prosecution in Belfast? I desire also to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman, was it by his directions that an additional bill was sent up in the case to the Grand Jury of Antrim at the present Assizes, although a bill had been found by the Tyrone Grand Jury; and, if it is the practice, when a bill is found at the Winter Assizes, and the jury disagree, to send up another bill to the Grand Jury when the prisoner comes to be tried at the County Assizes?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): It is a fact that I conducted the prosecution of the two Walkers at the Omagh Winter Assizes. Pressure of other business prevents my Colleague and myself attending at Belfast and Derry; but I have directed that one of the leading counsel of the circuit, who is intimately acquainted with that case, and with whom I have had two or three consultations, should assist the regular Crown Counsel. As to the third paragraph in the Question, the information at my disposal prevents me from accepting as accurate the report mentioned; and, while the case is still undecided, it would be obviously undesirable that I should make any statement. With regard to the hon. and learned Gentleman's latter Question, the matter was brought under my notice not at all in reference to this particular case, but to a large number of cases similarly circumstanced, in which the juries disagreed at the Winter Assizes; and I thought it right to advise that fresh bills should be sent up to the Grand Juries at the County Assizes, and that course has been taken in this case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman is of opinion that this is necessary, why was it not done at the Cork Assizes on this present occasion?

MR. HOLMES: I can only say that in several cases my attention was directed to it, and I ordered the course mentioned to be taken. I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that it had no reference to this case.

NAVAL ESTIMATES — RE-ORGANIZATION, &c. OF THE ACCOUNTANT GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Order of the House, made early last Session, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), for a Return showing the Re-organization, &c. of the Accountant General's Department of the Admiralty Office, is being carried into effect; and, if so, when the Return will be ready for distribution among Members, before Vote 3 of the Naval Estimates is taken?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. Forwood) (Lancashire, Ormskirk), in reply, said, that the Return was presented on the 17th of February, and ordered to be printed on the 4th of March. Changes were in progress in the Department. He was informed by the printers that the Return would be out in a few days.

POST OFFICE—TRANSIT RATES FROM ENGLAND TO INDIA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General, When was the present arrangement made whereby a payment of 1½d. per letter is made to France and Italy for transit rates for every letter from England to India and the East; under what conditions does the contract exist, and when can it be terminated; what steps are being taken to obtain more satisfactory conditions and terms; and, does Germany pay any sum to France or Italy for transit rates?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The arrangement referred to was made in 1879 by correspondence between the British Post Office and the Post Offices of France and Italy, and can be terminated at any time. Three years ago steps were taken to obtain more favourable terms; but the result was not satisfactory, and it is intended to make further efforts in this direction as soon as the new service for the Australian Mails is settled. Until it is certain that those mails will use the same accelerated train service as the Indian Mails, negotiations with the French and Italian Post Offices cannot be opened advantageously. On the last point raised by the hon. Member I have no official information. But I understand that the German Mails for India and the East do not pass through the French territory at all, but join the Indian Mail Train at Bologna. In that case, they would incur only the Italian transit charge, amounting to a fraction over ½d. a letter.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can state when the Report of the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment is likely to be published?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): There is no Royal Commission now sitting on Capital Punishment; but a Departmental Committee was appointed last year to consider the best mode of carrying out the sentence of death. The Chairman of this Committee, Lord Aberdare, has unhappily been incapacitated by an accident from attending to business. He is now abroad, and for the present the proceedings of the Committee are in abeyance.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POST OFFICE AT GRANGEGEITH.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.) asked the Postmaster General, When he intends to establish the post office at Grangegeith; and, whether for nine months the people have paid for post office and letter carrier?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I beg to say that I shall be pleased to establish a post office at Grangegeith, if the letters turn out to be sufficiently numerous. I expect to receive definite information on this point within a day or two. As previously stated by me, it is, I believe, the case that a private messenger is employed to bring the letters for Grangegeith from the Slane Post Office.

MR. O'HANLON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the guarantee had been offered to cover any additional expenditure the post office may entail?

MR. RAIKES: I am not aware. I telegraphed to-day to the surveyor for full information on the subject.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS — TRANSIT OF INFECTED CATTLE FROM IRELAND TO LIVERPOOL.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcubright) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention had been called to the fact that on the 14th of last month a large number of cattle were shipped from Northwall to Liverpool, although three of their number were discovered on inspection to be suffering from pleuro-pneumonia, and were ordered to be slaughtered; and, if the Irish Government proposes to institute any immediate inquiry into cattle disease with a view to give further powers to guardians and Privy Council authorities; and also to provide more qualified Veterinary Inspectors at the different ports to prevent the debarkation of cattle to Great Britain which have been in contact with infected animals although showing no signs of disease themselves?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): In answer to my hon. Friend, I have to say that my attention has been called to the circumstances referred to. The subject of giving some further powers with a view to prevent the exportation of diseased animals has been considered. The Inspectors engaged at the ports of inspection are all qualified veterinary surgeons; and I am not inclined at present to promise that there shall be any increase in their number.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Would the right hon. Gentleman say if the further powers to prevent the exportation of these diseased animals could be introduced into the Coercion Bill?

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—RETURNS—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it intended, as was done by Mr. Forster on introducing the Coercion Bill of 1881, to immediately circulate a Blue Book, giving particulars of the alleged outrages on which the Government rely as the justification of their proposed measure?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It is not my intention to lay any special Returns of outrages on the Table.

ADMIRALTY—VACANCIES—CIRCULARS.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the following statement made by Mr. Field at a meeting of the Civil Service Supply Association held at Cannon Street Hotel on 24th February:—

"There is one thing I ought to call the attention of the meeting to, because it is a very grave subject. I believe that in reference to the candidature for the Admiralty vacancy, Circulars have been sent out in envelopes marked 'On Her Majesty's Service,' and at the expense of the country;"

and, if so, what steps he proposes to take in regard to the matter?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): If the

statement alluded to is correct, the proceeding was most improper and entirely unauthorized. A full and immediate inquiry will be made on the subject.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF ACT, 1829—

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, W.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to a statement in The Weekly Register of 19th March, concerning a Roman Catholic Mission at Poplar—

"The Mission was opened on the last Sunday of February with a procession through the principal streets of the parish. The Guards of the League of the Cross and the members of the different confraternities left the church preceded by a large Mission Cross and accompanied by the parochial clergy. Father Lawless, M.R., clothed in cassock, cloak, and biretta, intoned the Rosary, in which all joined. In due course the East India Dock was reached. Here Father Lawless recited the Litany of our Blessed Mother, delivered an address, and exacted the following promise, which was made with one voice by the kneeling crowd:—'I promise, by the grace of God, to attend regularly this Holy Mission even to the end, and to go to my Confession and Communion.' Father Lawless then gave the blessing with the Mission Cross, and the procession moved on by way of Robin Hood Lane, increasing in numbers, until it reached High Street, Poplar; " whether these proceedings constitute a distinct violation of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, s. 26; and, what course the Government propose to take in this case and similar ones?

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I wish to ask him whether the Statute referred to provides that any person who becomes a Jesuit, or a member of any Religious Order, in these countries shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour and subject to the penalty of being ordered to be banished from the Kingdom for his natural life; and, whether the penalty provided under the 26th section of the Act can be given to the person who informed on those guilty of thus exercising religious liberty?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to the Question last addressed to me, I am sorry to say I have no personal knowledge of the provision of the Statute in question, and therefore I am unable to give the information which the hon. Gentleman asks for. In answer to the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Johnston), I have to state that my attention has been called to the statement by the Question of the hon. Member. I have not seen the paper in question; but, assuming the statement is correct, I am advised that there is a strong reason to doubt whether there has been any violation of the penal provisions of the Act. I am not aware that proceedings have ever been taken under that particular section.

SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND BILL—LEGISLATION.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Are the Government able to state if the Bill relating to the Office of Secretary for Scotland is drafted, and whether it will be introduced before Easter; and, whether the Government will remove the block they have put on Scotch Bills, especially that on the Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act Amendment (No. 2) Bill?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Secretary for Scotland Bill has been drafted, and will be introduced as soon after the Easter Recess as possible. I am unable to give any hope that the block which has been placed by the Government on the Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act (1886) Amendment (No. 2) Bill, and other Scotch Bills, will be removed.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked whether, considering the condition of the Highlands, and the decision of the Court of Session regarding the Crofters' Act, the Government themselves would bring in a measure amending the Bill of the late Lord Advocate?

MR. W. H. SMITH asked for Notice of the Question.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—MOTION FOR URGENCY.

RESOLUTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Amendment proposed to the Question [22nd March],

"That the introduction and several stages of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion, including the Rules of Procedure, whenever the Bill shall be set down for consideration by the Government as the first business of the day."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Mr. W. H. Smith

And which Amendment was,

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Mr. Speaker, I wish, in the first instance, to thank my hon. and learned Friend the Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) for his kindness in waiving his claim to address the House on the present occasion, and for enabling me, subject to your approval, to state what I have to say to the House on a Motion which seems to me to be of great importance. I am the more desirous to do so, because I wish to say a few words on a portion of the subject which has yet attracted but little attention. No doubt, this Motion opens important parts of the great question relating to Ireland; and the field, so far as concerns that question, has been widened by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), who acquainted us with the leading particulars of a Bill which Her Majesty's Government are about to introduce with respect to land in Ireland. My first desire is to call attention to what I think I must describe as the unprecedented position of the House itself, both as it stands at the moment, and still more as it will be affected by the adoption of this Motion. The House has been sitting for two months, and for two months the independent initiative of the House of Commons has been altogether suppressed. Not a single day has been allowed to hon. Members for the purpose of bringing forward subjects in which they take an interest—not a single day even for the consideration of questions, like that touching the crofters, which concern social order in the country. We are now invited again to surrender entirely the time of the House, and that Vote, I suppose, is to be carried by a majority. And Gentlemen opposite exult in the prospect of that further suppression of the independent action of the House. But such things may happen in the revolution of years as to cause hon. Members to take a somewhat different view of a question of this kind. We are now, Sir, asked to make another absolute surrender of the whole time of the House until a Bill, not yet introduced, but reported to be of an extreme and severe character, has received the attention of the House. Well, Sir, we recollect that questions of this kind have on former occasions been deemed to require protracted discussion. The Bill relating to the Habeas Corpus Act—or the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—although it was proposed in a tenfold more formidable state of things than the present, and although it consisted of, I think, only a single clause, occupied 20 nights of the time of the House. I may be told that a revolution is now to be brought about in the modes of our Procedure by the frequent application of the Closure Rule. Sir, I can conceive no greater calamity to this House than the frequent application of the Closure Rule; and the very first—perhaps the most formidable—of all the effects I should anticipate from that frequent application of the Rule would be that it would sap the foundations of that Chair which you, Sir, so worthily occupy, and the authority so absolutely necessary to be maintained unaffected, intact, and unimpaired. Nor is that all; because it is within the pleasure of the Government—if they think fit under the powers they have obtained—to take any day of their choice for the purpose of resuming the question of Procedure, and the very first subject they would bring under the attention of the House would be to alter fundamentally the sole remaining weapon which is now given to independent Members, not of a full initiative for Parliamentary purposes, but at any rate of raising a discussion upon a Motion for Adjournment. Such is the position in which we are placed when a demand is made which aims at obtaining for Her Majesty's Government the disposal of the entire time of the House upon a Bill which must occupy weeks, which may occupy months, if we judge from former experience from reports in circulation, and from the nature of the case. I may say, for my own part, having seen more of Parliamentary practice than anyone who hears me, that I have never known such a similar position of affairs. I think it grave; I think it menacing; I think it unprecedented. I think it an extreme use of the powers of the majority, and one which, if it is persisted in, and driven to the uttermost, will leave behind it a sense of wrong—I may say, of intolerable wrong—not favourable to the future conduct of the Business of this House. I may say that it appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman would not at all impede the progress of the measure, and would adopt a wise and salutary change, if he were to introduce some relaxation into the Motion he has made. He might do that with great facility. He might exempt some day of the week—Friday, for example—from the operation of the Rule. At any rate, I think it right to utter a warning that the yoke which it is endeavoured to lay on our necks is a yoke which, perhaps, may not be patiently borne for an unlimited period of time. I need not, however, go into details on that subject, and I will touch the question of this Motion as it affects the great case of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) will, perhaps, allow me to pay him this compliment—that he has, I will not say acquired, because I think Nature has given it to him, the happy faculty of making extreme and astonishing propositions in the blindest and most gentle way. Had the right hon. Gentleman been discussing the clause on which we were occupied for some minutes this evening of a Private Bill he could not have done it in a manner more entirely apart from a sense of deep gravity, or from an expression of those feelings, which are usually connected with the discussion of great political subjects in this House. I am very sorry to be compelled to assail in toto—I am afraid not with equal blandness but at the same time, I hope, with temper and fairness—the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, and the ground upon which he supported it. He supported it entirely by a reference to the case of 1881, doing me the honour to quote from speeches of my own, and resting the whole justification of the Government upon what had then occurred. Now, Sir, if that case of 1881 will not stand the right hon. Gentleman in stead, I may apprehend he must look for some new justification. And how, Sir, does it stand? We have now a proposition made to the House to abandon its whole time for the purpose of a measure as to which no Parliamentary Papers have been laid. No Parliamentary Papers—as we know from an answer to the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) just made—are intended to be laid; no statement by the Government has been laid before the House which can convey to us the slightest indication of the nature and contents of the proposed measure. Now, Sir, I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman is he borne out in this capital respect by the proposal and proceedings of 1881? On the contrary, he must know that the case of the Government—the presumptive case of the Government—was laid with the utmost fulness before the House by the official statement of Mr. Forster before any demand whatever was made upon the House for the surrender of its time and privileges. [Cheers.] I heard cheering on the other side of the House when I stated that this was a very different state of things from what prevailed in 1881. I know not whether the hon. Gentlemen who cheered had made themselves acquainted in any way with the history of the case, but I think I am correct in saying that it is a very different state of things indeed. The first difference I shall note is this. The right hon. Gentleman—I cannot blame him for it—had not read the speech from which he quoted. He founded his case upon my speech—he had not read that speech. Silence in this case means consent—silence means consent. I am as far as possible from blaming the right hon. Gentleman for avoiding the reading of any speech of mine, or of almost any Parliamentary speech, if he can possibly avoid it. But it imposes upon me the necessity of making another quotation from that speech. The House of Commons will recollect that there has usually been before the present practice arose of debating the Address at full length a period at the commencement of the Session—a week, a fortnight, or three weeks—during which there has been very little Business to transact. The right hon. Gentleman—or those who informed the right hon. Gentleman—those who supplied him with the quotation from my speech—might have provided him with another quotation which he has imposed upon me the painful necessity of inflicting upon the House, in which I stated that I was emboldened to make that Motion by its being the first day of the Session when we were not already engaged in the general Business of the Empire, but that if it had been a later period I doubted whether I should have been justified in making it. The quotation is to be found in Hansard. My words were—

“I will, however, make this admission—that great as is the evil of the prolongation, even for a day, of this state of things in Ireland, had this proposal been made to the House at a period of the year when we were already engaged in the miscellaneous Business of the Empire, it might have been doubted whether we should have been justified in asking hon. Members to make the sacrifice which I do not doubt their acceding to such a Motion will involve.”—(3 Hansard, [257] 1318.)

As to that Motion of 1881, which the right hon. Gentleman quotes as a precedent, I admit I could not have had a case for making it at all had it not been the opening of the Session. But the right hon. Gentleman makes his Motion at a moment when he has already kept us silent for two months. Well, Sir, what is the state of things which is to justify this singular and extreme method of Procedure? Is it the state of Ireland? Is it the amount of crime in Ireland? On all great occasions which I have known it has been customary before and beyond all things for the Minister to make out his case by showing the terrible prevalence of crime in Ireland—of that description of crime which threatens especially social order. Is that the case now? No, Sir; the House has already been acquainted with the fact that during the year 1880—the year immediately preceding the proposals of Mr. Forster—agrarian offences in Ireland had far exceeded the highest amount they had ever touched since the Returns of the Constabulary were instituted in 1844. They had risen by not less than 40 per cent, I think, above that highest amount; and not only so, but during the interval there had been a decrease of population from 8,000,000 to 5,000,000, so that in point of fact the amount of agrarian crime was double at the time when Mr. Forster made his statement—double not only as compared with the preceding year, but as compared with the highest year, or any year, since 1844, the first institution of the Returns. What is the answer to that? The answer is another quotation from a speech of mine, and I return my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman the Irish Secretary for making it. He could not have made a quotation more apposite for my purpose, for I pointed out, it seems, that we must consider not merely the amount, but the character, purpose, source, and object of crime. What is the character, purpose, source, and object of crime now—take it at its very worst? It is to obtain certain reductions of rent. [Cries of “No, no!”] It is what your own witnesses say. It is to obtain certain reductions of rent—it is not a movement against rent in general. I think, in saying that, I carry the assent even of that side of the House. Is it a movement against rent in general? Let me hear the man who argues that—let me see what is his knowledge, what is his experience, what is his authority. I contend this—that every fair man would admit and allege that it is an attempt to obtain reductions of rent which are beyond what equity requires. That is the allegation which will be made on that side of the House. I should like to hear the man on the Front Bench opposite who would rise and say this is a movement in Ireland against rent as a whole. You may find a speech of some individual possibly, but I speak of the evidence which is upon the Table; and upon that enormous mass of testimony you have raised, I say the fundamental distinction between this period—besides the amount of crime—and 1881 is this: that whereas now the demand of the people has been almost universally restricted to a demand for just abatements—as can be proved from the evidence you yourselves have laid before us—in 1881 there was a movement in progress which was growing to be, and a few months after the statement of Mr. Forster was avowed and declared to be, a movement against the payment of rent altogether. Therefore, the quality, as well as the quantity, of crime shows that there was no analogy upon which the right hon. Gentleman could quote the proceedings of 1881 as a justification for the present proceedings. Even these are not all the differences. There are others of the greatest gravity which are involved in this case. Unhappily, Sir, the evidence and the information derivable from the history of coercive or repressive measures in this House is but too abundant. There is one feature—there are two features which have accompanied them all along, and which have, at least, mitigated the case. The first of them was this—that from whatever cause—and into that question I will not now enter—coercive measures have never on any of those occasions been resisted by a majority of the Representatives of Ireland. Never on a single occasion—not when Mr. O'Connell opposed the fiercest of all these coercive measures—was he supported by a majority of the Irish Members; but now you know very well that the protest against this coercion is made by a majority, and by an overwhelming majority, of the Irish Members. You have to put it to yourselves—you have to face this question—whether it is your intention to invite Parliament, deliberately and systematically, under a representative system and in a free country, to govern Ireland in defiance of the sentiments of the vast majority of those whom she sends to represent her? At the time when we were painfully engaged—whether wisely or not—in the passing of that measure of 1881, I was accustomed to observe to my Colleagues—

“For us, at least, as a Liberal Government, it would be totally impossible, even in the teeth of the small numerical resistance we receive, to persist in and to carry through this measure were we not supported by the practical unanimity of the other portions of the British Empire—by the whole of Great Britain.”

Sir, is that the case now? You know perfectly well the condition of the Liberal Party. You know how reduced in numbers are those with whom I have the honour to think, to feel, and to act; but, Sir, reduced as we are, yet still the minority which will oppose your measure is a minority which, perhaps, may amount to three-sevenths of the House of Commons, and you deliberately think that you can, as a system, make this a rule of your policy, to throw aside for a time the remedial measures upon the evidence contained in this Book—Lord Cowper's Report—as to the state of Ireland, and upon the evidence contained in those returns of crime which you are far from willing on your own responsibility to produce, and you think you can do all this in the teeth of five-sixths of the Representatives of Ireland, and in the teeth of three-sevenths of the Members of the House of Commons. Well, Sir, I think I may say that I have shown, not that your Bill is wrong; but at least that in every point your proceedings stand in glaring contradiction to the precedents which you have quoted as your sole justification, and that those who are to speak for the Government must set about to search for some other pleas to justify the astonishing proposal that is now before us—that the House should silence itself anew for weeks and probably for months. I must now say something on the other part of the subject—namely, that which concerns the actual condition of Ireland. When Parliament met in the autumn of last year we were anxious to press that the measures of the Government for handling Ireland should be produced as speedily as possible. We did not go the length of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), who, when we asked for a few weeks to prepare our measures, deliberately made a Motion to stop the Supplies, which Motion was supported by his Party. That was the idea which the head of the Legal Profession in Ireland had as to the propriety of Parliamentary proceedings. We did not go that length at all; but we requested that as soon as the Government could make up their minds, and, as we hoped, before the winter and before the season of coming evictions was faced, they should tell us what they meant to do. They sheltered themselves behind two propositions. One was that they had sent Sir Redvers Buller to restore order in the most disturbed parts of Ireland; and the other was that they had appointed a Commission to go to the root of the evils connected with the Irish land system. Sir, those pleas were very effective. It was felt, I think, very generally in the House, when once we understood that the mission of Sir Redvers Buller was a purely civil mission, that the choice made of the man to deal with the peculiar circumstances was a choice to which no exception could possibly be taken. But that gentleman had attracted to himself the utmost degree of confidence on the part of the Government, and that confidence, apparently, was afterwards renewed and heightened; for, when they had most unwisely, as I think, dismissed from the Permanent Under Secretaryship at Dublin Castle that most distinguished public servant, Sir Robert Hamilton, for no other offence than the offence committed by Lord Carnarvon—whom when he retired from Office the Government he belonged to declared themselves most anxious to retain in Office—at any rate, they did what they could to repair that error by the choice of Sir Robert Hamilton's successor, and showed their supreme confidence in Sir Redvers Buller by making him the head of the whole permanent Civil Service in Ireland. Sir Redvers Buller, as far as the executive and administrative action was concerned, was the shield of the Government. As far as legislation was concerned, the Commission was the shield of the Government. But how, Sir, do we stand now? The evidence of Sir Redvers Buller is utterly thrown over by the Government. He is their witness—he is their chosen witness—and he enjoys their confidence as much as the Attorney General for Ireland—as much, at any rate, as it is possible to exhibit in any civil servant under any circumstances whatever; but now, Sir, we are told that there is a great combination—we are told by the cheers of inarticulate Members that there is a great combination—against the payment of rent in Ireland, and we are invited, it appears, for the 87th time to pass a measure to put down agitation. There is agitation in Ireland. There is, you say, intimidation in Ireland. Within certain limits I shall admit that; but you propose to us to pass a measure to put down agitation. [An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.] I must say that your explanations have been so imperfect, and that you have so deliberately kept us in the dark, that we can only infer from your vague general announcement we have before us what you are going to do. ["Hear, hear!"] But we have before us—and you may "Hear, hear" this if you like—the main remedial propositions which you are now prepared to make. My point is this. If these remedial propositions are, from your point of view, the legitimate method of acting against Irish agitation, is it a mode of action that your own witness—Sir Redvers Buller—recommends? Does he say that agitation is to be put down; that intimidation is to be cured; that the law-abiding man is to be guaranteed, under all circumstances, the full use of his freedom of action—does he say that these aims are to be gained by repressive legislation? Short as is the evidence of Sir Redvers Buller, it is most important, and I will take, without flinching, what I believe to be the main points which it contains. Some time ago it was faintly signified—or at least it was signified not quite in the strong manner so usual on the other side of the House—that there was a general non-payment of rent in Ireland, and a general movement against the payment of all rent in Ireland. When I stated the contrary I was saluted by a rather considerable torrent, a current of contrary assertion, in a brief and succinct form. Now, what does Sir Redvers Buller say on that subject? He is asked in Question 16,456, and at page 500 of the Report—"Therefore, in spite of the opposition of the League, they are willing to pay?" Be it remembered that is in the worst part of Ireland. My right hon. Friend has said—and his statement has not been contested—that seven-eighths of Ireland are free from disturbance or difficulty; but where difficulty exists even there this general movement against the payment of rent in Ireland does not exist. What does General Redvers Buller say in answer to the question?—

"I believe that the great majority through those counties—that the great majority of those who have not paid are anxious to pay."

Mr. Neligan, as if to emphasize the answer, asked, "Anxious to pay?" which again called the attention of the witness, who replied—"Yes, are anxious to pay." There is not a general movement against the payment of rent. Do not suppose that I am dealing with Sir Redvers Buller's evidence as if I imagined that that would dispose of the whole case. But I am showing that he is your witness, whose evidence and whose recommendations you are going entirely to disregard; and his first point is, that his replies do not indicate a general unwillingness to pay rent, but, on the contrary, a general desire to pay rent. What does Sir Redvers Buller say is the condition of peace in Ireland? You say that the condition of peace is that we shall pass some repressive Bill of which we do not yet know the nature. Is that his opinion? No. His distinct declaration is this—

“I think this, and I feel it very strongly, that in this part of the country”—the worst part of the country, remember—“you will never have peace unless you create some legal equipoise, or legal equivalent, that will supply the want of freedom of contract now existing between the landlord and tenant.”

Those are his views as to the condition of peace; but that is not the proposition on which you are about to act. You are, on the contrary, about to favour us with a Bill directed to the increased stringency of the Criminal Law and with the very measures of procedure that Sir Redvers Buller condemns. Well, Sir, what is the state of the law now in Ireland? Is the law that which it ought to be—a fair arbiter between man and man—and is the law, as it is administered, as it has been generally administered in the opinion of Sir Redvers Buller—a law in which the mass of the population reposes confidence, or ought to repose confidence? What does he say? Sir Redvers Buller says—

“You have got a very ignorant and poor people, and the law should look after them, instead of which it has only looked after the rich. That, at least, appears to me to be the case.”

Is there a Gentleman on the Front Bench opposite who will deny that when you have introduced, pressed, and passed your Bill the Irish people—who now believe the law to be on the side of the rich and against the poor—will still believe it, will believe it more firmly than ever, sustained as they will be by the authority of Sir Redvers Buller? Well, then, it is admitted—of course it is admitted—that we have got classes of unsatisfactory persons to deal with in Ireland. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland represented the case of Ireland with reference to rents as the same as everywhere else. “There are,” he said, “rents too high and rents too low.” Yes; but in Ireland the Land Court, the judicial tribunal, finds 178,000 rents too high, while the proportion of rents found to be too low is so insignificant and infinitesimal that your Land Commission in its Report does not think it worth while, or perhaps thinks that it would be injurious, to quote the cases in which rents have been increased. This new law is to be a law for pressure on the tenant class. Is there any doubt about that? Is the tenant class the class that, in the opinion of your own witness, Sir Redvers Buller, require pressure to be applied to them? Some of the tenants do require pressure, no doubt, but these things are comparative; and if you ask what pressure, in the view of Sir Redvers Buller, is required upon the tenants, you must also ask what pressure does he say is required upon the landlords. It is not upon the landlords that you are going to exercise coercion; you are going to make it easier for the landlords to enforce the rent, whether it be a good rent or a bad rent. Is this the opinion of your witness? What does Sir Redvers Buller say?—

“What we want is a Court that would have a certain amount of coercive power over a bad tenant, and a very strong coercive power over bad landlords.”

A very good recommendation—“a very strong coercive power over the bad landlord.” His view is that in the case of the bad tenant something is required, a certain amount of coercive power; but his view of the bad landlord is that a very strong coercive power is required against him. But what are you doing? On your own showing you are proposing to introduce a Bill for exercising a certain power against bad tenants, but a strong coercive power against the bad landlords does not enter into your views. Unless your friends in the Press and elsewhere have totally misrepresented you, the views of Sir Redvers Buller are diametrically opposed to yours. A complaint was made yesterday by a Member of the Government that hon. Members on this side of the House—who had quoted from Sir Redvers Buller’s evidence—had refrained from quoting what he said about intimidation, and it was urged that his evidence does show that there is intimidation in Ireland. No doubt Sir Redvers Buller does say that there is intimidation in Ireland. I will not dwell on the different constructions of the term. Some of the witnesses call it the disfavour in which people are regarded who pursue a course different from that which is desired by the mass of the community. Some of them refer to Boycotting, and say that the Irish people in certain cases are rather apt to follow the example which in Ireland, and even elsewhere, is pretty constantly afforded by their betters—apt to try what they can make out of a system of exclusive dealing. But beyond that, no doubt, there are cases of intimidation proper. Well, Sir, you are going to deal with this intimidation; you are going to pursue the old system of dealing with symptoms and neglecting causes. There is much mischief in the condition of Ireland in several counties. What is the root of that mischief? You have appointed a Commission to go to the root of it. Why do you dwell simply on the surface? What is the opinion of Sir Redvers Buller as to the source of this intimidation? Hon. Gentlemen opposite say—“We know the source of it; it is these mischievous agitators; if we can only get rid of them by some dispensation of Parliament, or some dispensation of Providence, then Ireland would be happy, tranquil, and content.” Yes; but that is not the opinion of your own witness—the man who pre-eminently enjoys your confidence. Sir Redvers Buller is asked—“What is the cause of the mischief that prevails?” And he answers without hesitation—“The rents are too high.” He explains his meaning in this way—

“I think it was the pressure of a high rent which produced the agitation and consequent intimidation as to the payment of rent.”

Now, Sir, I ask, how is it possible we can hope for any state of things other than that which actually subsists, and how is it possible you can dream that you will do anything except aggravate that state of things, and increase it intensely, by the proposals you are about to make? I will take them in kind such as we know they are to be, so far as we know their general purport. They find that all agree, though to some extent, in the case of individuals who may wish to pay rent which is even an unjust rent, yet for their own peace and comfort they would wish to pay it. But the opinion of the community in which they live is inflexibly set against it. And that opinion may manifest itself in just or unjust methods. But what is the root of the mischief, according to your own witness? He says that it is not agitation which produced the intimidation, nor was the immediate cause of it, but that it is the high rent which produced the agitation, and which is the source and fountain-head of the whole mischief. I come now to the consideration of the subject of the National League. That League has been treated by some hon. Members opposite as if it were virtually identical with the Land League of 1881. My opinion is quite different; but I do not intend to dwell upon that point now. For the present we will assume anything you like about the National League. Now, what was the answer of Sir Redvers Buller, your witness, to a question referring to the National League? He was asked—“Is there any general sympathy with the action of the League among the people?” And he answered—“Yes; I think there is sympathy, because they think that it has been their salvation.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: If the House is willing I will read the Question, and indeed I would read the whole of it if my eyes were better, because it would evidently be conducive to the purpose I have in view. I think the hon. and gallant Gentleman will see that it is highly inconvenient to be interrupted unless he can show that I am reading something which destroys the effect of what I have previously said. If he can show that then I will not say that there is anything wrong in interrupting me. I see that at Question 503 the witness says that a man was murdered the other day, but I do not see what relation that has —

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Be good enough to read the Question.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not deny that there is intimidation; I do not deny that in Ireland, as in other parts of the world, there is a certain amount of crime, although I think I shall be able to show that that amount of crime is small and insignificant in comparison with other parts of the Kingdom, and in consideration of the justification. But I am now speaking of the action of the League, and not of the action of the League as it is estimated by the witness—Sir Redvers Buller—who is your chosen officer and agent; and I am showing that he begins by saying that the people have sympathy with and supported the League because they think it has been their salvation. Well, Sir, but we are told they are a poor and ignorant people in that part of Ireland. Perhaps you will say—“Oh, he does not say that their opinion is correct;" but we have got a sentence on that subject, and as the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Saunderson) has recommended me to read Question 503, I will now recommend him to Question 494. The Question is—"It has been their salvation?" When I read that Question I thought I knew by whom it was put. On looking at it, I saw it was put by the inevitable Gentleman who alone could put a Question in that form—namely, Lord Milltown. The answer is—

"The bulk of the tenants in this part of Ireland tell of rents that have been reduced and evictions that have been stayed which are directly due to the operations of the League. They believe that, whatever truth there be in it."

And after dealing with their belief he goes on to say something for himself; and what does he say for himself?—

"Nobody did anything for the tenants until the League was established, and when the landlords could not let their farms, then they were forced to consider the question of reduction of rent."

There is your own witness; there is the opinion of the gentleman whose appointment stood you in such good stead in September last; there is the opinion of a gentleman who, before you appointed him, had earned in the service of Her Majesty the very highest reputation, and I believe has since done nothing to compromise, but much to increase and establish, his fame. Sir, I have now, I believe, read every point material to the case in the evidence of Sir Redvers Buller, who admits and asserts there is intimidation, but points to the root of that intimidation, and says the root is not in agitation but in rent. This is the testimony of your own chosen witness and your bulwark, during the first months of your existence him and his authority you utterly reject and cast aside. The other plea put before us last September for delay was the appointment of the Royal Commission; and how do you deal with that Commission? You deal with it in a manner, if possible, still less ceremonious; because the Commission has been invested by you with express authority to inquire into the whole working of the Land Act, and there is one recommendation which overshadows and absorbs all the rest—that is, the necessity, owing to the change of circumstances that has occurred, of re-opening the judicial rent fixed by law under the 15 years' contract. That is their chief recommendation. That recommendation, we know from the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the Government mean to cast aside. Then their position is this. They chose men to examine deliberately on the spot the evils of Ireland connected with the land and the rents, and to go to the root of the matter. These men executed their task, and made their recommendations, and their main recommendation the Government mean to cast aside, and at the same time to ask us for a Bill to give increased stringency to the Criminal Law—whether for the purpose of agitation or not, I know not—but certainly for the purpose of putting the law in a position still more offensive to the general sense of the Irish people. What I have now to say is, I think, the most curious portion of the whole case. Why is it the recommendation of the Commissioners cannot be adopted? We have been here fully enlightened by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who rose to the great reputation of his rhetoric in two parts of his case—one when he was reproaching us, and the other when he was describing the acts which the Government knew how to perform. The reason, Sir, why this recommendation cannot possibly be adopted is because it would involve a breach of contract. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman is undoubtedly a perfectly intelligible one. He says you must not break a contract, and he warns and threatens you that if you break any one contract you never can be sure of holding any other.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I desire to correct that statement. I said that to break up a contract solemnly engaged in by Parliament would be wrong.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has made a correction which does not, in the slightest degree, affect what I am about to say. But the right hon. Gentleman will not deny that he did say that if one contract were broken you would lose the authority by which you attempt to hold another. He does not question that?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not wish to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, nor do I recollect the precise words of my speech; but my point was—my argument was—that solemn Parliamentary engagements should not be broken up.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman forgets his own speech, for he went beyond that, and he introduced into this debate, I think for the first time, the question of Local Government for Ireland, and he first said—you are perfectly mad. We have no objection to his saying that—we are much obliged to him for saying that—for much worse things than that have been said about us. That is rather a moderate method of dealing with us, all things considered. He then qualified his language by saying we were singularly unwise; and when he used these words—words almost as gentle as if they had come from the Leader of the House—he objected to Home Rule for Ireland, because, he said—

“Do what you will with Home Rule for Ireland, it must rest upon a kind of contract between the countries, and when you have broken the contract under the Land Act, you will not be able to maintain the contract under the Act constituting Irish Government.”

This is his doctrine—high doctrine which I am not disposed to criticize in a severe or hostile spirit. I think the maintenance of contract is one of the prime duties of Parliament, and rare and strange indeed must be the circumstances which would justify interference with it; but in what condition is the right hon. Gentleman who propounds this doctrine? Is he going to break no contract? He is going to break the contract of 130,000 leaseholders, every one of whom is bound to pay a rent which the right hon. Gentleman is going to allow him to get reduced if he can. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that he will escape by saying that that is not the subject of a Parliamentary settlement? It was the subject of a Parliamentary settlement. There are those sitting in that quarter of the House who remember it—there are not many here who followed the details of the Land Bill of 1881, but there are men here who went through it with a patience and a skill and a perseverance that stamp them—if they had nothing else to stand upon—as men of high talent and capacity to serve their country. Sir, I admit to you that there is this difference between the 15 years' contract and the leaseholders' contract. The 15 years' contract sprang out of the Land Act; but the leaseholders' contract was reconsidered, modified, and sanctioned afresh by that Land Act. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. What does he know of the details of the Land Act? Am I to understand by the shaking of the head that the case of the leaseholders was not discussed and debated? Yes it was, and upon every point, as I can tell the right hon. Gentleman if he likes—for pray recollect the most effective part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech on Tuesday night was that in which he declaimed with fervid indignation about our deadness to the claims of the leaseholders, and insinuated—“There you sat a set of dummies.” That was the substance, undoubtedly, of his charge. I must own that in our weakness we had considerable difficulties on that subject, and I expressed those difficulties. I am now proving that the case of the leaseholders was considered, fully debated, and adjusted by serious changes of law by the Act of 1881 just as much as the case of the 15 years' contract was. A proposal was made that the leaseholders should be permitted to enter the Courts and to obtain judicial rents. I made a speech on the part of the Government in answer to that proposal, from which I shall quote a very few words. I said—

“In my opinion it would be impossible to strike more directly at the very root of contract itself, as it is understood in Ireland, than to give relief in that form.”

That speech was the result of long and careful consideration between the then Attorney General (Mr. Gibson)—afterwards Lord Chancellor of Ireland—and myself, with the able assistance of Lord Herschell, and we determined that the Irish leases with which we were then dealing had, and must have, all the solemnity of Parliamentary contracts. This question was not only not passed over in silence; it was carefully dealt with, and we introduced most important changes in the law. We introduced a change in the law by providing that if a leaseholder could show that he had been led to accept the lease by intimidation or fraud he might get his lease quashed—compulsorily quashed in Court. That was in 1870. That was under the Act that we introduced. But we introduced a more important change than that—a much larger alteration. This change was that whereas by law in Ireland up to that date the whole interest in the lessee terminated upon the expiry of his lease, we introduced the most important provision that at the expiry of his lease he should pass into the position of a yearly tenant, with all the rights which the Act conferred upon a yearly tenant; and not only was this contract considered, but all its conditions were readjusted; and those conditions which remained have the Parliamentary stamp upon them, just as much as the conditions of any contract. I should like to show how this change came about. At that time, when we proposed that on the expiry of the lease the man should take the position of a yearly tenant, Mr. Gibson gave his opinion on the subject. He said, with regard to that amendment of the law, on the 19th July, 1881—

“Never was there a more distinct and flagrant violation of contract than is proposed by this Amendment, which would set aside the most solemn covenants and the most deliberate engagements as between man and man.”—[3 Hansard, (263) 1298.]

The right hon. Gentleman who said this is now a Member of the Cabinet which proposes deliberately to invade the rights of every leaseholder, and not only so, but at the same time that it does this it throws over the Report of its own Commission, and its most important recommendation because, forsooth, as they say, it would be a violation of contract. Yet these Gentlemen themselves propose, at the same time, to trample 130,000 contracts under foot. I must say that, having regard to the total inadequacy of the proposals of the Government, and to the absolute fallacy of the precedents they have quoted, and after two months of Parliamentary silence—I may almost say Parliamentary extinction—I think the proposal of the Government an absolutely unprecedented proposal. I have said enough, I think, for the present. This debate is only the introduction to other debates, an epitome—I will not say a miniature, for that might cause alarm; but undoubtedly these are subjects of the gravest character which are coming before us; and, for my part, I shall now say no more except that I heartily and fervently agree with the views of my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley). We shall record our vote in opposition to this policy and this course of procedure; and I do not see how we can forbear to continue that opposition at each step which the Government may make in the prosecution of so unhappy a policy. We can do nothing but resist it; and whether we are in a majority, or whether we are in a minority, it is very important, in my opinion, that the people of England should see that we have done our duty in a matter of so great difficulty. That duty, I trust, we shall do to the last stage of this ill-omened measure, which is now, as it were, flapping its wings over us, until the very last stage of it, when the voice of numbers shall—with full Parliamentary authority—drown what we think to be the voice of reason and of justice; when another false step, after the warnings which 86 years have given, and given in vain, shall be taken, and a further blow shall be struck, under the name of a Parliamentary Statute—a fresh blow shall have been struck—alike at the happiness, at the prosperity, and at the contentment of Ireland and at the Union of the Empire.

After a pause,

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.), rose. He said that owing to the extraordinary and ill-omened silence of the Government and their supporters, who desired by their numbers, if not by their arguments, to pass that Motion, and the silence of hon. Members who called themselves Liberals, the task had been thrown on the Irish Members to continue the debate. He was not surprised at the silence of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were now face to face with the Report of the Commission of their own choosing. From the evidence of hostile witnesses they had a complete justification of the Plan of Campaign. The Government had given them no information upon that subject, or upon the subject of crime in Ireland. They had been told that juries had refused to convict. Upon that point also they had declined to lay any information before the House. They had refused to convict, but where? In Belfast. Yet the Government proposed to coerce and punish, by Constitutional and lawful tribunals, the starving peasantry of Kerry and Clare, while they postponed to a later date dealing with the case of the prosperous and well-fed rioters of Belfast.

The evidence of all the hostile witnesses before the Land Commission was to the effect that the people of Ireland—the poor people of the South—were willing, above all things, to live peaceably and quietly in their own country, and that the combination was due altogether to excessive rent. There were two courses open to the Government. One was to establish a despotism in Ireland, and the other was to govern in a Constitutional manner. Since Her Majesty's Government had absolutely declined to carry out a Constitutional method of government, and since they were supported in that determination by a number of hon. Members who called themselves Liberals, the alternative of despotism was the only one they could possibly adopt. It seemed to him that it had been one of the fundamental principles of Liberalism that the will of the people should govern a country, and that where the Government governed against the will of the people the Representatives of the people should take the verdict of the country upon their acts. But the Liberal Unionists had not adopted that principle. They had declared their intention of supporting the Government whether they were right or wrong, in order that they might not go to the country, and that the verdict of the country might not be pronounced upon them. Those Gentlemen were, therefore, neither Liberals nor even Constitutional Conservatives, but simply despots. He was happy to think that those Gentlemen who had gone to the country at the last Election against Home Rule, and who had contended that Ireland could be governed Constitutionally without Home Rule, had now abandoned that position, and he believed that the next time the verdict of the country was pronounced upon them they would receive their political annihilation. He warned the Government that no paltering or partial measure of coercion could possibly succeed. The Government had better dispense with the last remnants of the British Constitution which were dangled over the heads of the Irish people, and go in for absolute despotism, and the sooner they did that the better.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) said, he thought that the majority of people in the country would differ from the views of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Chance) with regard to the Liberal Unionists, many of whom had given up honour and profit in order to give effect to their views. They had listened that evening to a very eloquent speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), a speech well appreciated by the Nationalist Members; but, for his (Mr. Addison's) own part, he was astonished at the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman, or that it was possible, by any form of language that existed, so to misrepresent what had been going on in that House during the last two months. The right hon. Gentleman had gravely reproved the Government with the waste of time that had taken place, and had said that private Members had been given no chance. But why was that so? Simply because matters, which might have been disposed of in a night or two, had been debated at very great length by hon. Members opposite who might be considered as followers of the right hon. Gentleman, and whom he might have told to allow Business to get on quickly. He should have imagined, listening to the right hon. Gentleman, that there was no crime in that country; but, supposing that in seven-eighths of Ireland there was no crime, what harm would be done by passing the measure proposed by the Government affecting such a small proportion of the country? Hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House had as strong a desire as Nationalist Members could possibly have not to infringe on the liberties of the people of Ireland more than was necessary; but they maintained that crime must be punished whether in England, Scotland, or Ireland, and when order was restored in Ireland they were desirous of doing all that legislation could do to give happiness to the Irish people, always bearing in mind that they had no stronger claim on the consideration of Parliament than had the people of the rest of the United Kingdom. In this country they had had special legislation from time to time when any particular crime had become rife, such, for instance, as garotting, offences against the Bankruptcy Act, and, more recently, crimes against women and children; which had been dealt with by the Criminal Law Amendment Act; but it had never entered into the head of any sensible

man in the country to denounce such measures as coercion, and why was Ireland to be the only country in the civilized world where those who committed crime were not to be coerced—if compelling people to obey the law was coercion? Against whom was coercion directed? It was against those who wished to commit crime. He thought that an attempt was being made to confuse the English mind between what was called coercion for Ireland and that coercion which existed in foreign countries; which was directed against the freedom of political opinion, the freedom of meetings, and matters of that kind affecting the liberty of the people. In England the passing of measures directed against crime had been going on as long as they could remember. Then the right hon. Gentleman told them that coercion had been tried for 86 years in Ireland and had done no good. Why, the result of coercion was that Ireland at least existed, and was, to some extent, a civilized country; what it would have been if no coercive measures had been passed he did not know, and it was impossible to say. But was the right hon. Gentleman so sure that there was no crime in Ireland? He (Mr. Addison) had read in The Times newspaper an address of Mr. Justice O'Brien, who he believed was a Catholic, to the Grand Jury of Kerry, no later than on the 10th of March, in which that Judge had regretted that he could not announce any improvement in the extraordinary and unsatisfactory state of affairs which existed, amounting to a state of open war, with all forms of authority and even with the necessary institutions of civilized life; the law was defeated, or rather had ceased to exist; person and life were assailed; an increased confidence in impunity existed; menace had given place to the deed; and terror and lawlessness existed everywhere. Those were the words of a person speaking with authority, and weighing his words, and if such a state of things existed, surely some sort of remedy must be found. It was no satisfaction to those who sat on the Government side of the House, as hon. Members below the Gangway seemed to think, to be told that the jury system had practically broken down; but it was remarkable that, even in the case of the Phoenix Park murders, although the jury had been summoned partly from the county and partly from the city, it had been necessary to make 50 of them stand aside in order to get a jury who would have the courage to do their duty. Then, to secure life and liberty, it was surely necessary that the existing law should have some respect shown to it. The very foundation and meaning of passing a law was that, when it was passed, it should be treated with respect. If that were so, surely hon. Members opposite could not complain if it were desired that some amendment of the Criminal Law in Ireland should be passed which should secure some kind of respect for the law there. With regard to what had been said as to evictions, no man with a heart could fail to be distressed at hearing of any poor family being turned out of their home on to the roadside, perhaps with young children and women; but what was the meaning of those evictions, and how was it possible to avoid them? He regretted that the efforts which had been made over and over again by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) in this direction had only been made the gravest subject of reproach against the Government by the National League. Scenes occurred in this country in cases of eviction and of distress for rent which rivalled in wretchedness and misery anything that passed in Ireland. But they were, to a certain extent, inevitable as long as people without capital sought to draw a precarious living from the land. It had been found necessary in this country to consolidate holdings in order that the occupier should be able to pay his way. The doctrine put forward by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, if carried to its legitimate extent, would prevent any rent from being obtained in respect of small holdings, either in Ireland or in this country. He should like to see any Land Bill whatever produced by hon. Members opposite which would be consistent with the rights of property. Irish Members now said that the judicial rents could not be paid; but in that case what would have become of the security which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian proposed in his Bill of last year to offer for the advance by this country of £150,000,000? In his opinion, hon. Members opposite would do well if they accepted the Criminal Law Amendment

Mr. Addison

Bill which was about to be introduced by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It was believed that its application would extend only to those districts in which crime and outrage prevailed, and, having regard to the restoration of peace and happiness among the Irish population, he considered that was the honest and just course for the Nationalist Representatives to pursue. They should turn their attention to assisting the Conservative Party to restore peace, order, and prosperity to their country.

Mr. MENZIES (Perthshire, E.): I shall ask the indulgence of the House, while we are on the very threshold of this important question, in order to state briefly my reasons for supporting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), and resisting the proposals of the Government. Unfortunately, Sir, demands for the urgency of coercion are so little of a novelty in this House, that the arguments both for and against them are almost as familiar to hon. Members as those of certain annual discussions on our Votes of Supply, or hereditary legislators, or any other continually recurring subject of debate. It is, therefore, quite unnecessary to go into them at any length. But, Sir, there is this amount of novelty in the present proposals of the Government—I mean as compared with other coercive proposals—they have the unfortunate distinction, as has been proved over and over again in this debate, of being the most unnecessary and inexcusable instance of coercion which Parliament has ever been called upon to support—coercion with least crime to suppress, and with most to be said in favour of dealing with the difficulties which do exist by other and more humane methods. With reference to those other methods, we have been told, Sir, by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, that remedial measures will not of themselves restore order. No, Sir; I dare say they will not. There is not the slightest chance, I am sorry to say, of those remedial measures which the right hon. Gentleman has in his mind producing anything like such a beneficial result. But, Sir, are there no other remedial measures than those which the present Government are likely to propose? I believe that there are some—

the very hope, the mere introduction of which into the last House of Commons, though defeated by a majority, exercised the most powerful tendency in favour of diminishing the amount of crime and the number of outrages throughout the whole of Ireland. We were told, Sir, in somewhat vague and inadequate language, considering the magnitude of the issue, that Ireland is in a state of disorganization, although it seems impossible to apply that remark with anything like accuracy to more than a portion of the country, containing about one-eighth of the whole population of Ireland. I would like to ask how Scotland would have stood the application of similar reasoning to her own case? Would it have entered into the wildest heads of the most uncompromising supporters of coercion on the opposite side of the House to have described Scotland as being in a state of disorganization, because the crofter counties, containing about one-ninth of the total population of Scotland, were described as being disturbed by an agrarian agitation. I would remind the House that in March last year the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland said that—

“He doubted whether in any part of Ireland you could exceed the lawlessness, although you might exceed the violence, which now prevailed on some portions of the Western Coast. Nothing but the most courageous exercise of the powers of the Executive Government could possibly restore those elements of social order without which prosperity could not be re-introduced.”

And when it was a question of remedial, and not of criminal legislation, which is far worse, was not the whole drift of argument which came from the opposite side of the House towards limiting the area to which the Bill should apply. I am aware that it may be replied that we are as yet ignorant as to how far the Government proposals are limited. But that is not the question. Hon. Members seem to forget that we are now dealing with the question of the urgency of coercion over remedial measures. The whole of Ireland—every single Irishman—is necessarily affected by precedence being given to coercion, and the delay of those remedial measures for which the whole country is calling. Because one-eighth of the population of Ireland may be said to be disturbed, all Ireland must go on in rapidly-increasing misery, and the “door of hope” be shut to every Irishman. And what, Sir, is the chief plea upon which the Government are basing their extraordinary policy? We are told that it goes back to the simple duty of every Government, which is to maintain the law and secure the liberties of the people. What law, I ask, and what liberties? It seems to me almost an abuse of language to make it your excuse for giving urgency to coercion over remedial measures, and preferring a policy of resistance to the Constitutional and reasonable demands of the Irish people to a policy of conciliation, that you are securing their liberties and maintaining their law. It is on this ground that I think the question is one which goes to the very root of civil liberty and the proper respect for the law. For the law which you are asking us to support by coercion, is not law which has been made sacred—or even respectable—by the fact that it has been made by the people themselves whom it affects. And, Sir, when we are asked to support, by coercion, what is called the stability of Government, let us at least be certain what that phrase really means. Let us remember, at all events, that in the eyes of the vast majority of Irishmen, this phrase—the stability of Government—means, under present circumstances, the stability of a foreign Government; and that the maintenance of law and order means in their sight, however much we may deplore it, the maintenance of landlords' law and land agents' order. I think that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle was right when he said that the real hypothesis on which the Government proposals are based is that the Irish, as a people, are incorrigible. And this, Sir, seems to me to be the guiding and impelling idea in many very sincere minds, and not only on one side of the House—an unnatural, an unhappy idea, but one which has taken violent possession of many men and many newspapers, and which it may possibly be difficult to eradicate except by a process more in the nature of a miraculous illumination than an ordinary process of reasoning. Against such an argument, it seems to me to be useless to fight. But the one thing which ought to be clear to all hon. Members is the impossibility of sustaining such a policy as the Government are now entering on, even for a moderate length of time. Hon. Members should remember that they have to reckon in future, not only with Irishmen, but with the electors of England, Scotland, and Wales. How long are they going to support you? May not they very shortly become incorrigible too? Yes, Sir, coercion may be an intelligible policy; but there is one great condition of success that it ignores. There is the heart and conscience of the people of Great Britain, which you cannot force to sleep for 20 years, or guarantee against an awakening, compared with which the Liberal reaction of 1880 would seem almost a feather in the cap of the Tory Party.

MR. MULHOLLAND (Londonderry, N.): I think it is desirable that some of the Ulster Members should say a few words in reply to the accusations which have been levelled against them by the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley) and other speakers who have followed him. The right hon. Gentleman quoted from the Blue Book the evidence given before the Royal Commission by Mr. Dickson, who, as hon. Members know, was at one time a Member of this House; but I should like to know what weight the statements of that gentleman can carry on this question, seeing that, although for a long time he has been very hostile to the landlords of Ulster, he was not successful, at the last Election, in inducing a single agricultural constituency in Ulster to return him as their Representative. Other hon. Members who have spoken in support of the Amendment have quoted extracts from the evidence given before the Royal Commissioners which happened to bear specially on their side of the case; but, Sir, I venture to say that I do not think this is a very proper way of putting the case fairly before the House. I have the Report of the Commission here, and I could, myself, quote any number of statements in support of the landlords, and in exactly the opposite direction to the statements quoted by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I think that the House, in studying the evidence, will be rather inclined to balance the evidence of the landlord party and those who represent the landlords as against the evidence of the farmers and those who are specially the supporters of that class; and that they will attach the greatest weight to persons who are obviously impartial in the matter. Probably, the evidence which will carry most weight with it is that of the Head Commissioners—Mr. Justice O'Hagan and Mr. Litton—and I will trouble the House with a short extract from it. Mr. Justice O'Hagan, speaking of the increased reductions which have been made in recent years, says—

"I think the figures of the change which we made, instead of averaging on the whole about 1 per cent above decisions of the Sub-Commissioners, came to 2 or 3 per cent below them."

So that the whole effect of the recent reductions was to reduce the rents 3 per cent more than they had been reduced under the earlier operation of the inquiry. Mr. Litton, who is the other Head Commissioner, was asked this question—

"Does this, in your opinion tend to justify an alteration in the judicial rents?"

His reply was—

"I cannot conceive anything to justify legislative interference with the rents fixed under the authority of the Act, if there is to be any finality, or if there is to be any trust in the Legislature."

Again, in respect to a produce rent, the same Commissioner said—

"If a produce rent is to be adopted, I would not apply it to judicial rents already fixed until the term had run out."

In considering this question of the fairness or unfairness of the judicial rents, it seems to me that this is purely an economic question, and that it should therefore be tested more by reference to the statistics which bear on the subject than by the evidence of individuals who have not studied the subject. I notice that hon. Members who have spoken in the debate in support of the Amendment have kept very clear from statistics. I have not been surprised at it; but I have never yet seen any statistics which, in any way, will support them in their contention. They say that the statistics in regard to agricultural produce show a considerable fall in prices during the last two or three years; but what we complain of is that in regard to this question of agricultural prices, hon. Members, and, indeed, some of the Commissioners, have only dealt with five or six years previous to the time of inquiry. Surely, it would have been very much fairer if they had considered the average of prices during a very much longer period than that. If we compare the condition of the farmer 20 or 30 years ago with his condition at the present time, we shall find broadly that the prices at the present time are from some 20 to 40 per cent higher now than they were at that period; notwithstanding which fact the rents have been reduced 20 per cent by the operation of the Land Courts. In addition to this question of the prices of agricultural produce, there is a large amount of evidence, collected in tables and in the Report of the Commission, to show that the value of the tenant's interest in the farm has been kept up even down to the present date. In fact, especially in Ulster, it is a well-known fact that, on the average, the interest of the tenant is at the present day fully equal in value to the interest of the landlord. I do not think that a fact like that tends to show that the existing rents are either exorbitant or rack rents. Take, again, the bank deposits; they have increased during the last 45 years from £8,000,000 to £34,000,000, and hon. Members will admit that a large amount of these deposits is the property of the tenant farmers. Then, again, there is the case of the Bright purchasers—those who have purchased farms under the Act of 1870. I contend that their case is really a hard one, and I have already brought it under the notice of the Government. Indeed, I am sanguine enough to hope that the Government will take the case of these purchasers into their serious consideration, with a view of giving them some relief. The point I wish to make is, that these purchasers have been paying instalments which are equivalent to a rent very much higher—30, 40, and 50 per cent higher than the level of the judicial rents. I regard that as a very strong proof indeed that the general condition of the rents of Ulster is not too high. I do not think it is altogether surprising that, taking these matters into consideration, the landlords of Ulster have not been making a general reduction of the judicial rents. Another argument which has, no doubt, influenced them is this—that while the landlords in Ireland have given reductions, either from generosity, or, what I think has more often been the case, because they were too poor to fight the matter, and were obliged to take what they could get, that fact has been brought forward as an argument that the rents were exorbitant. When a landlord reduces his rents in certain years, it is often brought against him in succeeding years that because he made the reductions the rents were exorbitant. There is one point more, and I think it has an important bearing upon the question—namely, the position of the labourers in Ireland. I can speak specially from my own knowledge of the condition of the labourers in my own constituency, and the manner in which they regard the proposals for new land legislation. I may inform the House that the labourers do not look with any degree of satisfaction upon the proposal to confer new benefits upon the farmers. They are of opinion, and I think to a large extent that opinion is justified, that the Legislature has already conferred a sufficient number of boons and benefits upon the farmers at the expense of the landlords. They think it is quite time that if further legislation is to be introduced in regard to the land of Ireland, it should be in their favour. What they want is to have a decent house and half-an-acre of land at a fair and reasonable rent. They know, too, that the landlords are their best friends; that they give them the best employment, and that they treat their labourers much better than the farmers. They look forward with dread to the time when the landlords will be swept out of the country, and when they will be left entirely to the tender mercy of the farmers. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that they are opposed to any sweeping transfer of property from the landlords to the tenants. I believe the other Ulster Members will bear me out in saying that they are not now in favour, nor are they likely to be in future, of any sweeping or drastic land legislation. What Ireland wants is peace and repose; that the grinding and cruel coercion of the National League should be put an end to; and when this result has been attained, when law and order are restored, when the country is in a condition to receive remedial legislation, I hope that this House and the Government will not relax their efforts, but will use British credit to encourage the industries of the country, and to provide that employment for the Irish people which is so much needed. If that be done, I believe that before many years are passed we may hope to see our country on a fair road to prosperity and contentment.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, that nothing but the most overwhelming necessity could have justified the Government in the monstrous proposition they had made for what really amounted to an appropriation of the whole time of the House for the remainder of the Session. If the Government devoted themselves to coercion in that way, Parliament would cease to be Imperial, and would become a Legislature for the transaction of Irish Business by a majority composed of English and Scotch Members. Looking to the vast amount of opposition this measure was likely to encounter—an opposition very different both in extent and character from that which any other Coercion Bill had met with—it was certain that the matter would occupy a considerable time; indeed, he could not help thinking that possibly Whitsuntide or even the months of July and August would still find them squabbling over this measure. What, then, was to become of the Ministerial programme? This was rather a heavy burden to lay on a new House of Commons in, practically, its first Session, when a large number of Members had come up from the country anxious to bring forward questions of great importance to their constituents and the country generally. It was especially hard when they remembered that the Government had asked for and obtained every minute up to the present time. The House had now sat for two months, and of that period independent Members had not obtained a single day. Not a month ago, the First Lord of the Treasury asked that priority should be given to the Rules of Procedure, on the ground that they were intended to restore the dignity and efficiency of the House. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) accepted the statement in perfect good faith, and did his best to help the Government to pass the First Rule. But within a few hours of passing the Rule, they threw the dignity and efficiency of the House to the winds, and asked hon. Members to give fresh urgency to a new measure. The right hon. Gentleman had let the cat out of the bag, and had shown that the real motive of the Government in passing the Closure

Rule was not to insure the efficiency and dignity of the House of Commons, but to enable them to pass a severe Coercion Bill for Ireland, for which there was nothing but the most flimsy pretext. What was to become of the other Rules of Procedure, some of which were far more important than the one which had been adopted? What had become of the Rule relating to the Sittings of the House, and to the devolution of the Business of Parliament? What was to become of the measures promised in the Queen's Speech, if this Bill was to take up the remainder of the Session? Why, they would vanish into thin air, and become "such stuff as dreams are made of." Urgency was never before demanded upon such flimsy grounds and such inadequate information as the Government had put forward in this case. There could be no comparison between the state of things in 1881-2, when urgency was granted, and that existing at the present time. Crimes and outrages were now comparatively few and light. On the previous occasion, facts and statistics were placed before the House to justify the action it took; but now hon. Members were called upon to vote with their eyes shut. He insisted, therefore, that the Government were bound to show some more solid grounds than they had done for the demand they made. They ought to have stated some facts, data, and statistics before, and not after, making their demand for urgency. The urgency now asked was sought not to restore law and order in Ireland, but to maintain high rents; not to protect life and property, but to protect the pockets of the landlords, and to enable them collect rents which, in a great majority of cases, were higher than the tenants could possibly pay. The evidence of the Land Commission showed that the whole land system of Ireland was rotten to the core. As a proof of it, he would refer hon. Members to the account given in that day's newspapers of the evictions carried out on the Lansdowne estate, which resembled the description of a storming party in the Peninsular War. A body of 100 constables, under the command of a Resident Magistrate, were told off with scaling ladders, shields of corrugated iron, and crowbars, in order to evict 20 wretched old men, women, and children. How long, he asked, was it possible for those things to go on? The sooner they were altered the better it would be for the Government, and the peace and happiness of the long misgoverned Sister Country. A Bill, they were told, was to be introduced in "another place" to deal with the Irish Land Question. He did not like the domicile of origin of that Bill. He knew what the House of Lords had done in regard to rents in the case of previous Bills, and he had not much faith in anything that came from them on that subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was an able man—he was an honest man—but, however able and honest, he could not accomplish impossibilities—he could not govern Ireland in the way he had proposed. Did he expect to succeed where Lord Spencer and Mr. Forster and Sir George Trevelyan had failed? They might gag the Press, imprison priests, stop public meetings, and evict old men, women, and children from their miserable homes; they might put on the closure in the strictest form, and drag unfortunate Members out of bed to enforce it; but the weapon they had formed would break in their hands, for they would still have to deal with 85 Irishmen who had been sent to that House to ventilate the wrongs of their country, and who would, if he mistook not, continue to do so. He believed that the democracy of England were getting sick of those Coercion Bills, and longing to find out a better way to deal with Ireland, and evidence of that was furnished by the recent bye-elections, and would, he believed, be furnished by another bye-election which was going on that day. If the Government really preferred a policy of buckshot let them openly say so. As Cavour said—"Anybody can govern by military law." That was what it would come to; but in Heaven's name let them get rid of that half-and-half policy—that sham freedom—that attempt to combine the despotism of Russia with the democratic system of England. He was not sorry the Government had shown their hand. Every day of that debate would bring them nearer and nearer to the only way of solving the Irish problem, and, possibly, before long Lord Salisbury might wake up from that nightmare which he confessed he had been suffering from, and would find out that the only true way of governing Ireland was to let Ireland govern herself.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, it was not his intention to detain the House at any considerable length, not because he did not attach immense importance to the subject under discussion, but because inevitably during the next week or two that same subject would be discussed again and again; and the great inconvenience of the debate in which the House was now engaged consisted in the fact that it was a partial debate on a question that would be completely debated in the course of a very few days. No doubt, however, hon. Members below the Gangway opposite would expect himself and his Colleagues connected with land in Ireland to say a few words in connection with the question of rent. The Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) was not an Amendment which simply dealt with rent, but it was a Vote of Want of Confidence in the Government; and he thought he knew the constituency which he had the honour to represent too well not to know that, however tempting it might be—and undoubtedly it would be very tempting—for the tenants to have their rents reduced, they would think it a gain too dearly bought by replacing the Government now occupying the Treasury Bench by a Home Rule Government led by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). The right hon. Member for Newcastle, in moving his Amendment, apparently had two tasks to fulfil. First of all, he had to try and saddle the Government with the charge of backing up Irish landlordism; and, secondly, he had to whitewash his present staunch allies the Irish National League. He had taken down the words of the right hon. Gentleman, and, in speaking of the National League which it was his business to whitewash, as his remedy for Irish Bills was to commit the destinies of Ireland to that organization, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“You are acting against a combination to protect the tenants against rents which you yourselves will admit—will be compelled to admit—to be excessive and exorbitant, and against which these combinations are the only existing safeguards.”

Now, the right hon. Gentleman was usually very calm and academic in his style; but when he attacked the Irish landlords he raised his hand and pointed across at the class which he desired to crumple up and destroy; and, happening himself to be the Irish landlord nearest him at the moment, he felt almost alarmed at the anger and fury displayed by the right hon. Gentleman in pointing to the Irish landlords as a class worthy only of abhorrence and detestation. But, a little further on in his speech, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“I do not wish to leave off with any particularly bad language against the Irish landlords.”

Well, he then thought the right hon. Gentleman was going to pull in the reins and say, at least, a few kind words of the landlords; but, however, he went on and compared them very disadvantageously with Irish Moonlighters. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“Anxious as I am to do that, still I am less anxious to secure vengeance on 100 or 200 ruffians than to secure righteous and humane treatment for thousands of poor tenants in Ireland; and that is the difference between hon. Gentlemen opposite and those who sit upon this side of the House.”

Well, what did that mean? He imagined it meant that the great majority of the Irish landlords, in their extortion practised on the tenants, compared unfavourably with the Moonlighters who carried out the behests of the National League in Ireland. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean what he said? The right hon. Gentleman had been Chief Secretary for Ireland, and had been in that country for three weeks, and had therefore had a considerable knowledge of the affairs. If during those three weeks he made a careful examination of the condition of the country, many instances must have occurred to him in which the National League, which he now tried to whitewash, had proved that it was the greatest tyrant that ever exercised its baneful influence over the Irish people. He could give numerous instances of how the National League had helped Irish tenants. In the County of Roscommon, about a year and a-half ago, a man named Brennan had the audacity to pay his rent after he had been ordered not to do so; he was furnished by his brother with the money to pay it, and he paid it; and that night, sitting at his bedside, he was shot dead through the window. This was an instance of the beneficent action of the National League—the only organization that benefited the tenants of Ireland. While the right hon. Member for Newcastle was Chief Secretary, in the County of Roscommon the League Boycotted some grass lands belonging to two landlords—Lord Kingston and Mr. McDermott Roe—and issued orders that no one was to take the lands, simply because they belonged to gentlemen against whom the League had a grudge. They were, however, offered at so low a price that six farmers determined to take the risk, and took portions of the lands. Immediately there were placed upon the telegraph posts by the roadside warnings from the local League, of which the parish priest was president and his curates vice-presidents, that these tenants were to be treated as land-grabbers. This had such an effect that one tenant gave up the land and paid a forfeit of £75. The others continued to hold what they had taken, and the next day the cattle on the lands disappeared. It was afterwards discovered that the cattle had been driven to a coal-pit, and hurled over the edge, and their dead and mutilated remains were found at the bottom. They were brought to the surface and identified; and those dead and mutilated cattle identified the character and nature of the National League. [An hon. MEMBER: How about General Buller?] Oh, I will deal with General Buller presently. So far from its being the main object of the proposed Bill to subject the Irish tenants to a galling yoke, it was to set them free from a yoke that was crushing all progress and enterprise, driving capital away, and depriving the country of its life's blood. He could multiply instances in which the League had done injury to the Irish people. He had a letter from a small Irish Roman Catholic tenant, whose name he could not give, because if it were published his life would not be worth six days' purchase. This man, whose letter he held in his hand—and which he would have no objection in showing to the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley)—had committed a crime which was unpardonable in Ireland. He disobeyed the behests of a Court which suffered no contempt to go unpunished—he paid his rent, walking 14 miles into the town of Tipperary to do it in the hope that the League might hear nothing about it. But, somehow, the fact got wind, presumably from an official of the bank; and the next night his farm was visited, the cattle were massacred in the fields, the ploughs and agricultural implements were broken up. The tenant had to fly from his house, and he dared not return for some months for fear of being murdered. This man was perfectly willing to pay his rent. He said—

"I have sold my horse; I have got the money; I am ready to pay when the rest is paid; but as I was Boycotted last year, I am afraid to do it until they get leave."

And he wound up with the remark—

"I do not know what is becoming of this country that a man won't be let do as he wants to do."

This remark was entirely apposite; and the writer added—

"We have a quare Parliament that don't put down such work at once."

Well, he (Colonel Saunderson) believed it was the intention of the House and of the Government to put this down at once. The right hon. Members for Newcastle and Mid Lothian were prejudiced critics—they were opposed to the plan which the Government intended to pursue, because they had a cure of their own for the wrongs and woes of Ireland; and no matter what proposals the present Government might bring forward, they would be opposed by those right hon. Gentlemen. They all knew that doctors, when they had prescribed for a patient, and were superseded by another medical man, always said—"Oh, you will yet be very glad to come back to my pills." The remedy of right hon. Gentlemen opposite was to force Ireland from the control of the British Parliament. It was quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had remarked that evening, that the present state of things in Ireland was different to what it was in the year 1881. That was true; because the Party of Separation was now led by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, whereas it was formerly led by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). He (Colonel Saunderson) admitted at once that there was not much crime in Ireland; but he held that the first duty of the Government was not only to punish crime, but also to prevent the commission of crime; and Irish society was now ripe for the production of crime in its worst form. The greater part of the Island was absolutely subject to the National League. There was no need now for crime. If they went into the details of the crime of 1880, 1881, and 1882, they would find that that was mainly directed to one purpose—namely, laying the foundation of the authority of the National League everywhere, and to enable it to terrorize over the Irish people. That had been effectually done; the National League had ousted the law of the land; and it was superior to the Law Courts in all parts of Ireland. The right hon. Member for Newcastle and his Colleagues had swallowed that state of affairs and the Plan of Campaign, and hoped the nauseous mixture would be swallowed by the Government, because they would not follow their example. But the Government, and the Unionist Party who had placed them on the Treasury Bench, showed no inclination to take the nauseous dose. There were only two policies submitted to the electors last July—surrender to the National League, and the maintenance of the law of the Crown and the unity of the Empire. The great majority of the country decided that the latter policy should prevail, and the Government intended to carry it into effect. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian quoted the evidence of General Buller. He (Colonel Saunderson) interrupted the right hon. Gentleman—he was afraid somewhat rudely—but he knew the right hon. Gentleman was very averse to saying anything inaccurate in his speeches, and he asked him to read on. The right hon. Gentleman was trying to show that General Buller had stated that the National League had nothing to do with crime. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian went on to accuse Sir Redvers Buller, and he (Colonel Saunderson) thought the right hon. Gentleman would feel obliged to him for calling attention to another question which would throw some light on the subject under discussion. The right hon. Gentleman went on to read the Answer to Question 16,503, but only read a part of it, and then thought he had snuffed him out. But the whole answer showed that, in the opinion of Sir Redvers Buller, in some parts of Ireland, at any rate, the National League was directly responsible for crime, outrage, and intimidation. The Question was whether, owing to the organization of the League, the enforcement of legal obligations had not, in that district, become impossible? And Sir Redvers Buller replied—

[Third Night.]

“Quite so; you cannot collect a shop debt. There was a man murdered the other day on account of a shop debt, on the other side of Tralee; and the crops of a farmer having been seized for a shop debt, a man who came to cut them was shot the same evening.”

That is General Buller's opinion of the action of the League in that part of Ireland. He (Colonel Saunderson) could not conceive any answer more direct, or to the purpose. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian appeared to think that Her Majesty's Government looked upon, and intended to deal with, the Irish people as if they were the most lawless and criminal population in Europe. He absolutely denied it, and believed that, if they had the chance, the Irish people would be as law-abiding as the people of England and Scotland. They would all admit that the most civilized and exemplary part of the British Islands was that part of them north of the Tweed. If they had in Ireland a law as stringent and severe as had always prevailed in Scotland, they would not want a Coercion Bill. What the great majority of the English people expected was that the Government would bring in a Bill strong enough to crush the National League and enable law-abiding Irishmen, whatever their class or creed, to go about their business as they pleased and to fulfil all the duties of citizens. They expected the Bill to be a permanent one. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Osborne Morgan) asked—“Do you expect to succeed when Forster and Spencer failed?” They failed because their measures were temporary. He hoped, therefore, that the Bill would be permanent, and not confined to isolated parts of the country, because he defied anybody to bring forward an instance where a Coercion Act, while in force, had interfered with any law-abiding man. There was not a county in Ireland which could hold up its hands against that measure. When such a measure as he referred to had been passed and the supremacy of the law was established, the remedial measures Her Majesty's Government intended to bring in would have some chance of success. No Land Bill, the most generous that could be conceived—even one that would turn the landlords adrift and make a present of the land to the tenants—would succeed in pacifying Ireland so long as they were trodden under the foot of an organization which originated in crime and outrage; and whose ultimate object was to separate Ireland from England and to destroy the just rights of the Crown. For that reason he hoped the Government and the House would reject the Amendment, stand by the law and coerce, not the tenants, but the agitators who had ever been the curse of Ireland. Then Ireland might become what they had a right to expect she ought to be—a source of strength and wealth to the British Empire.

Mr. ASQUITH (East Fife) said, he would ask the indulgence of the House while he stated the reasons that induced him as an Englishman who represented a Scottish constituency, in the interests of Great Britain no less than in the interests of Ireland, to support the Amendment. It appeared to him that the Government were inviting them to a display of trustfulness, not to say of credulity, which might well tax the faith of the most docile and the best-disciplined majority. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had darkly hinted that when the time came for him to introduce his Bill, he would be able to unfold a terrible tale of anarchy and disorder. But up to this moment, after three nights' hot debate, not a single responsible Minister had condescended to a single specific statement in support of the proposal of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had contented himself first with general declamation as to the condition of Ireland, and next by appealing to the precedent of 1881. Now that appeal to precedent rested on two assumptions—first, that the state of things now was similar to the state of things existing then—a hypothesis which had been effectually demolished by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone); and, secondly, that the experiment of 1881, repeated in 1882, was so well justified by experience, so brilliantly fruitful of good results, that at this distance of time—1887—they were bound to follow it as a precedent, blindly, implicitly, without question and almost without argument. He would direct the attention of the House to that assumption. A great deal had been said about the duty of the Executive Government to enforce the law. He entirely agreed with that proposition. In his judgment it was the duty of the Executive not to inquire whether the law was good or bad, just or unjust, but to enforce it in all places, and at all times, without distinction of persons, without discrimination of cases, with undeviating uniformity, and with irresistible strength. [Ministerial cheers.] Hon. Gentleman opposite cheered that statement, but he would ask them, when, in our time, had that view of the duty of the Executive been recognized and acted upon in Ireland? Once certainly, and once only, and that was during Lord Spencer's administration. Lord Spencer's hand was heavy, but its pressure was even. Wherever he encountered lawlessness—among Catholics or Protestants, the Moonlighters of the South or the turbulent Orange rabble of the North—he dealt with it in one fashion, firmly, impartially, and effectively. But there was not a right hon. Gentleman now sitting on the Front Bench opposite, with two exceptions—namely, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, whatever might be the case now, was then a Member of the Liberal Party, and the Home Secretary, who had not then come to the close of that period of hibernation which separated the two stages of his remarkable political career—with those two exceptions there was not a right hon. Gentleman of Cabinet rank who was not a party, either as principal or accessory, to the most envenomed and bitter attacks upon Lord Spencer's administration. He would quote for that statement the authority of Lord Salisbury himself, who said that under Lord Spencer's administration the Nationalist League had grown into power and spread its branches throughout the whole of the country. Next he said that the practice of Boycotting, which up to that time had been comparatively rare, had established itself throughout the country, and, as Lord Salisbury pointed out, that was a practice with which no law, however stringent, could deal and which no Administration, however zealous, could put down. He, for one, did not believe in the plenary infallibility of Liberal Governments, and he did not think the proudest period in the history of the Liberal Party had been that in which it had frittered away in Office pledges which had been given when in Opposition; and, therefore, loyal though he was to his Party and his Leader, he did not think the fact that in 1881 the Liberal Government committed what he considered a colossal and disastrous mistake was any reason whatever why, in 1887, they should, in obedience to a Conservative Ministry, repeat that blunder. It was admitted that, looking at Ireland as a whole, there had been during the last six months less serious crime, whether open or secret, than in almost any corresponding period of her troubled history. What crime there had been was confined to a comparatively limited area in a few counties in the South and West. In those counties they found another phenomenon. It was in those counties that abatements of rent had been most generally refused. It was in those counties that evictions had been most exceptionally frequent in number, and most grave and cruel in their character. It was in those counties that the standard of rents, judged by the reductions made by the Land Commissioners in the course of the last few months, had been abnormally high. As to the prevalence of crime, having regard to these admitted facts, he said deliberately that this was a manufactured crisis. They knew by experience how a case for coercion was made out. The panic-mongers of the Press—gentlemen to whom every political combination was a conspiracy, and to whom every patriot was a rebel—were the first in the field. They had been most effectively assisted on the present occasion on the other side of the Channel by the purveyors of loyal fictions and patriotic hysterics wholesale, retail, and for exportation. The truth, whatever truth there was in the stories, was deliberately distorted and exaggerated. Atrocities were fabricated to meet the requirements of the market with punctuality and despatch; and when the home supply failed, the imagination of the inventive journalist winged its flight across the Atlantic, and he set to work to piece together the stale gossip of the drinking saloons of New York and Chicago, and eked it out with cuttings from the obscure organs of the dynamite Press. And thus it was that, after six months of comparatively little crime, we found ourselves in the presence of this artificial crisis, and confronted once again with proposals for coercion. They were told—and it was true—that there were certain grave symptoms in the existing condition of Ireland. The National League was asserting its authority throughout the country. In many quarters the practice of Boycotting was carried on to an extent that was inconsistent with the maintenance of law and good order. There was a disposition on the part of juries not to convict persons who ought to be punished. He made these admissions; but he asked hon. Members to consider what was the meaning of the facts. His hon. Friend the Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay) declared the other night that he was going to support the measures of the Government because they were measures, not of coercion, but of emancipation—measures to enfranchise the suffering Irish tenant from the tyranny of secret societies. What secret societies? His hon. Friend did not attempt to answer that question; but it appeared that he was referring to the National League. Well, that was no more a secret society than was the Primrose League. It was an open association, and reports of the proceedings of all its branches appeared every week in United Ireland. There had been in Ireland and elsewhere secret societies such as the Fenian Brotherhood, the Carbonari in Italy, the Ku-Klux-Klan in the Southern States of America, and the Nihilists in Russia; but these secret societies had been called into existence by measures such as that to be submitted to the House. They had drawn the vitality which enabled them to tyrannize over and terrorize the people by such a policy as the Government were now asking the House to adopt, and in favour of which the Government were asking the House to devote the whole of its time, to the postponement of all the real Business of the nation. Once suspend the guarantees of the Constitution, and take away from the people the privilege of free criticism and of legitimate political agitation, and the consequence was to drive them to those sinister and subterranean methods, which were destructive of peace and prosperity in every country in which they should exist. The really grave symptoms in Ireland were the existence of Boycotting and the indisposition of juries to convict prisoners. No coercive legislation could have the least effect in diminishing or removing either of those evils. With regard to Boycotting, he was content with the testimony of Lord Salisbury. It was one of those impalpable things which legislation could not reach, and the only remedy for it was altering the conditions out of which it sprang. The indisposition of juries to convict depended, firstly, on the rooted antipathy and hostility of the class from which the jurors were drawn to the system of law that they were called upon to administer. In the next place, it depended on the unwillingness of men to give evidence against those whom they believed to be in sympathy with the aspirations of the masses of the community. He would illustrate this by the case of the Curtin family. He did not hesitate to say that the treatment to which that family had been exposed was a disgrace to Ireland and a scandal to humanity. But while they should lose no opportunity of denouncing the cruelty of which the Curtin family had been the victims, yet, when they came to practical legislation, they must consider the real meaning of what had occurred. What was the crime in the eyes of the people which the Curtin family were expiating by this terrible social ostracism? It was not that the head of the family shot and killed the leader of the band of marauders who invaded his house by night. It was because the sons and daughters went to Cork Assizes and gave evidence against the persons concerned in that crime. He was not defending or palliating that course of conduct, but they were sitting there as legislators, and not as moral censors. They had to consider what would be the result of their legislation. From actual violence and outrage, and even from open insult, the Curtin family had long since been protected. ["No, no!"] He was speaking of facts which he had personally investigated. Did hon. Members imagine that by the legislation which Her Majesty's Government were going to propose, they would be able to transmute the social atmosphere in which those people lived and which rendered such treatment of them possible? Suppose they enlarged the powers of the magistrates; suppose they deprived the jurors of their share in the administration of the law; suppose they made punishments more severe; did they imagine that in that way they would increase the disposition of the peasantry of Ireland to come forward and give evidence? Not even a drum-head court-martial could convict without testimony proving the guilt of the accused. The difficulty which they had to provide for was the difficulty which arose from the fact that the great mass of the population in Ireland were alienated from the law, and had no sympathy with its administration. We were not unfamiliar in this country with the very state of things which existed in Ireland. There was nothing novel in the symptoms. They had been witnessed in every country whenever the state of the law had not been in harmony with the wishes of the people. In the early part of the present century, in the days when it was the custom for the Attorney General to file, as a matter of course, informations for seditious libel against political opponents, in vain did the Judges direct that juries had no alternative but to convict. In the teeth of the evidence, and in the face of the direction of the Judge, the jury acquitted the prisoner. It was truly an extraordinary thing that at this time of day the Government, dealing with a well-known form of social and political disease, should come to the House and repeat the catch-words of the Metternichs and Castlereaghs as if they were the latest discoveries of political science. They were told that, after passing this Coercion Bill, the Government were going to give the Irish people a dose of remedial legislation. The procedure of the Government reminded him greatly of that enterprising speculator in the days of the South Sea Bubble who invited the public to subscribe their money in support of a scheme, the particulars of which were to be disclosed subsequently. History did not record that any dividends were ever paid on the capital so subscribed. He did not wish to impugn the good faith of the Government, and he dared say that they believed in the efficacy of the Land Bill which they were to introduce. At present, however, very little was known about that Bill. They knew that it was to provide for the extension to leaseholders of the benefits of the Land Act. That was a provision borrowed from the

hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). It was further believed that the Bill would provide for the application of some of the equitable provisions of the Bankruptcy Act to the cases of a certain class of tenants. The road to prosperity for these tenants was in some way or other to lie through the portals of the Bankruptcy Court—in truth a very encouraging prospect. Then they knew that this remedial legislation was in the first instance to make its appearance in “another place.” That was a very significant fact. He was far from being disposed to intrust the Government with exceptional powers for the enforcement of the law on the chance, the very remote chance, that some day or other, this year or next, or on the advent of the Greek kalends, that august Assembly, which in the last 50 years had mangled and mutilated every proposal for the remedy of the grievances of Ireland, might be coerced or persuaded into acquiescing in an equitable solution of the Irish agrarian question. The Chancellor of the Exchequer not long ago, with what was then his habitual caution, declined to give a blank cheque to Lord Salisbury. He thought that they might profit by the right hon. Gentleman’s example; and the liberties of a nation being at stake, reasonably decline to honour this very serious draft upon their political credulity. He quite understood that there were hon. Members near him who took a very different view of the matter. Those hon. Members were compelled by the circumstances of their position to an exercise of faith which a very short time ago they would have been the first to ridicule and condemn. It was, perhaps, excusable in them, that under the stress of compromising memories—memories of the day when they were wont to declare “that force was no remedy,”—memories of the days still more recent when they denounced the wickedness of Irish landlords, and the more than Polish abominations of Castle rule—it was, perhaps, excusable in them that they should clutch at any pretext, however desperate, which might seem to reconcile their present with their past. He did not know who was the casuist of the Liberal Unionist Party. In that compact and complete organization he felt sure that a place must have been found for a director of consciences. Whoever he was, his time must just now be pretty well occupied. But as for the poor Separatists “the intellectual scum of what was once the Liberal Party,” they might be thankful that they had not to exercise their humble faculties in the attempt to explain how they could vote for a Coercion Bill in the hope that some day or other, in some way or other, remedial measures might be introduced. In the course which the Party opposite were about to take, were they not either going too far or not going nearly far enough? Let them consider what would be the position of Ireland, the condition of government in that country under the system which they were about to introduce—representative institutions upon the terms that the voice of the great majority of the Representatives of the people should be systematically ignored and overridden; the right of public meeting tempered by Viceregal proclamation; trial by jury with a doctored and manipulated panel; a free Press subject to be muzzled at the caprice of an official censorship; Judges and magistrates in theory independent of the Crown, but, in fact, by the tradition and practice of their office inextricably mixed up with the daily action of the Executive. What conceivable advantage could there be either to Ireland or Great Britain from the continuance of this grotesque caricature of the British Constitution? There was much virtue in government of the people, by the people, for the people. There was much also to be said for a powerful and well-equipped autocracy. But, between the two there was no logical or statesmanlike halting-place. For the hybrid system which the Government were about to set up—a system which pretended to be that which it was not, and was not that which it pretended to be—a system which could not be either resolutely repressive or frankly popular—for this half-hearted compromise there was reserved the inexorable sentence which history had in store for every form of political imposture.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I do not know whether the speech to which we have just listened is the maiden speech of my hon. Friend (Mr. Asquith); but, whether it be or exist. I think that all who have heard his speech agree with me that his speech is a fair and able augury of the position which he is likely to fill in our Parliamentary contests. I will not say more about his speech at this moment, except to congratulate my hon. Friend upon the position which he occupies, and which he regards with so much satisfaction—that of a Member of a Party which is free from all compromising memories, and which, as he says, possesses the inestimable advantage—I am not quite certain whether I understood him correctly—the inestimable advantage of having no directors or having no conscience. In what I have to say upon the question before the House, I hope that I may not have to trespass at any length upon its attention, and I hope also that I may be able to avoid wounding the legitimate susceptibilities of any of those from whom I have to differ. Although I may differ from some of their conclusions, I find myself in general agreement with most of the arguments and all the statements of fact which have been made in the course of this debate. The issue which we have to decide is, practically speaking, a very limited one. We are not discussing the terms of a Bill for amending the Criminal Law. We do not know what the proposals of the Government are to be. [“Oh, oh!” from the Irish Members.] Well, I do not know. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway may be more fortunate. At present I only know that the provisions of that Bill may be so stringent that some of us may find ourselves unable to support them. On the other hand, they may be so moderate and reasonable that some of us are already pledged, by our public declarations, to give our assent to them; but that is not the question before us. The question before us is, whether, before we have heard the case of the Government—whether, before we know the nature of the proposals which they are about to make—we are so certain that any Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Law, whether it be a great Bill or a small Bill, whether it be a stringent Bill or a moderate Bill, is unnecessary that we are resolved to refuse to the Government the facilities for its discussion for which they are asking. Now, what do they ask from the House? What they ask from the House is, that the House shall agree to give the Government control over those two nights in the week on which private Members would otherwise have a right to discuss their Motions or their Bills. Well, I do not think a proposal of that kind can fairly be described, as it is in this Amendment, as “setting aside the Business of the nation.” I must say that, in my experience, I have generally found that very little indeed of the “Business of the nation” is ever transacted on nights devoted to private Members. We are told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone)—and it is perfectly true—that this demand is unprecedented, in the sense that it has never before been made with a prospect of its being in operation for so lengthened a period. That is quite true; but then, the circumstances are unprecedented. Who is it that has told us that “Ireland blocks the way?” I do not dispute that assertion. Ireland, or a combination of circumstances which it is not my business now to discuss, does undoubtedly block the way; and it is impossible that any practical progress should be made in any social or political reform until the business of Ireland has been disposed of, and therefore there is no question before the House as to urgency in relation to questions affecting Ireland. That must be granted by the nature of the situation. The only question is as to the order in which the various branches of the Irish Question shall be considered—whether we will give priority to the amendment of the Criminal Law, or to remedial legislation. Well, Sir, I venture to say that, in my judgment, no one can consistently vote for the Amendment before the House unless he is determined that, under no circumstances, will he at present be willing to support any amendment of the Criminal Law in Ireland—[Cries of “No, no!”]—until at all events the remedial legislation which he thinks to be necessary has been dealt with by the House. I hear some Gentlemen say “No, no!” I hope those are the voices of Gentlemen who are unable to support this Amendment; but it has been adopted by the majority of the Irish Representatives—those who call themselves Nationalist Representatives, and by many Liberal Members, on this ground—the majority of the Liberal Party, and the majority of the Irish Representatives, have come to the conclusion that, in future, they will not assent to any measure in the nature of a

[Third Night.]

Coercion Bill for any amendment of the Criminal Law in Ireland, until, at all events, the remedial legislation which they desire has been successfully passed through the House. They found this determination—which I remark, in passing, is a new determination with regard to many of them—they found that determination on two propositions; in the first place, on the proposition that coercion has always failed to secure the objects for which it has been passed; in the second place, that remedial legislation is an alternative to coercion which may be relied upon to secure those objects, and to bring back peace and order to Ireland. Now, I ask the House whether experience warrants these two assumptions? I am not going back a long time; I am going to deal only with the time which is within my own experience, and with that legislation for which I was in part responsible in the period which was covered by the Government that lasted from 1880 to 1885. We devoted a large share of our time and the time of the House of Commons to remedial legislation. I remember well the hopes and the expectations and the promises which heralded the land legislation of 1881. I supported that legislation with my whole heart; and again and again, while it was under consideration in the country and in this House, I put forward my own opinion and the opinion of my Colleagues, that by this legislation we should restore peace and contentment to Ireland; that while, as regarded the landlords, we should diminish—and rightly diminish—their income, we would, at the same time, secure to them the remnant that was left; that, as regarded the tenants, we would give them just rents and fixity of tenure, which we believed would induce them to peaceful enterprizes and industry; and that, under these circumstances, the real material grievances of Ireland would cease. Well, but, Sir, how have these prognostications, how have these sanguine anticipations, been fulfilled? Can anyone deny that the land legislation of 1881 has conspicuously failed? Has it brought peace and prosperity to Ireland? Let hon. Members below the Gangway bear witness. Has it brought security to the landlords? Why, the landlords are in worse plight than ever. I have never been accused of much sympathy with landlords; but really

they are now objects for the pitiful consideration of every Member of the House of Commons. The Royal Commission condemns them; the Opposition condemns them; and even the Government does not defend them. But what is the position of the tenants? This Amendment we are now considering is a confession that the main object of the Land Act of 1881, or of its promoters, has not been accomplished; that we have not secured a fair rent for the tenants of Ireland; and that even now, protected as they are by that Act, they are still subject to the possibility of exactions of excessive and exorbitant rents by bad landlords. [An Irish Member: That is your care.] Well, but it ought to be remembered that this Act of 1881, although passed by a British Parliament, was not an English Act; it was not English in spirit. It was an Irish Act, and such an Act as might have been passed by an Irish Parliament. [Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Certainly not.] I do not accept the contradiction of the hon. Member. I say that that Act was opposed to all the prejudices of Englishmen. I say it violated all the cherished doctrines of political economy—I am not speaking for myself—I am not a political economist; but I am speaking for the vast majority of the Members of this House. I say it was recommended to the House, and passed by the House, because it was modelled upon the demands of the Irish Members, and upon Irish sentiment. In spite of this, the Act has conspicuously failed, and now, six years after its passing, we have to consider a state of things which is as bad as, or worse than, the state of things which existed at the time the Act was passed; and we have still to take measures by the confession of every Member of the House to protect the tenants against the excessive rents which may be levied by landlords unmindful of their duties. But in the time of which I am speaking we did not confine our attention to remedial legislation. I was a party during those five years to two Coercion Acts, and I should have been a party to a third if the Government of which I was a Member had not resigned. Were these Acts of Coercion which we passed successful? I think the answer depends upon what you understand by successful; by what you expect from the Acts of Coercion. If there were any people foolish enough to suppose—and my hon. Friend (Mr. Asquith) appears to believe in their continued existence—that force is a remedy for national discontent—they must have been grievously disappointed by the results of the two Acts which were passed by the Government of which I was a Member. But if force is only intended to secure the temporary suppression of disorder, and an outward respect to the law, then I say that, although in my opinion—I speak only for myself—the first of these Acts which involved the suspension of Habeas Corpus was an entire failure; the second of these Acts, the Crimes Act, as it was administered by Lord Spencer, was a success, and justified the expectations of its promoters in this limited sense only—that it produced peace and order in the country and outward respect for the law of the land. Well, then, I say that the lesson of my experience, at all events—others may not have learnt it in the same way—has been that we ought not to be too sanguine as to our remedial legislation, although we ought not, on that account, to despair; but that we may assume that moderate amendments of the ordinary Criminal Law will enable any Government to cope successfully with active manifestations of disorder. What is the position of the supporters of this Amendment? I understand they contend, in the first place, that social disorder is not at the present time widespread in Ireland; and that they contend, in the second place, that the manifestation of disorder is not sufficient to justify any coercive legislation until, at all events, the causes of disorder have been dealt with by the Government. I believe that is a fair account of the position of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), and those who support his Amendment. In attempting to deal with this contention, I am prepared to make large admissions—admissions that I think will justify what I said in the opening of my remarks—namely, that I am able to agree with a great deal that has fallen from my Friends around me. I agree, to begin with, that the disorder in Ireland is partial, and confined to a limited area. But if you take that by itself, it is really a reason for restricting the operation of any Bill; but it is not a reason for allowing disorder to continue unchecked, even in that limited area. As I have already pointed out, we are not now asked to approve of the Bill. By the Vote which we shall give upon this Amendment, we none of us pledge ourselves, in the slightest degree, to support the Bill when it is brought forward. All that we are asked to do is to admit that there is urgency—that the subject should be discussed and disposed of at the earliest possible moment, in order to make room for other Business, and, if necessary for another Government. I admit, in the second place, that the number of serious outrages is fortunately, much less than it was on many previous occasions when coercion was proposed; but, Sir, there is a reason for this, which does not tell in favour of inaction. I remember a meeting being held in Ireland, which was addressed by an Irish Member who told his hearers that murder was unnecessary, because Boycotting was very much more effective, and when the machinery of intimidation is quite perfect, as it nearly is at the present time in Kerry, I have no doubt that outrages will be altogether unknown. But this involves a state of terrorism which is just as repugnant to true liberty, as the order which reigned at Warsaw under a tyrannical despotism. Then, Sir, I admit also the main facts which my right hon. Friend has sought to prove from the evidence in the Blue Book, and from the Report of the Royal Commission. I admit that combinations for resisting legal obligations have been facilitated by the action of some landlords, who have refused abatements and who have exacted rents which the fall in prices has made excessive. I admit that to the full, and I think that some remedy is necessary for the state of things herein disclosed. But if we are to accept, as conclusive against the landlords, the Report and the evidence of the Royal Commission which tells against them, surely we should pay some attention to this evidence and this Report when it appears to tell against the organization of the National League. I should just like to quote from the Report of the Commissioners. On page 11, there is this paragraph, in which they say—

“In the other Provinces (that is, excluding Ulster) combinations for the purpose of resisting the payment of rents have been found to be the principal cause of the disorder before the passing of the Bill.”

have in various forms continued to the present time. Outrage was at first made use of to intimidate parties who were willing to pay rents; but, latterly, the methods of passing resolutions at National League meetings, causing their proceedings to be reported in local newspapers, naming obnoxious men, and then Boycotting those named have been adopted. Tenants who had paid even the judicial rents had been summoned to appear before self-constituted tribunals, and if they failed to do so, or, appearing, failed to satisfy those tribunals, have been fined or Boycotted. The people are more afraid of Boycotting, which depends for its success on the probability of outrage, than they are of the judgments of the Courts of Justice. This unwritten law in some districts is supreme."

Then on the next page, the Commissioners further say—

"The evidence shows that the tenant farmers who join many of these combinations, constitute themselves the sole judges of what is an equitable rent. Landlords in many districts, no matter how moderate their rents may be, are practically unable to collect them. The tenant in arrear of rent is sometimes prohibited from selling his holding, and if the landlord ejects him for non-payment, no matter how low the rent or how large the arrears, the land must lie idle on the owner's hands, as he is neither allowed, even if he has the means, to work it himself, the land being strictly Boycotted, nor dare anyone hire what is known as an evicted farm, and very large tracts are now in consequence waste. Thus the recovery of rent is rendered difficult, and sometimes impossible."

I have preferred to quote from the conclusions of the Commissioners as showing in a short form, what passed through their minds as the effect of the evidence they had heard. I say that is the conclusion to which any impartial person would arrive on reading the whole Report, paying equal attention to all parts of it. [An hon. MEMBER: Was Mr. Knipe impartial?] I am not in the habit of interrupting hon. Members, and I hope they will permit me to proceed without interruption. The conclusion to which I have arrived on reading the whole Report is, that a double duty is thrown upon the Executive Government of the country. On the one hand, they have to provide for the temporary suppression of disorder; but on the other, they have the still more arduous, the still more serious and important duty, that of attempting, once more, undeterred by previous failure, the solution of the great agrarian problem, which is at the root, and which is the source, of all Irish discontent. I will say, for my part, I will give no vote to any Government which does not recognize this second—this important duty, as fully, as clearly, and as completely, and does not press forward its prosecution as sincerely as it is inclined to do the other and prior claim to its exertions. Now, Sir, I cannot help glancing at one inference which I am inclined to draw from the Amendment proposed by my right hon. Friend. I gather from that, that it is the opinion of the Liberal Party, or the majority of the Liberal Party, that the most urgent and pressing duty of any Government is to find a solution of the Land Question. Well, I agree with that. I said so some time ago at Birmingham, and, thereupon, I was peremptorily told by the organs of the same majority, that they would not even enter into a discussion on the subject with anyone who was not at the same time prepared to assent to their ideas of general policy on the subject of Home Rule. I am glad that such a controversy is past, and that now, at all events, we are agreed that the most urgent duty of the Liberal Party and of this House is to deal with the Land Question in Ireland. But, Sir, what does the Government tell us on this matter? My hon. Friend the Member for East Fife (Mr. Asquith) has a constitutional distrust of Conservative Governments, which, I admit, I think a very proper feeling on his part, and one which I am myself inclined to share. But I should like the House to bear in mind exactly what the Government does tell us, and then to put their own construction upon it. I would say this—even for a Conservative Government—that I think they have been unjustly accused of vagueness with regard to their agrarian programme. How could it be expected that a Government should give a first or second reading exposition of two important Bills on the Land Question on a Motion of Urgency with regard to a subject of a different nature? But they have drawn aside the curtain to some extent, and they have given us indications of their intentions which I myself regard as promises, and in that matter I am more ingenuous and less sceptical than my hon. Friend. I find that the Government say, or I understand them to say—and they will contradict me if I am wrong—that they propose immediately to bring in a Bill to deal with a matter of the utmost importance and urgency. I understand that they intend to deal with the case of leaseholders, a class which includes no less than 160,000 tenants in Ireland, whose case, I am sorry to say, a Liberal Government has always refused to recognize. I am glad that the pressure of circumstances has brought home conviction to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I have no doubt some of the same circumstances will be found also to have brought conviction home to my right hon. Friends around me. Well, but the Government propose to do something much more important than that. If there is one scandal worse than another at the present time, it is the evictions for the enforcement of unjust rents. I understand that the Government propose to deal with these evictions, and to make it impossible for a landlord to evict a tenant upon an unjust rent. [Interruption, and cries of "The first time we have heard of it!"] An hon. Member says it is the first time he has heard of it. There are none so deaf as those who will not hear. I understand that the Government propose to deal with this matter in the way I have described. I understand that they propose to allow no evictions without an appeal to a Court which will have equitable jurisdiction upon it. ["No, no!"] Let the Government contradict me if I am wrong. I understand that they propose there should be this equitable jurisdiction, and that if it is proposed to evict a tenant, in a case where the rent is shown to be excessive or unfair, or where the arrears are excessive or unfair, the Court will have power to impose a composition upon the landlord. If I have rightly described the intentions of the Government, I say that it is absurd—that there is no excuse for saying that any Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Law would be a Bill to enable unjust landlords to evict for excessive and unfair rents. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, in his speech to-night, said that the crime in Ireland was due to the attempt to secure a reduction of rent. I should not have said that myself. I should have said that crime in Ireland was due to the attempt to carry out the programme of the Convention of Chicago, to make the government of Ireland by a British Parliament impossible. If I am wrong, if it be as my right hon. Friend says, then I say that this Bill which, as I understand, the Government intend to introduce, will cut the ground from under the feet of the Opposition, and make it impossible that crime should exist which is due to the attempt to secure reduction of rent where rent is excessive. But the Government propose something further than that—oh, I understand more. [Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Read!] I find all that I understand in the text. I have found it in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I have no other authority, and I unfortunately did not hear his speech; but I can read, and I have read it again and again, and I understand from that speech that the right hon. Gentleman has given a pledge to the House that this Bill will be introduced immediately in the House of Lords. [Laughter.] I should have thought that hon. Gentlemen would have been glad of that announcement. I know that, in my experience of agrarian legislation for Ireland, our difficulty has been in the House of Lords, and if that difficulty is overcome there is very good hope that no difficulty will remain in this House. Sir, the Government have pledged themselves to introduce this Bill in the House of Lords. As soon as that has been done, we shall all be aware of its provisions. I hope that it will be pressed forward there. I hope something else—something that I have not seen in the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland—I hope that when it comes down to this House it will be possible to press it here to a second reading before the Criminal Law Amendment Bill leaves the House. But the Government have said something more than that. I really feel that I am working a mine for the benefit of the House. All this solid gold appears to have passed unseen. [Laughter.] Oh, but it is there! From the same speech I understand that the Government propose as soon as the two Bills—the Criminal Law Amendment Bill and that dealing with leaseholders and other Amendments of the Land Act—have been passed, to introduce a Bill for what they hope may be a final settlement of the Land Question. They do not tell us more about it than this—that it will be a Bill for abolishing the dual ownership of land. Thereupon some of my sceptical Friends—

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): We are not your friends here.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Gentleman is much too hasty. I assure him I did not allude to him; but some of my hon. Friends who are rather sceptical have said with regard to this statement, that they are convinced that no Bill can be introduced for doing away with the dual ownership of land that will not put a tremendous risk upon the British taxpayer, and that they are pledged to oppose. Well, so am I. All I can say is, that if this Bill which is promised us contains any undue or improper risk to the British taxpayer, my hon. Friends will find me in the same Lobby with them in opposition to it. But I do not believe that that is necessary, and I am confirmed in my opinion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who, in a speech which he made the other night at the house of an hon. Member, said himself that he had come to the conclusion that although his proposal, which in the opinion of some of us proposed a risk to the British taxpayer, would have been perfectly safe, yet he was inclined to believe that there was a better and more admirable way by which that risk can be avoided. I hope the Government will find it, and if that be so, then I hope my hon. Friends who now hesitate will be prepared with me to give it their heartiest support. I notice that my hon. Friends do not cheer that statement. I am afraid they are not inclined to support a Conservative Government, even in proposals which are thoroughly approved as in accordance with Liberal principles, and in accordance with the Liberal programme? That is what I understand to be the state of the intentions of the Government as presented to us by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Now, Sir, if the discussions upon the two first Bills to which I have referred occupy only a reasonable space of time, in my opinion there ought to be no difficulty whatever in dealing with the whole of this great subject during the present Session. That is a matter which is in the hands of the House. Hon. Members below the Gangway might prevent the solution of the Land Question. I am not protesting against reasonable discussion. I only say that if the discussion is lengthened unreasonably, the responsibility will lie with those who take that course. Now, I ask the hon. Member for East Fife whether, under these circumstances—if the Government accept the description I have given of their policy—he is entitled to ask for more at this stage, even from a Conservative Government? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in introducing his Amendment, based his opposition upon the precedent which he quoted as to the action of Lord John Russell in 1846. But, surely, my right hon. Friend spoke before the announcement of the Government was made. Surely he will admit that that answer is a complete acceptance of the principle that Lord John Russell sought to establish. What did Lord John Russell propose? He proposed to refuse urgency to the Government, unless they would produce, at the same time, their remedial legislation. But the Government are prepared to introduce their remedial measures. I say that it is an unworthy quibble to deny that the Government are prepared not only to produce, but to carry their remedial measure at the same time as their measure for the Amendment of the Criminal Law in Ireland. But I confess that I should prefer to rely upon a later precedent; which does not commit the right hon. Gentleman because he was not at the time a Member of the Government, and I do not think that he was even a Member of this House. We have heard a great deal of the precedent of 1881; but I think myself that that of 1882 is much more applicable to our present situation. I quote that precedent, not in support of the claim for urgency, because as to that, as I have already said, urgency for Irish affairs is conceded by all—but in regard to the priority or order of our legislation. In 1882, the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) brought in his Bill for the Prevention of Crimes in Ireland; and, in doing so, he said that he founded it, not upon the then recent terrible events—the assassination in Phoenix Park, or the murder of Mrs. Smythe, or other similar outrages, though all these were in the mind of the Government—but on the fact of the existence of secret societies and illegal combinations in Ireland. But the hon. Member for East Fife has asked what secret societies are now in existence in Ireland. If he knew all about those societies, they would be no longer secret. Anyone who is in communication with the Irish police will know that a great number of secret societies and of illegal combinations are still in existence. No one will deny that there are unlawful combinations in Ireland; and, therefore, the case now is the same as the case upon which my right hon. Friends in the Government of which I was a Member founded their claim for the Bill for the Prevention of Crime. But the parallel goes much further than that. At that time the serious grievance in Ireland was the existence of large arrears which had not been dealt with by the late Government. It was admitted by the Government, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that thousands and tens of thousands of tenants were threatened with eviction from their holdings, and consequent destitution, unless an Arrears Bill could be passed. That was admitted; and yet the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member brought in the Prevention of Crimes Bill first. They produced the Arrears Bill while the Crimes Bill was going on. They did not introduce it in the House of Lords, for the very good reason that they had not a majority in that House. They refused again and again, in answer to repeated demands, to proceed with it pari passu with the Prevention of Crimes Bill, and they refused to interrupt the Committee stage of the latter, in order to pass the Arrears Bill. I remember the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian appealing again and again to hon. Members below the Gangway to limit the discussion upon the Prevention of Crimes Bill, on the ground that, by carrying it to great length, they were delaying the passing of the Arrears Bill. I say, therefore, that the circumstances of the case are precisely parallel—only the positions are reversed. Then we asked the Party opposite to give us an opportunity of passing our measures, and now they ask us for a similar opportunity. The hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife and my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle were not parties to the request made. No one can accuse the right hon. Member for Newcastle of inconsistency in this matter. But if I and those who voted with me upon that occasion were to refuse the demand of right hon. Members opposite, we should be inconsistent. In my opinion, we ought to deal out to others the same measure as was dealt out to ourselves. I have said that my right

hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle is untrammelled by the proceedings of 1882; but I would like to press upon him to consider further another portion of the Report of the Royal Commission which deals with the question of the maintenance of order, and is to be found on page 18 of the Report. It is as follows:—

“That, whilst recommending certain changes in the law which circumstances have rendered necessary for the present relief of the tenants, it is right that we should press, in the interests of all classes, the maintenance of law and order, which has, in several parts of the country, been grievously outraged. In the absence of that security, which ought to be enjoyed in every civilized community, capital is discouraged and enterprise and industry checked, and it is impossible that any country can thrive, or any healing measure be devised which can add to its prosperity.”

[“Hear, hear!”] My right hon. Friend cheers the statement. I knew he would agree. The conclusion I draw from it, is that no reform and no remedial measures we can propose, or this House can pass, would have a chance of success so long as the National League is supreme, so long as the unwritten law is superior to the law of the land. Just again let us see what are the lessons of experience. We tried conciliation; we tried the absence of any restrictive or exceptional measures. When we came into Office in 1880, we were pressed to renew the Peace Preservation Act; but we thought it better to rely on the generosity and good sense of the Irish people, and those who were leading them. We refused to renew that Act. What was the consequence? In a few short months the state of Ireland got so bad that the Government were bound to bring in a Bill infinitely more stringent than the Peace Preservation Act, and to carry it through and put it into operation. And when it came to putting it into operation, we hesitated and halted—and I think rightly—to put that Act into operation until we had passed a remedial Act—which I now admit to be a failure, but which was then heralded with great hopes, and which was looked upon by the Irish tenants as an unparalleled boon. It was not until we had passed that Act—until we found it would be a dead letter, in consequence of the action of the advisers of the Irish people—that we were forced to take stronger measures, and it would never have had a fair chance if the Land League had not been proclaimed and its leaders put in prison. That is history. I am not commenting upon it; it is within the knowledge of all those Members of the House who were in the House at the time I am speaking of. After we had put that Act in force, no doubt the Land Act had a fair trial. But since then, two Land Purchase Acts have been passed. I do not think they are good Acts, and I am not sorry they have failed. I object to them, not because they are not favourable to the Irish tenants—for they are more favourable to the tenant than any legislation passed in this, or any other country—but they are unfavourable to the English taxpayer. They have been failures, chiefly on account of the advice given to the tenants, and especially because of the interference of the National League. They interposed between what the tenants would have wished to do if they had been free men, and what they have actually done. And that is proved by the fact that in Ulster, where I believe there is much less readiness on the part of the landlords to sell, the number of applications to purchase on the part of the tenants has nearly equalled that from the whole of the rest of Ireland. I say, then, that I do not believe any remedial legislation which the Government can propose has a chance, unless the authority of law and order is at the same time restored. And I say, also, that I believe the Government will not fulfil its duty unless, while it protects the tenants, as it is bound to do, and as I understand it intends to do, it also takes measures to protect honest men against the tyranny of those who are dishonest. Well, Sir, I am afraid that the opinions which I have expressed are rather unpopular with the majority of the Liberal Party. I am content on this occasion to be in the minority. It is a very respectable minority, and at one time or another it has included every man who sits on the Bench beside me. I do not blame them in the least, if they think that circumstances have arisen which justify them in changing their opinions. I hope they will not blame me if I choose to stick to mine. I have said every man on this Bench—I believe without exception—

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: I do not admit it.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle challenges me. It would take too long—I should exhaust the patience of the House—if I endeavoured to prove my case in reference to every one of my Colleagues. However, I will accept the challenge of my right hon. Friend; but, before that, I want to deal with a still more prominent Member of the Party. I want to quote to the House a passage from a speech made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), a passage which I take not in the least with the object of inferring any inconsistency on his part, but because I believe it states the principle upon which hitherto the Liberal Party has always acted, and to which I, at all events, still give in my allegiance. Speaking in the debate on the Prevention of Crimes Bill of 1882, and replying to an appeal made to him by the hon. Member who then sat for Sligo, but who now represents West Belfast, my right hon. Friend said—

“I was coming to the observations of the hon. Member for Sligo, to the effect that we ought to have only one article in our political creed, and that article should be conciliation; and he went on to speak of that article of conciliation as rather one of justice. Sir, I quite agree with the hon. Member; the article of justice satisfies me perfectly; but I must remind the hon. Member that it means justice to all and to everyone. Unfortunately, this includes the use of force for the punishment of evil-doers, and the praise of all who do well. If the hon. Gentleman asks me whether I place my reliance chiefly upon force, or on what he has termed conciliation, I answer him that I place my reliance undoubtedly upon the removal of the causes of discontent infinitely more than upon mere force. But, Sir, this is also a necessary part of our duty which cannot be overlooked. The hon. Gentleman says—and here again I agree with him—we must show the people that the law is their protector and helper, and trust to our showing this to bring them to the side of law. I agree; but then I must show that to all sections of the people, and among these I am bound not least to show it to those who, during the last autumn and winter especially, have suffered most cruelly for not only the exercise of their legal rights, but for the performance of their legal and personal duties.”

Sir, I agree with every word of that. I agree now, as I agreed then, with what my right hon. Friend said, and I rely, as he did, chiefly upon remedial legislation as a cure—as the only cure—for the discontent of Ireland. Not the less do I hold it to be the duty of any Government, as it was the duty of our Government, to protect those who stand in need of protection. Protect the tenants by all means against the rapacity of landlords and against the exaction of excessive rents; but protect also those poor men, the Curtins, the Byers, and the Murphys, protect them also against the assassination and outrage with which they are threatened by those whose unwritten law is superior to the law of the land. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle has challenged me. I have a quotation from his utterances also, and I am quite sure from the cheers—the somewhat derisive cheers—with which he has occasionally greeted me during my remarks, that he will not back one iota from the declarations I am about to read. This was written in November, 1881—

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I should like to know whether this was an article actually written by me? I think that is only reasonable.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I quite agree with my right hon. Friend that his demand is extremely reasonable. I should not have quoted the passage, which appeared in The Pall Mall Gazette, and which from internal evidence I should myself have been inclined to identify with my right hon. Friend, if it had not already appeared in a life of the right hon. Gentleman which was published by Mr. Stead, who was his colleague and successor in the administration of The Pall Mall Gazette. I will read it, and then my right hon. Friend will know whether he will accept it. What he is reported to have said is this—

“On the other hand, if great social disorder has spread over a country from whatever cause, every Government, exactly because it is a Government, is bound to do its utmost to restore order temporarily, even while it is removing the more permanent causes which have made disorder natural and justifiable.”

[MR. JOHN MORLEY: Hear, hear!] My right hon. Friend, I see, recognizes and owns the passage, and, as I anticipated, he does not go back one jot from his utterances in 1881. I would like to know what is the difference between the course which he suggested to an imaginary Government in 1881 and the course which the present Government is pursuing? My right hon. Friend went on to say—and I call particular attention to these words—

“It would be a singular confession of the impotency of Liberalism as a practical theory of politics, if it were found to forbid its professors to deal effectually with outbreaks of popular violence and opposition to the ordinary work of police.”

I call special attention to this passage, because I hold that if Liberalism ever becomes identified with lawlessness, it will lose its hold on the popular feeling. Since the extension of the franchise, we have been living under a system of democratic government. I think I read that my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) said the other day that no democratic Government would impose coercion on a democratic nation. I do not know what he meant by a democratic nation; but if he meant that no democratic Government would use force to vindicate the law, then I differ from him altogether. I always have held that a democratic Government in this country, as in other countries, would be a very strong Government, because it would rest on public opinion, and would not depend upon the will and the prejudices of individuals or of classes; and I believe that the masses in this country have no sympathy with anarchy, no love for disorder. They have shown in other countries, and notably in the United States, that they can repress it with a sternness which autocratic Governments might envy. So I say, in conclusion, in the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, that if social disorder prevails, Government is bound to do its utmost temporarily to restore the authority of the law, and if, at the same time, it produces to the country and presses forward to the utmost of its power its remedial legislation, I believe the vast majority of the people will support and approve its action.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Sir, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has delivered a speech founded on what I may call the minor key, doubtless owing to the great secrets with which he is charged. A great responsibility seems to rest upon him as the mouthpiece of the Tory Government. The right hon. Gentleman does not now feel himself able to indulge, with the same freedom, in that rancour which he was formerly accustomed to indulge in—before he became one of the choice supporters of a Conservative Administration. He has told us of some very wonderful secrets. Everyone says there is a good deal of gold in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour). I have read that speech, but I have found no gold in it whatever; and I have heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), and I find gold there, but with a slight touch of Brummagem about it, because, having the curiosity to turn to the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, I find in it wonderful things which are amplified by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham into the extraordinary promises which he has just made. Here is an extract taken from The Times newspaper, and the passage has not been contradicted by the right hon. Gentleman—

"The first Bill will not alter, and does not profess to alter, profoundly the system established in 1881; but we think it will make the working of that system more smooth, more equitable, and more beneficial to all concerned in Irish agriculture. The Bill, among other things, will deal with leases, and give to the tenant some equitable relief such as was given to debtors in the Bankruptcy Act of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham."

That is to say, that they will bring in a Land Purchase Bill. That is the entire of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. And how is it that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who boasts that he is not in the secrets of the Irish Chief Secretary, can tell us exactly what it is the Government are going to produce? We have had a promise to-night from the right hon. Gentleman who speaks as the mouthpiece of the Government—who can easily repudiate what he says, because they are not bound to know the statements he has made by a sort of officious authority—that the Government are going to pass an Act which will be in character almost the same as the Bill proposed last year by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). The statement of the right hon. Gentleman is not repudiated by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and we do not see the eloquent and Jove-like nod of the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) in denial—nodding being the right hon. Gentleman's most eloquent attitude. We have not had from him a single denial that these were the proposals of the Government. What are they? In the first instance, it is proposed to pass into law a provision enabling tenants to claim equitable consideration of the Court when in arrear; and, secondly, that if the Court considers the rent to be too high, they shall not be evicted. If you propose to enable men's rents to be reduced when the only remedy for the non-payment of rent is eviction—if you propose to enable the Judge to say—"The rent shall not be paid; I will give you equitable relief;" what is that but to enforce by a side wind the Act of 1881? I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that question, who interrupted with so much fervour the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham used this to allure his Radical Unionist Friends across the desert of Coercion, stating, at the same time, that he relied on the precedent of the Act of 1882, and not on the Act of 1881. I will take the right hon. Gentleman at his word, and I ask hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway to press on the right hon. Gentleman adhesion to the Act of 1882. His speech to-night was a very wary and technical one. What was the principle of the Act of 1882, and what is the principle of the Government to-day? The complaint is that we refuse them the whole time of the House. Yes; because we do not know what the proposals of the Government are. Let it be remembered that the Government ask for the time of the House before anyone knows what is the nature of their proposals. We know that, by the aid of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and others, they intend to pass a Coercion Bill for Ireland; but we do not know that they have it in their power to pass either here or in the House of Lords any remedial legislation. What was the position in 1882? Everyone knows the dreadful and terrible event which gave such a momentum to the Government to pass the Crimes Act of that year—the unhappy murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, in the Phoenix Park, on the 6th of May. Well, on the 11th of May the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby

(Sir William Harcourt) brought in his Crimes Bill. No time of the House was asked for before that Bill was introduced. The Arrears Bill was then introduced, and the Crimes Bill having been read the first time on Thursday, the Arrears Bill was read the first time on the following Monday. And when did the Government ask for the full time of the House and urgency for their Bill? Let it be remembered that on the 11th and 15th of May the House had before them the full proposals of the Government, coercive and remedial. It was not until both Bills had been read a second time, and received the approval of the House, that the full time of the House was asked for by the Government, and they did not do that until the 23rd of May; nor did they ask then, as they are asking now, that the House should discuss coercion alone. On the 23rd of May the Government moved that urgency should be accorded to the remaining stages of the Crimes Bill and the Arrears Bill. This was a totally different state of things from that relied upon by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; so that when the Unionist Party was asked by the right hon. Gentleman to give their adhesion to these Government proposals on the strength of the precedent of 1882, the state of facts belonging to 1882 was carefully concealed from them. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman to-night was extremely adroit, and, for him, of an extremely moderate character. His position was this—you must restore law and order before you attempt anything like remedial legislation; and one of his great arguments in favour of giving the Government the whole time of the House was that the great secret societies of the last few years are still in active existence. If all the great secret societies are still in existence, it is a very poor tribute to the effectiveness of the Coercion Acts which have been passed for Ireland. If it be true that, in spite of the 87 Coercion Acts passed in this country, and in spite of the stringent measure passed when Lord Spencer was in Ireland in 1882, all the great secret societies are still in existence, I ask what hope have you that, by passing another Coercion Act, you can put down crime and agitation and secret societies in Ireland in the future? We have had put into the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham the exact intentions of the Government; and all the speeches that have come from the Government side of the House to-night have dealt with crime and disorder in Ireland as the reason for granting the demand of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman has said—"You cannot have peace in Ireland so long as the National League maintains uncontrolled sway in that country." So now you have it for the first time, on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman, that this Bill is practically aimed at the National League. I have no objection to the suppression of the National League. I would have been delighted last autumn if the Government had suppressed it then. I would be delighted if the first thing done, if this Bill becomes law, were the suppression of the National League. Its suppression will relieve us of a great deal of responsibility. We have been obliged to strain every nerve, and make every effort to keep that extraordinary organization within the strictest limits of legality; and, although United Ireland has for months published in the fullest manner every resolution of the National League, touching the most vital matter of the lives of the peasantry—although those resolutions have been published week after week, not one of them has been challenged on the ground of illegality. Suppress the National League, and we shall no longer be responsible for what is going on in Ireland; and we shall be no longer able to keep the people themselves in check. I was really disappointed and regretful that the first step of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland was not the suppression of that body; and, therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham makes his attack on the National League, and says that the Government Bill is intended to deal with that organization, I say that I rejoice to hear it. I say that I rejoice that we are to be relieved of the responsibility of conducting the agrarian movement in Ireland; but let me tell the Government that these people will conduct it for themselves. The right hon. Gentleman does not like the National League now, as it speaks through its open and published resolutions, but he will like it still less when, after its suppression, it speaks in a very different tone, and when the uncontrolled, and perhaps uncontrollable peasants of Ireland, suffering under the smart of eviction, come face to face with the calamities in which they believethat this Bill will involve them. I say it is lamentable that this House should be legislating for a state of things in Ireland of which those who instigate this legislation are themselves in a state of unhappy and deplorable ignorance. Suppress the National League, and who will be more delighted than hon. Members on my right and left? Then, Sir, you will, for the first time, be dealing, not with politicians, but with a very different class of persons, and those secret organizations which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham tells us are still in force, notwithstanding Lord Spencer's Act, notwithstanding the Crimes Act and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, will be augmented in a way of which he has very little conception. The right hon. Gentleman does not know where he is going; our words and advice were unheard and unheeded in 1881 and 1882, and they will be so to-day. Why were the secret organizations which the right hon. Gentleman says are still in existence not suppressed? Because you did not deal with the roots of the disorder; they will continue to spread, and our unfortunate countrymen will be prejudiced by these miserable crimes, but they will be prejudiced when we are no longer responsible for Order in Ireland, and when the responsibility of all the blood spilt will rest on the head of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and his Colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has dwelt upon the evidence given before the Royal Commission, and he mentioned that Commission as if it were a body that had our fullest confidence. He did not even mention the name of Mr. Knipe; but he left us to understand that the Commission reported unanimously. Before I go to the character of the Royal Commission let me say that in my opinion, no more disgraceful attempt to debase public opinion was ever made than by the appointment of that Commission. It did not possess one element of authority, so far as its Members went. It was presided over by Lord Cowper, who was associated with Mr. Forster in signing warrants for the arrest of suspects; there was Lord Milltown, one of the most malevolent and persistent rack-renters in Ireland, who spends his time in the House of Lords drafting Amendments to all the beneficial measures sent up from this House with regard to Ireland; there were Mr. Neligan, a landlord of the worst type; Sir James Caird, a Scotch gentleman of considerable authority—perhaps the most respectable element of the Commission—besides a Protestant and Liberal Unionist, who opposed the return of Mr. Thomas Dickson when he stood for Mid Armagh. So that we had not a single friend on that Commission. Of witnesses summoned, there was not one out of 20 on the popular side; and if you read the evidence, you will see that every one of the questions addressed to the witnesses was that of a packed tribunal. The evidence taken is confined to that of magistrates, policemen, and land-grabbers, whose names are not given, and men connected with the landlord system in Ireland—land agents and landlords. And it is upon the evidence taken by that Commission, upon the verdict of that packed jury, which is given in favour of the Irish tenants, that the Government are proceeding. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham relies on the Report of the Cowper Commission, and the evidence taken before that Commission, he should be the first to insist on the Report being carried out in its entirety; and the first thing he ought to do is to insist on the reduction of the term of judicial rents from 15 years to five years. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland says he will not have that; but I wonder if he remembers what he said on the Land Act of 1881? In that year the right hon. Gentleman said that 15 years was too long; but it is not too long now. On the 20th June, as will be seen by Hansard, vol. 252, p. 190, he had an Amendment on the Paper in favour of restricting the term to 10 years; but now, even upon the recommendation of his own Commission, he will not assent to the reduction of the term to five years. The right hon. Gentleman says he is not in favour of the reduction of the term, because the real remedy lies in a system of peasant proprietorship. But what did he say about that in 1881? According to Han- sard, page 1611, he said, with regard to peasant proprietors, that, although he doubted the economic advantages of the system, he believed it would be politically advantageous, on the principle that if legislation was to be carried on under mob dictation in the interests of justice, it was well, in the interests of the nation, to have a mob on both sides. That was the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman in 1881; and now he tells us that the Bill of the Government is not a Bill in favour of the landlords, but one for restoring law and order in Ireland. Sir Redvers Buller says there is very little law in Ireland, and that what there is is on the side of the rich. I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham if he is prepared, under this Bill, to repay the money to the Irish tenants of which they have been robbed for many years past according to the decisions of the legal tribunals. Two of the chief supporters of the Bill are Gentlemen who waited on Lord Salisbury the other day; and it is to their intervention that we are told a great deal of the stringency of the Bill is owing. The names of these gentlemen appear in the Return of rents judicially reduced. I find on the estate of the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Tottenham) that three or four months ago there were the following reductions of rent:—From £8 to £3 15s.; £7 8s. to £3 15s.; £6 12s. to £3; £17 17s. to £6 10s.; £47 10s. to £20. Will the right hon. Gentleman introduce into this Bill a provision that the hon. Member for Winchester shall give back to his unfortunate tenants the money of which he has been robbing them? Will he have the same regard for the Macintyres, the Rooneys, and others, as he has for the Murphys, the Byerses, and the Curtins? Again, one of the advisers of the Government whose name appears in the Return is a gentleman named King-Harman, with whom the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham will go into the Lobby to-morrow evening. Woeful tears have been wept by the right hon. Gentleman over the fate of Byers, Curtin, and Murphy, and no one condemns the atrocious crimes perpetrated in their case more than I do, but let me tell the right hon. Gentleman that these were crimes committed by ignorant peasants who have never had the advantage of listening to the speeches delivered in this House by the right hon. Gentleman; they are men who have not had a liberal education such as has been enjoyed by the two Gentlemen I have named. I know not whence these peasants got their education; they may have read something in The Times in praise of men like Stepniak, Gallenga, and Mazzini, and they may have read that the liberty of nations is to be worked out with knives and hatchets. But I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will shed tears over the fate of the men who have been robbed by these educated dragoons for generations. Here is another list of reductions that have been made:—Old rent, £13, judicial rent, £7 5s.; old rent, £7 10s., judicial rent, £4 4s.; old rent, £18 9s., judicial rent, £10; old rent, £30, judicial rent, £16 10s.; old rent, £9 9s. 4d., judicial rent, £4 10s.; old rent, £12 10s. 8d., judicial rent, £6; old rent, £12 6s. 8d., judicial rent, £6 5s.; old rent, £13 14s., judicial rent, £6; old rent, £30, judicial rent, £16 10s.; and so on ad infinitum. Well, Sir, I hope that the first use these Pat Fords and others make of the reduction of their rents will not be to send a contribution to the dynamite fund. The men on whose estates these reductions have been made are the companions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; these are the Gentlemen with whom he will co-operate in the Lobby in promoting a Bill for the coercion of men who, Sir Redvers Buller declares, have no law on their side, while he says, at the same time, that such law as there is is altogether on the side of the rich. This Commission has made proposals which are to be acted upon. It has made proposals against Boycotting and intimidation; but its proposals on that point are not unanimous, because the only Member who can profess to have anything like a popular character, Mr. Knipe, entirely dissents from the Report. Mr. Knipe is not a Nationalist; he is an Ulster man, he is a Presbyterian, he is a Unionist, he is a disciple of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. But Mr. Knipe is an Irishman. Mr. Knipe knows his country just as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham knows his. We do not, however, admit, that the right hon. Gentleman knows ours. Mr. Knipe declares that any Coercion Bills you may pass must fail; and he dissents from the Report of the majority of the Commission. He dissents altogether from the proposals which have been made for enforcing coercive legislation. Now, on what leg does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham stand? If he is in favour of the Cowper Report, he must be in favour of it in its entirety. Lord Milltown, a Tory Peer, is the only dissident to the proposal with regard to the official term. I ask right hon. Gentlemen what is the use of appointing a Royal Commission if you will not act upon its recommendations? Last August, you refused to pass the Bill of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork; but, in the words of the noble lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), after immense consideration, you determined to appoint a Royal Commission. What is the good of piling up evidence and getting up Blue Books, if you will not act upon what the Commission recommends? It would appear that all you desire is to find employment for printers and shorthand writers. It is absurd for the Government to appoint a Commission in August and when it reports in the February following, to refuse to carry out what it proposes. I venture to say that the refusal of the Government to put in force the recommendations of the Royal Commission had much more to do with the resignation of the late Irish Chief Secretary (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) than his eyes, which I hope are better. That right hon. Gentleman has had a considerable experience of Ireland, he knows the necessities of the country, he found it necessary to delay the making of the Report of the Royal Commission. The Report was delayed. It was declared in the newspapers that Lord Cowper had several interviews of a long and important character with the right hon. Gentleman. When the Commissioners made their Report, it was found that in the Cabinet there was not unanimity with respect to the proposals the Commissioners made. I am not surprised that that should be the case. There are some Gentlemen in the Cabinet and in the Government who have been already hard hit by the Land Act of 1881. There is the Abercorn family, for instance, and I certainly am not surprised that the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) should refuse to give his consent to any measure which would involve a further slice off the rents of the Abercorn property. Well, Sir, that being so, unanimity was found impossible in the Cabinet, and therefore the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland resigned. Now, what is the remedy the Government suggest. They discover, for the first time, that a great want of Ireland is agrarian legislation. The Irish people have been crying in the wilderness on this subject for years and years. Ever since the Devon Commission we have been telling you this, and it appears that now, for the first time, we have succeeded in awakening your conscience. As I understand him, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham does not believe the Government can pass their coercive legislation, but he will support them in producing it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: In the preliminary step.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman expressed no hope whatever that they would be able to pass their coercion. I will tell him why they will not. I think the words of the right hon. Gentleman were "in producing it," and not "in passing it." [MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No.] I may be mistaken, and, of course, I accept his correction.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: As the hon. Gentleman appeals to me, perhaps I may be allowed to put him right at once. What I said was that I hoped and believed that if the discussion of these two Bills were confined within reasonable limits, the whole of the subject, including the Purchase Bill, would be successfully dealt with during the present Session.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If this Session succeeds in settling the Irish Question, it certainly will be a memorable year. Well, Sir, let me point out why I have some philosophic doubts as to the possibility of the Irish Question, or of even the Irish Purchase Question, being successfully settled in the present Session. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is reported, in all the newspapers, to have had frequent breakfasts, dinners, and teas with the Irish Chief Secretary, and to be himself the parent of the measure. He allows it to be stated, whether truly or untruly, that the measure is one for which he is largely responsible; that the scheme is, in fact, his notion. He has to-night told us some further particulars; because he says it must be a scheme that will not involve the Imperial credit. I should like very much to see the Irish landlords compelled to sell their lands to the tenants on any security that will not pledge the Imperial credit. I will give them my own note of hand, if they like to take it, and I am sure that the entire Party of 86 Irish Nationalists will back the Bill. But I would like to know how the right hon. Gentleman proposes to compel astute Gentlemen such as the Member of the Abercorn family, and the Financial Secretary to the War Department (Mr. Brodrick), who spoke yesterday, the son of an Irish Peer, to part with their estates upon any other terms than those involving the Imperial credit; because it must be remembered that you cannot, or, I suppose, you will not, force the Irish landlords to sell their property. I imagine that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh (Colonel SAUNDERSON) were forced to sell his valuable property on open security, he would call out his reserves in the Orange brigade, having threatened civil war, as I understand, on much slenderer grounds. I imagine it will require a very stringent Coercion Bill to induce the hon. and gallant Gentleman to sell his estates in Cavan upon the security, say, of the Cavan Board of Guardians—[Colonel SAUNDERSON nodded assent.]—the hon. and gallant Gentleman bears me out in that—or even of the Cavan Grand Jury. The hon. and gallant Member does not dissent to the security of the Cavan Grand Jury. He appears to have rather more faith in them; but I should like the hon. and gallant Gentleman to say whether he will take the security of the rates on the faith of the Cavan Grand Jury, for upon neither of the local bodies in existence will the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh accept security. Well, Sir, what other local institution have we in Ireland, except it be the poor-house. There are the police and the lunatic asylums, and certainly, Sir, as yet, the hon. and gallant Gentleman has never attempted to qualify for membership of the latter institution. Is it not preposterous for the Government to invite this House to pass a Coercion Bill which they know will pass current in this House, and in the House of Lords, on the faith of some paulo post futurum measure, which will be knifed in this House, and which will have no chance of passing the golden gates of "another place?" No people have a greater appreciation of the value of pounds, shillings, and pence than the Gentlemen in ermine across the Lobby. No local guarantees will do for them. They want the chink of the current coin; and, that being so, I invite hon. Gentlemen of the Unionist persuasion, who believe in the possibility of remedial legislation for Ireland, to remember that the passing of this measure is inevitable, but that the passing of any remedial legislation is of a most hazy and doubtful character. One is current coin, and the other is composed of Brummagem metal. I, therefore, think that the least we can ask of the Government under circumstances such as these is, that they should show us exactly what is in their Budget before they ask us to buy a pig in a poke. We are asked to give them the whole of the time of the House, not for the twin proposals of remedy and restriction or coercion, but for coercion alone. Is it to be wondered at that we, who are not favoured with invitations to dinners from the Irish Chief Secretary, should demur to giving the Government the time they ask until we know exactly what the intentions of the Government are? The Government of 1882, as I have pointed out over and over again, passed the second readings of both their measures—their measures for coercion and for remedy—before asking for the time of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has appealed to that precedent, and so do we. We are prepared to abide by it. It is absurd to attempt to entrap us, and get us into Chancery by the promise that, when the coercive proposals of the Government are passed, the House will be asked to proceed with remedial legislation. Now that precedents have been cited, why is it that the Government do not choose to follow them? We are told, when we ask for particulars of the crimes that are alleged to have been committed in Ireland, that it is not the volume of the crime, it is not the number of crimes, but it is the character of the crime that requires the passing of this legislation. If the Government had crimes of number or of magnitude we should have heard about them. The greatest crime in their Chamber of Horrors is the Curtin murder, committed in 1885, nearly two years ago, during the régime of Lord Carnarvon. How can that crime do service, or be a momentum for the passing of a Coercion Bill in 1887? Give us something new. Let us have some facts that are connected with the present state of affairs in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, in one of his dramatic flourishes, quoted the case—a deplorable case, it is true—of some girl who was tarred and feathered—no, I beg pardon, whose hair was cut off and her head tarred. I heard of the outrage with horror and abomination, and I believe that if the ruffians could be caught, no punishment that could be inflicted upon them would be too great. But, having attended the Assizes all over Ireland, I have come to be sceptical upon the subject of these outrages. My experience is that, whenever these crimes are brought to the test of examination and inquiry, they shrink to very small proportions indeed. Judging from my experience in watching the trial of criminals in Ireland, short as it has been, I do not hesitate to say that, if the facts connected with this case could be investigated, not by some penny-a-liner of The Times, who visits the district in the company of the Resident Magistrate, but by someone who earnestly desired to arrive at the truth, we should find a very different state of facts indeed. Remember this, Moonlighters do not go about with pots of tar. Do not suppose for one moment that in the wilds of Kerry there is tar at hand with which people can commit crimes of this kind. I doubt extremely whether what is alleged to have taken place did take place, and I venture to say that this outrage is altogether a-piece with that other outrage in which it was stated a girl was not tarred, but criminally outraged, and in which—

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: If the hon. and learned Gentleman is referring to me as having given a description of the outrage, I wish to say it is perfectly true. I did give a description of it. I took that description from an address of a priest at the altar, who denounced the outrage and described the circumstances.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Who was it? Was it Canon Griffin?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: A priest.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was it Canon Griffin?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I will give the hon. and learned Gentleman the name subsequently. I was not aware he would ask for it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If it was Canon Griffin, of Millstreet, I can only say I would as soon believe him as Dr. Patton, of The Daily Express. And it is a sad thing to say, but it is undoubtedly the fact, that much of the crime that has arisen in Kerry and in the district of West Cork is owing to the fact that the Bishop of Kerry has entirely lost the political confidence of his people, and that Canon Griffin has set himself with the bitterest hostility against the popular movement. But let me give another reason that may account to the right hon. Gentleman for some of the savagery that exists in that district of the country. Under the régime of the late Mr. W. E. Forster—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was one of his Colleagues—there was a cruel murder committed in Knocknagoe; a young man named Patrick Leary was shot at his own door, and Canon Griffin prevented him from receiving the last decency of Catholic burial, under the plea that he was a Moonlighter. I heard it admitted by the informer O'Connell—who was an agent provocateur of Mr. Forster—on the witness table at Cork, that he had shot this young man out of pure sport. O'Connell was then in Government pay, and was the Captain Moonlight of the district. Leary was the son of the President of the Knocknagoe National League, and O'Connell, who was in the pay of the Government, was examined at the trial, and admitted the murder. On his evidence no less than 70 of the young men of that district—which is at this moment giving you the greatest trouble in Ireland, giving you such trouble, in fact, that you have been obliged to send a Major General down there to quiet it—were arrested, and were kept without trial for a period of 18 months. From week to week, from month to month, from Assizes to Assizes—their trial was postponed. They were kept locked up in separate cells, and were not allowed to speak to one another or communicate with one another. They were denied the newspapers, converse with their friends, and all exercise, except for one hour out of the 24. This was done by the Cabinet of which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) was such a distinguished Member. After these young men had been imprisoned for nearly 18 months, I moved the Adjournment of the House at Question time one day, and called attention to their case, and I then took the train to Cork to be present at the trial of one of them. The next day the Government ordered the release of all but one of these 70 young men, who had been in gaol for 18 months. They allowed them out on their recognizances, and they have never proceeded against them from that day. If you now have Moonlighting and outrage in Kerry, I say some of these gentlemen are on the war-path, taking revenge for the 18 months' solitary confinement you gave them, during which they were denied exercise, except for one hour a-day. This was the result of the legislation that the right hon. Gentleman gave us as part of his policy of legislating for the poor, with respect to which he has made so many speeches, both in this House and in the country. This is part of the seed of the hard work done under his auspices and by his sanction in 1881, and it is to be found in the murder of the unfortunate Murphys, Curtins, and Byrnes, and in the mutilations of cattle, to which he so indignantly refers. I say you cannot arrest a whole people—you cannot arrest all the young men population of a place, keeping them for months and months in prison without trial, denying them the commonest rights of humanity and the commonest comforts which the people of England have a right to, and for the denial of which your newspapers are crying shame on you—you cannot do this without producing the inevitable consequence of reprisals. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was locked up for 18 months, and denied his exercise and his orchids, I venture to think that at the end of that time the speeches he would make at that Table, and the deeds he would do at Birmingham, would be of a very different character from those he now does and advocates. I think they would rather resemble some of the deeds of Mr. Broadhead, who was formerly connected with that thriving and important town. [Cries of "No, no!" and "It was Sheffield!"] Sheffield? Well, I pretend to know as little of England as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham does of Ireland. Do not suppose for a moment that I am ashamed of making any mistakes about England. I know nothing about the country, and I want to know nothing about it. I do not pretend to legislate for it. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not pretend to sufficient knowledge to enable me to legislate for it—put it in that way. That being the state of things with regard to your legislation at that time, I maintain that it has directly produced the evils of which you complain at the present moment. When the Westmeath Act of 1873 was passing through the House, I remember very well reading in the papers, that Mr. Henry Herbert got up in the House and said—

"It is true that Westmeath is very much disturbed; but I represent the Celtic county of Kerry, and in Kerry, as in all Celtic counties, there is not at this moment a single crime, or a single disturbance."

He declared, speaking in 1873, that they only had disturbances in counties such as Westmeath and Tipperary, where the English blood predominated; but in Celtic counties, such as Kerry, there was absolutely no crime. What made the crime in Kerry—what has produced it? Why is it that at the present time your legislation is directed to the suppression of outrage? It is because Lord Kenmare has insisted on building his great mansion there, and on having for handles to his doors the backs of Louis Quatorze watches; while in the surrounding neighbourhood are dwellings for the people as miserable as any huts human beings could possibly live in. It is because, cheek by jowl with Lord Kenmare's magnificent castle, adorned and equipped with all the luxuries and artistic embellishments that wealth can procure, are the miserable pigsties of the men Lord Kenmare and his crowd have been robbing for years. How does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham propose to remedy that state of things?

Will he take from the handles of the doors of Lord Kenmare's mansion the backs of the Louis Quatorze watches? Will he put back into the pockets of the tenants around the Lakes of Killarney and on the mountains of Kerry the balance of the judicial rents of which they have been robbed? Will he do any of those things which Sir Redvers Buller, with his great experience, declares to be necessary? No, Sir; the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham will do nothing of the sort. His only course is to vote for proposals to enable the law to be still more stringently enforced in Kerry by gentlemen of the type of Captain Plunkett, by gentlemen of the type of the present High Sheriff, Mr. George Sands, and by gentlemen of the type of the magistrate who the other day, to the horror of Sir Redvers Buller, dismissed the charge against a policeman who had made a brutal assault upon a man. The incident to which I refer was not noticed in The Times, or in the speeches which are brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman; at any rate, he has not alluded to it; but the fact is none the less true that a man who had his head beaten into a pulp by a policeman applied in vain to the local magistrate for redress. It was not until Sir Redvers Buller came down, like another Gordon Pasha—until the man who had been beaten went up to him and showed him his wounds, and asked him if there was to be no justice given to him—it was not until this unfortunate man told Sir Redvers Buller how the charge he had brought against the policeman who had assaulted him had been dismissed, and the policeman had been allowed to go scot-free, that a telegraphic message was sent up to Dublin for another Resident Magistrate—you can get them of all sorts and sizes on application—those who will convict and those who will not convict, who will play sharp or flat, at the will of Her Majesty's Government—it was not, I say, until these things had happened that another Resident Magistrate was sent down, and the unfortunate man who had been wounded by the policeman had the satisfaction of seeing the magistrate who would not listen to his complaint, removed. I have said this incident was not mentioned in The Times. Let me inform the right hon.

Gentleman that The Times has just dismissed from its employment the gentleman who represented it in the South of Ireland, and who gave in its columns the account of the Glenbeigh evictions, and has appointed in his stead the gentleman who gave the account of the outrage on the virtue of a girl in Kerry which never took place. So that when the right hon. Gentleman is again referring to outrages reported in The Times perhaps he will do well to bear these facts in mind. Now, I ask the House is it a reasonable thing for the Government to ask Irishmen to give their assent to proposals such as they are now making? In the first place—as we have been told to-day in the eloquent and impressive speech of the late Prime Minister—they have the bulk of the Liberal Party against them. Then, in the second place, they have five-sixths of the Irish Representatives against them—a thing that they never had before. I tell Gentlemen of the Liberal Party who are still supporting us, and who will continue to support us, according to the pledge of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that whether they succeed in preventing the passage of this coercion measure or whether they fail, our thanks to them will be the same. I tell them, moreover, that whatever law and order may exist in Ireland in the future, after the passage of the Coercion Bill, will be law and order dependent on the knowledge of the necessity of retaining the sympathy of one of the greatest of the English Parties. The reflection that that sympathy is necessary in fighting their political battles will have an enormous effect in restraining even the wildest and most wronged of the peasants in Ireland; and when we are told that we have against us a majority of the English people, I say I do not believe it. I say you did not go to the country on the cry of coercion. You did not carry the country on that cry. ["Yes we did!"] You did not. [An hon. MEMBER: I did.] What is the hon. Gentleman's constituency? I believe he is Secretary to a Civil Lord of the Admiralty ["No!"] Then I hope he will be so before long—he is admirably fitted for the position. I say you did not carry the country on the cry of coercion. You carried it on a totally different issue; and when you tell me that the country is in favour of coercion, I say I take leave to deny it, until the question has been put before the country and the verdict has been given. I tell the Liberal Party under the Leadership of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that their support will be more valuable to the cause of law and order than a score of Coercion Bills. If we have life and breath in Ireland, the action of the Liberal Party will have supplied us with a third lung. The fact that the people of Ireland know they have behind them, in the Amendment before the House, the sense of a great Party will have a greater restraining influence upon them than any "protection" the Government may give. The Government, no doubt, expect to carry their legislation with great precipitancy. Except on their own authority they have given us no declaration to justify it—they have favoured us with no facts or figures to justify their course of action. All the evidence produced is in our favour. If the Blue Book has any effect, it is an effect for us. The Government have not given effect to the evidence in the Blue Book. They should not give countenance to one portion of the Blue Book unless they give countenance to the other; but they have refused to act on that principle. I believe that their intention now is simply to throw dust in the eyes of the English electorate; to mislead English public opinion; to take up the time of the House with the pretence that their legislation for Ireland is necessary in order to facilitate the passage of local government legislation and land legislation for England. They are only anxious to fill up the time of the Session, and this Irish cry is a very good stalking-horse for you to go to the country upon. This Bill will fill up the time of the House perhaps until Whitsuntide. Their Land Bill will then occupy the attention of the House until August; and then you will be able to tell the English constituencies that the state of the Irish Question was such that they had no chance of passing other legislation. This Coercion Bill will pass, perhaps; but no Land Purchase Bill will follow. It is not possible that the landlords would accept such a Bill as would receive the approval of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Would the hon. Gentleman for South Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) accept such a Bill, or the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson)? They would accept no guarantee of a local character that did not give them some Imperial source to draw on. That being so, I say it is disingenuous for the Government to ask this House to give assent to a measure which gives them a certainty of coercion alone, but denies them the hope of ever seeing the recommendations of the Cowper Commission carried into effect. I say that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, while extremely ingenious and technical, will not mislead any Member of his Party into giving their assent to the proposals of the Government until they have insisted upon having those proposals incorporated in full in a measure placed before the House.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I hope that in assenting to the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate, it will be understood that the Government do so in the hope that the House will come to a decision on this Question to-morrow evening.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I hope we are not supposed to agree to that suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. I must protest against the assumption of the right hon. Gentleman that the time of this House, on a debate of this character and importance, involving issues of the greatest moment to Ireland, is to be meted out as if it were so much tape.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 1.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Jackson.)
COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th February], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Bill).

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I am amazed that the Government, who have had weeks and weeks to deal with the objection that I have raised to this Bill, have not taken any steps in the matter. You propose to fuse the Common Pleas Division and the Exchequer Division of the Court with the Queen's Bench Division; but you have made no provision for dealing with the machinery of the Courts and the salaries of the officers. I ask the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, what is to become of the Masters and Clerks, and the machinery of these Courts, in the event of this fusion taking place? I never knew of a Bill of this character being brought forward in so great haste and in so muddled a manner; and I appeal to the House to say that something more is required besides providing for the fusion of the Courts. Certain Judgeships are to be abolished, and the Bill goes on to say that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland may, by Order in Council, direct the fusion to take place between the Courts; but, as I have said, there is no provision whatever for dealing with the officers of the Courts. Is it not absurd that, under the circumstances, there should be no provision for the salaries and pensions of those officers? On the last occasion, I moved the adjournment of this debate, and the Motion was carried. I do not like to have to make that Motion a second time; but at least I must have some assurance from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), who is not enamoured of the Bill, that before we go into Committee the Government will give us some idea of their scheme for dealing with the officers of the Courts in question. It will be seen, from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), that in 1895 he introduced a Bill under which it was estimated that a saving would be effected of £25,000; but the right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal with the officers of the Courts. If this Bill is passed, you will weaken the Court of Appeal by removing from it two Judges. The Court of Appeal in Ireland, up to the time of the appointment of Lord Ashbourne, was one which enjoyed a considerable amount of confidence. Lord Ashbourne was, for a long time, a Member of this House; he never practised, and he appreciated nothing but the position of a politician. Under the law, as it stands, you have the Lord Chief Baron and the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in the Court of Appeal, and now that you propose to merge the two Courts into the Court of Queen's Bench, what is to become of the Court of Appeal? When registration appeals come on, they naturally excite feelings of strong political partizanship, and I say it is to the credit of Lord Ashbourne that, on such occasions, he retires from the Bench, on the ground that he is a political functionary and never takes part in cases relating to the franchise. Well, Sir, you reduce the Court of Appeal in Ireland to two Judges, one of them Mr. Justice Gibbon, a Tory, and the other Mr. Justice Barry, a Whig; and I say that registration cases are now to be left to the decision of a Court in which neither I nor anyone in Ireland has confidence. Although I am opposed in this House to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, I believe, if he were to decide cases of registration, he would give us full measure of justice. But we are not to get him by your arrangement. The Government ought to revert to the Bill which Sir Robert Hamilton caused to be brought forward, which fully and freely dealt with this great subject, and which, if it had become law, would have met this difficulty. The Court of Exchequer enjoys the confidence of the people of Ireland; they believe that when they go into that Court they will get the law, if they have the Queen against them, and that is a very important thing; but you propose, by the action of the Lord Lieutenant and an Order in Council, to merge the Court of Exchequer in the Queen's Bench as soon as the Lord Chief Baron dies. I hope, if that is so, that the Lord Chief Baron will live a long time. I altogether object to having the Court dependent on the signature of Lord Londonderry. That, in my opinion, is a vicious principle. I have no sympathy with the Bill, which deals with this question in a tinkering and obsolete manner, although, of course, I agree that it is necessary to reduce expenditure on the Courts in Ireland, and in that sense we shall vote with the right hon. Gentleman. Further, I am convinced that the Bill does not reflect the genius of the right hon.

and learned Attorney General for Ireland; it would deprive him of an important position, and therefore it is not very likely that he has given his assistance in drafting it. Two months have elapsed in which you could have considered the defects of the Bill, and yet you have not put down a single Amendment to it. I say that Irish Members have no time to come here and make up for the bad workmanship of the draftsman employed by Her Majesty's Government; it is your business, and not ours, and I decline to undertake the remodelling of a Bill that is badly drawn and unsatisfactory in all its provisions. With the proposal to reduce the number of Judges I agree, but with the Bill itself I have not a spark of sympathy.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) says that this Bill contains no provision for dealing with the officers of the Courts of Exchequer and Common Pleas; but I point out that there are at the present time the Act of 1877 and the Act of 1882, under which they can be dealt with. The only difficulty in the way of that would be that the Lord Chancellor and two other Judges would have to consent to the arrangement. As regards the other point to which the hon. and learned Member called attention—namely, the Court of Appeal, there would be five Judges of Appeal—the Lord Chancellor, two ordinary Judges, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls. Inasmuch as the normal number of the Court of Appeal is three, I should think that five Judges would be sufficient for every purpose. I may mention that the late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) stated, when he introduced this Bill, that he intended to put into a Bill to be brought forward towards the end of the Session some other of the clauses that were contained in the Bill originated by his Predecessor. I trust this explanation will facilitate the passage of the Bill.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The last remark of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland induces me to make a suggestion to the Government which, I hope, will be received favourably. I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether, this Bill having been read a second time, when the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair is agreed to, he will not himself introduce in Committee the clauses which were in the Bill brought forward by the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) in 1885, in order to carry out a much-needed reform in the Irish Judicature and make the system completely satisfactory? I shall, of course, proceed with the Amendment of which I have given Notice, with reference to the Irish Judges, and I shall take the opinion of the House upon it; but for the purpose of settling the plan of the Bill, free from all Party bias, I would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to allow the matter to stand over for a fortnight or three weeks.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a great deal in what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) has said; but if I followed out his suggestion I would not be fulfilling the object my Predecessor in Office (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had in introducing this Bill. This Bill was introduced simply in order to meet a present necessity. The Courts of Ireland cannot go on doing their work unless some arrangement is come to within the next two or three weeks. ["Oh!"] I am informed that that is a fact. The House, therefore, has really this choice before them—either I have to follow the example that is invariably followed by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and fill up vacancies as they occur, pending the carrying out of the complete scheme which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has foreshadowed, or else the House must consent to pass, "immediately and without discussion," this fragmentary Bill, in which case the saving which has been alluded to will be effected. It is a matter of perfect indifference to me which course is adopted; it is purely a question for the English taxpayers. Merely as Secretary for Ireland, responsible for the administration of justice in Ireland, I am absolutely indifferent as to which course the House takes. I quite admit that, from the point of view of the reconstitution of the Courts of Law, the larger Bill is the one which ought to be considered and carried by this House. But I ask the House to consider the difficulty in which we are placed. Hon. Members know in what condition the Public Business of the House is. They know that the Government are pledged to bring forward large measures with regard to Ireland. Do hon. Gentlemen suppose that, in the course of the next three weeks, or even in the course of the next three months, there is the slightest chance of passing the large measure which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has described? But I merely rise now to repeat the pledges made by my Predecessor (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). If the House will consent to take this Bill in its present form, without prolonged debate and without amendment, I shall be very glad to see it pass. If they will not so consent, I shall be obliged, in order that the work of the Law Courts in Ireland may be properly carried on, to fill up the vacancy which now exists; and I shall then proceed to press on, as far as I can, the large and general measure of reform the right hon. Gentleman opposite alluded to, and which I know my right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) desired to pass. But that cannot be done now. There are now only the two alternatives I have mentioned, and the question is which is to be adopted.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I have noticed the working of the Irish judicial system, and I beg to question the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) that there is any urgency whatever for the passing of this Bill. I may recall the right hon. Gentleman's recollection to one very significant fact in connection with this matter. Four years ago the late Liberal Government made the proposal to this House to reduce the number of Judges in Ireland by no less than five. The statement which the right hon. Gentleman makes now is that the Irish judicial system cannot continue to go on as at present, although there is only one vacancy, caused by the retirement of Chief Justice May. Anyone who knows anything about the working of the Courts of Ireland knows that the Court of Common Pleas is constituted of three Judges; that there is one vacancy in that Court, owing to the transfer of Chief Justice Morris to the Queen's Bench; and that, therefore, there are two Judges left to carry out the work of the Court. Under the Judicature Act, two Judges are quite competent to do the work of the Court; and not only so, but, in practice, they have been doing it for the past two years. Though the Court of Common Pleas is constituted of three Judges, nine out of every 10 judgments given in the Court are pronounced by two Judges. During a third of his time, at least, the Chief Justice is engaged upon legal business elsewhere—at one time trying appeals; and at another time sitting in Nisi Prius. Two Judges can do, and are at the present time doing, the work of the Court; and, therefore, there is no foundation whatever for the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that it is urgent that this Bill should be passed in order that there may be no mishap in the working of the Irish judicial system, owing to the vacancy which now exists. Now, I should like to make a few observations in reference to the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes). The right hon. and learned Gentleman said there is no necessity for providing expressly in this Bill for the merging of the offices of the Queen's Bench and Exchequer Divisions, because such offices already exist under the section of the Judicature Act to which he referred. He added that the Executive in Ireland have at the present time under their consideration a scheme for effecting this amalgamation. The Irish Members would like some little information as to the nature of the scheme. We should like to know how many of the existing officers are to be pensioned, as to how many are to be continued in the service, and who the favoured officers are to be? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was entirely silent upon that point. It is a most important point; it is one which must be explained to the House before this Bill is passed; it is one on which the fullest information should be given to Members of the House; and I can see no more opportune time for affording such information than during the discussion of this Bill. There is another point which has not been adverted to up to the present. I confess, Sir, that when I first read this Bill, I came to the conclusion that it was nothing better than a dummy Bill—a Bill not meant to deal seriously with the subject. This Bill provides for the merging at present of the Common Pleas, and in future of the Exchequer, in the Queen's Bench Division, and for having, in future, only one Common Law Division to do the work now done by three Divisions. Let me call attention to the fact that the Bill makes no provision whatever for pending causes or matters. The only precedent I can find for this Bill is the Judicature Act of 1877. That Act merged the three existing Courts into one, which was called the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland; but it made express provision for the causes pending in the different Courts at the time the merging took place. This Bill is absolutely silent on that matter, and no lawyer can read this Bill without having his attention called to the fact. The causes and matters pending at the time of the merging will utterly collapse, or come to an end, owing to the fact that the new Court brought into existence by the merging of the three old Courts will have no jurisdiction whatever to deal with causes commenced in the old Divisions. There is another point on which this Bill is entirely silent. Under the present system, the two Courts it is proposed to merge in the Queen's Bench Division—namely, the Common Pleas and the Exchequer, have certain exclusive jurisdiction. There is nothing whatever in this Bill to show that the Court of Queen's Bench, as constituted by the merging of the three Divisions, will have any jurisdiction to deal with the matters with which the two old Courts had the exclusive right to deal. It seems to me that this is a most perfunctory and imperfect measure. I could understand a complete Bill—a Bill such as the late Government introduced into the House three or four years ago; a Bill which proposed to completely reform the judicial system of Ireland. I could understand such a Bill as that for which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) has asked to-night—namely, a Bill to deal with the emergency which occurred when Chief Justice May retired, and when the Government had to consider whether or not they would fill up the office left vacant by the promotion of Chief Justice Morris. But I confess I cannot understand a Bill of this kind, a Bill which is neither one thing nor the other, which does not fine itself to the one specific point I have referred to, and which does not effect that reform in the judicial system of Ireland which is so badly required. I trust that before this Bill comes to be considered in Committee the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) in charge of it will consider the points to which I have alluded, and which seem to me to be most important and material, and that he will make some statement in regard to them.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I should like to say that even if we admitted that a difficulty does exist—and I do not admit anything of the kind—the House should recollect who created the difficulty. There were originally four Judges in the Queen's Bench Division; but one of them recently retired. I do not think anyone can stand up in this House and say that three Judges are too few to carry on the business of the Queen's Bench Division; but as a piece of political patronage the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas was promoted to the Queen's Bench Division, in which he draws a considerably increased salary. It is owing to the action of Her Majesty's Government that the deadlock, if there is any, exists. I do not think it can be denied by anyone that at present we are spending annually on the administration of law in Ireland not less than £150,000 more than we ought to spend. We are spending this £150,000 in what is nothing else but the most barefaced and arrant political bribery, in what is really a prostitution of law, and yet the Government come down to the House and tell us, upon the stand-and-deliver principle, you must allow us to save £1,200 a-year, or else we will go on spending £150,000 in patronage. Now, suppose this Common Pleas Division is abolished. There are many young gentlemen connected with the Division as to whose future the House would do well to evince a certain amount of interest. Take the case of Mr. Courtney, a nephew of Chief Justice Morris. He was appointed to a position carrying a salary of £1,000 a-year, and his duties have certainly not broken down his health. What is to be done with him? Is he to receive a good round sum as compensation, or is he to receive the modest sum of £500 or £600 as pension? There are about a dozen other officers who, in any case, will have to be dealt with.

But there is another point, which is of more importance to us than any other. We do not pretend to have any great burning regard for the English tax-payers' money; but we do attach great importance to the question of registration. If this Bill is passed unamended, the Court of Appeal, for the purpose of registration, will be constituted by the two permanent Judges of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls, and this promoted gentleman; and I say, without the slightest hesitation, that that Court will not have the confidence of the Irish people in any degree. It cannot possibly have; and the Gentlemen who now desire to uphold law and order would do well to give us some undertaking that the Court of Appeal will be more fairly constituted for registration matters. This object might be secured by the inclusion in the Court of one of the Exchequer Judges, the only Judges in whom the Irish people have any confidence. I trust that before we proceed further with the Bill the Government will give us some assurance on this point; and also afford us some information with respect to the pension scheme which must follow upon the passing of this Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Abolition of distinction between judgeships).

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I understand there is an arrangement with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) that the Bill should be taken up on Tuesday. I therefore move, Mr. Courtney, that you do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Plunket.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I do trust we shall have some information from the Government on Tuesday as to what the scheme under this Bill is to be. Master Courtney is a young man of 35. What do you propose to do with him? What do you propose to do with all the clerks in the Common Pleas? Are we going to have an answer to that question or not. It is monstrous that English Gentlemen, professing to be anxious for the money of the tax-payers, should allow a Bill of this kind to be passed into law on the strength of their own ignorance, and refuse us the least support in asking the most reasonable questions of the Government. Are you going to pension these gentlemen or not?

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): When this Bill is again taken up, I shall most certainly add my protest against it to that of my hon. Friends below the Gangway, unless we receive the fullest information from the Government as to what they propose to do. The mere suggestion that a young gentleman such as has been described should be pensioned off at the age of 35 is enough to make the Secretary to the Treasury's hair stand on end.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that it is irregular to enter on this discussion on the Motion to report Progress.

MR. PLUNKET: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that the question raised is one for the Treasury rather than for the Irish Office; but I have no doubt that when we reach the 4th clause the explanation desired will be given.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If on Tuesday we can see no sign of information from the Government on this particular question, I shall, Sir, as soon as you enter upon your arduous duties in the Chair, move that you do leave the Chair.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee to sit again upon Tuesday next.

ACCUMULATIONS BILL.—[BILL 31.]

(Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Haldane.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COZENS-HARDY (Norfolk, N.): There is no difference of opinion as to the desirability of passing the second reading of this Bill. It is an attempt to alter the provisions of an Act passed 88 years ago, by which it was permitted to accumulate the income of property for a period that is regarded as unwise in the interests of the public. The present Bill is an attempt to prevent this power for a longer period than the minority of the person who may be entitled to it. Full opportunity will be given in Committee to consider any point which may be thought to require discussion; and I, therefore, hope the House will allow the Bill to be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Cosens-Hardy.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I trust the House will allow this Bill to be read a second time. Before the question is decided, however, I just wish to say that I am not quite sure that the measure does not go too far in reference to the matter of time. If the hon. Member will put off the Committee stage to some period which will give time for the consideration of clauses, and will enable us to prepare Amendments, if necessary, there will be no opposition to the second reading.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 2nd May.

EARL GRANVILLE: Perhaps the noble Marquess may be able to state

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): It may be convenient to the noble Earl and to the House if I state that we propose that the House should rise on Friday next; and though it is impossible, on account of the burdens of legislation in "another place," to make a statement with regard to the actual technical Sittings of the House, I think that if we met again on the Monday after Easter week, that would be satisfactory to your Lordships.

PROBATION OF FIRST OFFENDERS (No. 2) BILL—(No. 20.)

SECOND READING. ORDER DISCHARGED.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving that the Order be discharged, said, the Bill was practically the same as one which had last year passed through the House of Commons, and which he had had charge of in their Lordships' House. That Bill was no doubt opposed by the late Government, and some of the details of it were objected to, and, besides, it was considered that it had come up at too late a period of the Session. But the principle of it was approved by every noble and learned Lord who was then present. He had, therefore, been allowed to withdraw the Bill, and he had re-introduced it at the earliest period of the present Session. Since the Bill had been printed a Bill with a similar object had been introduced in the House of Commons. It was not exactly the same as this Bill, but it would have practically the same effect; it was an improvement upon it, and from what he had learned he had reason to think that if the Bill got through the other House it would come here still more improved. He would therefore postpone this Bill, and take charge of the other one, if it reached this House; and in that case he would eventually withdraw the present one. He would, therefore, move that the Order for the Second Reading should be discharged.

Moved, "That the Order for the Second Reading be ~~discharged~~."—(The Earl of Belmore.)

Motion

TITHE RENT-CHARGE BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I have to ask your attention to a subject which I am sorry to say has become recently a subject of considerable public interest, and which requires the attention of Parliament—I allude to the incidence and mode of levying of tithes. When the Tithes Bill was passed in 1836 it was passed by common consent of both sides of the House; but the extreme difficulty of the subject was then fully recognized. Lord John Russell said, when he brought forward the Bill, that there had been three plans which he had considered, accepted, and ultimately abandoned. The difficulty was recognized by all as very great; but the result of the efforts which were made at that time was that a measure was produced which has worked on the whole with very great advantage to the Church and the public for the space of some 50 years. But that great agricultural distress which has searched the joints and found out the weak places of more than one of our political arrangements has brought to light the very serious difficulties attending this measure which was passed with so much success in 1836. At that time, although it was received with general favour, Mr. Hume, on behalf of the landed interest, very much objected to it. He said it was not fair to the landowners; that it was a great deceit upon them; that it was being passed at a time when Protectionist laws existed; that he was quite sure that those Protectionist laws would not continue, and that the arrangement which the landed interest accepted with willingness and even satisfaction at that time would wear a very different aspect when those laws were withdrawn. Unfortunately, we have lived to see Mr. Hume's prophecy become true. Free Trade, with all the enormous benefits it has conferred upon other industries in the country, has undoubtedly dealt a very heavy blow at the agriculture—or, if I may use the phrase, the arable agriculture of this country—and the distress which has come from the lowering of prices has led occupiers and owners, and especially occupiers, to look with a very jealous eye at the arrangement for the discharge of the burden of tithes which they had accepted without question in more prosperous times. For political purposes, the weak point which has come out in the arrangement of 1836 is the introduction of the occupier into the matter at all. The debt is the debt of the owner in respect of the produce of his land, but the person who, as a matter of fact, pays is the occupier. I believe that the intention of the Act, if it had been carried out, was that the tenant should have power to deduct it from his rent as he did with the Income Tax. That, however, has not been the common practice. The occupier has taken the risk of what the tithe would be, and has undertaken to pay the debt in good years and bad, when the average is high and when the average is low, and to have it considered once for all in fixing his rent. No doubt, that circumstance has added very much to the discontent with which the occupier in some parts of the country has looked upon the burden of tithes. He has had to pay often a very high average at a time when prices had fallen very low, and he has felt aggrieved. Some persons have thought that the difficulties would be entirely met by so far amending the Act of 1836 as to prevent this transference of risk from the owner to the occupier—to insist that the owner should not contract himself out of his liability, but that, as in the case of Income Tax, he should always pay back to the occupier whatever the occupier has paid to the titheowner. I do not dispute that that would be an admirable plan, but it would not meet the whole difficulty of the case. It would not remove the occupier from the position which he now fills of having to discharge the debt and bear the first blows of a financial conflict in which he is not actually or legitimately interested. If he has paid in the first instance you say he has a right to deduct that from his rent. Yes; but supposing he has paid no rent? That is not an impossible contingency, I am sorry to say, in these times. It has not infrequently happened that landlords have not asked for any rent at all, but have given the tenant time, in order to enable him to dispose of his produce and pay with greater convenience. But although they may be ready to forego the rent for a certain time, very few landlords would carry their philanthropy so far as to pay the tithe as well, and therefore the occupier, in the midst of his distress, finds that the titheowner is the person with whom he must deal. I do not think that that touches the worst part of the question. The fundamental vice of the system is this—that though the debt is the debt of the landowner to the titheowner, if the titheowner wants to recover it, he has to distrain upon the occupier's goods. Now, the remedy of distress has many advantages; it has great rapidity, but it is probably the most irritating to administer which it is possible to adopt. It is not only irritating, but it is not, in this particular case, very efficacious. The titheowner comes for payment on a particular day, and the farmer knows when to expect him, and every bit of stock may be driven off the farm. In old times you had a security in the crops which could not be thrashed until the winter, but thrashing is no longer relegated to the winter; thrashing machines have changed all that. Therefore, although it is an immediate remedy, it is not an effective one. For the clerical titheowner it is singularly unhappy in its character. It is subject to all kinds of difficulties, doubts, and technicalities, and the expense makes the poorest clergy naturally very unwilling to resort to it. I have heard that it has amounted to as much as 50 per cent of the sum recovered. That is the material side of the question; but there is the spiritual side, of the relations between the clergy and their parishioners. The farmer ought to look on the clergyman as his best friend. The use of that remedy is not calculated to increase the spiritual influence of the clergymen upon the farmers, or to promote the peace of the pariah; and when, in addition to all other causes of difference between the farmer and the titheowner, there is the bitter odium theologicum—when differences on doctrinal or ecclesiastical questions separate the two, and make the farmer look with a special jealousy and mistrust on a measure which is necessary to keep up an order of ministers to whose very existence he conscientiously objects—it would be easy to foresee what has actually happened; that the necessity of recovering tithes by this machinery has in many parishes constituted an almost impassable barrier between the pastor and many of his flock, and created spiritual differences which it would require years to heal. Those are evils which exist at the present time, and I have preferred to dwell upon them in a general way and not to bring before your Lordships special instances; but many scenes of great gravity have occurred. Not only in Wales, but in the East of England, sufferings have been endured by the clergy through their inability to obtain that which is their undoubted due, while terrible results have followed to the peace of the pariah and the influence of the pastor when this rude and painful machinery has been put in force by clergymen for obtaining their rights. The Bill which I shall now ask your Lordships to read a first time to-night is for the purpose of remedying these evils. One of the main objects of the Bill is to shift the incidence of tithe from the occupier to the owner. Perhaps I may say, in passing, that much larger anticipations have been formed with respect to this subject, and a much more extensive scheme of change has been expected. I wish, on behalf of the Government, to disavow any intention of grappling with projects of that kind. I am sorry to hear it has got abroad that tithe is excessive in amount, and that the bargain which was made in 1836 ought in the interests of the landowner to be revised. This idea, if it has at all spread, is due entirely to misconception. The bargain made in 1836 was a very good one for the landowner, and remains a very good one still. It is said that tithe must now be excessive because it is more than a tenth part of the value of the land. The value of the land is an exceedingly ambiguous phrase; but what it ordinarily means in our parlance is the rent of the land—that is to say, the profit that remains after all the expenses of cultivation in their widest sense have been discharged. But the tithe is a tenth part of the produce of the land, and it was in that sense that it was recognized by the Act of 1836. If your Lordships will consider the matter, you will see that even now the tenth part of the produce of the land would be something very much in excess of what the Church has a right to under the existing rent-charge. Prices are very low; I suppose an acre of wheat in gr about £7. The tenth part of £7 is 14s., but you will not find any tithe even in the most heavily burdened part of the country amounts to 14s. an acre. I will not go through barley, clover, and other articles of produce, but I think you will find that the result is much the same. Take an acre of hay. I suppose an ordinary acre of hay will bring in between 70s. and 80s., and the tenth part of that is 7s. or 8s. I think it will be found to be much the same for turnips and barley. On the other hand, it is undoubtedly true that an acre of wheat, which under the old system might have yielded the Church 14s., would not, if the Church were held to be entitled to a tenth part of the value of the land—the rent—yield it anything like that sum. It should be remembered that the old right of the titheowner was to take no account whatever of the cost of production. It was a right to take a tenth part of the produce of the land, with deduction for the cost of bringing to the market. Therefore there is no ground for saying that any revision of the tithe would in any degree benefit the land. I have seen it stated, although I have not gone into the calculation, that even now, according to present prices, more would be yielded than was the case before 1836. The prices of barley and wheat have fallen heavily; but I doubt—though I cannot speak with certainty—whether the prices of animals are not higher now than in 1836. Therefore, my Lords, unless you propose on this occasion to take from the Church the rights that belong to her, you could not revise the bargain made in 1836 without very considerable damage to the landowner and without damaging the titheowner. Owing to agricultural improvements the value of land has very considerably advanced, and in any such revision of the bargain the Church would have the right to reap the advantage of that change. There is another grievance with respect to which I cannot use the same absolute language. I do not wish to disguise it, though I do not propose to deal with it by the present Bill. The grievance arises out of the seven years' revision of the tithe. Supposing four good years and three bad to occur, the effect has been that the unfortunate tithepayer has, perhaps, during the first two years had to pay on an average calculated, on the very properity that has gone from him. I believe it would be much wiser to arrange to make the tithe payable on prices adjusted from year to year. But anyone who undertakes to make such a change will find that he has all his work before him. For the difficulty will be to find the exact point of transition, and I doubt whether you will ever get the two parties to agree as to the precise amount at which the tithe should be fixed. What this Bill proposes to do is to make the landowner responsible for the tithe; the titheowner will recover it from him as a simple debt. As long as the land yields more than the amount of the tithe, that is a change which I believe will be attended with no difficulty. An arrangement of machinery will be necessary, which will not tax our ingenuity; but there is a difficulty arising out of a state of things which, I am sorry to say, is by no means unknown, in which the rent of the land—the rent that can be claimed for the land—is less than the tithe due upon it. That state of things exists to some extent in the Eastern Counties now, and it raises rather a difficult problem. If the land grows anything at all the titheowner is entitled to his tithe; but if we look forward a step we shall see that that is a very illusory privilege. Directly the farmer finds out by experience that after he has paid his tithe he is not able to pay the cost of cultivation, it is obvious that next year he will cease to cultivate the land. The land will go out of cultivation, and the titheowner next year will lose his right altogether. I acknowledge that, technically, it may be said that at least for one year the titheowner has a right to get his tithe out of land which yields no profit if it yields anything at all. Of course, if the land is out of cultivation, the question does not arise; but out of land which yields no profit, but which will still yield some produce, then for the first year I will admit the titheowner has a right to obtain his tithe, but it is a right which he will obtain at the cost of throwing the land out of cultivation. With that hanging over it the claim of the titheowner would rest as a burden upon the land which would prevent its being brought into cultivation again. It appears to me to be more just to the landowner, and more just to the tithe-

owner, to say that when the land does not yield the value of the tithe to that extent the titheowner should lose his right. And we propose by the Bill to give power to a County Court Judge to ascertain this state of facts from the landowner, and if he pleases make such allowance as he thinks just. I admit that the arrangement, in point of argument, is open to attack; but we have taken into consideration not only the rights of the respective parties, but their future rights and future prosperity. I think, therefore, we shall do well to adopt an arrangement which is not only just, but most favourable for encouraging the cultivation of the land. There are two other points of smaller importance. One is whether the titheowner should pay anything for the greater convenience he obtains by taking his tithe direct from the landowner. The question is difficult to decide, because the convenience which titheowners receive differs. In many cases there are 10 or 20 landowners in a parish, while in others there are only two or three landowners. It is, however, very much better for the titheowner to go direct to the landowner instead of the occupier for his tithe, and we propose to recognize this by allowing the landowner to deduct 5 per cent discount. It appears to us that it is almost impossible to draw any definite dividing line between lay and clerical titheowners; and, therefore, we propose that the Bill shall apply equally to titheowners of all kinds. I feel sure that if, by the waving of a wand, we could get rid of tithes altogether, without injuring any particular interest, Members of both Houses would be prepared to abolish them; but all that we are justified in doing at the present moment is to do our best to encourage the redemption of tithes. Your Lordships are aware that in cases where the land has been cut up into very small portions the landowner can force the titheowner to accept 25 years' purchase of the tithes, and we are of opinion that in the existing state of things 20 years' purchase at the par value is a fair rate for redemption. This proposition may, at first sight, appear rather startling; but, on a careful examination, it will be seen that it will do good rather than harm to the titheowner. In the first place, the titheowner will benefit by having his money every half-year instead of having to press a reluctant farmer for payment; and, in the next place, he will be saved from the costs of collection, while there will be an entire absence of litigation and of ill-will, which, under existing conditions, without imputing blame to anyone, inevitably arise. Allowing 10 per cent for the average fall in the par value, 16 per cent for rates, and 5 per cent for cost of collection, the £100 of par value is reduced to £70, which, at 3½ per cent, would be the precise interest yielded by the 20 years' purchase of the rent-charge. I do not know how far Parliament is prepared to accept such a measure as this, and undoubtedly it is open to criticism; neither do I know how far we may be able to persuade the Chancellor of the Exchequer to help us, although he has hitherto shown us very good will in the matter. I need not go into any details as to the extent to which the redemption of tithes could be assisted by loans from the Public Loans Commissioners, only we must remember that we cannot offer as security for any such loans the land itself, but merely its produce. There are, I admit, many difficulties in the way of carrying out this scheme; but I trust that they may eventually be overcome. I do not know whether, in the present state of Parliamentary Business, we can have any very great hopes that a Bill of this kind, which certainly presents considerable surface for attack, will become law during the present Session. But I am sure that Parliament can pass no measure that will do more to put a stop to differences that are rending asunder communities in different parts of the country, or do more to secure the foundations of the most essential institution of our land. I beg to move that the Bill be read a first time.

Bill to amend the law with respect to the recovery and redemption of tithe rent-charge in England—Presented (The Marquess of SALISBURY).

EARL DE LA WARR said, it was not very usual in their Lordships' House to enter into a discussion on the first reading of a Bill, but rather to defer such discussion till the second reading, in order that time might be given to consider it. But as the noble Marquess had thought it well to deviate somewhat from the more usual course, he should not, perhaps, be out of Order if he made a few remarks in accordance with the Motion of which he had given Notice—

“That, in the opinion of this House, in view of the depressed state of agriculture and the heavy burdens upon land, it is desirable to afford greater facilities for the redemption of tithe rent-charge in England and Wales; and that the attention of Her Majesty’s Government should be called to the question.”

He might, perhaps, first be allowed to explain the reason which induced him to bring under their Lordships’ consideration the subject of the redemption of tithe rent-charge. The existence of very great agricultural distress throughout the country must be, unhappily, too well known to need any proof. In some parts of the country there were hundreds, he might say thousands, of acres out of cultivation; in some the land, if cultivated, would barely pay the tithe rent-charge; in many others it made no return at all, and was often cultivated at a loss. It was generally admitted that wheat could not be grown much under 40s. a quarter in this country. The average price for some time past had, he believed, not much, if at all, exceeded 32s. a-quarter. Many other kinds of produce had also materially depreciated in value, and it was calculated by those who were competent to give an opinion that 70,000,000 a-year did not overstate the loss in agricultural produce as compared with 15 years ago. That sum, it was estimated, represented more than the actual rents received by the owners of land in this country. There were many more details which might be given, but their Lordships as landowners, having tenants and labourers dependent on the produce of the land, must too well know that the land was fast being reduced in very many places to a condition which would render it impossible to maintain those who had hitherto lived upon it. It was with much disappointment that he read the letter the noble Marquess the Prime Minister not long ago addressed to the Marquess of Bristol, in answer to a Memorial of the owners and occupiers of land in Suffolk. After expressing great sympathy with the Memorialists, the noble Marquess added—be misleading you if I used any language to indicate that I entertained any hope of being able to cope with an evil of this kind by any sort of legislative action. I heartily wish it were otherwise; but it would not be justifiable to hold out hopes for which no trustworthy grounds exist.”

He was quite sure that that statement had been received with great disappointment by agriculturists throughout the country. They naturally said—“Look at the burdens upon land in the shape of taxation. If these were imposed by Parliament, can they not be at least modified or adjusted by Parliament?” There were Imperial taxes; could not Parliament deal with these? There was a high Income Tax—a tax formerly unknown in times of peace; there was a Land Tax which pressed heavily in many places, could not some relief be given in respect of this? There was a local taxation, which was an increasing burden. There were school rates enforced by Act of Parliament, and highly-paid schoolmasters, far beyond what were required in agricultural districts, but which were rendered necessary by the regulations of the Education Department. There were School Boards and Local Boards, and Sanitary Boards and Highway Boards, with highly-paid officers. There were poor rates, highway rates, and police rates; there were Boards of Guardians, with their paid officers. All charges such as these were thrown in a great measure upon the land, which was expected to maintain the landlord, the tenant, the clergyman, and the labourer. One especial way of relief seemed to present itself. He did not say there were no others; he believed there were many. Personal property should be assessed for local as it was for Imperial taxation. It would be difficult to see how the fairness of that method could be disputed. He had pointed out where it seemed to him some relief might be afforded as regarded Imperial and local taxation. It remained for him to show that a great and permanent benefit might be conferred by a well-considered scheme for the redemption of tithe rent-charge. It had been suggested that the present difficulties might be removed if the landlords were made wholly liable for the payment of the tithe rent-charge. It would, no doubt, relieve the clergyman from the inconvenience of any collision with the tithepayer; but as the landlord must raise the rent if he had to pay the tithe, the occupier would practically be in the same position as regarded the amount of payment. But if the tithe were redeemed the occupier might be freed from all liability, and the landlord, in consideration of the advantage which his property would ultimately derive by the redemption of the tithe, would be induced to make easy terms with his tenants with regard to raising the rents until the whole charge was paid off. The scheme, it might be urged, was a large one. The annual amount received from tithe divided between parochial incumbents, lay and clerical impropriators, and collegiate bodies, amounted to about £4,000,000. But although the financial details for effecting the redemption might require experienced handling, it was by no means deemed impossible by those who were competent to form an opinion on the matter. He had figures which he could lay before their Lordships; but he thought it would be more convenient on that occasion if he referred to the Irish Church Act of 1869 and the Amendment Act of 1872, one of the objects of those Acts being the redemption of tithe. By Section 7 of the Act it was enacted that—

“The Commissioners may at any time after the passing of this Act sell any rent-charge in lieu of tithes vested in them under the principal Act to the owner of the land charged therewith in consideration of a sum equal to 22½ times the amount of such rent-charge, less such sum in the pound as such owner shall be ascertained by the Commissioners to have been, on an average of five years preceding the passing of the said Act, entitled to deduct for poor rates from the tithe rent-charge payable by him, and upon any such sale being so made the Commissioners shall by order declare the rent-charge to be merged in the land out of which it issued.”

By this it appeared that a landowner in Ireland since the year 1872 could redeem the tithe chargeable upon land at 22½ years' purchase, less the sum paid by him for poor rates; and it further added—

“The Commissioners may by order declare his purchase money to be payable by instalments, and the land out of which such rent-charge issued to be accordingly charged as from a day to be mentioned in such order for 52 years thence next ensuing with an annual sum calculated at 4½ per cent on the purchase-money.

The result of this arrangement would be that the tithe could be altogether redeemed by the annual payment of a sum very similar to what was now paid for the annual rent-charge, less the rates and the charge for collection. But by being spread over a greater number of years, it might, in proportion, be still further reduced, and thus give greater present relief to the landowner. He believed this Act was in operation in Ireland, and landowners there, especially in Ulster, had to a considerable extent availed themselves of it. It could readily be shown that this transaction could be carried out without at all affecting the Revenue of the country. It might, perhaps, be advisable that the measure should not be compulsory, but that the landowner should have the option of redeeming the tithe or of taking the onus of paying it himself. A re-adjustment of the present rent-charge might probably be necessary before the redemption was effected, in order to adapt it as far as possible to the present value of agricultural produce. It could hardly be doubted that the advantages of a measure of this kind would be great, for it would, he believed, set at rest a question which was becoming one of great friction and uneasiness. The tenant occupier of land would no longer be liable for tithe in any shape. The owner of land would repay the money advanced for the redemption by easy instalments spread over a number of years, and at the end of the time the land would be freed from all charge. He was happy to hear that Her Majesty's Government would take into their serious consideration this important question, which was assuming large proportions, in order that by timely legislation a remedy might be applied to circumstances, the burden of which was increasing at a time of almost unparalleled agricultural distress. He would not move the Resolution of which he had given Notice, understanding that the noble Marquess at the head of the Government would consider the question of tithe redemption during the passage of the Bill through the House.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) said, he wished to state, with respect to a letter of his to which the noble Earl had referred, that he had not the slightest intention of drawing back from any expression which he might have made of a desire to effect reforms for the advantage of the agricultural community of the country. He believed that much might be done, though the task might be extremely difficult, to adjust the burdens of taxation on land and personal property. What he wished to impress on the noble Earl and on agriculturists was that distress of the character referred to could not be met, could not be coped with, by measures of that kind, and that it was not to legislation they could look for any effective relief. He wished to reply to another point. He was very anxious that his agricultural friends, with whose sufferings he had the greatest sympathy, should not imagine that it was within the range of practical politics that Protection could be restored in this country. He believed that the injury caused would be great if they imagined that such a thing could be done. Before Protection could be restored it would be not merely one Party, but both Parties in the State, that would have to be converted. Let them suppose, for instance, that the Conservative Party were converted and became Protectionists; that would not make it safe for agriculturists to rely upon obtaining Protection. Men could not venture to invest their money on the chance of Protection unless it was so thoroughly received by the country that it would be accepted by both Parties in the State. He thought his noble Friend would agree with him that that was as unlikely a contingency as it was possible to contemplate. It was very natural that agriculturists, in the sufferings they were undergoing, should look for a remedy; but he feared that some public evil might be caused by their looking forward to a remedy which he sincerely believed to be impossible.

ADMIRALTY—SIR WILLIAM PALLISER (ARMOUR BOLTS).

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any pecuniary acknowledgment has ever been made to the late Sir William Palliser, or his representatives, by the Government, in connection with his valuable invention of armour bolts, which have been for a long time, and now are, in general use in Her Majesty's Navy?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood) (Lancashire, Ormekirk) (who replied) said: No, Sir.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—MRS.
LUCAS, CONVICTED OF ARSON.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the fact that Mrs. Lucas, wife of a Cork magistrate, was in March 1886, sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment for having attempted to burn down her own mansion, then inhabited by her family and a protection party of police, by pouring paraffin oil over the curtains of her rooms, to which she set fire; that she was detected by, and convicted on the evidence of, the police who guarded the house; that her husband had claimed for compensation for malicious injury off the rates in this and other cases, which the Grand Jury rejected; is it the fact that Mrs. Lucas was released from gaol several months before the expiry of her sentence; that her husband still remains a magistrate for County Cork; at whose instance was the sentence commuted; and, in how many cases within the past six years have sentences for arson, with intent to defraud, been commuted?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The facts are substantially as stated in the Question. A Memorial was received on her behalf, numerous signed, the signatures including those of the Protestant clergyman and the Roman Catholic curates of the parish, setting forth that the case was one in which the clemency of the Lord Lieutenant might be properly exercised; and His Excellency, after considering all the facts, ordered the discharge of the prisoner. Two sentences for arson have been commuted within the last six years.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to say whether the claims of compensation made to the Grand Jury were rejected, as stated in the Question, and whether Mr. Lucas, who made these claims after getting his wife to set fire to the place, still retains the Commission of the Peace; and, will he also state whether these outrages, reported by the police as agrarian outrages, will be given in the Return as against the people?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Part of the Question of the hon. and learned Member I am unable to answer. The other part I have already answered, by stating that I believe the statement that the Grand Jury rejected the claims for compensation is accurate. As to the assertion that the lady's husband urged her to commit the crime, I have no knowledge at all.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay the facts before the Lord Chancellor?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question has already been fairly judged and decided. His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant thought it was a case in which his clemency should be extended, and I do not think the question should be reopened.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) — RIOTS AT BELFAST — REPRESSION OF DISTURBANCE.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if his attention has been called to a paragraph in The Daily News of this date (21st instant), referring to disturbances in Belfast on Saturday last, in which, after describing the arrest of a prisoner, it is stated—

"As soon as this was done, the mob, which had now become large, began to violently stone the police. Despite the attacks made on them, the Constabulary arrested, not only Edgeworth, but six others. . . . Matters to-day (Sunday) passed over quietly; but to-night, in Millfield, there was more stone throwing. A numerous body of police were soon present, and charged the mob with their batons;"

and, if he will explain why people in Youghal, and other parts of Ireland outside of Ulster, are to be charged with the sword bayonet, and even to be fired upon, for resistance to the police, while only the baton, or at worst the bayonet, is employed in Belfast?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The report referred to is substantially correct as regards the disturbance in Belfast on Saturday last; but the circumstances of the following Sunday were not of the serious character suggested. As regards the insinuation made in the last paragraph of the Question, I may inform the hon. Member that the police will use the means for quelling disturbance, or resisting attack, which the circumstances of each case may unhappily render necessary without regard to distinctions of place, Party, or religion.

MADAGASCAR — RECALL OF MR.
PICKERSGILL, HER MAJESTY'S VICE CONSUL AT ANTANANARIVO.

MR. M'ARTHUR (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the statement made in a Reuter's telegram, dated Paris, 21st March, that the French Government have asked, and obtained, the recall of Mr. Pickersgill, Her Majesty's Vice Consul at Antananarivo, the capital of Madagascar; and, if so, will he inform the House on what grounds Mr. Pickersgill has been recalled?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF

chester, N.E.): There is no truth in the statement referred to, and Mr. Pickersgill is still Her Majesty's Vice Consul at Antananarivo.

ACTS—OUTBREAKS OF ANTHRAX.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with reference to the various reported outbreaks of cattle anthrax, Whether any steps have been taken to warn Local Authorities of the danger of establishing permanent centres of infection, by the burial of carcasses of animals suffering from that disease?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (Lord JOHN MANNERS) (Leicestershire, E.): The Anthrax Order of 1886 provides for the destruction of carcasses of animals dead of anthrax by exposure to a high temperature or by chemical agents, and some Local Authorities, in districts where the necessary appliances exist, have been authorized to adopt such modes of destruction instead of burial. In reference to burial, which in many parts of the country is the only available method of disposing of carcasses, Local Authorities have been warned that the carcasses should be buried entire and be well covered with lime. There is reason to believe that when carcasses are so buried as to exclude the air the infection does not continue for any great length of time.

DR. CAMERON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the attention of his Department has been called to the numerous outbreaks of cattle anthrax recently reported; and, whether he proposes to take any measures, by way of warning or otherwise, to guard against the danger of disease being communicated to human beings?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The danger of anthrax being communicated to human beings is one almost exclusively incurred by those who have to deal with the hides or opened bodies of infected animals; and obedience to the Order of the Privy Council of September 16, 1886, as to dealing with such animals and their carcasses, will practically get rid of that danger. No other measure is regarded as called for. I may add that the Report of the Medical Officer of the Board for 1882 contains a Memorandum which was prepared in order to give the means of recognizing anthrax as it affects people dealing with hides; and this Memorandum may be useful as guarding against error in diagnosis in districts where actual anthrax has appeared.

LAW AND POLICE—SENTENCE ON FRANCIS M'LOWRAN, AT SOUTHWARK POLICE COURT.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the Memorial sent him, with reference to the case of Francis M'Lowran, who was sentenced at the Southwark Police Court on the 8th instant to three months' hard labour, for an assault on a police constable, in which it is alleged that a miscarriage of justice has taken place; and, whether he will have inquiries made into the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have carefully considered this Memorial, and I have read the evidence and obtained a Report from the magistrate upon it, and I see no reason to interfere with the sentence.

ADMIRALTY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL FUNDS—INVESTMENTS.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth) asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in the interest of the seamen of the Royal Navy, the Greenwich Hospital Funds, which were originally in part subscribed by them, or deducted from their pay, will be invested in Government loans of the Colonies of Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, and New Zealand, paying Four per Cent, instead of the Three per Cent Annuities?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (A LORD of the ADMIRALTY) (Sheffield, Ecclesall): Arrangements have been made already, or are in progress, for the re-investment at home, on favourable terms, of the greater part of the Three per Cent Annuities held on account of Greenwich Hospital; and it is not considered that there will be any difficulty in similarly re-investing so much of the remainder of the Stock as it may be considered advisable to re-invest. The Colonial Stocks of Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, and New Zealand mentioned in the Question are at present quoted above par, with the exception of the New Zealand Stock, and at present prices would yield interest of less than 4 per cent on the sum invested.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIOTS AT YOUGHAL—THE CORONER'S WARRANT.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What steps, if any, have been taken to carry out the warrant of Mr. Coroner Rice against District Inspector Somerville and Constable Ward for the wilful murder of Hanlon at Youghal; whether the accused have been suspended from duty and lodged in gaol; and, if so, when; and, whether the jury attached any rider to their verdict, or made through their foreman any statement when returning their verdict; and, if so, what rider or statement?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The accused officers were arrested and committed to custody on the 23rd instant, and are, therefore, suspended from duty. I am not aware that the Coroner's Jury added any rider to their verdict; but I understand that before separating they adopted a Resolution which has been published in the Press.

MR. CHANCE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will state the terms of that Resolution?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is as much in possession of the Resolution as myself.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say if these prisoners, District Inspector Somerville and Constable Ward, are receiving in Cork Gaol the treatment of ordinary untried prisoners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume they are; but I do not know. If the hon. Gentleman has any anxiety in the matter he can put a Question on the Paper.

EJECTMENTS (IRELAND)—THE MARQUESS OF DOWNSHIRE'S ESTATES, CO. DOWN.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in The Belfast Morning News of the 15th instant, in which it is stated that processes of ejectments had been, on the previous Saturday, served on about 70 tenants of "The Seven Townlands," near Dundrum, County Down, on the estate of the Trustee of the Marquess of Downshire; whether any reduction of rent was offered to these tenants; whether any of the tenants so sued owe more than one year's rent; and, if so, how many; and, whether, having regard to these and other cases where the tenants are sued for rent which they cannot pay, the Government will bring in a provisional measure to empower the Judges to adjourn ejectment proceedings for the recovery of rent, pending legislation on the subject?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): My attention has not been called to the paragraph except by the hon. Member's Question. I do not think it part of my duty to inquire into the particulars of special transactions between landlords and tenants. Certain of the proposals which the Government have to make in reference to land in Ireland will be brought into the House of Lords on Thursday next, when hon. Members will have an opportunity of satisfying a curiosity which I admit to be legitimate.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—TELEGRAPH ESTABLISHMENTS AT WATERFORD.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the postal and telegraphic establishments at Waterford are still ranked in the second class, notwithstanding that the Returns taken last year show the work transacted to be sufficient to warrant the first class being applied; whether, when the late Mr. Fawcett's scheme for the revision of offices was issued in 1881, Mr. Baines, of the General Post Office, who superintended its application, included Waterford among the offices to be promoted, possessing as it did the necessary qualification in high class instruments and direct telegraphic communication with London; whether, in consequence of the strenuous opposition of Mr. Guinness, Surveyor of the Southern (Ireland) District, Waterford was struck out, but on consideration that it would be restored when Limerick obtained the necessary qualifications, and if this promise is still unfulfilled; whether the recent revision of the establishments confers only two clerkships in a staff of 34, while English offices with a smaller staff have three times the number of superior appointments; and, if it is the intention of the Department to improve the prospects of the general body of the staff, and remove the discontent which now prevails?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): All the officers consulted in 1881 were of opinion that the Waterford office should be ranked in List B. In November last I revised the establishment, increasing the number of clerks by two to the present number of four, which was all that the work of the office required. It is not the fact that English offices with a smaller staff have three times the number of superior appointments. The office is still properly ranked in List B; and I should not, I think, be warranted now in reconsidering my decision of November last.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAMS—SHORTENED TELEGRAPHIC ADDRESSES FOR THIS HOUSE.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) asked the Postmaster General, If he will be good enough to state whether he has had any further consultation with the authorities of the House with reference to the adoption of a shortened telegraphic address for telegrams addressed to hon. Members at the House?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I have been informed by the Speaker that it will be for the general convenience if the word "Commons" could be registered for telegrams addressed to the House of Commons, and I have given instructions accordingly.

POST OFFICE—SUNDAY DELIVERY OF LETTERS—POSTMEN'S WAGES.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven) asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in the event of its being decided to discontinue the Sunday delivery of letters throughout the Country, a proportionate reduction in the wages of the postmen will not necessarily follow?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In fixing the wages of postmen, it is the practice to take into account whether or not they have any work on Sunday. If the Sunday delivery of letters were discontinued throughout the country, and postmen were relieved of all work on Sunday, it would certainly be necessary to consider whether the wages of the men who now work on Sunday, and who, of course, form the great majority of the postmen, should not undergo a proportionate reduction.

COLONIAL CONFERENCE—AUSTRALIAN OPINION.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will consider the expression of Australian opinion contained in Reuter's telegram from Melbourne, published in yesterday's Times, and make public the proceedings of the Colonial Conference, thus taking the public into its confidence from the outset; and, whether any other Members of the Government, beside the Colonial Minister, will take part in the Conference?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): I am glad that the hon. Baronet has asked this Question, as there seems to be some misunderstanding as to the matters referred to. It was clearly explained in my Predecessor's Circular Despatch inviting the Conference that

"Secrecy must continue to be observed with regard to many of the defensive measures," the consideration of which is one of the principal objects of the meeting of Colonial Representatives in this country. Further, it is not desirable that proposals and tenders for mail services and telegraphic communications and the discussion of them should be prematurely made public. And it is no less important that questions bearing upon the relations of this country with Foreign Powers should, if they are to be freely discussed, be considered without the necessary publication of all the observations that may be made and all the information that may be given. It is intended to admit reporters on the opening day of the Conference; but on subsequent days two official reporters only will be present. But it is proposed to furnish the papers with a précis of the proceedings of each day. As I have before stated, the Prime Minister and other Members of the Government will be present at the opening; and Members of the Government will attend when the Conference have under discussion matters affecting their Departments.

THE COLONIAL CONFERENCE—THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, in view of the fact that the first subject for discussion at the Conference, summoned to meet on the 4th of April, is that of Imperial Defence, the Representatives appointed by the Colonies will be furnished with the Report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into that subject, and presided over by the Earl of Carnarvon?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): The Report of the Royal Commission, and the evidence brought before the Commissioners, must be still treated as confidential. But that Report has been taken as the basis of the different recommendations that have been made from time to time, some of which have already been carried into effect; and it will be my duty, as President of the Conference, to state fully, for the information of the delegates, all that has been done in consequence of the Report, and to bring to their notice what measures still remain to be taken.

LOCAL TAXATION—ASSESSMENT OF CHAPELS AND SCHOOLS AT HAYLE, CORNWALL.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the fact that the Local Authorities for the District of Hayle, in Cornwall, have determined to tax all the chapels and schools; whether in any, and what, cases exemption from such taxation is admitted by the law; and, whether such exemption should be permitted in the case of those school-rooms, belonging to certain religious denominations, which are attached to and form portions of the chapels, and are used simply for religious instruction on Sundays, such instruction being given without fee or other payment, and the chapels and schools being erected and maintained by voluntary offerings?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) (who replied) said: The Local Government Board have no information as to the proposed action of the Local Authorities in the district of Hayle with regard to the assessment of chapels and schools. As to the cases in which there is an exemption from assessment to the poor rate of churches, chapels, meeting-houses, or premises appropriated to public religious worship, the statutory provisions will be found in the 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 30.

SALMON FISHING (SCOTLAND).

MR. A. L. BROWN (Hawick, &c.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the case that salmon fishings in Scotland are the property of the Crown; and, whether, when such properties are for sale, he will take steps to put them up to public competition?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): Salmon fishings in Scotland are prima facie the property of the Crown; but a large proportion of them has been acquired by those who now possess them by ancient grant, or, more recently, by purchase from the Crown. No undertaking can be given that when the salmon fishings still belonging to the Crown are for sale they will be put up to public competition. The mode of sale must depend upon the circumstances of each case; but it has been assumed that the proprietors of the ex adverso lands are entitled to some consideration when a prerogative right of the Crown affecting their properties is disposed of.

MR. A. L. BROWN (Hawick, &c.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he will take steps to institute proceedings against river proprietors in Scotland who fish for salmon on parts of rivers for which they have no Charters?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): This Question relates to a matter with which the Lord Advocate could not interfere. The interests of the Crown in regard to salmon fishings are attended to by Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS — BOY CLERKS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camberne) (for Mr. JAMES STUART) (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Treasury will extend to Civil Service Writers the privilege now enjoyed by boy clerks in competing amongst themselves for a limited number of vacancies in the examinations for Lower Division Clerkships?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): Copyists, under the existing regulations, are allowed to deduct from their actual age, when competing for Lower Division Clerkships, any time not exceeding five years which they may have spent as registered copyists in the Civil Service. They have, therefore, already a great advantage over other competitors, and it is not considered desirable to give them the further privilege proposed by the hon. Member.

TRIALS BY JURY (IRELAND)—THE RETURN.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will grant the Return relating to Trials by Jury (Ireland), which stands on the Paper for Monday?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am informed that the information that the hon. Gentleman asks for cannot be prepared from official records; and, inasmuch as it would have to be based on matters of opinion, I am unable to hold out any hope of it being granted.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to give a Return showing, without any comment, the number of convictions and acquittals at the last Spring and Winter Assizes in Ireland?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, if Notice were given of the Question, no doubt the Attorney General for Ireland would answer it.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne) inquired whether the Chief Secretary would be prepared, in the course of a week or so, to provide a Return of the number of persons committed for trial, convicted by juries, and so forth; and, whether he would produce it before the termination of the debate on the Criminal Law Amendment Bill?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) replied, that if it was a Return that the Government could furnish it should be done. He would inquire into the matter; but the right hon. Gentleman was aware that there were difficulties in making out such a Return so that it would be intelligible.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—MOTION FOR URGENCY.

RESOLUTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [FOURTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Amendment proposed to the Question [22nd March],

"That the introduction and several stages of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion, including the Rules of Procedure, whenever the Bill shall be set down for consideration by the Government as the first business of the day."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

And which Amendment was,

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) said, that whatever might be the result of the Division upon the Amendment before the House, hon. Members would be of opinion that already the discussion had been of great service to the House and the country. It had forced the Government to lift the veil from a portion of their policy for Ireland, and to disclose to them part of their intentions with regard to land legislation. It had also enabled his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) to follow suit upon the Government, and to announce on his part, or on the part of the Government—he was not quite sure which—a fuller explanation of the Government land measure, giving them greater detail than was supplied by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour). He could not but comment on the extraordinary Constitutional novelty of this course. Never in his recollection had such a course been pursued in that House as that of a right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench expounding at greater length than the Government themselves a Government measure. Nor had it ever occurred that a Government had sat by without protest and heard the announcement of their own intentions from a right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench. Probably they might have further explanation of the same kind from the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) later on. He ventured to hope that they might have some further announcement of a Ministerial policy from that other Member of the Dissident Liberals who for the moment appeared to be in the confidence—if not in the Ministry—of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham devoted some part of his speech to proving his own consistency in regard to coercion, and to throwing some doubt on the consistency of many of his former Colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman said he had voted in 1881 and in 1882 for coercion, and that in 1885 he was prepared to support another Coercion Bill. No doubt, the technical record showed the right hon. Gentleman to be perfectly consistent; but the right hon. Gentleman did not go on to say that there were certain Members of the Government in 1885 who were strongly opposed to a policy of coercion. Some information on that point was at the same time derived from statements which appeared in The Birmingham Daily Post—which were regarded as authoritative—and which were certainly never denied. On the 22nd of May, 1885, The Birmingham Daily Post announced that—

"The opposition of Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Dilke to a policy of coercion is unmistakable, and the Radical section have made up their minds that the fullest extent they can go is that the Crimes Act shall run for one year only. In the event of the Government not taking this step they will resign their places."

Some time later the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) addressed a meeting, at which he informed them that, with the Liberals, coercion was a hateful incident, but with the Tories it was a policy. A subsequent announcement connected him with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and Sir Charles Dilke in taking up that attitude. He could not say whether that was accurate, but it was not denied. He had the privilege of being a Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham at that time, and was closely associated with him in many political aims and objects up to the period that the Home Rule Question was brought before Parliament by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). He then thought that the right hon. Gentleman and he agreed on a great many subjects, and especially on the subject of coercion; and if anyone had then foretold that the right hon. Gentleman might in the year 1887 be prepared to support a Coercion Bill brought in by a Conservative Government, he would have considered such a suggestion as that of a madman, and would have asked him to leave his room. Like the right hon. Member, he had voted for coercion in 1881 and 1882. When the Coercion Bill was introduced in 1881 the circumstances were very different to what they were at present. Crime was rife throughout Ireland; witnesses would not come forward, and juries would not convict. He soon found out, however, the mistake he had made in voting for the Bill, and he had ever since regretted having done so. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) himself went over to Ireland at the beginning of 1882, at the suggestion of the late Mr. Forster, and he saw the mischief that coercion was doing. He went to Loughrea, and was struck by the amount of crime that prevailed and the relations that still existed, in spite of coercion, between landlord and tenant. He was convinced that coercion was doing infinite mischief throughout the country, and he recollected suggesting to the late Mr. Forster at the time that it would be wise to drop coercion, to release the suspects, and to pass an Arrears Act. The Government did not do so then; but later on they carried an Arrears Act, accompanied, however, by a Coercion Act, which resulted from the Phoenix Park murders. Any person protesting against that Act at that time would not have been listened to; but even then he had great and grave misgivings as to its advisability. He believed that it would have been better then to trust only to the Arrears Act. He did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that the Crimes Act of 1882 had been a success; in his opinion any good that had taken place had been the result of the Arrears Act. It might be that the Crimes Act drove agitation below the surface; it had, at all events, created a strong feeling of disaffection against the Government, and led to many evil results. One effect had been entirely to destroy the Liberal Party in Ireland. Then came the proposal in 1885 to adopt another Coercion Act, and during the time that the Members of that Government were discussing whether there should be one or not, it turned out that the Tory Leaders had secretly come to a determination to oppose the renewal of coercion, and had made an agreement with the Irish Members below the Gangway, the result of which was that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was turned out of Office. When the Tory Government came in they did not propose coercion, and the sequel justified them in that course. It was quite certain that while Lord Carnarvon was Lord Lieutenant a very great improvement took place, which was even greater during Lord Aberdeen's term of Office. Well, he would ask—what had arisen between that time and the present to justify a return to coercion? All the difficulty which had since happened was due to the fact that the Government would not accept the measure proposed by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) last autumn, and had failed to meet the demands of the Irish Members to remedy the defects of the Land Act of 1881, and provide for the extraordinary agricultural emergency. He could not agree with his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham that the Land Act of 1881 had been a gigantic failure. In his opinion it had been, on the whole, a just and sound Act; it had already done a great deal of good, and it would be the foundation of more good throughout Ireland. The Land Act had not created dual ownership of land in Ireland, as some appeared to think; it had only given legal sanction to a state of things which existed in Ireland, not only in Ulster, but in other parts as well. It should be remembered that the Land Act had come into existence amid considerable difficulties, having been preceded by a Coercion Bill, which had predisposed the Irish people against it, and in that way done much to prevent its success. Another mistake was that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had neglected to consult Irish opinion in the framing of that Act, and also with regard to the Amendments which had been moved to it. If they looked at the debate upon the Act they would see that it had been moved by Irish Members to include leaseholders and the tenants of town parks, and it had also been contended that the term of judicial revision was too long, and that it should be reduced to five years. These contentions had been affirmed by Lord Cowper's Commission, whether the Government accepted them or not. Other Amendments had been pressed by hon. Members below the Gangway, which the House would not listen to; and it was his belief that if on that occasion they had listened to the Irish Members, and taken information on the subject of Ireland from them, the Act would have been to a great extent, if not wholly, a settlement of the Land Question, and would have been a remedial measure of far greater importance than it had actually been. As it was, however, the Act had been a measure of the greatest importance to Ireland. It had reduced rents to a very large extent, and had produced what he might call a common denomination, which would make it much easier to deal with the question in future. The great fall in prices which had taken place had not been wholly unexpected by hon. Members from Ireland. For shortly after the Land Act was passed the hon. Member for Cork, at a Convention held in Maryborough on the 16th September, 1881, made a remarkable speech, and one which showed there were wise men in Ireland who predicted the difficulties which were coming. The hon. Member for Cork in that speech said—

"He thought the tenants had better not go into the Courts for the purpose of getting a rent fixed. Rents, he said, for the statute term of 15 years were dangerous for the tenants to enter upon. They were at the commencement of a new system of American competition in corn and wheat, and no one would know whether before 15 years Irish land would be able to pay the rents or not. If they went into Court and asked to have a fair rent fixed, and that application were granted, the statutory term would be fixed for 15 years; and if after five or six years they found they were unable to pay the rent fixed, what position would they be in for obtaining the moral sympathy of the world if the landlord was able to point to their own action as the cause of these intolerable and impossible rents?"

That was an interesting statement for the hon. Member to make, and a wise prediction of what had actually occurred. Nobody now would deny—after reading the evidence given before Lord Cowper's Commission—that a very serious emergency had arisen in Ireland, resulting in very great difficulties to the tenants of that country, and imposing upon that House the necessity of providing a remedy. The Commissioners had not only pointed out the very serious fall in the prices of agricultural produce amounting to 18½ per cent, but also a number of other concurrent circumstances tending to increase the difficulties of the tenant. The question then was, whether the whole of the loss which the tenants had admittedly sustained ought to fall on one of the two parties to the dual ownership of land? Parliament had legalized a system of dual ownership, but they must take that system with all its conditions; and one of those conditions was this—that if a serious fall of prices occurred wholly unexpected after the determination of rent, it was not fair or just that the whole of that loss should fall only on one of the parties. It was, therefore, incumbent upon Parliament to do something to amend the Land Act of 1881, and to meet the difficulties of the tenant farmers. Now, all the difficulties which formed the foundation of the Government's measure of coercion arose from the agrarian question. Those difficulties would have been far greater but for the very great pressure put by the late Chief Secretary upon the landlords to reduce their rents, and for which he ought to have the gratitude of the people of Ireland, and also of this country. What had occurred on Lord Clanricarde's property was an illustration of what went on in Ireland. Some time ago he stated publicly that Lord Clanricarde had declined to make any abatement to his tenants; that he had reason to believe his Lordship's own agent—Mr. Joyce—had recommended that there should be an abatement; and that if he had done so the whole country would have been quiet. Lord Clanricarde wrote to the papers to say that was untruthful in making such a statement, and that the statement was not in accordance with fact. On turning, however, to the evidence before the Royal Commission, he found he was fully justified in his statement. Mr. Joyce stated before the Commission that he had recommended Lord Clanricarde to make small abatements of rent, but that Lord Clanricarde had declined to do so; and he added, in answer to a question put by Mr. Knipe, that "if that abatement had been given the whole country would have been quiet." The consequence was that evictions took place, scenes of disturbance ensued, and £1,400 was spent by the Government in car hire for the conveyance of the police and bailiffs engaged in them. Eventually 74 persons were sent for trial in connection with these disturbances, and by means of packed juries, were sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from 12 to 18 months. Later, in consequence of a strong letter from the Chief Secretary, Lord Clanricarde consented to make a reduction of 20 per cent; but there could be no doubt that if he had done this a few weeks before the disturbances in question would have been completely avoided. In his opinion, the story of the conduct of Lord Clanricarde and the Woodford evictions constituted a monstrous case of injustice, and what he asked was this—was it right and just to give any further facilities to men like Lord Clanricarde to exact rents, or was it not wiser, in the circumstances of Ireland, to legislate in the interest of the tenant farmers at the present time? He thought there could be but one answer to that question. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had enlarged and explained the Government proposals with regard to land legislation; but even with the right hon. Gentleman's explanation it was difficult to understand the exact nature of those proposals. It would appear that something in the nature of bankruptcy proceedings was to take place—that the Court on eviction was to be entitled to proceed upon some equitable bankruptcy jurisdiction and to remit rent in certain cases. That might be a very large or a very small proposal. If it was a large proposal, it most closely approximated to the scheme of the hon. Member for Cork; if, on the other hand, it was a very small one, it would be totally useless. He urged the Government to consider whether on the whole it would not be wiser at once to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork—supported as it was by the recommendation of Lord Cowper's Commission—rather than the proposal which they had now under consideration, which appeared to have come to them from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, and which, in all probability, would be inadequate for the occasion. His right hon. Friend very well and sufficiently explained the present position of the Liberal Party with regard to the Motion before the House, and the question of coercion when he said—and he thanked him for the words, which seemed to suggest his own ideas and wishes on the subject, if he were not trammelled by other unfortunate connections—

"The Liberal Party object to any measure in the nature of a Coercion Bill until, at all events, the remedial legislation which they desire has been successfully passed."

That appeared to exactly point out the present position of the Liberal Party on the subject. His right hon. Friend proceeded to state the principal arguments on which this was founded; but he omitted altogether one of the most important arguments on which they based their present objection to the proposal of the Government—namely, that coercion, especially at this moment, would inevitably ruin the remedial measures. It was on this point mainly that he relied for his objections to the course of the Government on the present occasion, and for his contention that by proceeding to coercion they would do infinite mischief to the present condition of Ireland. That was the strongest reason which weighed with him against coercion at the present time. It was, he thought, the lesson which they learnt from the legislation since the Act of Union. The cause had been the same in nearly every case; Irish grievances and Irish demands had been refused at the time when the demands were made in a Constitutional way. In consequence agricultural agitation and disturbance and outrage had occurred. England then found it necessary to legislate; but while remedying the grievances it had associated its remedies with coercion. He knew that it had been the doctrine of a certain class of Whig statesmen from early times—of whom the noble Mar-guess the Member for Rossendale was now the exponent—that we must put down disorder in Ireland a “judicious mixture” of coercion and remedial legislation; but it had always been an unsound one and a great mistake, and it would have been far wiser in every case to have postponed coercion, at all events, until they had seen the effect of their remedial measures. It was the doctrine of Lord Grey and Mr. Stanley in 1833, and of many other statesmen since; but it had always failed, and always would fail. He would quote on this point a few words from a Conservative statesman, delivered in 1833, on Lord Grey's Coercion Bill. The tithe agitation was then raging violently in Ireland, and the Government had promised to legislate on the subject; but meanwhile they brought in a Coercion Bill to put down disorder. Mr. Bulwer Lytton, afterwards Lord Lytton, in a very remarkable speech, said that—

“The question is how disorder and anarchy in Ireland are to be put down. The Government say by coercion tempered by concession. I say by concession, and concession only. I am sure that no people on the face of the earth can be governed by the system which His Majesty's Ministers propose. To-day coercion—to-morrow concession. . . . You flatter yourselves, that under shelter of those laws you will be able, with effect, to apply your remedial measures: it is just the reverse—they will blight all your remedies, and throw their own withering shadows over all your concessions.” —(3 Hansard, [15] 1234-1238.)

All the remedies tried by the Liberal Government failed till Lord Melbourne came into Office, and dropped coercion and took the Irish Leaders into his confidence and governed Ireland through them. The same lesson resulted from every other attempt to precede remedial measures with coercion. But there was one other argument he would state, and that was that the present occasion differed from any other that had hitherto occurred when Coercion Acts had been carried. He had searched through all the cases of the 86 Coercion Acts which had been passed since the Act of Union, and he found that there was not a single Act which had been passed by a Party vote, or otherwise than by the most unanimous vote of the English and Scotch Members. In the few cases where it had been tried to carry such a measure against any large section of English and Scotch Members it had failed. Thus, in 1834, Lord Grey was compelled to withdraw his second

Coercion Bill, and had to resign Office, because a majority of the Liberal Party was against him, and Sir Robert Peel was defeated in 1846 on a Coercion Bill by a combination. But there had not been a single case in which a Coercion Bill had been carried otherwise than by practical unanimity. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian had already pointed out that in no single case had a majority of the Irish Members been opposed to a Coercion Bill. The Act of 1833 was carried by a majority of 466 to 89, of whom 41 only were Irish Members. In 1881, 36 Members only voted against coercion, of whom three only were English Members and 33 Irish. In 1882 the Coercion Act was carried by 383 to 45, of whom nine only were English Members. The Government were now going to attempt to carry a measure against 86 out of 100 Irish Members and the great bulk of the Liberal Party. Had they considered the cost of this, and appreciated the results? A measure going to Ireland with the practically unanimous vote of English and Scotch Members would carry great force with it; but a measure going to Ireland carried by a Party vote, and with five-sixths of the Irish Members against it, would carry no weight and no sanction. It could not but have most serious effects. He should fear to predict the consequences. An hon. Friend of his quoted three nights ago a passage from Lord Macaulay in favour of coercion. He preferred Lord Macaulay when he spoke in opposition. There was a remarkable passage of his spoken at a time when it was proposed to put down the repeal agitation by force. He said—

“Force will not suffice. You cannot govern a gallant nation by the Law of Quarter Sessions; because it is in vain, though you have law on your side, if you have the people against you. There is only one power that can make the law strong, and that is the consent of those for whom the law is made.”

This was a consideration of a serious character; and he asked the Government—he asked the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale—to consider the effect of the measure they were now about to propose—to consider its effect in Ireland when going to it with that little sanction. He was lost in wonder at his noble Friend, as one of the traditional Whigs of the country, adopting so perilous a course—one so opposed to every principle of popular government.

[Fourth Night.]

In his humble opinion the Coercion Act could not fail to be mischievous in the highest degree. It would aggravate a hundredfold the difficulties in Ireland; and, worst of all, it must absolutely ruin and blight the prospects of whatever principle of good there might be in the best of remedial measures.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, it had been stated last night by the hon. Member for North Derry (Mr. Mulholland) that it was the opinion of the Unionist Members for the Province of Ulster that no drastic measure of land reform was required by that Province. He (Mr. T. W. Russell) desired to take the earliest opportunity of dissociating himself from the statement made by the hon. Member, and to state to the Government and to the House his conviction that, unless a very drastic measure of land reform was introduced and carried, the Ulster tenant farmers would be totally destroyed and lost. Hon. Gentlemen among whom he sat appeared to be perfectly clear as to the course they ought to pursue on this matter. He wished he could share their feelings and enjoy their apparent peace of mind. The Party to which they belonged had forged most of the 86 Coercion Acts which had appeared on the Statute Book. They were asked to believe that now they had turned over a new leaf, that they had entered upon a new stage, and that they were done for ever with all that sort of thing. They proposed the sharp and decisive remedy of throwing the Irish problem into a seething cauldron, and trusting that what went into the cauldron black would come out white. Like the illustrious author of The Apologia, they went through seas of trouble when they did their own thinking; but, like that eminent man, now that they had learnt the virtue of obedience and the duty of surrender to authority, all was peace, and they saw their way clear before them. For himself, he did not share their clearness of sight, nor had he their seeming peace of mind. He approached the consideration of the question unfettered by any Election pledges. [Ironical cheers.] The jeers of hon. Members below the Gangway pleased him more than their cheers; and, what was more to the purpose, they pleased his constituents better. Not having learnt the Irish Question by means of a holiday tour, he was aware, in June and July last, that the National League aimed at making all government in Ireland impossible; and on every platform on which he stood he declared, and with the warm approval of those who listened to him, that if the law proved weak and unsuitable, he would vote to strengthen it and make it suitable, and to make it apply to priest and peasant alike. That, he supposed, was flat blasphemy to hon. Members below the Gangway. What was he to do under those circumstances in the present emergency? He had listened with admiration to the speech of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley); but what was the pith of it? The right hon. Gentleman, on Tuesday night, admitted that one-eighth of the total area of Ireland was in a disturbed state. When the Assizes had to be adjourned, when trial by jury was admitted to be a farce, when contracts were openly scouted, when shop debts were almost irrecoverable, and ordinary morality was set aside, the disturbance of social order could not be denied to exist over that area. But what of parts of the country not included in that area? They were told by holiday tourists that the National League was a Constitutional body, and on all-fours with the Liberal Federation or the Conservative Association. Let them take a local branch of the National League and see what was their ordinary Sunday work. He was not quite certain that a good many hon. Members had not been humbugged in Ireland. He would tell them what the National League did. He would take a local branch outside the prescribed district, and show what their Sunday work was, and he was speaking of what he knew. A judgment in a family dispute was solemnly given by the Master of the Rolls in Dublin, and the local branch of the League presumed, on the following Sunday, to sit and reverse that judgment, and the authority of the local branch of the League was of more weight and power than the decision of the Master of the Rolls. That was Constitutional action, was it? Did the Liberal Federation do work like that? He would take the same local branch of the League. Three tenants sold their interest in their farms three years ago, and went to America. They came back to Ireland a few months ago and claimed their farms; and on Sunday the local branch of the League ordered the solicitor to produce the deeds, and sat in judgment on the question whether the farms should be restored to men who had got the money for them and gone to America. Was that the kind of work which the Liberal Federation or the Conservative Association professed to do? How about Boycotting? Respecting that, he wished to quote the testimony of the Rev. Canon Griffin, of Millstreet, who was not very popular with hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway; but it did not follow that a priest, because he dared to be an honest man and refused to bow the knee to the Baal of the National League, was not to be believed in that House. When examined before the Commissioners, Canon Griffin was asked—"And rents are being paid?" He answered—

"Well, I must say that during the entire agitation the rents were fairly paid, and any disturbances that took place in that district were not caused so much by disputes between landlords and tenants as by trade jealousies, which caused a great deal of Boycotting."

Asked whether he could give any information as to Boycotting, he said—

"That has been very extensively practised in my parish, and, in fact, it has been the curse there for the last five or six years."

Asked—"Does it continue in the same force?" He replied—"Yes; it does." Next he was asked—

"Is it aimed at persons who transgress the edicts of the League, or on what account is it effected?"

He answered—

"It commenced, I think, through trade jealousy in the town against one shopkeeper who was a very large trader there, and a very large farmer, but not a land-grabber in any way."

He further stated that

"the man's trade was nearly ruined as far as his shop business was concerned;"

and also that the school in the town was Boycotted and broken up, because the schoolmaster was a witness in a case of Boycotting, tried at Cork Assizes, and simply told the truth. The system of Boycotting was followed by murders, which were its ultimate sanction and only authority, and it was in issuing Boycotting notices and edicts that the local branches of the League spent their Sundays. Was that Constitutional work? But they were told that outrage had diminished; that there was no such case now as there was in 1881 and 1882 for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law; and they were asked for statistics showing the cause assigned for the demand for coercive legislation, when, as it was said, outrage had diminished. But what did the cessation of outrage mean? It was, to a great extent, true that it had ceased; but to his mind the fact covered a terrible truth. Why had outrage ceased? Because of the alliance between the National League and the official Liberal Party in England. That alliance never could have been maintained had crime and outrage stalked red-handed through the land. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen had better wait until he finished the sentence. The conscience of the Liberals of England would not have tolerated it; therefore, the outrages ceased, and intimidation and Boycotting took their place. But the power that could stop outrage in that way must have some knowledge of the criminals. If the League had the power to restrain them, how fearful was its guilt in the past—how terrible would be its responsibility in the future. Admitting the truth as to the extent of the area referred to by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley), he, for one, held that a case had been made out for interference of some kind. He was told that coercion had always failed. He asked, did the Westmeath Act fail? Did the Act of 1882 fail? When did these outrages cease? They ceased when they got the power to change the venue and when the treason-mongers and the murderers were brought from the South and West of Ireland to Green Street, Dublin, for trial. ["Oh, oh!"] He was speaking that which he knew, and he said that the Act of 1882 did its work as well as any Act that ever passed, and that the evil system began afresh when that Act unfortunately expired, and when hon. Gentlemen on that (the Conservative) side of the House refused to Lord Spencer the power which they ought to have given him. Well, what shape should the necessary interference now take? The right hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne declared for land reform as against what he called coercion. He (Mr. T. W. Russell) himself was in favour of land reform of the most drastic character. He did not believe that either the Act of 1870 or the Act of 1881 had been a total failure; he never would subscribe to any such statement inside or outside that

[Fourth Night.]

House, and he should like to know what the state of Ireland would have been if they had not had the Act of 1881? He, too, had read the evidence taken by Lord Cowper's Commission; and, with that evidence before them, the Government would have been culpable in the highest degree had they introduced a Bill for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law, and allowed the Land Question to drift. That, however, was not their declared policy. They proposed to deal with crime, to restore freedom to the individual, to enable every man to exercise his judgment freely and without fear, to bring to swift and stern justice those who represented the "Constitutional" Associations of the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Rowntree); and, believing in the policy of restoring the reign of law and dealing at once remedially and effectively with the Land Question, he, for one, should vote for urgency on that question. But he should do more than that. He should vote for urgency as required by the Government; but he would wait to see the Crimes Bill before he would make up his mind whether he would support it or not. What did he gather from the responsible Minister for Ireland in that House? This—that the Government intended to bring forward a Land Purchase Scheme. That appeared to be what was wanted to finally settle the Irish land difficulty. Now, he did not think there were half-a-dozen Members in that House who did not believe that a purchase scheme of some kind was at the bottom of the whole question. He was not prepared to throw the slightest obstacle in the way of such a scheme. Let them take any witness they liked in the Cowper Report—and he had carefully gone through all the evidence that was taken before the Commission—and they would find that they one and all declared for Land Purchase as the solution of the Land Question. Well, that was going to be done—or, rather, the Government had announced that they were going to try to carry such a scheme of purchase, and it was for that House to say whether or not that plan should be adopted. He was not going to cast stones at anyone on the Opposition side of the House; but it seemed to him that it ill became certain hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Benches near him to sneer at the proposal of the Government to admit the leaseholders to the benefit of the Land Act. Who but the Gentlemen sitting on that side of the House had kept the leaseholders out of the provisions of the Land Act of 1881? He, therefore, welcomed the promise of the Government in regard to the leaseholders, who had borne the burden almost until they could bear it no longer. They were the flower of the tenantry of Ireland, and he rejoiced that the Government had consented at last to listen to their passionate prayer. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), in the course of his speech last night, said that he would give the landlords of Ireland his note of hand for as much land as he wanted. The hon. and learned Member was then speaking as if he were speaking on behalf of the farmers of Ulster; but he (Mr. Russell) must tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that he had no authority to speak for the farmers of that Province. As soon as they got the opportunity, the farmers of Ulster sent the hon. and learned Member to Longford, which was not in Ulster. The farmers of Ulster were willing to pay a fair price for their holdings. What was the present campaign in Ulster? It was not a "No Rent" Campaign, but it was a "Fair Rent" Campaign. The hon. Member who stated, or insinuated, in that House that the tenant farmers of Ireland, and especially of Ulster, did not wish to meet their engagements did them an injustice; and in the name of the farmers of Ulster he (Mr. Russell) repudiated any such characterization of their hopes or wishes. He apologized to the House for intervening in the debate; but, speaking in the name of law-abiding people in Ulster, he considered that a case for urgency had been made out. He hoped that the Government would deal resolutely and firmly with crime, and not only with crime, but with incitements to crime as well; but, at the same time, they should not let out of their mind the thought that that was not the solution of the Irish difficulty. The solution rested on the Land Question; to that Ministers must bend themselves, and in that they must succeed, if they would solve it.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN) (Dublin, College Green) said, the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. T. W. Russell) was a temperance orator. Of the temperate nature of the man the House had many opportunities of forming a judgment. That hon. Gentleman had ruined the temperance movement in Ireland. He ruined the temperance movement in Ireland he was sorry to say, by his violence, his folly, and his fanaticism. The hon. Member said the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) had no right to speak for the tenant farmers of Ulster. Who, forsooth, had that right? The Irish Nationalists were the majority of the Representatives of Ulster, and, therefore, they or any man among them had a better right to speak for the people of Ulster than the hon. Member. The hon. Member sneered and jeered at Members who paid flying visits to Ireland; but the hon. Member had not long been in that country himself, and if he ventured to correct the impressions of those who paid flying visits, then the Irish Members who were born and bred there must take leave to correct the impressions of the hon. Member. They were natives of Ireland, like their forefathers; but the hon. Member was not. In saying that, he had no desire to throw any imputation whatever upon the land of his birth. Time was when Scotland and England seemed to be very hostile to the rights and claims of Ireland and its people; but, happily, that state of things had passed away, and they were now proud to recognize that since the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian introduced his Home Rule Bill a happy change had taken place in the feelings of the English and Scotch people. Ireland had now honest sympathizers in Britain, but the Party opposite desired to make the feeling of animosity eternal. What was it they argued? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. W. Russell) had admitted—for he could not deny it—that outrages had greatly declined. But they were confronted with this state of circumstances—that if crime was prevalent that was a serious accusation against the Nationalist Members; if crime was not prevalent that was worse again. They had been told that the Irish National League had subjugated the country, and that it was because of that subjugation there was an absence of crime. If it was a fact that 87 years after the Act of Union the National League—unsupported by bayonets or cannon—was able to supersede the written law of the British Parliament in Ireland, what evidence did it give with regard to the system and the condition of government that had prevailed in that country during all that time. He maintained that outrages and disturbances were inevitable in any country that was misgoverned, misruled, and grievously oppressed. Could they have in any part of the world such a system as that of Irish landlordism, and have peace, happiness, or contentment among the people. Could they have such a system of rule as that of Dublin Castle, and have no crime or outrage in the country? Such a thing was impossible. Some hon. Members seemed to revel in accounts of shootings, maimings, and murderings; and they would, apparently, be miserable if they could not do it. It was becoming a stale trick to produce a letter from someone whose name could not be revealed. The last time it was done the trick produced little sensation, and it appeared to be nearly played out. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) said that 86 jaw-bones were the weapons of the Irish National Party. When it came to a question of jaw or a question of bone, the hon. and gallant Member should be the last man to open his mouth, for he (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) ventured to say that in the matter of bone and of jaw the hon. and gallant Member was able to hold his own with any man on this side of Crim-Tartary. If Ireland was in a state of disorder and of disturbance and of anarchy, he asked who had the ruling of the people? If Ireland was in a state of anarchy and disorder, it was the fault of the British Parliament. It was admitted, and could not be denied, that the people were pretty much what circumstances and what history had made them. Who had had the making of the Irish character for so many hundreds of years? Who had had the ruling of these people, and why were they now found to be disaffected—or what the Tories called disloyal—engaging in combinations regardless of the law of the land and preferring very much the law made for themselves by themselves? The ruling of Ireland had been in the hands of the British Parliament for many a long year, for 87 years since the passing of the Act of Union, and a pretty mess indeed they had made of it. Was it not time to make a change? Had not this experiment of ruling Ireland from London by the votes and decision of people who knew nothing of the country—was it not time that that experiment, which had proved an utter and a disastrous failure, should be given up, and that recourse should be had to another and yet untried course which there was every reason to believe would produce very different and very much happier results? If Coercion Bills had not been tried before by all means try them; but if 86 or 87 of them had already been tried, and if at the end of them all Ireland was now in the condition in which she was represented to be, was not that fact a condemnation of the British system of rule and of their 87 Coercion Bills? After the new Coercion Bill was passed, and after its period expired, what was to be the state of things in Ireland? It was alleged that by virtue of this impending Act of Parliament the Government could put a large number of Irishmen into gaol. That was no new experience with the Irish people. The very centres and leaders of Irish National opinion in Ireland—a thousand of them were formerly put into gaol, and what was England the better for it to-day? Had the heart of the Irish people been intimidated thereby? Had the spirit of the Irish race been suppressed? Had the desire for Irish National independence been extinguished? Not a bit of it. By the Government's own showing the condition of Ireland to-day was, according to their point of view, as bad and as barren as ever it was. In these circumstances he read a condemnation of the system of rule, or rather of greivous misrule and hateful oppression, inflicted upon that country so long by the dominant power of Great Britain. He denied that there was anarchy in Ireland. He denied that the moral condition of the country was inferior to that of any other country on the face of the earth. He did not wish to go into unpleasant or invidious comparisons; but he challenged comparison between England and Ireland with regard to all crime and all offences outside the range of political and agrarian matters. There was a good deal that was disturbed, unsatisfactory, and unpleasant in relation to those two things; but the explanation was to be found in the state of agrarian and political legislation. He had heard frequent references in that House to the Ten Commandments. Any references to the Ten Commandments were usually cheered to the echo by the virtuous Tory Party; but, taking the Ten Commandments all round, he asserted that they were as well observed in Ireland as they were in England. They were as well observed by the peasants, and the labourers, and the farmers of Ireland as they were by the Tory aristocrats and the crème de la crème of the English aristocracy. The Tory Party liked to take their Ten Commandments with a certain abatement—with quite as large a reduction as the Irish tenant demanded off his rack-rent. The evidence of that could be seen in London day after day, and night after night—evidence of which they could read in the newspapers every day of the year, and these splendid Gentlemen who choose to relieve themselves of a very considerable degree of the latter half of the Ten Commandments cheered every reference to the Decalogue as if hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House were to be silenced thereby. On the behalf of his countrymen, and of those who represented them, he challenged the highly moral and exceedingly virtuous Tory Party with respect to the Ten Commandments, taking them all round. In the eyes of the Government anarchy consisted in the non-payment of rents, and in the payment of rack-rents they found the fulfilment of the whole Law and the Prophets. If the Irish people only paid rack-rents they might do anything else they pleased, but by not paying them they were denounced as worse than the publican and the heathen. He considered it the right and the duty of the Irish people to resist the payment of these infamous exactions. The men who tried to extort those rents from the Irish tenants ought to remember one at least of the Ten Commandments, which told them, "Thou shalt not steal." What had they been doing in Ireland for ages but stealing and plundering from the hard-working, the laborious, and the industrious classes of the country, and living in ease and luxury upon money they had never earned, by exacting rents upon land which they were pleased to call their own? At the very best, the landlords were only the part owners of the soil of Ireland. Many of them had had their fee simple paid 10 times over, and had rented the people upon their own improvements. They had confiscated these improvements, and he was justified in calling them thieves and robbers. What sort of persons were these Irish landlords who were perpetually appealing to the House against the tenant farmers of their country? In no country—except, perhaps, in Turkey—had there been so ruthless, so worthless, so vicious, and so bad a class as the Irish landlords. In England the country gentlemen held a certain position, and fulfilled certain duties. In Ireland they were simply an affliction and a burden upon the people—they did the people no service; they set them no good example. He would quote the description which appeared of the Irish landlords, not in any Nationalist newspaper, but in The Times. The Times, writing some years ago, made use of the following memorable words—

"It is no earthly use to go on abusing the Irish landlords. Their names stink already to the ends of the earth. We might as well go on expatiating for ever on the vices of tigers and wolves as to be saying every day what we think of a class which for selfishness and cruelty has no parallel, and never had a parallel, in the civilized world."

Those words were not published in an Irish Nationalist paper. They did not come from United Ireland. They did not come from The Nation. They did not come from any organ of sedition and disaffection. They came from The Times newspaper, and he hoped would be treated accordingly.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): What is the date?

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: It was some time towards the end of the year 1852. But he had yet to learn that the character of these gentlemen had beneficially changed since. The leopard had not changed his spots, and the character of the landlord class to-day was what it was then, save in so far as their power for cruelty and mischief had been restrained by the strong hand of the British Parliament. But he would, with the leave of the House, give them a more modern quotation—it came from a not unsympathetic source, being an extract from an article published in The Contemporary Review in January, 1882, and written by Professor Mahaffy, of Trinity College, Dublin. Professor Mahaffy described the Irish landlords as a most worthless, idle, and uneducated class, and described them as reading what they considered safe and sound newspapers, though in many cases these papers advocated views the very opposite of those held by members of their class, and gave the following illustration—

"An old M.P., who resides now in Dublin revisited some time ago the county which he had represented in Parliament, and upon going into the country club—an exceedingly Tory club—saw on the table The Pall Mall Gazette. As the paper had passed for more than six months into the hands of Mr. Morley as editor, and was producing almost daily his well-known articles on the Irish Land Question, my friend asked some members present how it was that they still took in The Pall Mall Gazette? They answered, of course, why not? It is the best and ablest Conservative paper—it always expresses our views precisely. He asked them had they observed anything odd about it lately? Had they read the articles on the Land Question? They said they had, but had noticed nothing strange. At last one man said, for the sake of appearing more shrewd on the question than any of the others. Yes, by the way, now that you mention it, I did think there was something odd about some of the articles I read lately; but, of course, as it was The Pall Mall Gazette I knew it was all right."

The Professor then stated that these people really had no idea beyond fox-hunting, sporting, and idleness, and seemed to think education a superfluity and unnecessary. He said—

"How often when I have been urging on parents the necessity of sending a boy to school have I heard the fatal formula, 'Oh, he doesn't require to go,' expressed in a tone of assumed modesty, as if I had made a social blunder by presuming that the boy was, like most of us, obliged to work for a living. 'What does he want with education?' said an old lady to me once in the same connection—'Isn't he a fine handsome boy?' 'and can't I keep him till he grows up? Then he will go over to England, and perhaps some rich lady will thrate herself to him.'"

That was the class of gentleman for whose benefit England was keeping Ireland in suffering misery, disgrace, and discontent. They constituted the "loyal minority" in Ireland. By going on in the same way England might always have a loyal minority in Ireland, but she will never have a loyal majority. It would pay England better if the majority in Ireland should at last have a taste of freedom, and of righteous justice, even though the loyal minority might consider themselves greatly and cruelly outraged thereby. The Bill that was to be brought before the House might be the result of imprisoning many a brave and honest man in Ireland who could easily be made out a criminal under the provisions of the Act. But he asked the hon. Gentleman to bear in mind this practical consideration—Will it help the landlords to recover their rents? No, he said it would not, but it would only create exasperation, it would cause suffering; it would excite a feeling of vengeance in the minds of many a cruelly wronged man, and the landlords of Ireland would be no nearer to their rack-rents in the end. He warned the House of this, although whenever an Irish Member gave utterance to words of warning honestly spoken; whenever an Irish Member said to the Government “Do not have recourse to this cruel and oppressive legislation, because the inevitable consequence will be disturbance and outrage and crime,” he was immediately charged with suggesting and inciting these disorders; but he had noticed, whenever other men declared that if a certain Act was passed by the House that it would be followed by disorder and disturbance in the North of Ireland, that these men were not called to Order in the same fashion. The noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), speaking the other night, rebuked the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) for using language of this character, although, with his usual manliness and candour, the noble Marquess acquitted the hon. Member for Cork of any intention to incite to disorder, but added that the hon. Member for Cork, while prognosticating crime and disorder, should have uttered serious words of warning against them. But why was not the same rule applied all round? Why did not the noble Marquess condemn the men who declared that if a certain Act were passed it would be followed by civil war in Ireland? Why did not the noble Marquess condemn these men because they did not, in the same breath, or at any time at all, say that disorder was a hateful thing and merited the condemnation of all men? Why did not the noble Marquess carry his wise advice to all points of the compass, and apply it to Lord Salisbury, who said of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who was then in Office—

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

“The Prime Minister and his Friends are meddling with edged tools of whose sharpness they have no conception, but which they will painfully find out if they pursue their insane career?”

This resulted not exactly in edged tools, but in the paving stones of Belfast. Lord Salisbury, speaking at the Westminster Palace Hotel, on Saturday, May 15, said—

“I have no doubt that he, Colonel Sanderson and the Ulstermen mean what they say, and if the time shall come they are the men to do what they say.”

Was not that an incitement to violence and outrage in the North? And the result was seen in the Belfast riots, which immediately followed. These were the direct results of such suggestions addressed to these excitable people by Lord Salisbury and by Gentlemen on the other side of the House who now held Office. He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) desired to say, in all honesty and all sincerity, that he feared the result of the coercive legislation about to be proposed. The result of any suppression of open political organization in Ireland, or interference with political writing or freedom of speech in Ireland, would inevitably be a recourse to secret councils, secret organizations, and the most terrible and deplorable crimes. He did not pose as a prophet when he said that. There was nothing new in it. It had not only been stated over and over again, but it was the teaching of history; it was a plain fact, written large over the history of Ireland, to which the eyes of hon. Members opposite, in some unaccountable way, were utterly blind. The Prime Minister, in a speech delivered a few days ago in Willis's Rooms, remarked that the Irish Leaders of the present day said very little in Ireland about Irish nationality, and that they seemed to have lost sight of the ways and means by which other peoples considering themselves aggrieved sought to obtain justice and freedom. He thought these were very ill-conceived words on the part of the Prime Minister, for they amounted to a plain incitement to the Irish people to have recourse to the pike and gun. The right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary had quite recently in that House used language which was exactly the opposite of that used by his uncle the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman said that certain quotations from the speeches of Irish Members were enough to prove his proposition, which was, in the first place, that the League aimed at political objects wholly alien to the question of combination for the purpose of exacting a fair rent; and, in the second place, that it aimed at this treasonable end by the spoliation of a particular class. Inasmuch as the uncle and the nephew were both engaged in the government of Ireland, they might as well take a little more pains to harmonize their views. The Irish Members were accused of being paid agitators—it was said they were carrying on agitation for the purpose of gain. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] He would like to know from the hon. Member opposite who cheered his words whether the Business of the British Government and Parliament was worked out on the voluntary principle? He would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House of Commons was in receipt of any salary for his services? He would like to know if the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary got any little consideration? He would like to know if there was a man on the Treasury Bench who did not draw pay from the pocket of the British taxpayers for serving his Queen and his country? Besides, there were many English and Scotch Members who, directly or indirectly, either themselves or through their relatives, were receiving pay, profit, and emolument. This imputation against the Irish Members would not stand for a moment under the consideration of a right-minded man. References were being made to American dollars. So long as the Irish landlords were getting the dollars they had no objection to them. The rack-rents of Ireland had been mainly paid by the earnings of hard-working Irish labourers in England, and by the savings of the Irish race in America. Long ago the rack-rents would have broken down but for the folly of these people in sending home the earnings of their hard toil and labour in foreign lands to pay those impossible rack-rents which the land itself never made, and the exaction of which was oppression and robbery. If they turned to the Blue Book of the Cowper Commission, they would find the story of a poor tenant, who asked the landlord for time until he got money from his children who were in service in England. What right had the landlords to the earnings of that man's children? No right whatever. The landlord had perhaps a legal right to some share of the profits of the farm, but he had no right to the earnings of the sons and daughters of his tenants in other parts of the world. Thank God, the day was near when that accursed system would come to an end; and even the proposed Land Bill of the present Tory Government, no matter how miserable and inadequate a measure it might be, would be another nail in the coffin of Irish landlordism. The Plan of Campaign had been censured in that House. His own opinion was that under circumstances of so much oppression and wrong there never was in any part of the world a public movement conducted with so little crime. They did not deny that there had been crimes—lamentable and disgraceful crimes—arising out of this unfortunate condition of things in Ireland; but it was impossible that such a condition of things could exist in any part of the world without crime. His hope, his trust, and his desire was that they might be near the end of the present unhappy condition of things. The only way he saw to end it was not in the invention of new Coercion Acts—not in a meddling and peddling with the Irish Land Question—but in the large, the safe, and the healing measure of Home Rule, and putting into the hands of the Irish people the right to adjust, to consider, and to manage their own affairs. He had no doubt whatever that the mind of England was coming round to that view of the case. He believed in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that the flowing tide was with them. There might be little signs of it just now in that House, but the fact was there nevertheless; and in that connection he was reminded of the words of one of their English poets—

"For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far off, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flowing in, the main."

He hoped and believed that the flood was rising, and that the two islands would soon be surrounded by a sea of peace, which would ebb no more.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport) said, the speech of the right hon. Member who had just sat down was amusing, rather violent, and very discursive. The point before the House was a very small one, and was confined within narrow limits. It was not the question whether coercive legislation, or, as he preferred to call it, quoting from the speech of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in 1881, "protective legislation"—for, in his (Mr. Curzon's) opinion, this Bill would protect far more numerous classes and individuals in Ireland than it would coerce—it was not the question whether these protective measures or remedial measures should exclusively occupy the attention of Parliament, but which of the two had the prior claim upon the time of that House? The Government accepted the Report of the Cowper Commission, and intended to make it the basis of legislative proposals. The attitude of hon. Members opposite with reference to this Commission interested him greatly. When the appointment of the Commission was first mooted it was sneered at and derided by hon. Members; but now they had changed their minds. [Home Rule cries of "No!"] He was speaking of hon. Members above the Gangway, who had changed their views with respect to this matter just as they had changed them on almost every conceivable point. They now endowed the Report with an almost canonical authority, and quoted carefully-selected and garbled passages from the evidence of individual witnesses with as much reverence as if they were inspired. The Government was at least so much in harmony with hon. Members opposite that they did not ignore the Commission, for they had heard from the Chief Secretary that the principal recommendations of the Commission would be embodied in legislation. But the main question now before them was not whether there should be remedial legislation; the question was whether the Land Bill that had been promised, or the Crimes Bill, should be given priority. A Government had no right to make such a demand as was now made unless they could declare that they had tried and exhausted all the ordinary forces of law, and could show that, while endeavouring to fulfil that duty, they had acted, not only with justice, but with patience, toleration, and forbearance. He appealed to hon. Members opposite whether the late Chief Secretary for Ireland had not shown in the discharge of his duties exemplary patience and humanity? They might feel certain that such a man would not have contemplated proposing to the House repressive legislation if all the ordinary Constitutional means of governing the country had not been tried in vain. Then the Government ought to be able to satisfy the House that they could make out a strong case, resting on plain and incontrovertible facts, and proving the incontestable need for exceptional powers. He felt sure that the present Chief Secretary would be able to make out such a case. Unreasonable complaints had been made that this statement of the Chief Secretary had not yet been delivered. Had he, however, attempted to make it in the course of that debate, he would have been out of Order. The statement would have been delivered before now but for the dilatory Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley). In calling the Amendment dilatory, he did not allude to the intention with which it was brought forward, but to the practical effect of its introduction. He trusted that hon. Members opposite would believe that it was with extreme reluctance that those on his side of the House approached legislation of this kind. The Government had been driven to this sorrowful necessity by the inexorable force of circumstances, which had been largely shaped and controlled by hon. Members below the Gangway opposite. It could not be a pleasant thing for a Government to signalize its first year of Office by the introduction of a Crimes Bill, and it was not a pleasant thing for new Members to find that their first year of Parliamentary life was to be signalized by the duty of supporting such a measure. [Ironical Home Rule cheers.] Hon. Members opposite were inclined to laugh when observations of this sort were made on his side of the House. The other night the right hon. Member for Newcastle made a remark which he was sure he would have readily withdrawn if he had known the pain it gave to hon. Members on the Ministerial Benches. He said Members on the Ministerial Benches were fond of reminding the House of the villainy of the Irish people; and when he (Mr. Ourzon) and others cried "No, no!" the right hon. Gentleman leaned over the Table, and, pointing at them, said—

"Oh, yes; the whole of this Bill is based on the theory that the Irish people are incorrigible."

He wished he could purge the minds of hon. Members of this baseless assumption. The Party to which he belonged gave full credit to their opponents for sincerity; and they respected the right hon. Member for Newcastle because they knew that he was consistent and converted on the subject of Home Rule at a time when all those Gentlemen who sat round him and now clamoured in his wake were steeped in original sin; and when even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) was engaged upon his famous 15 years' process of incubation over the wrongs of Ireland. Why should not Gentlemen on his side of the House be given credit for sincerity in their turn; why should they always be taunted with this supposed inherent belief in the depravity of the Irish character? If the Ministerial measure were considered to presuppose the immoral character of the Irish people, the enforcement of the Eighth Commandment in any civilized community must be held to presuppose that the bulk of the people were thieves. He admitted that sometimes they were likely to form unfavourable impressions of the Irish character from the exhibitions of it seen in that House. If they were compelled to form a diagnosis solely from the symptoms seen below the Gangway opposite, it might not be a very flattering one; but he could assure hon. Members from Ireland that a far higher opinion was entertained of their constituents than of themselves. On his side of the House, then, they repudiated the insinuations of want of feeling and humanity which were directed against them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had contended that there was no analogy between the year 1881 and the present time. But if priority was claimed for the Land Question now, as it was by hon. Members opposite, why was it not claimed in 1881? The answer was that the state of Ireland as regarded crime was infinitely worse then. But, he asked, was the state of the Irish tenant better? The ground on which the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said a Land Bill should have priority was that the state of the Irish tenant was urgent and extreme; but in 1881 the Irish tenant was in an infinitely worse condition. He did not enjoy the advantages of the Land Act of 1881, or the Arrears Act of 1882, or the various Purchase Acts. On all points and in every particular the position of the Irish tenant was infinitely worse in 1881; yet, in spite of this fact, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian did not hesitate to claim precedence for criminal over remedial legislation. The right hon. Gentleman would have none of this analogy, and begged them to find out another precedent. He had endeavoured to follow that advice, and would refer the right hon. Gentleman to the case of Sir Robert Peel in 1829. In that year he met Parliament with the statement that he intended to propose the repeal of Catholic disabilities; but before that he insisted on passing a coercive measure for the suppression of the Catholic Association. He would read an extract from the speech of Sir Robert Peel on that occasion defending the priority of coercive over remedial measures. His words were—

"Until the ascendancy of the laws in Ireland was vindicated he did not think they ought to be called upon to take into consideration the question of concessions. It was not intended on the part of the Government to propose any measures until this essential object should have been accomplished."

Those words might be used with equal force by Her Majesty's Government at the present moment. Upon the analogy of 1829, if not upon 1881 and 1882, he thought everyone would admit that if the Government were erring they were erring in very good company. It was further urged by hon. Members opposite that remedial measures, if they were introduced concurrently with, or posterior to, repressive measures, would be discredited and ineffective. He understood however, that whilst the Crimes Act was intended to strike at the criminals of Ireland, the remedial measures would apply to the tenants of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian defended his claim for the precedence of his Criminal Bill in 1881 on the ground that—terms. Those were not the men to be converted by remedial legislation. What they feared was personal consequences, and it was for the power of administering those consequences that they pleaded, and whether they had a sufficient case or not, it was idle to talk of governing the minds of such men by what was termed remedial legislation."

Now, the Bill of the Government was directed against those self-same dangerous classes; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said it was a Bill levelled at the tenants of Ireland. That suggested a connection between the tenants of Ireland and the dangerous classes. It was a curious thing that it should fall to one who was accused of having an incurable belief in the inherent villainy of the Irish character to repudiate such an insinuation. The Crimes Bill of the Government would not touch the tenants qua tenants, but only in so far as they chose to join the criminal classes of Ireland. Did hon. Gentlemen opposite say there were no dangerous classes in Ireland? They did not. Then they observed a creditable moderation. But they had heard again and again the statement that there was no exceptional lawlessness in Ireland, that there was nothing but sporadic disturbance in certain districts. When those statements were made about the law-abiding state of their country, he was constrained to ask whether hon. Members opposite read the daily papers. He was not speaking of publications which could, by any possibility, be said to be prejudiced or partial. He did not refer to the publications of the Loyal and Patriotic Union, nor to The Times, but to papers edited and under the control of hon. Members opposite, such as United Ireland and The Freeman's Journal. [Cries of "Read!" and "Quote!"] If he had known that the House would have given him permission to quote he would have come down prepared with bushels. He thought it impossible that anyone could read those papers and still talk of the absence of lawlessness in Ireland. Nor was it possible to read the speeches made by hon. Members opposite when St. George's Channel was between them and the English authorities without coming to the same conclusion. Hon. Members opposite reminded him of an ancient deity, the god Janus—they had two faces, one of peace and the other of war. They wore the face of peace when they wanted to dupe and cajole the

Mr. Curzon

English House of Commons, but they wore the face of war in Ireland when they wanted to hound on and inflame the Irish peasantry. Let hon. Members read the speeches made in Ireland by Mr. William O'Brien, a gentleman who was cheered on that side of the House, because he was what he was—namely, a perfect firebrand of sedition in Ireland, scattering sparks of lawlessness and disorder wherever he went. It appeared to him that hon. Gentlemen opposite made a mistake which was not uncommon—they saw one set of facts with extreme and almost abnormal clearness; they saw the misery and distress that prevailed in many parts of Ireland; they saw the hardships of evictions; they saw the unjust cases where tenants, perhaps, received an insufficient reduction of rent or no reduction at all—they saw these things, and, feeling them profoundly, they came to that House and built upon those facts a moving and pathetic appeal. But there was another set of facts of which they saw nothing—that the greater part of Ireland was at the present moment given up to a successful rebellion against the law of the land. Various reasons had been given for the absence of serious crime in Ireland. They had been told by the right hon. Member for Birmingham that the fear of the bullet had made the use of the bullet unnecessary. It was said that violent outrages were not committed, because no man was so foolhardy as to place himself in the position of a possible victim. That explanation was advanced by many much better informed Members than himself (Mr. Curzon), but there was another explanation which had not yet been given. What was the particular quality and complexion of the crimes that were not now committed? They were precisely those very crimes with which the existing law, weak and impotent though it might be, was still strong enough to grapple. The average Moonlighter was the most contemptible specimen of humanity on the face of the earth, but even he obeyed the first instinct of Nature—the law of self-preservation. He worked with a mask on his face, he skulked behind hedges and fired through windows, and conducted his operations under the convenient shelter of the night. Whatever danger he inflicted on life and limb he never endangered his own skin. The absence of open murder, assassination, and outrage in Ireland was due not so much to suddenly acquired scruples on the part of the Moonlighter, as to his timidity and personal alarm.

MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): What will this Bill do for him?

MR. CURZON said, he hoped it would put him in the position he ought to be in—in a gaol of the country. He was, further, quite prepared to admit a greater part of what had been said on the other side, to the effect that lawlessness did not largely prevail in Ireland at the present time. The majority of the people were "law-abiding;" but the law which they respected was not the law of the land but the law of the League. Facts showed that whatever might be the case with regard to crimes of violence, outrages did exist, and the administration of justice had very nearly ceased in Ireland; and there was an absolute repudiation of all social contracts, at any rate of contracts relating to land—those very contracts which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said last night—and he was cheered to the echo for saying so—that it was the primary duty of the Government to maintain. The House would, no doubt, be told, as they had been told over and over again, that coercion was no remedy for the wrongs of Ireland. He admitted that. They had often heard in the House of Commons about the wrongs inflicted upon Ireland by England in the past; they might or might not be real and genuine and deplorable, but that was not the question now before the House. They had been told that a large number of those wrongs had been inflicted by Statute law, and that this law was hated by the Irish because it came to them in a foreign garb. But whatever might be the wrongs inflicted upon Ireland by England in the past—and he believed that they had been expiated by honest repentance on the part of the present generation, and by an ample atonement on the part of the British Parliament—the sum total of all those wrongs, whether real or imaginary, would not approximate to one-tenth part of the wrong which would be inflicted on Ireland by England at the present moment if the British Government allowed all law, Statute law and the moral law, to be trampled under foot. It was because he believed that the proposals of the Government were intended to re-enact, by the agency of the Statute law, the moral law which was now in abeyance in Ireland that he would support the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury and vote against the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) said, the hon. Gentleman had admitted that a Government bringing forward such a measure as a Coercion Bill ought to state the facts and the evidence on which they relied. But this was just the course that Her Majesty's Government had not taken. It would have been quite possible for the Government to have introduced their Bill, and laid before the House the grounds upon which they based it before asking that it should have precedence. He was by no means opposed to all coercion, and did not deny that circumstances might render exceptional repressive measures necessary. But before the Government asked for special facilities for such a measure, they ought clearly and distinctly to make out their case. In the present instance they had failed to do this, and he could not support them, especially as it was to be noticed that this was the first occasion on which it was proposed to bring in coercion against the views of a majority of the Representatives from Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had not met these two points, but had shown himself as very anxious to hide the iron hand of the Government under the velvet glove—under the promises of land legislation. Exceptional repressive measures such as the Government were about to introduce ought not to be levelled against political opponents; but it was the National League that the Government were really aiming at, and not the prevention of the small number of outrages that now took place in Ireland. With reference to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay), he should like to know whether, if the hon. and learned Gentleman was not going to vote for coercion, he was going to vote for conciliation? The hon. and learned Member had said the proposed legislation was not coercion, because it meant the emancipation of a large portion of the Irish nation. From whom had the hon. and learned Gentleman gathered that? Had he learnt it in Ireland? Or from the Representatives of the Irish people? He thought the voice of Ireland which the hon. and learned Gentleman heard must have been that of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson). The hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay) had accused the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) of half-heartedness in opposing this Motion. He would remind the hon. and learned Member that although the verdict of the constituencies was against Home Rule, yet the other side received from the constituencies no mandate in favour of coercion. If there were any half-heartedness it was on the part of Her Majesty's Government, who were hounded on by the hysterical screams of The Times, and by the fiery eloquence of such full-blooded enthusiasts as the noble Lord the Member for North Devon (Viscount Lynton). For himself, he refused to be a party to handing over a blank cheque to a Government of forcible feebleness who were being urged to their destruction by a Brummagem Strafford and a bogus Castlereagh. They were told that if this Coercion Bill were passed the Government would bring in remedial measures. This was like using a cane to a sick child, and promising to call in the doctor in three months; but he had no confidence in the sort of parental despotism which the Government sought to set up. It was because he held this Coercion Bill to be against the interests of law and order, and because he believed the policy of the Government tended rather to separation than the union of the Empire, that he felt it his duty to protest against the introduction of this Bill.

MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon) said, that the Government had been charged with preventing matters in which the House was interested from being brought forward; but the fact was that the Irish Question had gone on for Session after Session, until there were a vast amount of English matters blocked in a way that was becoming unbearable to the constituencies of this country. By the course they had taken the Government improved the chance which English Business had of obtaining the attention of Parliament. No one could sympathize more than he did with the small farmers of Ireland; but he was sure that the interests of the farmers would never be advanced by allowing laws which remained on the Statute Book to be broken. He was most anxious that everything should be done to improve the position of Irish occupiers of land; but he could not believe, as they were told, that an abatement of 20 or 30 per cent in rents of £2 or £3 a-year would bring contentment to Irish peasant homes. If something was to be done for the Irish peasants, they should be first shown that the law must be upheld, and then a remedy should be found for their distress. He thoroughly believed, and he had always maintained, that it was far more for the interest of the working classes that the law should be upheld with firmness than it was for that of the rich. If Ireland had been so badly treated as had been represented—and that she had not been treated fairly in connection with many matters he would be among the first to admit—he thought that the Leaders of the Opposition ought to bear in mind that, during the 35 or 40 years they had been in power, they had allowed so many Irish grievances to exist of such a nature, that it was now said that they almost justified breaking of the law. He sincerely hoped that this subject would be treated as a matter of emergency, and that the Government would enforce the maintenance of the law, and relieve the poor people of Ireland, or of any other part of the United Kingdom, from the tyranny of their neighbours, who would not allow them to have those liberties which every Englishman ought to be able to enjoy, merely because they differed from them on a question of politics. If the Irish Members opposite would agree that the stamping out of crime was in all countries a matter of urgency, and would put forward reasonable demands, they would speedily gain the ear of Conservative Representatives for those demands, and would also have the support of the English constituencies in obtaining a remedy for the misfortunes and grievances under which their country had undoubtedly suffered to a considerable extent.

Mr. H. Gardner

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): The hon. Member for the Malden Division of Essex (Mr. Gray), who preceded me in this debate, assured the Representatives of Ireland that, if they came to this House and told us what Ireland really wanted, he and those who acted with him would try to meet their wishes. Why, Sir, the Government which the hon. Member supports have sent their own men to make inquiry in Ireland, and have proved that, so far from listening to the representation of the Irish Members, they will not even listen to their own Commissioners. The hon. Member seems to think that the Government in taking, as they propose to do, what will practically be the whole time of this House till after Whitsuntide, are taking the best course to help private Members. It is more reasonable to say that there are enormous arrears of legislation urgently demanded by Great Britain. And there are vital reforms, which it is essential to the welfare of Englishmen to obtain, and which they rightly think to be quite as urgent and important as any of the questions affecting Ireland. I should be out of Order if I discussed these reforms; but I am expressing the opinion of the whole House, when I say that the disastrous position of the agricultural interest, the revision of local taxation, and technical education for the people of this country, are matters of urgent and immediate importance. What I maintain is, that whatever may be the pledges of hon. Members, whether for or against coercion, hon. Members on all sides of this House have pledged themselves to their constituents to do their utmost to press forward these reforms. The utterly unprecedented number of Bills and Resolutions on the Order Book show that hon. Members are willing and anxious to throw all their energies into this work. Well, Sir, I think, wholly irrespective of coercion, it was imperative on the Government, in the face of such circumstances as these, when they asked for the whole time of the House to make a complete and conclusive statement of the arguments which led them to take this course. But no statement, no coherent argument has been offered. The First Lord of the Treasury does not agree with the Chief Secretary, and the Chief Secretary does not agree with himself. The First Lord of the Treasury gave the House to understand that the whole of Ireland was in a state of disorder. But after the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. John Morley), the Chief Secretary had, in the beginning of his speech, to allow that disturbance was only local in Ireland, and did not cover more than one-eighth of the country; and yet, as he went on in his singular, haphazard harangue, and reached higher flights of rhetoric, he spoke of the whole fabric of society in Ireland crumbling to its primeval atoms. If the Government have failed to tell us why they need coercive powers, they have as conspicuously abstained from defining what sort of coercion they are going to introduce. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) last night showed an extreme anxiety to supply something of the backbone which the Government so woefully lack; but he felt himself obliged to take an attitude of temporizing scepticism, and would not pledge himself to take this leap in the dark and vote for the Bill of the Government till he saw what it was. And yet, at the same time, he was so illogical as to urge his Unionist Friends to support the Government on this occasion, and to give them the power to force the House and the country to take this leap in the dark. The only thing that was clear was that the Government were determined to persist in the fatal error adopted last August. The House will remember that the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), in the speech which ushered in his brief Leadership, declared, as the policy of the Government, that they would treat social order as a thing apart, and not as dependent on remedial legislation. Ireland could wait, and they would send Commissioners to inquire into the real aspects of Irish questions. Then, at Bradford, the noble Lord gave as the apology for the delay of the Government that they would not legislate "until they knew." Well, our contention is, that they will not legislate even when they do know. They have sent the best men they could to Ireland, they have given them carte blanche, they have enabled them to call the most capable witnesses; an exhaustive inquiry has resulted in a volume of evidence which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) rightly characterizes as the most important document on the condition of Ireland ever laid before this House. And yet, Sir, we find the Government ready to cast to the winds the practical recommendations of their own Commissioners, and to give the preference apparently to brand-new theoretical schemes from that Birmingham mint; with the ever changing political currency of which we were so familiar last spring, when, as hon. Members will recall, each week there was a new issue, with a new die and a new superscription. As I have said, the Government is persisting in their policy of August in spite of their own Commissioners' Report. If we could gather anything from the speech of the Chief Secretary, it was that he would firmly maintain the sacredness of contracts, and uphold the judicially fixed rents. That makes one call to mind once more the remarkable speech of the Prime Minister at the beginning of the last Session. Lord Salisbury said, in the House of Lords, that if rents had really become impossible, the loss by the difference between the possible rent now, and the rent judicially fixed, should fall, not on the Irish landlords, but on the State—that is, of course, on the taxpayers of England, Scotland, and Wales. Now, if the Chief Secretary were in his place, I should challenge him, and ask him, why he has not the courage of his convictions, why he cannot carry out such a policy, which would at least be equally fair to tenant and to landlord? Why, Sir, can he not adopt the recommendation of his own Commission, and at once carry out a revision of the judicial rents; and, why can he not also bring in a Bill to make good the difference out of the Consolidated Fund? The answer is obvious. It is cheaper, and easier, and less risky to coerce the poor Irish tenant, who is far away, and weak, and helpless, who is groaning under the semi-Russian despotism, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham once so eloquently denounced, and who is, as that right hon. Gentleman pointed out, at the mercy of 30,000 bayonets. It is easier, I say, to do this than it is to face the free and independent taxpayer of Great Britain, who is at our doors, who has free speech, free right of meeting, and who will challenge the action of the Government and insist on a just consideration of his claims. Does the Report of the Commission justify a resort to coercion? The Commissioners do not recommend coercion, but only a firm maintenance of the ordinary law. Last night we were treated to a singular display of fraternal criticism from the right hon. Member for West Birmingham on the right hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne. He quoted a passage in which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley) said that it was not inconsistent with, that it was part and parcel of the Liberal creed not to hesitate to deal with outbreaks of violence. But, Sir, that is just the difference. We Liberals and Radicals are always prepared to deal vigorously with outrage and crime. We do not need to call for un-Constitutional powers. We hold that coercion is the avowal of weakness. Liberalism and Radicalism are strong to repress wrong, because they have a strict regard to justice. And I would say, what I am sure our Members on this side of the House will confirm, that my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne showed in that short period in which he was Chief Secretary for Ireland (that period which will remain a bright page of Irish history) just this quality. He had but one great opportunity, and that was afforded him by the disgraceful and sanguinary riots at Belfast—riots which, I have no hesitation in saying, were the direct and obvious result of the reckless and inflammatory address of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington. My right hon. Friend showed firmness, justice, and impartiality in dealing with the Belfast riots. I do not think any of us doubt, that if similar occasions had arisen in the Catholic Provinces of Ireland, he would have shown the same resolution and the same impartiality in putting down public violence. But happily the rest of Ireland was peaceful. They had learned the lesson of hope, and had fixed their trust on a great Englishman and a great English Party. The Government have a still stronger warning in the separate Report of Mr. Knipe, which has been so long delayed, and was only laid two days ago on the Table of this House. Mr. Knipe says—

“ I think that any attempt to meet agrarian crime and outrage, which unfortunately prevail

in certain districts, by any fresh coercive legislation will now, as in the past, not only fail to secure the tranquillity of the country, but will inevitably end in seriously aggravating the present difficulties."

The real source of trouble, he pointed out, was the strained relations between landlord and tenant, because rents had become impossible. It was at the Rent Question that the Government must strike, if they wished to pacify and gain the confidence of the Irish people. I would beg the attention of Liberal Unionists to Mr. Knipe's advice; for Mr. Knipe is speaking not as a Nationalist, but as an Ulster Liberal Unionist. The Government have disregarded Mr. Knipe's advice, and seem to have made up their minds that coercion is the best way to improve the relations between landlord and tenant. They have determined to crush by force the combinations of the tenants against rents which the Government's own Commission prove incontestably to be unjust. They seem to think the happiest solution of Irish difficulties is to drive, by force, the tenants of Ireland into whichever of the gigantic, universal, compulsory schemes of State purchase has been excoogitated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham for the present emergency of the Government. What is the real reason the Government have thrown over their own advisers? It is the old reason, the exasperation of failure. The Government, the Unionist Party, as it calls itself, has missed a golden opportunity. It is easy to denounce and deride the objects of the Unionists. But it is possible also to state the Unionist creed in noble and generous terms. And I have no doubt there are Unionists in this House, who would find the ideal of Unionist policy in words used many years ago in "another place"—

"We contracted, when we assumed the dominion of Ireland, a solemn duty, that we would give to that country the same amount of benefit as it would have received from an independent domestic Legislature, really representing the wants, the feelings, and the wishes of the Irish People."

If the Unionist Party last summer, when they had the clear and undoubted facts before them, when they were fresh from that "irreversible and final verdict of the country," of which we heard so much, when they had that magnificent majority at their backs; if they had seized the occasion for proving that they were the true friends of the suffering Irish people, then it was just conceivable, from the standpoint of a Unionist, that they might have won for themselves the noble title of being the salvation of Ireland. They have preferred to leave the work and the reward to the National League, and their failure is complete, and that is the key-note of their cry for coercion. What is the spirit in which the Government approach this task? Why, in the speech by the First Lord of the Treasury, and in that of the Chief Secretary also, there is not a word of sorrow or regret—not a single apology for their proposal to abridge the Constitutional liberties of Irishmen. I am almost tempted to wonder whether any Member of the present Government has read and considered the speeches of past statesmen who have proposed coercive measures, such as the noble and generous speech of Lord Grey in 1833, when he spoke with pain and sorrow at the necessity he felt, and said—

"Such powers are only to be exercised in extraordinary circumstances, and are such as, if permanently established, are incompatible with free institutions; if resorted to on all occasions, must prove destructive to every free Government."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne referred the other night to the singular evidence which Captain Hamilton, the hon. Secretary to the Property Defence Association, gave before the Royal Commission, and I will read to the House the last answer which that Gentleman gave—an answer which seems to me to stamp him as the apostle of prompt and pitiless eviction. In reply to the question, "What further suggestions he wished to make?" Captain Hamilton said—

"The only thing that occurs to me is to make the law as short as possible. What I always do is to sell the farm at once; the hold the tenant has is the six months allowed under ejectment for redemption, and that is one thing that, if it could be prevented, it would be of great advantage. In view of the combination among tenants banking their money, the only way is to show them that they must pay, whether they bank or not, and the only terror you can hold over the tenants is to say, 'I will sell your farm, and knock down your house, if necessary.'"

It seems to me that it is in the temper of men like Captain Hamilton, rather than in the grave, and dignified apologetic spirit of great statesmen like Lord Grey, that the Government are introducing their proposals. We are face to face with coercion, that does not explain, does not apologize for itself—with coercion impenitent and unredeemed by a single touch of generosity. But I may venture to say also we are face to face with coercion in its unhonoured decrepitude, with coercion in the sere and yellow leaf, which the strong and wholesome breezes of democracy will promptly sweep for ever into the dust, which is its fitting resting place. It was hard to understand how the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham could support the Government in so miserable and so ruinous a policy, when one remembered the forcible words of a speech delivered only a year or two ago, in which he bitterly characterized the want of sympathy Lord Salisbury showed for the sufferings of the Irish tenants. The difference between all the circumstances when coercion was last resorted to, and the present situation, when no reason, substantial or otherwise, had been put forward for such a course, was enormous. I would wish to ask the Liberal Unionists, in the face of this enormous and striking contrast, whether it would not be wiser for them in time to reconsider the vote they are about to give; whether it would not be wiser for their own future interests; whether, apart from interest and on the higher ground of conscience, it would not be better in view of the pledges many of them had given again and again on public platforms throughout the country; and whether they are really determined to identify themselves with a failing and a hopeless cause, and resolved to go into the Division Lobby in support of a policy to which they saw the entire democracy of the United Kingdom were opposed. I do not know that I can more appropriately conclude these remarks than by quoting some weighty words from the noble speech delivered by Lord Grey in 1846 on the state of Ireland, in which he denounced the unwisdom and the hopelessness of the policy of coercion persisted in by the Conservative Ministry of that day. It seems to me that every word applies with equal force to the present Ministry on the present occasion. After pointing out that the Tory Ministry of 1846 refused to supply any real remedy for the miseries of Ireland, Lord Grey said—

“Her Majesty’s Government propose only to go on with measures such as those we have tried over and over again—measures which have allowed all the evils of Ireland to go on, as I have shown, and rather to get worse rather than better. They propose doggedly to pursue the old and beaten track. How, then, can they expect that it should lead to any but the accustomed termination? Two words, ‘money’ and ‘coercion,’ seem to describe the whole policy of the Government. . . . Both have been tried over and over again, and we see in the state of Ireland the most convincing proof that by themselves they hold out no hope of success.”
—(3 Hansard, [84] 1847-80.)

Mr. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen’s Co., Ossory) said, the Government exercised a wise discretion in not putting up any of their Members to reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), because that speech completely pulverized the case of the Government. He said the case of the Government, but practically the Government had no case at all, and it could not be said even by their best friends that the Government had seriously tried to make a case. He had heard many speeches from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), but he had never heard the right hon. Gentleman say anything yet—he had never yet heard the right hon. Gentleman say anything that was pointed, that was forcible, that was conclusive; and he thought when they considered the demands the Government were making on the House, no speech could be more feeble or more pointless than the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman took refuge in generalities. He said that Ireland was disorganized, and that expression seemed to serve him in good stead, for he used it several times during the course of a short speech. He said that juries were intimidated and that criminals were going about the country scot-free and unpunished, though Judges had declared they ought to be convicted. He (Mr. Macdonald) did not know what particular instances the right hon. Gentleman had in his mind—if the right hon. Gentleman had in his mind any instance at all with regard to the necessity for coercion, viewing the condition of the country. It seemed to him that the observation was made in that kind of vague talk in which the right hon. Gentleman usually indulged; but he remembered a case pretty distinctly in which an Orangeman committed a murder which was declared to be such by a Judge—and yet a jury of Orangemen acquitted the prisoner. Whether it was to meet such a case as that the Coercion Act was introduced he did not know, but if so, the right hon. Gentleman's friends in the North of Ireland would not be thankful to him.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Will the hon. Gentleman name the case he refers to?

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: The case of the Walkers. He did not think the case for the Government was very much mended by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It seemed to him to be more like a speech in a young men's debating society, rather than of the character they were accustomed to listen to from Ministers. With regard to the Chief Secretary's description of the National League being merely an alias for the Land League, he pointed out that there was a vast distinction between the old Land League in operation in 1880-81, and the National League which existed now. Many of the most prominent persons associated with the old Land League were no longer connected with the National League. The persons who were connected with the National League were hon. Members of that House, and they could be brought to the bar of the House and of the public opinion of the country to account for their conduct if they pursued any course which deserved serious censure. He contended that no case had been made out for coercion. No exceptional crime existed in Ireland as a whole. There was disorder in a few districts, but this was solely due to the action of the landlords. If the Government, therefore, introduced reforms neutralizing the action of the landlords, they would get rid of whatever disturbance might exist. Hon. Members who contended that if the land system in Ireland were reformed or settled there would be an end to the demand for Home Rule, must be singularly ignorant of Irish history, and particularly of the events that had happened in that country during recent years. The very soul of Irish agitation for a long period had been the demand for self-government.

In 1843 the great agitation of O'Connell was based, not on a reform of the land system, but on the repeal of the Union; and so in 1885 the hon. Member for the City of Cork, as the Leader of Home Rule, doubled his strength in that House on the same demand—he would say the indestructible demand—of the Irish people for self-government. That was still the great want of the people of Ireland, and until it was granted there would be no satisfactory settlement of the difficulty. Not a few hon. Members must have been puzzled to discover the real object of the coercive policy of the Government. It could not be the suppression of secret societies, for it had been shown that there were none, and it could not be in consequence of the general prevalence of crime, because since 1880 there had been an enormous decrease of crime in the country. This had been proved to the House by the production of very remarkable statistics, and the charges of the Judges to the Grand Juries throughout Ireland might be adduced in strong confirmation of the statement. It was, therefore, not the state of crime in Ireland which induced the Government to bring forward a Coercion Bill; neither could it be on account of Boycotting, because Lord Salisbury himself had told them that Boycotting was a thing which no law could deal with. Moreover, Boycotting was in full force last autumn; and, if the practice could be reached by coercive legislation, why was not such legislation proposed then? He could only suppose that the Coercion Bill was to be introduced in order to prevent the carrying out of the Plan of Campaign; but even if they made it too dangerous for the Irish Members to do so, the people themselves would be quite able to carry out the Plan, in spite of all their repressive enactments, by means of secret combinations. Further, he warned the Government that even if they obtained the exceptional powers which they demanded, they would never break the spirit of the Irish people, who had resisted all the efforts made through many centuries to accomplish their subjugation by force, and would still continue to do so. He trusted the House would not assent to the Motion of the Government, whose object it was to destroy all hope of peace in Ireland.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat

(Mr. Macdonald) always secured the sympathetic attention of the House and set an example to some of his Friends in the earnestness with which he spoke, but which had carried the House a long way from the issue before it. He would like, with the permission of the Speaker, to draw the attention of the House to the very simple issue which was before it. They were not there to discuss hypothetical measures, which the hon. Member had presented, or to discuss that measure on its details. They were there to discuss the graver question, whether law and justice had been paralyzed in Ireland, and whether paralysis of law and justice justified the Government of this country in asking for exceptional advantages in prescribing great remedial measures. Before he addressed himself in a few words to the direct issue, he would like to say a word or two about the incident which occurred the previous evening, and in which he thought he should secure the sympathy of some hon. Members on that side of the House. It seemed to him that after the brilliant speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that it was distinctly the duty of some Member on the Front Bench to get up and reply to it. He and others felt that the fact of the dinner hour intervening at 8 o'clock was not a sufficient excuse for Members on either Front Bench to refrain from speaking when some one of great experience was, and authority in the House had presented the case from the opposite side, not merely to the Benches they saw around them, but to the country. It seemed to him that it was not fair to their own people outside the House, nor quite fair to hon. Members who represented Conservatism there, that that speech should have gone by default for two or three hours, as it would appear to the country as if the great conjurer—who had conjured so often with the House—had no one on the Opposition Benches who was competent and willing to answer him. The only excuse, if it was an excuse, was that Ministers were addressing, possibly, Benches. They had in the Reporters' Gallery, however, friends who performed many services on many occasions, and who formed the conduit pipe between that House and the country, and who would take good care that whatever was worth repeating and reporting was reported

duly the following morning. Hon. Members were not there to perform an intellectual and political parade. They were there to answer each other on the one side of the House and the other. Now, having said this, he should like to refer to one or two parts of the right hon. Gentleman's speech to which an answer had not yet been given. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech by a very dexterous side issue, which had nothing whatever to do with the issue before the House. He occupied one-third of his address in showing that the parallel between the cases of 1881 and 1887 did not hold good, and for this reason—that whilst he introduced his measure at the beginning of the Session, the present Government introduced it two months after the Session had commenced, and when they were in the middle of a discussion on the affairs of the country. The fact that the Bill of 1881 was introduced at the beginning of the Session, when there was, therefore, more time to discuss it, seemed to him to demand less instead of more urgency than when such a Bill was introduced later on. Besides, two months, it must be remembered, had been occupied in preparing the machinery necessary before they could pass the Bill which they deemed to be most essential for the community if it was to be preserved from disintegration. This was the preliminary part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech; but he went on to challenge the Government that the state of Ireland did not justify exceptional advantages being given to the Government to carry a measure of repression. He should quote a few extracts more powerful and more judicial than anything hitherto laid before the House. The authorities he would quote were in an absolutely neutral position. He proposed to read two or three short sentences from the addresses of several of the Irish Judges to the Grand Juries in Ireland, not two, or three, or 10 years ago, but within the last few weeks; and he believed the extracts would prove the best epitome available of what was the real condition of things in Ireland just now. He began by quoting the charge of Mr. Justice O'Brien. Addressing the Grand Jury at Ennis, County Clare, on February 27, Mr. Justice O'Brien said—

“I find by the returns compiled by the Comptroller that even with regard to the undetected crime there is a large increase since the time of the last Summer Assizes over the corresponding period of last year. . . . From the returns before me I have come to the conclusion that law, to a great extent, has ceased to exist in the county. The common rule of obedience which exist in every civilized State is abrogated and replaced by an influence fatal to industry, fatal to prosperity, fatal to every interest connected with the welfare of the community, and an influence that is becoming dominant here elsewhere through a want of courage and firmness in meeting it."

The same Judge, addressing the Grand Jury of Kerry, on March 9, said—

"I grieve that it is not in my power to announce any change for the better in the state of this county. On the contrary, there exists even at this moment an extraordinary state of things of an unprecedented description—nothing short, in fact, of a state of open war with all forms of authority, and even, I may say without exaggeration, with the necessary institutions of civilized life. These returns before me present a picture such as can hardly be found in any country that has passed the confines of natural society and entered upon the duties and relations and acknowledged obligations of civilized life. The law is defeated—perhaps I should rather say has ceased to exist."

Mr. Justice Lawson, addressing the Grand Jury of County Mayo at Castlebar, on March 10, expressed regret—

"That he could not congratulate them on the condition of the country. So far as he could judge from the official returns, the county appeared to be in a state of disorganization. The existing state of things was most unsatisfactory, and, according to the report made to him, approached as near to a revolt and rebellion against the existing authorities as anything short of a civil war could do."

These were appalling statements to which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) would address himself, instead of indulging in rhetorical by-play. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would avoid appealing to the elaborated rhetoric, to which he had possibly devoted many hours of preparation, and rather bring to bear on those extracts that spontaneous genius which was at his command—extracts, however, which he would not have the courage to contravene. These statements of the Judges presented a state of things so terrible in the condition of Irish society that they must feel that it was not only the duty of the Government but of every Member of that House to assist the Government to find some way out of it unless society was to become disintegrated. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) had laid down the extravagant and extraordinary theory that people were not to obey or be controlled by a law when they were not in sympathy with it. What, he should like to know, would have become of the Slave Trade of the West Indies if Parliament had not gone directly in the teeth of the prejudices of the slave owners. At every turn in their history they had been continuously legislating for the great benefit of the people in the teeth of the prejudices—the immoral prejudices of large portions of the people. Another statement from the Benches opposite was really remarkable, and it has been repeated as if it had some peculiar virtue in it—that no Act for the purpose of restoring order had hitherto been passed in this House by a Party vote. The fact was true; and why was something like a Party vote about to be exercised on this occasion? Because this was the first time in the history of our country that a large and responsible Party, with great traditions, found itself allied with the forces of disorder. It seemed to him that we were in a very critical condition indeed, when a great Party like the Liberal Party was found adding its weight to those who would like to see anarchy produced in Ireland, and refused to assist the Government in passing a law which was called for, not by partizan opinion, but by the opinion of independent observers like the Judges. Apart from these considerations, it seemed to him that they were bound to accept the Government for the time time being as the best judge of what was requisite when the question was one of maintaining order in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions. If the Government made a grievous mistake in miscalculating the position, they would be held responsible presently when they were brought before the bar of public opinion. He thought it was the duty of all hon. Members to support the Government when they were asked that exceptional advantages should be given to this measure, and to vote in favour of a proposal which was rational, which was fair, and which commended itself to the judgment of every man who retained some love of order and of peace.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): There have been some remarkable circumstances in this debate—but I must stop.

self-restraint which we find in hon. Members opposite. It appears to me that the Government, as a preliminary to passing a repressive measure for Ireland, had passed a repressive measure for their own Followers. My hon. Friend the Member for South Salford (Mr. Howorth), however, will not subject himself to that discipline, although one would have thought he might have done it more easily than others, because he so often instructs us with his pen. Instead of subjecting himself to that discipline, he, himself, becomes a disciplinarian, and he undertakes to lecture the Bench behind which he sits for a gross neglect of duty. Well, I think there is some reason for the complaint he makes of that Bench; for I have never known, on an occasion so important as this, so many able speeches from one side of the House, and so very few from the other. The question before us to-night is one of great simplicity, and is perfectly intelligible. It is, whether we shall grant to the Government the whole time of the House, in order that it may pass a Bill which it could not readily pass unless we granted them that favour. The peculiarity of it is, that nobody knows anything about the provisions of the Bill. I have a strong feeling that there is no Legislative Assembly in the world that has any degree of self-respect which would bind itself hand and foot in favour of passing a measure which it has never seen. I see my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) before me. He is a reasonable man. He recently belonged to a rational Party. May I not ask him whether it would not have been a manly and respectful course towards this House, that the Government, before asking for the whole time of the House, should have introduced their Bill, and should have read it a first time? I do not know whether there are precedents for the course which the Government are taking; but, whether there be precedents or not, this course is contrary to reason and common sense. It must be allowed that, considering the gravity of the occasion, no case has been made out. When the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith) sat down, that was the first thing my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) said, and in the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) there was scarcely a sentence endeavouring to make out a case. The Financial Secretary to the War Office (Mr. Brodrick) certainly did more than his Predecessors; but I understood that his case was mainly that there are combinations in Ireland that ought to be put down. Then I seemed to get a sort of explanation why the Government had been so reticent. They know that there are millions of men in Great Britain who will have no sympathy whatever with the Government, when they find that their object is to put down combinations against excessive rent, seeing that the poor tenant has no tribunal to which to appeal. The Government is less original than most Governments. It has less courage than most Governments. It scarcely dares to take responsibility for its own acts. It is always leaning on the broad shoulders of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). The Leader of the House seemed to excuse the course he was taking because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian introduced a measure of coercion in 1881. The Party opposite and the Government may be wise—may be right in following precedents which have been set by the late Prime Minister; but I will undertake to say that even he is not infallible, and they may follow him sometimes when he has been totally wrong. In the precedent of 1881 I believe the Liberal Government was utterly wrong. It was preparing to pass a great land measure for Ireland; but, before it passed that measure, the Government had exasperated the Irish people to the utmost degree by taking the course of giving precedence to a Coercion Bill. Now, I undertake to say that what the Liberal Government did in 1881 had much to do with strengthening the hands of the Nationalist Party; and I believe what the Government is doing now will have precisely the same effect. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) last night declared his belief that we required a remedial measure, and we required also a measure for the strengthening of the Criminal Law. When I heard the speech of my right hon. Friend I was reminded very much of the clever people we see in circuses riding a couple of horses at the same time. He seemed to me to have one foot upon the Tory, and another

foot upon the Liberal, horse; but I could not help thinking that he leaned rather more kindly to the Tory horse than to the Liberal one. He made an extraordinary statement—a statement which he would not have made unless a great change had come over the temper of his mind. He said that in 1881 he had supported a coercive measure; that he had supported a coercive measure in 1882; and that he would have supported a coercive measure in 1885 if the Government had not broken down. Now, the intimate Friends of the right hon. Gentleman know perfectly well that he supported the measure in 1881 with the utmost reluctance. They have an absolute belief that, if he had had his way, he would have said—"Give us a remedial measure first." Even last night he admitted that the coercive measure had failed, and that the remedial measure had failed to do much of the good it might have done if it had stood alone. But with regard to 1885, we have heard a speech to-night from my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who knows a good deal of what took place in 1885; and it was then currently stated, and, as he says, never denied, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham either gave in his resignation to the Prime Minister, or threatened to do it, because of the attempt to enforce another coercive measure. Now, this will be one of the most memorable Sessions that any man in this House can remember, and it will be memorable in this way—that we have a Tory Government supported by so-called Liberals, and that that Tory Government has twice asked the whole time of the House—the first time in order that it may gag the Imperial Parliament, and the second time in order that it may forge fetters for the Irish people. It seems to me that the subject would form an admirable cartoon for some of the pictorial papers of the day. I voted in 1881 against the coercion measure of the Liberal Government. I have to make no apology with regard to that. I voted with a very small group of Members—I am not sure whether there were more than half-a-dozen English and Scotch Members who went into the Lobby at the time. I shall vote to-night against this attempt to pass a coercive measure; but I shall not vote with half-a-dozen Members. I shall tions over which he desires to throw the protection of this Amendment, save the National League and those who have combined to promote the Plan of Campaign? I know of no other; and so I understand that the Amendment, which has received the highest sanction in the enthusiastic support of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), is an Amendment moved on behalf of the National League and the Plan of Campaign. In order to make clear two points of difference between my right hon. Friend and myself, I will call attention to one other proposition which has been submitted to the House. He has told us what are the objects of his Amendment. He is anxious to redress grievances, as he calls them, in preference to punishing offenders. These are the words of my right hon. Friend—

The issue is plain and distinct. Whether there are 100 or 200 ruffians, or 500 or 600, can, in principle, make no difference whatever. It would be petty and technical to discuss his proposition on such a ground. Nor is the number of tenants that may be affected, the question which my right hon. Friend wishes to submit to the House. I will give him a thousand, or let him take any number he chooses. I say that it is a fair construction of what my right hon. Friend said that he would put aside, at least for a time, the necessity of bringing criminals to justice whatever their number may be—that he will be careless of either their detection or their punishment until a remedial measure is introduced into this House. [Cries of "No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen behind me shout an emphatic "No!" But these are the terms of my right hon. Friend's Amendment. ["No, no!"] The proposition is made in his own language. [An hon. MEMBER: No; the right hon. Gentleman said "less anxious."] My right hon. Friend said that he would allow the ruffians, be their number what it may—["No, no!"]—to go unpunished until a remedial measure is passed. If that be not his purpose, there is no one who would be more ready to disavow it than my right hon. Friend. What he has stated, he has stated with all the honesty of his nature, and I know he will adhere to it. Let me repeat it again in his own language—

That is the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. Beholds that these ruffians, number what they may ["No, no!"] ought to go unpunished until a remedial measure is passed. ["No!"] If that is not his purpose, why has this Amendment been moved? It has been moved for the purpose of securing remedial measures first, and then proceeding to the detection and punishment of crime. I am sure my right hon. Friend would be the first to wish that our friendship should not prevent me from discussing with him closely and critically what his proposition really is. To him it means simply that so many persons whom he calls "ruffians" should go undetected and unpunished. ["No!"] That is the proposition which my right hon. Friend has submitted to the House. ["No!"] I can explain his words in no other way. Sir, to my mind, there are other and graver considerations. For myself, I admit that it is of comparatively small moment that individual criminals—in some cases—should go unpunished; for instance, if from want of testimony, or the perverseness of juries, or the individual action of jurors—or from whatever form it may occur—criminals here or criminal there go unpunished because conviction cannot be obtained. That is a comparatively small matter, but if the escape of criminals be systematic; if it proceeds from organized action, then it affects, not only the criminals, but also the State. It becomes not only a question of the criminal who escapes, but of those who are the victims of crime. For every one of these criminals who, upon the theory and suggestion of my right hon. Friend shall, for a time at least, continue his career unchecked and unpunished, represents not only the impunity of individuals who might be named in numbers, but the over-awing of the whole community of the loyal and well-disposed. It represents a life of terror and misery when no man's life and no man's property are safe, and when the hours of every passing day must be hours of fear and wretchedness. We claim not only that criminals should be punished, but that the innocent and loyal subjects of the Queen should be protected. [A laugh.] A sentiment like that is jeered and laughed at, and I am asked to be a party to an alliance with such men. I decline to join in an alliance with men who can laugh and jeer at the suggestion that it is the first duty of every Government—of every civilized State—to afford all the protection that the law and the authority of the Government can afford to those who require protection. There are other considerations besides the protection of the weak, which my right hon. Friend ought to have placed in the scale of the balance he held between these two classes of measures. It is not only the protection of individuals who are without protection against organized combination, unless the law should afford it to them which has to be considered; but a great issue is raised now in respect to the very character of the community in which the law is to be administered. It is not only that the state of Ireland ought, I think, to create alarm in the minds of men; it is the countenance that has been given to those acts of crime and illegality that alarm the minds of those who are anxious for the maintenance of the law. We have heard something like a distinct expression of praise of illegality. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith), in the remarkable speech he made last night—a speech which was devoid of promise only because it was so full of the realization of success—in that most able speech my hon. and learned Friend reminded us that we are legislators, and that we are not moral censors. But I must remind some of my hon. Friends who sit around him that there is a danger of being worse than moral censors, and that is of being immoral censors. When I hear of hon. Members saying that, whilst they care not that the Plan of Campaign is illegal and criminal they give it their moral sanction, I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that it would be well if they would recollect that they are legislators, and not irresponsible censors. But there is a treatment of this combination which I regard as being worse than an express sanction—it is the conduct of men, on many of whom grave responsibility rests, some of whom have been Ministers of the Crown and know the responsibility of having to maintain law and order. Desiring to speak with the greatest consideration of my old colleagues, I wish they had spoken a little more plainly on the subject, and given support to the maintenance of the Queen's authority by condemning what they admit to be illegal. It is said you may condemn by faint praise; so you may also praise by faint condemnation. Those who would convert the men who commit crime and illegal acts into "village Hampdens" are men on whose shoulders the greatest responsibility lies. The question now is not one of mere figures; it is not whether the crime we have to deal with is of this character or that. We have not only to detect 100 or 200 criminals or ruffians. Differing from my right hon. Friend, we have not only to protect those who are unable to protect themselves, unless covered by the law's great and powerful authority; but we have here to try this great question—when illegality is rife, when illegality is supported by express words and by covert words, when, for the first time, the Queen's authority is repelled with contempt under a covert alliance with men who have been Ministers of the Crown—are we to make the admission that nothing is to be done, or are we to stand here with the confession that we have been bullied by anarchy into dealing with measures of remedial legislation? [Cries of "Oh!" from the Irish Members.] I scarcely expect the assent of hon. Members below the Gangway to that proposition. I could not suppose for a moment that it would be accepted by those who are anxious that no steps should be taken to recall the authority of the law and of the Crown, when the law is defied and treated with contempt, and when it is admitted that the Queen's writ does not run in many parts of Ireland. It is not from that point of view we have to deal with this question. The issue is very clear. We are dealing with a very grave and serious question which affects the very character of the nation. There are some of us who think the first duty of the Government is to protect the subjects of the Queen by the law. We admit that there is a duty cast upon the Government to redress wrongs and grievances; and the question is whether the proposition which has been made to the House that your first duty is, before you restore law into its proper position and authority, to consider the grievance of a class, or whether, on the other hand, your duty is not first to reassert the deposed authority of the Crown, and then to proceed, in a generous spirit, with the remedial measures. It has been said, in support of the Amendment, that you must not punish the crime that proceeds from the demand for a redress of grievances—that you must first remove the grievances which are alleged to be the causes of crime; that you must satisfy the demands made, and only then can you proceed to frame new laws or improve the machinery of the existing law for the enforcement of the punishment of offenders. What a monstrous proposition, for see what it means? Let there be a demand for the redress of a grievance, just or unjust—although it may be assumed to be just—and it will be inferred that you will not give redress unless it be supported by crimes; and then, if there be criminals to be dealt with, then the grievances of a class, the redress of which is demanded by criminals, will be redressed, and that upon the terms which they dictate, and after all this has been done you may begin to vindicate the authority of the law. Thus, the concession of the principle of the Amendment creates demands for the remedy of class grievances, and creates the criminals who will thrive unpunished upon the grievances. If that is so, the principle involved in the issue is immunity from the punishment of crime for political reasons—an immunity which is inconsistent with the maintenance of government in the State. There is nothing so disastrous to the maintenance of good order as the knowledge that impunity for crime exists. I am anxious to quote, on this subject, a high authority whose words will have the full approbation of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). I believe I shall be able to show that I am supported step by step in the proposition I desire to lay before the House, by the words of my right hon. Friend. Perhaps my right hon. Friend will recollect the views he entertained and expressed in 1882, and I think that it may be of advantage to many hon. Members who sit on this side of the House to refer to them. In 1882, my right hon. Friend said—

“The main cause of crimes is the expectation of impunity—an expectation which, in Ireland, is too well founded upon terrorism and its consequences.”

My contention is that the impunity which is suggested by the Amendment, and which is involved in the proposition that you should never punish criminals whose crime may proceed from a demand for a redress of grievances until the grievance itself is removed, is an impunity founded too much upon the terrorism which exists in Ireland at this moment. The hon. and learned Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith), whose speech I refer to with pleasure on account of our long personal association, asked what must be the feelings of the Liberal Unionists now, and suggested that we must be suffering much from the pangs of conscience. He asked who was the director of our consciences? I say with pride that for years the director of my political conscience was the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian; he formed, to a great extent, the political views I held; and in the campaign of 1882 it was from him we learnt most of what formed our conscientious views of what was best to be done on behalf of the people of Ireland—especially for those who needed the protection and the support of the law. It is from what I learned from my right hon. Friend, that I believed that my conscience will have no such pangs as my hon. and learned Friend spoke of. My right hon. Friend then said—

“Am I to be told that such intimidation—not trivial intimidation, but intimidation in furtherance of the objects of illegal combination—intimidation which does not express the silly and foolish wish of an individual, but the set purpose of large and powerful bodies of men; am I to be told that that is one of the objects beneficial to the public welfare, for the sake of which we are to look with tolerance and indulgence on the failure of the Jury system?”

I remember the appeal which my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian made to the constituencies. [Cries of “Oh!”] I trust there is nobody who supposes that I enter into this controversy with a view of showing that some of my former Colleagues have changed their opinion. I believe that any Member of Parliament—and especially one who belongs to the Liberal Party—may, from the necessities of political life, rightly change his views from time to time on questions of policy. It is a petty and paltry argument to call attention to words spoken here, and words spoken there, and to show how widely they differ from previous utterances. If that creed had been accepted, the Liberal Party would have lacked its flexibility, and would never have been able to adopt its policy to the necessities of the people, and would have been unable to accomplish the good which it has effected. If our policy had been an invariable and fixed one, it would not have been worthy of the Liberal Party. But on questions, not of policy, but relating to great principles and the necessities of government, there can be, and there ought to be, no change. No one can believe that the demands of policy can ever change the fundamental principles upon which government should be conducted. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle said the other night that he was very unwilling to draw an indictment against the landlords; but he certainly drew as grave an indictment as it was possible for anyone to draw against those who are now his Colleagues. Wittingly or unwittingly, he brought a most grievous charge against those who are acting with him. He charged them with having for five years, as a powerful Government, acted directly in opposition to Liberal principles. I do not know whether my right hon. Friends will entrust me with their defence. If so, I will do my best for them; but there are, undoubtedly, two or three cases which present extreme difficulty. There is, first, the case of my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). How to defend him I scarcely know. I heard him this evening explain the limits of his personal connection with measures of coercion. He told us that he was innocent of the charges made against him and other right hon. Members, and that in his heart—in his inmost heart—he had never been a supporter of any exceptional measures for the suppression of crime.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I did not say that, I said that I had supported by speech the first Coercion Bill.

SIR HENRY JAMES: Yes; but in a most reluctant manner.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I said nothing of the kind. I said that I supported the first Coercion Bill of 1881 in a speech, and that it was after that that I refused to support similar legislation.

SIR HENRY JAMES: I am sure that my client is right and that his advocate is wrong, and I will accept his instruction. But my right hon. Friend distinctly stated that, after giving that vote in 1881, he reflected, he visited Ireland, went among those who were suffering under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and then expressed to the late Mr. Forster his conviction that coercion must never be applied again. He knew then that our measures ought to have been of a remedial character, and that repressive measures should have been abandoned. The right hon. Gentleman, in fact, poses as a penitent who has discovered the error of his ways. But what strikes me with amazement is this. Although he says that in 1881 he gave a vote in favour of coercion, he has found himself unable to take that course since. He says that he lamented the vote which he then gave; and yet, although the time that has elapsed since the speech of my right hon. Friend, this afternoon, has been short, I have been able to discover that in the year 1882 he recorded no less than 87 votes in favour of coercion—which is a very fair amount for a penitent. I am not complaining that my right hon. Friend or any Member should change his opinion on a question of policy; but when Members do so, had they not better say so? I will now leave my right hon. Friend, in his state of penitence, to account for the 87 votes which he gave in 1882. But there is a worse case yet, there is another criminal—my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt)—who offered me a few minutes ago a general retainer. What am I to say for him? I can only offer him advice, and I advise him that the only safe course to pursue is not to plead to my right hon. Friend's indictment. I advise him to remain mute, not of malice, but out of regard to truth. I know that the person remaining mute is not to be contumacious, but still be much regarded by my right hon. Friend. I know, too, that the punishment for contumaciousness of that kind is that you have heavy weights placed upon your chest; but I am sure my right hon. Friend must already have felt some very heavy weights in the neighbourhood of that part of his heart which covers his conscience. Let me recall to my right hon. Friend, before he undertakes his own defence, an incident which occurred in the year 1882. I had the great advantage of constantly acting with my right hon. Friend in 1882; I very often accepted his directions. In fact, to use the phraseology of a sport, he used to put me on as a change bowler whenever he wanted to take himself off. And so I learned his style of delivery, and, although I sometimes thought that it was a little high-pitched, I recognized that it was very effective. Well, I remember that on the 14th of June, 1882, precedence having been given to the Crimes Bill for the purpose of hurrying it through the House, a Bill called the Arrears of Rent Bill to give relief to those who had not received the full benefits of the Land Act—a Bill which was, no doubt, much required, and which was a remedial measure—was placed after, and not before, the Crimes Bill. On the 14th of June, before proceeding with the Crimes Bill, the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) rose in his place, and appealed to my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby to delay the measure for one single day in order that steps might be taken for the relief of evicted tenants, on whose behalf the hon. Member told a far more serious tale than can be told now. My right hon. Friend had then the responsibility of Office, and an appeal being made to him to stay the Crimes Act for one single day in order to enable the Arrears Bill to be brought in, what was his reply? "No," said my right hon. Friend—I wish I could imitate him either in words or gesture. He is but scantily reported, but I will reiterate the effect of his words—"No," said my right hon. Friend in effect—"not for one single day will I stay the Crimes Act. I admit the truth of all that has been said as to the necessity for the Arrears Bill; I know the hardship and misery that are being inflicted by evictions, but there is a paramount duty placed upon me—I have to maintain law and order in this country. I have to take care, before relief is given to a special class that the law is enforced and that the condition of the population shall cease to be one of terror and wretchedness in consequence of the impunity with which crime can now be committed in Ireland." Is not the spirit that animated my right hon. Friend then the spirit that ought to animate him to-day? I ask him to revert in thought to the position which he took up when it was his duty to administer the law. If he stood to-night in the same position in which he stood in 1882, would not, I ask him, his line of conduct be precisely the same? I ask my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby now, to be careless of obtaining the advantage of a moment—I ask him, and men like him to consider that there are greater considerations than obtaining cheers from any quarter of the House. I cannot pass, unnoticed, the statement which my right hon. Friend made in support of his indictment—that all Crimes Acts have been useless and have failed. I admit that with regard to the policy of the Act of 1881 he proved his case, but he knows that that Act was admittedly a mistaken and an ill-conceived Act. It was not a Crimes Prevention Act, it was a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It was an Act which could succeed only by terrifying men. [An hon. MEMBER: It did not terrify anybody.] I agree that it did not terrify those it was intended to terrify. Hon. Members played their game with the cards on the table, and did not run away; but after one year the error which had been made was remedied. The measure of my right hon. Friend was conceived and drafted not on account of that sad and terrible occurrence of the 6th of May. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Front Opposition Bench.] My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney disputes that statement. Well, I know when the Bill was drafted, for I saw it on Sunday the 7th of May, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, in print. I have heard the statement made that that Bill was drafted and pressed through the House on account of the dreadful occurrence which happened in the Phoenix Park. It was nothing of the kind. The Bill had previously proceeded from the Cabinet, and had received its sanction, and the first draft of it was placed before me on Sunday the 7th of May. Therefore that Bill was framed to meet the wants of Ireland, and did not result from the Phoenix Park assassinations. I want the House to see, for a moment, the effect of that Bill. Sir, in the six months before it came into operation the number of agrarian crimes in Ireland was 2,548; I take the corresponding period of 1885, when that Act was still operative, and I find the number had fallen to 373, and out of those as nearly as possible one-half were merely the sending of threatening letters. I am told that has nothing to do with this Crimes Act. But those who had the greatest experience of that Act, as its operations drew to a close, came to the conclusion that its wise and equitable provisions ought to be renewed in order to maintain peace and order in Ireland. I believe it is true that Lord Spencer said Ireland could not be governed without it; and I know it was true that though statements were made that the Conservative Party would not support the renewal of the Act when my right hon. Friend for whose defence I am still acting, in the month of November, 1885, on the eve of the General Election, made a celebrated speech, he took the same view. In that speech there is one sentence which, as long as I live, I shall never quote, lest it should annoy my right hon. Friend. The effect of that speech was that in stating his charge against the Conservative Party he said they were not prepared to retain the wise and equitable provisions of the Crimes Act, but they were going, for Party purposes, to abandon their loyal fellow subjects in Ireland. I know by whom I am to be followed, and I apologize to the House for the long time I have occupied its attention. I can only say that to me there are graver considerations involved either than the treatment of Ireland or this Amendment, which I fear is being fought on strictly Party lines. Sir, this is a question that affects not only the Irish criminal, not only the Irish peaceable subject, it is one which affects every member of the community living in this country; but there must be men in the furthest dependency of the Crown, men who turn their thoughts to their home and ask themselves whether—in that central power which controls not with physical force the vast possessions of the Queen—whether there will not be men amongst them, the great majority of this House, who will not do their best to preserve the integrity of the Empire and the authority of the law.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): Sir, I believe that the first duty of a man who has been unjustly accused and who has been properly acquitted, is to return thanks to the most able counsel by whom he has been defended. That that defence has been able, and that it has been successful, I should be the last to deny, or, by disputing it, to cast any imputation upon, or do any injury to, the professional reputation of my right hon. and learned Friend. I remember a story connected with the trial of Horne Tooke. He was defended by Erskine, and thinking that Erskine was making a very bad defence, he sent him a note, saying—"If you go on in this way, I'll be hanged if I don't defend myself"; to which Erskine replied in another note, "you will be hanged if you do." I am content to leave my defence in the hands of my right hon. and learned Friend. But we have more serious matters to discuss, and as it is getting late, I think we had better come to the Resolution and the Amendment, upon which no very great light I think has been thrown by the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend. I always think it is best, in a great controversy of this kind, to try to understand and to state fairly the position of your adversary, and then to state your own. If I understand the proposition laid down by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, it is this—that the first duty of civilized society is to enforce the law. Is that a correct statement of the proposition of the hon. Gentleman opposite? I take it that it is. But let us clearly understand that the position has been fairly stated. It will be observed that it is a general proposition without limitation. There is no question as to what the character of the law is, or whether it be a law that works justice or injustice. It is a general proposition that it is the duty of the Government to enforce the law, because it is the law. To that sentiment, in that general form, I oppose an absolute denial. If the law be a good law and a just law, it is the first duty of civilized society to enforce the law; but if, on the other hand.

bad law, which works injustice, it is not the first duty of civilized society to enforce that law. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Ministerial Benches and interruption.] I have stated your proposition; allow me to state mine. It is not the first duty of civilized society to enforce that law; but the first duty of civilized society is to abrogate or amend the law. I desire no fairer issue than that. To enforce the law whether it is just or unjust is the Tory principle; to amend and reform laws which are unjust is the principle of the Liberal Party. It must be so; and thus I will answer my right hon. and learned Friend on the whole proposition contained in his speech. If it be the fact that the crime with which you have to deal is the direct and immediate outcome of an unjust law, surely if you amend the law non constat, that any coercion will be wanted at all. You may deny that crime is the outcome of the law; but if it be the fact that it is the outcome of an unjust law, the best way to get rid of crime which is due to an unjust law is to amend the law, and thus get rid of the cause of crime. That is a clear proposition, and I am ready to take my stand upon it. [Cries of "Oh!" in which some hon. Members on the Opposition Benches joined.]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Surely on one's own side of the House one might expect courtesy. I am referring to the interruptions of a Liberal Unionist, who ought to be content with the other advantages he possesses. I will illustrate my meaning by an instance from my own experience in early political life, when my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) sat with me below the Gangway opposite. At that time Trades Unions were practically illegal. The law of conspiracy had been so strained by the Judges that almost every combination of the labouring classes was criminal, and very cruel and unjust sentences were passed. I was associated with my right hon. and learned Friend in obtaining an alteration of that law, and in taking away the criminal action attributed to such combinations by the Law of Conspiracy, which was a most unjust law. But what would have been the attitude of my right hon. and learned Friend if at that time any Government had introduced a Coercion Bill more effectually to suppress trade unionism. We took a contrary course; we first addressed ourselves to altering the unjust law. That is the course which we desire to follow now. I will not pursue that part of the subject further, because it was fully dealt with yesterday in the admirable and consummate speech of the hon. and learned Member for East Fife (Mr. Asquith), who is, I believe, a pupil of my right hon. and learned Friend. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend upon his pupil; and I feel that the principles which the hon. and learned Member for East Fife has enunciated are those which were entertained by my right hon. and learned Friend in his early youth; and I will only say that the hon. and learned Member for East Fife appears to have acquired all the earlier and better manner of my right hon. and learned Friend. Of course, it is a great grief to us to find some of our Friends in disagreement with us on this subject. I do not see my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) here to-night. We are not, it seems, to have his support. But I confess—and I bear in mind—the blessing which has been pronounced upon those who expect nothing—namely, that they are not disappointed. We had no right to expect the support of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. Last autumn, immediately after the General Election, and on the formation of the present Government, the right hon. Gentleman very accurately described his political position. He said—

"I am not going to vote for an Amendment the carrying of which will be equivalent to a vote of censure on the Government. I am not going to do anything which will turn out this Government."

[Cries of "Go on!"] I will go on, Sir; I cannot remember the exact words but it is to this effect. "I will do nothing which will in any way be an advantage to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian." I had no wish to state that; but as hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to have desired that I should do so, I have no objection to comply with their wishes. Then it is quite plain that whatever this Bill was, whether there were to be remedial measures or no remedial measures, no Motion whatever, to disturb the present Government, would meet with the support of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. Last night, the right hon. Member for West Birmingham undertook to explain the views of the democracy of England on the subject of coercion. Well, Sir, with the greatest respect and regard for my right hon. Friend, I must tell him that the Liberal Party do not recognize in him the right to declare the opinions of the English democracy. The English Liberal Party look more for their "light and leading" in a different direction; they look to the statesmen whom my right hon. Friend abjures and refuses to follow. What the English democracy think of the views of my right hon. Friend we are able to some extent to judge. We have tested it lately in a borough in Lancashire. My noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and I are personally and politically connected with the great county of Derby, and we have heard the opinion to-day of Derbyshire. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham is a man of great abilities and great capacity, but he is engaged, at this moment, in what my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) very properly described as a dangerous performance in political equitation. He is trying to ride two horses at once; he is trying to pose as the confidential adviser and authoritative agent of a Tory Government, and at the same time he claims to be the chief monitor and sole dictator of the Liberal Party. Well, it is impossible to reconcile those two positions. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham must make his election between the two. What claim has my right hon. Friend to speak for the Liberal Party? Of course I may be answered—"What's in a name?" [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member is quite right. We, at the present moment have a Liberal Chancellor of the Exchequer. Of the Tory edifice the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the pillar within while my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham is the buttress outside. In that way the Government is well supported. But the doctrine which was preached last night by my right hon. Friend was not always the Birmingham doctrine. There is another right hon. Member—I mean no disrespect to my right hon. Friend; but he will pardon me for saying—a greater Member for Birmingham who has spoken on this question, and who had and has great claim to represent the opinions of the democracy of England. Well, Sir, speaking in the year 1867—[A laugh.] I have thought that hon. Members opposite consider that previous opinions ought to be quoted; no matter at what time they may have been expressed, and why I have mentioned the date is, that it was in the very height of the Fenian insurrection when Ireland was in the most dangerous condition that any man has ever known, and compared with which its position now is tranquillity and peace. Speaking at that time the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) used these words—

Sir William Harcourt

"I entirely disagree with those who, when any crisis or trouble arises in Ireland, say you must, first of all, preserve order, you must put down all disloyalty and disobedience to law and assert the supremacy of the Government, and then consider the grievances complained of. This has been the case in Ireland for a number of years, and the great preserver has been the gallows and the gibbet."

That was the Birmingham doctrine in those days. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) passed in review the policy and the acts of the Administration of which he was himself a Member. He condemns all remedial measures that they have all been failures, and there is only one part of the policy of the Government for which he expressed unmitigated admiration, and that was the coercion policy of the time. He does not agree with my right hon. and learned Friend in the distinction he drew between the Habeas Corpus Act of 1861 and the Crimes Act of 1882. The Habeas Corpus Act of 1861, he says, was a capital Act, because it put the Leaders into prison. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member opposite is of that opinion, and I presume he expects that that will be the object and effect of the Bill the Government is about to introduce. But I think that expression of opinion was a rather extraordinary one coming from my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. I think that, when he expressed his admiration of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and of the putting of all the Irish at the Irish

Party into prison, there is one man who ought to have been here to listen to the expression of the somewhat tardy repentance of my right hon. Friend—a man whose premature decease is regarded on all sides of the House with regret. Mr. Forster, I think, ought to have been here to hear that expression of opinion. The whirligig of time brings about strange things, and certainly a more extraordinary statement never came from a more remarkable quarter. I do not agree in the opinion of the policy of the then Government that is formed by the right hon. Gentleman. I admit that the Act of 1881 did not completely succeed, and I will say a word directly as to the causes of its failure; but that the Coercion Act failed in the objects it had in view I do entirely agree, and in that I have the concurrence, frequently publicly expressed, of Lord Spencer, who had to administer it. But how was that Coercion Act to which my right hon. Friend refers with so much exultation, and the shutting up of the Leaders of the Irish Party, treated by hon. Members opposite? I remember a speech of the right hon. Member the Chief Secretary for Ireland in which he described that Act as infamous. But who was the ringleader in the infamy? It was the very man who now says that the shutting up of the Leaders of the Irish Party was the proper thing. If you want any information with regard to the Kilmainham Treaty, you cannot do better than apply to the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. Last night my right hon. Friend said that he was extremely anxious for a reform in the Irish land system, and so vital and so essential does he regard that reform to be, that he says that, unless it is carried into effect, he will not support even this Government. But let me refer to another right hon. Member for Birmingham. In this morning's paper, in which the speech of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham appears, there is published a letter from the senior Member for Birmingham, in which that right hon. Gentleman says that he does not think there is any need for another great land settlement for Ireland, which would merely be used by the rebel party in Ireland as a weapon for obtaining Home Rule. What a pity it is that we cannot get, even in the select circle of the Members for Birmingham, an accord upon even central principles. If they cannot agree on this point among themselves, how can they expect us to agree with either of them? The right hon. Member for West Birmingham has complete confidence in the remedial measures of the Government; he seems to have divined the nature of the land measures of the Government by a sort of second sight. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham was not satisfied with the exposition of those measures which was made by the Chief Secretary; he thought that the explanation was imperfect, and he gave us a revised edition of the Government plans. He tells us that he approves of those plans in their substance and in their method. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that the Coercion Bill is to be passed with rapidity through this House, and that the Land Bill—the remedial measures of the Government—are to be introduced in the House of Lords. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham has evidently unlimited confidence in the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman stands sponsor for the House of Lords, and he promises us in their name that they will pass a complete and satisfactory measure dealing with the Irish Land Question. For my own part, I should have more confidence in the right hon. Gentleman's assurances if I could gather from his remarks that he was himself going to conduct the Bill in "another place." I should not be in Order, and I have not time to go into details as to the proposals of the Government, but the real and material proposal of the Commission of Lord Cowper is the reduction of judicial rents. The hon. Member for the Southport Division of Lancashire (Mr. Curzon) said that the Government have accepted the Report of the Cowper Commission and their recommendations, and that they are going to reduce rents in accordance with the proposals of the Commission. But are they going to do so? I gather that they are not. I understand, from the rather vague allusions of the Chief Secretary, that the Government are going to make some change in the proceedings in bankruptcy. I did not quite understand those observations, but they have been somewhat expanded and more fully explained by my right hon. Friend the Member for

West Birmingham. Now, what is the grievance which is complained of in Ireland? It is that, owing to the fall in prices, the Irish tenants are unable to pay their exorbitant rents, and accordingly the Cowper Commission have recommended that those rents should be reduced. But the Government are not going to reduce those rents; the exorbitant rents are going to be continued, and they are going to better the position of the unhappy tenants by making bankrupts of them. That is the remedial measure for Ireland which the Government have borrowed from my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. The right hon. Gentleman has many amiable qualities, but I think that that which most distinguishes him is the bump of philoprogenitiveness. He is very remarkable for the fecundity of his brain, and he is also conspicuous by his parental fondness for everything he produces. He once supplied us, as a bantling, with a Bankruptcy Bill, and I really do believe that my right hon. Friend is now convinced that the sum of human felicity is to become a bankrupt under his auspices. In the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, this is the cure for all the ills of Ireland—namely, to enable the oppressed tenant, who is unable to pay his exorbitant rent, to become a bankrupt. That is the first article of the Birmingham programme. By offering the solatium to a ruined tenant, under exorbitant rents, of becoming a bankrupt, we are to restore peace to Ireland. I leave the rest of the Birmingham programme in despair. The suggestions are very ingenious, but so numerous that it is impossible, at this late hour, to get through them. It is somewhat like a rainbow in the variety of its hues; but when you endeavour to grasp it, beautiful as it is to look at, it disappears with the swiftness of a meteor. The Government demand urgency for the measure; but I venture to say that the Government first of all have been extremely prudent on the subject, and they have not yet told us why they demand urgency for their measure. No Government before them has ever made such a demand without laying the condition of Ireland before the House. I know that in 1881 Mr. Forster made a full statement on the subject to the House. [Cries of "No!"] It is difficult to prove a negative; but I know that that has been the usual course. Why, then, do you refuse to lay Papers on the Table now? Is it because you know you have no case? Why have you taken this course? The Government, in my opinion, are altogether discredited with reference to their statements on the subject of Ireland. They were challenged last September, and they stated then that there was no occasion, in any way, to deal with judicial rents. They stated that the fall in prices could not possibly have affected the judicial rents. We were told the very opposite by the Members from Ireland, who know Ireland. But the Government argued—"Oh, the valuer must have anticipated the fall of prices in fixing the judicial rents." Why any man of common sense could have seen that no man could have valued on such a basis as that. In this Blue Book there are a dozen Assistant Commissioners who come and tell you that they did nothing of the kind. Mr. Grey, the chief valuer, said, in answer to a question, that if they anticipated anything they anticipated a rise of prices in the valuation. What do you think of a Government that comes and makes such a statement? Why, they had nothing whatever to do but to write a letter to Dublin asking the Assistant Commissioners whether they had or had not anticipated a fall of prices in their valuation; and they would have got an answer from everyone of them saying that, so far from that being the case, they had not done anything of the kind. The Government were so ignorant, careless, and reckless, that, in the face of Parliament and the country, they made a statement on that subject which was entirely without foundation. They were supported, no doubt, by several of their Party. There was the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson), who has a great knowledge of wool, and who demonstrated that there could be no occasion for any reduction in rents. And, of course, there was the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald) and the hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman), who came forward and demonstrated that it was all nonsense—that there was no occasion for considering the case of the tenants at all, and they refused all redress. There is in this

[Fourth Night.]

Blue Book the evidence which contradicts that in every way. The Government, then, does not come into Court with clean hands in considering the condition of Ireland, after the manner in which they behaved last September. Well, now, the facts are clear. The present rent payable by law by the tenants of Ireland is not a fair rent. It is an unfair rent. Every eviction in Ireland is, therefore, prima facie unjust. It is an eviction for an unfair rent. [Cries of "No!"] Every rent based upon those prices at that time is an unfair and unjust rent. ["No!"] Hon. Members say "No!" Parliament thought it right, and I will presently state why Parliament thought it right, to fix a fair rent; and it is now proved that that rent is not a fair rent. Now, I will tell the Government that under that state of things, in my opinion, the first thing to do is not to coerce these poor people into the payment of impossible rents. Your first object ought not to be to make it easier for the landlords to exact those rents; and your first object ought to be to make those rents fair. That is a reasonable proposition. You may say that rents are too high elsewhere—in England, for instance. No doubt the legal rents in England are too high; but we do not interfere with these. Why? Because we can trust the English landlords to do justice to the tenants. [A laugh.] Yes. The English landlords have given reductions far greater than the additional 15 per cent which is demanded in this Report. The Irish landlords, because Parliament have compelled them to do this act of justice, are always crying out about spoliation. Yes, there has been spoliation; but of whom, and by whom? Why, Sir, we were told that, under the Act of 1881, by the judicial rents since fixed, the landlords have been deprived—as they say, robbed—of something like £600,000 a-year. Now, who was it that was robbed? In my opinion it was the people, who before that time were made to pay £600,000 a-year, which they ought not to have paid. In Ireland, where the landlords have had power to do so—I am obliged to say this because it lies at the root of the whole question—the tenants never have had fair play. That is the root of your whole legislation. That is the root of the agitation in Ireland, that is the cause of the combination in Ireland, and that is the cause of the crime in Ireland; and unless this House understands that, and, unless the English people understand it, they will not understand the Irish Question. That is the story of this Blue Book. It is told in every page of the evidence. There is one piece of evidence given by a gentleman who, up till very recently, was a Member of this House—a man of very strong Tory opinions, and I think a leading Orangeman—I mean Mr. Macartney. At page 223 he is asked—"You say there are some landlords who have not given a reduction of judicial rents?" His reply was "There always are hard landlords who raise the rents as long as they can." Now mark this sentence for, coming from Mr. Macartney, it is a very remarkable sentence—"That was the cause of the agitation in Ireland." That, Sir, is the opinion of an Orangeman and a Tory who knows Ireland well. "That was the cause of the agitation in Ireland." Well, Sir, Mr. Knipe, in his Report, of which the Government seem to have taken so very little notice, says exactly the same thing. We hear it said in this House that all the landlords have shown such great consideration for the tenants. I wish I thought so. The Blue Book shows that that is not the case—that the number of instances in which it has been done are the exception and not the rule. Mr. Knipe says—

Sir William Harcourt

"The landlords, with a few honourable exceptions, have failed to meet by prompt reductions of rent the serious fall in prices, or to recognize the serious losses to their tenants, and to this may be attributed the combination and the resistance to eviction which has taken place and is likely to happen."

Now, that, in my opinion, is a very fair example of the evidence contained in this Blue Book. I am sorry to say it is a very old story and a very shameful story. By the Union the British Parliament placed in the hands of the Irish landlords weapons of oppression which they never possessed before the Union. I have here Mr. O'Connell, in 1846, quoting a series of statistics which, very shortly after the Union, were passed in favour of the landlord of Ireland and against the tenants. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Howorth) challenged me to produce the authority of the Judges. Here is an extract from a

Judge—Baron Pennefather—soon after the Union, who said—

“The entire landlord and tenant code goes to give increased facilities to the landlord. It never entered the head of the Legislature to make provision for the tenant; and all these enactments, at least 32, are invasions of the Common Law, without any declared intention to invade.”

What was the consequence of that? In the same year another Judge, Mr. Justice Fletcher, in his charge to the Grand Jury of the county of Waterford, July, 1814, said—

“What is the wretched peasant to do? Hunted from the spot where he had first drawn his breath, where he had first seen the light of Heaven, incapable of procuring any other means of subsistence—can we be surprised that, being of unenlightened and uneducated habits (education having been denied him by the Penal Code), he should rush upon the perpetration of crimes followed by the punishment of the rope and the gibbet? Nothing remains for peasants thus harassed, thus destitute, but with a strong hand to deter the stranger from intruding upon their farms, and to extort from the weakness of their landlords—from whose gratitude and good feelings they have failed to win it—a sort of preference for the ancient tenantry.”

In 1846, Lord John Russell held exactly the same language. Speaking after the Devon Commission had sent in its Report, he said—

“However ignorant many of us may be of the state of Ireland, we have here (in the Devon Report) the best evidence that can be procured, the evidence of persons best acquainted with that country—of magistrates of many years’ standing, of farmers, of those who have been employed by the Crown—and all tell you that the possession of land is that which makes the difference between existing and starving among the peasantry and that, therefore, ejections out of their holdings are the cause of violence and crime in Ireland. In fact, it is no other than the cause which the great master of human nature describes when he makes a tempter suggest it as a reason to violate the law:—

“‘Famine is in thy cheeks,
Need and oppression starveth in thine eyes,
Upon thy back hangs ragged misery.
The world is not thy friend, nor the world’s law;
The world affords no law to make thee rich:
Then be not poor, but break it.’”

—(3 Hansard, [87] 507-8.)

That was the language of Lord John Russell. Now, Sir, the English Parliament, from the time of the Union until the year 1870, passed many and many a Statute in favour of the landlord, but never lifted a finger in favour of the Irish tenant. It was the legislation of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian—so bitterly opposed by the Irish landlords, so violently denounced by the Tory Party, so mauled and mangled by the House of Lords—which was the first attempt on the part of the British Parliament to do its duty towards the country it had undertaken to govern. It is true, then, as Sir Redvers Buller said, that what law there was in the country was a law, not for the poor, but for the rich. And that sentiment was expressed by a man who knew Ireland better than Sir Redvers Buller—I mean the late Lord Clarendon. Every one who had the happiness of knowing Lord Clarendon knew that he was a man of the highest and most generous sentiments. He had been Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and in 1867, the last year of his honoured life, he described the acts of the landlord in the confiscation of the tenants’ improvements as “felonious acts.” That is a perfectly true description; and I am sorry to say that, in this Blue Book, too, there is a great deal which deserves the same epithet. In 1879 there came a period of great distress. That gave birth to the Land League; it gave origin to the Land Act of 1881. But what did these Land Acts mean? They showed that you could not trust the Irish landlord to deal with the Irish tenant. You have not legislated for fixity of tenure and fair rents in England. Why? Because it is not necessary. You have established fair rents in Ireland because you cannot allow the Irish landlord to fix a fair rent. But if circumstances have shown that the rent is not a fair rent, is it not the bounden duty of Parliament to see that the circumstances which led to that error should be corrected? Unfortunately, the persistent ingenuity of the landlord has defeated all attempts on the part of the Legislature to do justice to the tenant. In 1870, after the Land Act was passed, they forced, as this Blue Book will show, leases upon the most unjust terms on the tenants in the North of Ireland. We had a speech from the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) to-night, and how did he speak? He said that unless a very drastic measure of land reform were introduced and carried for Ulster, the tenant farmers of that Province would be destroyed. The Blue Book proves that things—first of all, the rent is not fair; and it also [many witnesses,] of rent have been made, the tenants have been willing to pay. That is almost universal in Ireland. It shows, also, that even the tenant-right—the most valuable possession of the tenant—has been either destroyed or greatly lowered in value by the fall in prices; and, I am sorry to say, that page after page is full of examples of the harsh and cruel treatment of the tenants under the existing law. We have heard of the pressure of the Government upon the landlords. It is not necessary for the English Government to exercise pressure upon the English landlords. Why was it necessary in Ireland? We have heard of the pressure put upon the tenants by the League. This Book shows, and I deeply regret it, that throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, in most cases, the full judicial rents have been exacted. In my opinion, this is a monstrous injustice. Now, this Bill—I do not say in its intention, but certainly in its effect—will be to give the landlords greater power to enforce those rents. ["No!"] You cannot deny that. ["Yes!"] Well, how can you deny it? What is the evil which you are aiming at and striking against? Is it the difficulties which now exist in the way of collecting those rents? Then, if you proceed with this measure, and until you have amended the law, it is perfectly plain that the effect of your legislation will be to give greater facility for the collection of those rents. The inevitable result upon the Irish tenants will be, in my opinion, to inflict the greatest and the cruellest injustice. They have suffered a great deal already. They will suffer a great deal more. Who has demanded this legislation at your hands? I am very much afraid that your principal inspirers have been the Irish landlords. [Cries of "No!"] Yes; I very much suspect it, because we have seen the demand made in the evidence of Captain Hamilton, the Honorary Director of the Property Defence Association. He tells us that what is wanted to restore peace in Ireland is that you should leave the tenant no hope. The whole case is summed up in that single sentence; and, in my opinion, if this Bill is passed, it will leave the tenants no hope. If you ask me whether I approve those combinations as the methods of giving some hope to the tenants, I tell you

"No." I do not approve combinations, and I do not approve the pressure of the Government. That is not the way to deal with the matter. It is the duty of Parliament to give the tenant hope. It is the duty, and the first duty of Parliament, before everything else, to give the tenants hope and to give them justice, and that is what is demanded in the Amendment. We say, "Before you take measures to enforce unjust rent, there is a far higher and a prior duty, and that is to provide against their use for the purpose of injustice." Then, I say, there is no case for coercion. You have made out no such case. I challenged a comparison, and the Government evaded that comparison between the case made out for coercion on former occasions and the case now. If you refer to The Times of 1882, my answer to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) is that it is idle and absurd to compare the conditions of 1887 with the conditions of 1882. The case for outrage is so faint, that The Times newspaper—the great organ of coercion—is obliged to invent one, and when it has invented the outrages, it can always find the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) ready to endorse them. As far as I know, there is only one part of Ireland which can be justly described in the strong language which has been employed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that is the Protestant City of Belfast. That is a city in which there is constant and violent disorder; and if the Government came forward and said that the state of Belfast was such that we must have a Coercion Bill there, on the ground that we cannot trust the juries, that the police are being attacked, and every sort of violence is going on there, I confess that I should have thought they had made out a strong and plausible case. I fully admit that there are difficulties in the way of the enforcement of the law in Ireland; but I do not want to remove those difficulties by coercion, if I believe, as I do believe, that in remedying the evils from which those difficulties arise, you would not require coercion at all. That is our plain and simple case. You may not believe the facts as we put them before you; but you will find them in the evidence and in the finding of your own Commission. Our case is simply this. We believe that whatever may be the amount of disturbance and crime, happily, the amount of crime and outrage in Ireland is not large. The Member for South Tyrone used a very singular argument on this point. He said—

“I know that there has been no crime, but that is because of the alliance of the Members for Ireland with the Liberal Party.”

Well, if we have done nothing else, we have done more than your Coercion Bill will do. We have put down outrage and crime in Ireland already; but we say that there is no evidence of crime or disturbance, or resistance to the law, except that which arises immediately out of unjust rents. Then, surely, if you make those rents just, if you remove the cause from which the crime immediately proceeds, if you remove the cause of grievance, and remove it at once, you do not need any Coercion Bill at all. The work the Commission was constituted to perform will have been accomplished, and your Coercion Bill will be totally unnecessary. That is the case upon which we press this Amendment. You state that there is an urgent demand for coercion. We say “No;” we believe that the cause of the evil is to be found in a particular thing, which particular thing you may remove, and ought to remove at once, and that if you will only do that first, then coercion will be unnecessary. It is for that reason that I support the Amendment, and oppose the Motion of the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Mr. Speaker, the most interesting part of the speech of the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) seems to me to be the exhibition of the changes which the whirligig of time has produced in the opinions of the ex-Home Secretary and the present Parliamentary Counsel of the National League. I was deeply interested in the view which the right hon. Gentleman took of the duties of this House and of the country with regard to the maintenance of law and order, and I reverted to the time when the right hon. Gentleman himself was Home Secretary and when he had the support of both Parties in this House in maintaining law and order. [Interruption.] I think that hon. Members from Ireland and hon. Members below the Gangway opposite will admit that it is the bounden duty of the Government to speak on this occasion. They would not be doing their duty, and would be wanting in courtesy to hon. Members, if they neglected to answer the speeches which have been delivered. Therefore, although I have no wish to appeal for the indulgence of hon. Members below the Gangway, I think it would conduce to the proprieties of debate if the Representatives of the Government were permitted to state their views on this subject. We owe it to hon. Members from Ireland, we owe it to the House itself, to speak fully upon this occasion; and if we have not risen in great numbers from these Benches, it is because we have been anxious to give every facility to every quarter of the House to take part in the debate on this most important subject. Great changes have been produced in the attitude of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. He wishes that the laws should be maintained in proportion as they are considered just by those who live under them. I believe I am rightly interpreting the right hon. Gentleman. When he was Home Secretary did he think that the laws he was engaged in administering and the rents which were collected during that time, were considered to be just by the Representatives of Ireland? Does he not see that the complaint made against the laws which he administered was essentially the same as that now made against the laws which the Government are administering? The two cases are precisely alike. Just rents, the right hon. Gentleman says, are to be established. Who is to define what is a just rent? Does the right hon. Member for Derby agree in his estimate of a just rent with hon. Members who sit not far from him? Does he believe that if he were to say what he considers to be a fair rent he would gain the assent of the majority of the Representatives of Ireland? He spoke of just rents and he spoke of reductions; but he gave no hint of any standard except the fluctuating standard of the popular feeling at any given moment, and he refused to assist the Executive Government in maintaining the law whenever it does not coincide with that fluctuating standard of justice. That is the attitude of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. I should like to be permitted, if the House even at this late hour will give me its attention, to reply to some of the speeches which have been made, and especially to the charges which the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition has brought against Her Majesty's Government. The first of these charges, as I gathered from the right hon. Gentleman, was that the Government, having wasted the time of the Session up to this moment, are now proposing to suppress the individual initiative of hon. Members. May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if it has been the fault of the Government that individual initiative has been suppressed up to this time? [An hon. MEMBER: Yes.] I presume that "Yes" comes from an hon. Member who has been present during most of the discussions, and who, therefore, has an advantage over the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who has not yet been able to honour us with a sufficient amount of his presence in this House to render us the aid of his authority in making more progress. We are charged with suppressing individual initiative. How were the first three weeks of the Session spent? Were they spent by Her Majesty's Government in prolonging debate? Sixteen days or more were spent on the Address in deference to the views of private Members who wished to prolong that debate. What was it that we were next engaged in? We are charged next with having engaged the attention of the House in the consideration of Rules of Procedure—Rules of Procedure which had the assent, I believe, of the Front Bench opposite, and to which they once attached so much importance that they considered it necessary to devote a Supplementary Session to the subject. Does the right hon. Gentleman really consider that the Government are to blame because at this stage—a stage which, we admit, is late, and which we deeply regret that we have not been able to arrive at sooner—we are obliged to ask for the whole time of the House to press on the Business of the Government? We contend that the blame rests on other shoulders. We complain, and we complain with justice, that we have received no assistance from the regular Opposition in getting on with our work. [Mr. GLADSTONE made an observation which did not reach the Gallery.] My right hon. Friend gives me an enthusiastic cheer. I thought it was a tradition of the regular Opposition that they should assist Her Majesty's Government—the Executive Government of the day—in promoting the Business of Parliament. But, however that may be, I throw back upon the Opposition the charge which they have levelled against Her Majesty's Government, that it is by our action that individual initiative has been suppressed; and if we now ask, as we are entitled to ask, the House now to make that great sacrifice of time which we regret having to ask for, it is because that sacrifice is indispensable in the public interests. To hear the right hon. Member for Derby speak, one would think the state of Ireland was not at this moment what we may all call intolerable. He seemed to view with indifference the state of things in Ireland at the present moment. Both the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian and the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), as well as the right hon. Member for Derby, speak of the diminution of crimes and outrages. They seem only to be able to read crimes when they are written in letters of blood. They do not seem to realize the fact that the administration of justice is almost entirely suspended at this moment in certain portions of Ireland. They seem to have no sense of this, and they seem not to think it of much moment that jurors can scarcely go into the box without having to make their choice between perjury and ruin. Look at the jurors. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from below the Gangway.] Yes, now there comes a cheer. The administration of justice is discredited in Ireland at this moment. [An hon. MEMBER: Packed juries.] Yes, you complain of packed juries; others complain of juries who will not convict, although the evidence of guilt is strong and conclusive. The position of the administration of justice—the position of juries in Ireland—is that in some cases they do not command the confidence of the Representatives from Ireland, and in other cases they do not command the confidence of the public generally. We see, therefore, that trial by jury in Ireland is discredited, even in the eyes of hon. Members who interrupt by speaking of packed juries. Have you confidence—[“No, no!” and “Name!”]—have you confidence in the administration of the law by juries in Ireland? [Cries of “No!”]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. GOSCHEN: If not—and you cannot deny it when I ask you—then I say that the moment has come when the Government must deal with the matter, and must restore to Ireland that fair administration of the law which shall command the confidence of the public generally. The House will have noticed how, from point to point, hon. and right hon. Members on the other side have spoken as if the object of this Bill were simply to provide better means of enforcing rents. That is not the view of Her Majesty's Government. It does not approach, in any degree, the views of Her Majesty's Government; but I should be surprised to learn that an ex-Home Secretary and an English lawyer was content with the present administration of the law in Ireland. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian made a further charge against Her Majesty's Government. He pointed out to us the extraordinary difference that there was between the present position and the present demands of Her Majesty's Government and those to which he was a party in 1881 and 1882. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I said 1881.] In 1881—and he asked us in his solemn tones—and his demand was repeated by the right hon. Member for Central Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) and others—whether we were prepared to face the fact that now, contrary to what was the case in 1881, we should pass a law of this kind in the teeth of 85 Representatives from Ireland, and in face of the further fact—I admit that it is a most significant one—that the regular Opposition also were opposing us. Well, now, as regards the representation of Ireland; is it contended by the right hon. Gentleman that if the great majority of the Representatives of Ireland are opposed to a measure which is necessary for the due administration of justice, we are, on that account, to flinch from our duty? This is the point which is put to us. You have 85 Members from Ireland. They will oppose your Bill. Therefore you ought not to propose it or else you are sinning against the first articles of the Liberal creed. Well, suppose my right hon. Friend were in power, and that the law were grossly disobeyed in Ireland, would he consider that the presence in this House of a majority of Irish Members, who were opposed to it, would constitute a bar to proceeding with a measure of this kind? If not, why then does he urge that against us, as at the present moment? But he has another argument, which is a more formidable argument, I admit. He says—

“Have the Government realized that there will be three-sevenths of the whole of this House which may be opposed to a measure of this kind.”

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Government have realized that fact with the deepest regret, and with the fullest knowledge of the consequences which it implies. They see, for the first time, I believe, in the history of this country, ex-Prime Ministers and ex-Home Secretaries refusing. [Opposition cheers and counter cheers.]

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Not before time.

MR. GOSCHEN: I did not catch that.

MR. STOREY: I said, “Not before time.”

MR. GOSCHEN: It is time that those who have been charged, as Ministers of the Crown, with the administration of justice, with seeing that the laws are obeyed—it is time, says my hon. Friend below the Gangway, that they should desert the Government of the day, and range themselves under the standard of disorder. I admit that it would be unfair at this period of the debate to inflict many quotations on hon. Members; but in answer to the cry made below the Gangway—and in order to show the House and the country the real position of this matter—I entreat the House to listen for a moment to the words of my right hon. Friend. The House will see what we have to deal with now, and what he had to deal with in 1881. These are the words of my right hon. Friend, in 1881—

“It is not with the people of Ireland that we are at issue. Our firm belief is that the people of Ireland, and especially that the mass of the tenantry of that country, are earnestly desirous to make full trial of the equitable provisions which, with great labour, effort, and resolution, Parliament has introduced into the law of the land."

That is our belief also.

"That with which we are struggling"— and I call the attention of the House to this point—

"is a power which presumes to go between the people and the law, and which tells them how far, when, and how, and upon what terms they are to have the benefits which Parliament intended for them all without restriction and without reserve."

That is our case. We, too, are struggling with a power which presumes to come between the people and the law, and tell them how far they shall go.

"We have, I repeat, no fear of the people of Ireland in the mass. What we have a fear of is lest some should be corrupted by demoralizing doctrines, and lest—and it is the greatest fear of all—more, and many more, should one by one be terrified out of the exercise of their just Constitutional rights, and unhappily induced through intimidation, and from no other motive, to make over their private liberty and the exercise of their civil rights into the hands of self-constituted dictators, and to place those rights under the unknown provisions of an unwritten law dictated by nothing but arbitrary will."

Well, Sir, what is the meaning of the Bill which we seek to introduce? It is to protect the people of Ireland, as my right hon. Friend wished to protect them, against arbitrary interference at every stage with their private affairs by self-constituted dictators who wish to exercise the "unknown provisions of an unwritten law." The occasion on which these words were spoken was the time when my right hon. Friend found it necessary to put into prison the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) lest he should frustrate the objects of the legislation of my right hon. Friend, who made the announcement of the arrest in these terms—

"I have been informed that towards the vindication of law, of order, and the rights of property, of the freedom of the land, of the first elements of political life and civilization, the first step has been taken in the arrest of the man who, unhappily, from whatever motives they may be—and I do not challenge these motives—motives which I cannot examine and with which I have nothing to do, has made himself, beyond all others, prominent in the attempt to destroy the authority of the law, and to substitute what would end in being nothing more nor less than anarchical oppression exercised upon the people of Ireland."

I have read this extract because it contains practically the case of the Government. What we have to do is to attempt to break down the oppression under which the people of Ireland are suffering, and to protect them from the self-constituted dictators who are now ruining the prosperity of Ireland. It has been said over and over again—and I regretted that my right hon. Friend should lend the countenance of his authority to such a statement—that the measure of the Government was intended simply to enable the landlords to enforce the payment of their rents; and I think he said to bring pressure to bear upon the tenants—I think that was the phrase. How did he know?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I quoted one of the witnesses—Sir Redvers Buller.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes. I want to say a word on that point. My right hon. Friend quoted Sir Redvers Buller; but he never told us to what extent he agreed with the views of Sir Redvers Buller. He put Sir Redvers Buller into the witness-box.

Several hon. MEMBERS: You put him in.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: He is your man.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman says he is our man. The right hon. Gentleman knows as well as anyone that a Commission summons before it whosoever it chooses. The Commission summoned Sir Redvers Buller to give his independent evidence. But curiously enough, my right hon. Friend said—"The views of Sir Redvers Buller are diametrically opposed to yours," and then he says—"He is your witness." Does my right hon. Friend mean to say he was our witness?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Yes.

MR. GOSCHEN: Oh! His views are "diametrically opposed" to ours, and yet he is "our witness." But I wish to call attention to the great dialectical skill with which my right hon. Friend dealt with that point. He put Sir Redvers Buller into the witness-box, and he quoted what Sir Redvers Buller said, to the effect that the law in Ireland looked after the rich and did not look after the poor. I hear a cheer from my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Goschen

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I read the words.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, you read those words; but you made no comment upon those words. It is dangerous ground. [A laugh.] Yes, but you will not laugh, I think, when I put the point to you. They are dangerous words to be quoted by my right hon. Friend, unless he intended either to endorse them or to differ from them. An hon. and gallant officer had said that that was the state of the law; but he was quoted by one who was a much greater authority than Sir Redvers Buller; he was quoted by one who was a party to the legislation of the last 20 years. I should like to know, and I think that this House and the country would like to know—and much more are the people of Ireland entitled to know—whether the right hon. Gentleman endorses the statement that the laws in Ireland have looked more after the rich than the poor?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

MR. GOSCHEN: They have? And who but my right hon. Friend has been mainly in power, and has for 20 years past had the chief hand in making laws for Ireland. To make a point in debate my right hon. Friend was prepared to sink his own individuality, his own authority, his own experience, and his own knowledge, and simply to put forward suggestive quotations from one part of the evidence of one of the witnesses before the Commission, when he must have known that that evidence was contradicted by his own legislative acts. [Mr. Gladstone dissented.] I hope, even at this time of the night, to clear up this point, because it is one which is likely, and naturally likely, to inflame the people of Ireland. I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will endorse, on the floor of this House, the statement that the laws of Ireland have been made simply to benefit the landlords? Has not my right hon. Friend striven with the greatest energy and devotion to pass law after law on behalf of the tenants of Ireland? There was the law of 1870, there was the law of 1881, the laws of 1882 and of 1885, and now he wishes to allow the dictum of Sir Redvers Buller. [Inter-ruption.]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I appeal to hon. Gentlemen to give a patient hearing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. GOSCHEN: I regret that the hon. Member for Northampton does not think that I ought to be fairly heard.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I said, Sir, that Gentlemen opposite chose to talk exceedingly loudly to drown my right hon. Friend's speech.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have been for a good many years in this House, and it has never been my wish to intrude at great length upon the time of the House. But I have now a duty to perform, and with all respect to hon. Members opposite, I say I should not discharge it if I were to resume my seat. I know it is my duty to my right hon. Friend to take notice of his speech. Now, is it true? I want to know this—is it true that the laws have done nothing for the tenants of Ireland? Is it true that they have not looked after the tenants? What did my right hon. Friend say in 1881?—

“It is commonly said that the iniquity of the Irish Land Laws is a main reason for legislating on Irish land. Equity and iniquity may be in great part comparative. But if we are to proceed on that principle of comparison it is an exaggeration to describe the Land Laws as iniquitous. The Land Laws of England are laws at any rate under which this country has lived and has been contented and remained prosperous, but the Land Laws of Ireland are chiefly different from those of England in the special conditions which they give on behalf of the tenants.”

And these words of my right hon. Friend were spoken before the Land Act of 1881, before the Arrears Act, before the Purchase Act, which enables tenants to become the owners of their holdings while paying actually less than their present rent. It was not without reason that my right hon. Friend declared on a subsequent occasion, that—

“A law had been passed for the sake of Ireland, with respect to the relations of landlord and tenant, as to which he might say that the civilized world did not record its equal.”

This House has during the last 10 years done its best to improve the condition of the tenants in Ireland. And besides, the laws having been passed for the benefit of the tenants of Ireland, the laws have not been administered in a sense hostile to the tenants of Ireland. Would my right hon. Friend endorse the view that the interests of the tenants have not been looked after, when he considers the action of the Commissioners and the Sub-commissioners throughout Ireland and the great reductions of rent which have been made? The tenants may now complain that these reductions are insufficient. But I maintain that the administration of the Act of 1881 has been, and has been intended to be, a boon to the tenants of Ireland; and it is not in such circumstances that my right hon. Friend is justified in quoting, without comment, the saying that the law of Ireland looks after the rich and does not look after the poor. I wish to protest in the strongest manner against the assertion that the legislation which the Government are now proposing is simply in the interests of the rich. I have read from the previous speeches of the right hon. Gentleman that it is the duty of the Government to relieve the people of the country from self-constituted dictators. It is that duty which we are seeking to fulfil. Our Act will aim at the suppression of the fearful curse of Boycotting which prevails still over a great part of Ireland, and not only in those unquiet counties of which the right hon. Member for Newcastle spoke. The right hon. Member for Newcastle minimized the quality of crime, as it is called by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and the geographical area of crime. I do not know whether he has read the whole evidence of the Blue Book. But that Blue Book gives instances of labourers being obliged to refuse work when they were starving, because the farmer was Boycotted and might not employ them. I have evidence which I will put before the House at a more seasonable time to prove that every class in Ireland—tenants, farmers, shopkeepers, labourers, every class—suffer from the fearful tyranny which is at present existing and against which it is the bounden duty of this House and of Her Majesty's Government to make a stand. And it is a libel on our intentions to say that it is simply for the sake of enforcing rents that we are acting. We would wish and we hope to decrease the number of evictions. It will be our endeavour to accomplish that most essential object; but evictions have not only been due to the action of the landlords. Evictions have taken place with all their tragical accompaniments because agitators have prevented compromises between tenants and landlords; and then when they had broken down compromises, and when the evictions took place under tragical circumstances, they gloated over those tragical circumstances, and did their best to delude the people of England into the belief that it was simply to the action of the landlords that they were due. Remember the case where a priest spoke of his "poor slaves," and where he regretted himself that the compromises which had been offered had not been agreed to. [An hon. MEMBER: What did General Buller say?] I should like to read a few quotations from General Buller. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian said he did not flinch from reading the evidence of General Buller, but he did not read it all. There were some very significant points which I remember in General Buller's evidence. General Buller said, "Intimidation is rampant in this country." An hon. Member interrupted me by saying, "What did General Buller say," when I was speaking about evictions. He wanted to turn me from that delicate point, that it is due to the National League that many of these evictions have taken place. Their action is not to prevent evictions and to secure compromises between landlords and tenants, but to compel the tenants to take a course which many tenants, if left to themselves, would not take, but which, when taken, forces the landlord to evict. I heard of a case yesterday where the tenant went to the agent of his landlord and offered him his rent and paid it. [Cries of "Name!"] Name! I will tell you about the name presently. I will tell the case first. The tenant went to the agent of the landlord and said—

"I will pay you the rent, but serve me with a notice of eviction. Send me all the legal notices which you have sent to my neighbours, because, otherwise, my life will be in danger."

And this tenant paid his rent; but he wanted to be served with a notice of ejectment lest he should be exposed to the dishonour of being known to pay his debt. [Cries of "Name!"] Yes, the name. I will give you the name when we have passed this Bill. When you have ceased to Boycott witnesses who tell the truth I will tell you the name; but I am not prepared to hand over the tenant to the tender mercies of the League. Our opponents are continually asking us for witnesses and for cases. Do they not know—have they not acquired sufficient experience during their term of Office to know—that in these cases to produce your witnesses is to expose them to the vengeance of the National League? It is the great disadvantage under which the friends of law and order labour. I admit it. Hon. Members opposite always cry “Name!” because they know that the entreaties of these men who wish to pay their rents is that their names may not be published. And why? It is in the Blue Book—lest they should be shot. It is against transactions of this kind that the action of the Government is directed. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle speaks of these combinations as spontaneous and natural, when, as a matter of fact, many tenants are notoriously coerced, and when a tenant the other day, who paid his money to the trustees under the Plan of Campaign, said that he never thought he should see a shilling of it back. You say these are spontaneous combinations. Then why are hon. Members opposite, why is Mr. O’Brien, rushing all over the country in order to stir up these spontaneous combinations? No! these combinations are no more spontaneous than the supposed cases of spontaneous generation. They are worked up by the agitators in Dublin, who have exercised that kind of coercion throughout Ireland which it is the intention and the bounden duty of the Government, if they receive the support of this House, to break down. We are asked why we do not, in the first place, produce our remedial measures? I think I can give a conclusive answer to that question. We may be guided in this matter by experience as well as by reason. We are guided by the experience that the ruling political forces in Ireland have always endeavoured to frustrate remedial legislation. And why? Because they have political, and not only agrarian, ends. I have already alluded to the fact that when my right hon. Friend had carried the remedial measure of 1881 the first step which he was compelled to take was to put the hon. Member for Cork into gaol lest he should frustrate the effects of that remedial measure. What security have we—that remedial measure having been succeeded by a No Rent Manifesto—that the most beneficial purchase scheme which we could pass would not be followed by a No Price Manifesto? The fact is this, and I wish the country to understand it, that the agrarian question is being utilized by the Nationalist Party in Ireland in order to dupe the democracy of England as to their ultimate aims. Matters were progressing fairly up to November last; but it does not suit the book of hon. Members from Ireland that there should be peaceable progress in that country. What have they to prove? They have to prove for the success of their scheme—and I entreat the House to bear this in mind—that Ireland is ungovernable by Saxon law. Therefore they produce disorder. And how can they best produce disorder? By constantly agitating the agrarian question. In order that they may produce this effect, they trade on the aversion to landlords, and disguise their schemes of Home Rule by putting that aversion prominently before the people of this country. The first stage in their programme is disobedience to the law. That is followed by disorder, and they know that disorder may be followed by despair, and despair they hope will be followed by separation. We have arrived at the stage of disobedience to the law; we have arrived, I am sorry to say, at the stage of disorder; but we on these Benches have not arrived at the stage of despair. We shall proceed with our remedial legislation, and we shall proceed, undeterred by the fear of those anarchical forces, strengthened though they may be now by the countenance of the regular Opposition—we shall proceed with the intention that these forces shall not frustrate our remedial measures, because we shall endeavour to take the necessary steps to defeat such attempts to frustrate them. We are told that our repressive measures will fail. That is one of the statements that we hear most frequently. But unless we first have the means of frustrating the endeavours which will be made to checkmate those remedial measures, it would be useless to undertake them at all. That is why we demand urgency for the reform of the Criminal Law, and that is the single reason why we proceed first with our demands for that which is not coercive legislation, but legislation to render remedial measures possible. But again, I ask, if we do not and cannot pass the measures we have in view, what is the alternative? I should like to know what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian the Leader of the Opposition—and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby think is the alternative if we cannot pass those measures? The alternative is the continuance of disorder, and if they are prepared to regard that alternative with equanimity, it is because they might point to triumphant disorder as a clenching argument for Home Rule. That is the point which is to be proved, as I said before, that we cannot govern Ireland. [Irish cheers.] I accept those cheers. It is to be proved that we cannot govern Ireland. The English democracy is to be told that we cannot settle the agrarian question. You do not wish the agrarian question to be settled by any remedial legislation. You wish the difficulties to continue; you wish the disorders to continue, and to make those disorders the argument for handing over Ireland to the Nationalist Party. I have heard of a Party who were described once as “marching through rapine”—[Interruption by the Irish Members—“as marching through rapine”—[Renewed interruption—“to disintegration.” You cannot entirely dispute the truth of words which fell from your present Leader. Even those cheers, which seem to be sweet Celtic music in the ears of my right hon. Friend, cannot set aside the fact that the Nationalist Party were described as “marching through rapine to disintegration.” Luckily they did not reach that goal; but where did they march to? Where are they now? They have marched with flying colours and beating drums into the camp of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and now, under his command, the allied forces intend to march, if they can, through disorder to Home Rule. But the voice of the country issued its command at the last Election. It had the Unionists to bar the way. That is the mandate we have received. The defence of order is the defence of the Union. What we ask of the House is to give us the necessary powers for the maintenance of both.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I rise, Sir, to make a protest, although I do not intend to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, in view of the fact that hon. Members from Ireland have been almost entirely shut out from this debate. [Laughter.] Well, I suppose hon. Gentlemen will admit that Members from Ireland have some interest in this debate—they will admit that the Irish Representatives are entitled to speak in this debate, though they have not taken any pains or trouble to allow us to speak, having, on the contrary, done their best, by the arrangements between the Front Benches, to prevent us from speaking. When I heard that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had decided to close this debate on Thursday night, I made up my mind that it was useless for any Irish Member to attempt to intervene at all; but when the right hon. Gentleman was good enough, out of his great bounty, to extend the discussion to this evening, I thought it might be possible for my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) to have an opportunity of speaking. Well, Sir, it has been quite impossible for my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast to speak. I willingly gave up my claim to speak. My hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) also gave up his claim to speak. We did this because we were confident that my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast would have represented our opinions and vindicated our position even better than we could have done ourselves. But we are in this position to-night—that no prominent Member of our Party has been allowed to speak to-night, except the hon. and learned Member for North of Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), who got up at a quarter to 12 o'clock last night, when almost every Member of the Conservative Party walked out of the House in a body. [Cries of “Sullivan!”] I call a debate, conducted under these circumstances, a mockery and a sham. When you talk about your desire to hear us, and to give us fair play—when you say you desire to hear an expression of our views before you strike us down—I say that I do not believe these protests and these expressed desires. Before you take this Division to-night, if I move the adjournment of the debate, I shall, I suppose, be told that I am interfering with the convenience of about 600 Members of the House, who have come down to divide on this question to-night, and I shall be told that it is impossible to allow me to interfere with their convenience in that way. Nevertheless, I say that we have not been heard, and that if this Division is taken to-night, and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury refuses the Motion with which I intend to conclude, it is a very curious sample of your English fair play. You are in such a desperate hurry, either to get your Coercion Act, or to go on your Easter holidays—I do not know which—that you refuse us an additional night for the discussion of this important question, notwithstanding, as has been shown over and over again, that what you are proposing is in violation of all precedent, and that in the course of its consideration we have been treated to two voices, one from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who told us that nothing at all was to be done upon the Land Question, and the other from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who told us that a great deal was to be done upon the Land Question. I ask is it, or is it not, right that the discrepancy between these two right hon. Gentlemen should be cleared up? I do not quite know what our position is. I shall not know what it is when we go into the Division Lobby. I do not know whether I ought to believe the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, or the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I do not know, indeed, whether I ought to believe either of them. I do not know whether either of these Gentlemen has made up his mind on the question, and I do not know whether, having made up his mind yesterday or the day before yesterday, he has not unmade his mind yesterday or to-day, or that he will not unmake it to-morrow. Before we vote away the whole time of the House for Her Majesty's Government, they ought, following precedent, to have placed us in possession not only of the nature of their repressive legislation, but also of the nature of their remedial legislation. That was the course adopted in 1882. In that year, before the Government moved for precedence for the Crimes Act, the Crimes Act had been read a first time, and not only read a first time, but read a second time; and not only that, but the Arrears Bill had also been introduced, and the second reading of it had been moved, and one night's discussion had been taken upon that stage. But now you would hurry us into the Lobby without having regard to that precedent. You ask us to go and vote blind, and not only do you ask us to do that, but you ask your own deluded followers to go and do the same, and I suppose they will obey you. I suppose that the consciences of hon. Gentlemen opposite will be as elastic as the consciences of Members of large majorities usually are, and I suppose these Gentlemen will be satisfied to vote blindly upon this question without further inquiry. But that is not our position, and I submit that we are entitled to further information than that which has been given by the right hon. Gentleman. In view of the extraordinary discrepancy of statement between the two right hon. Gentlemen who have spoken, one from this side and one from the Treasury Bench, I submit that we are entitled to that further information of which we have not received a single atom in the heated harangue of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Therefore, Sir, as one of the Members from Ireland who has a right to speak upon this question, and who is interested in this question, I, on behalf of 86 Irish Representatives, only three or four of whom have, so far, been allowed to take part in the discussion, beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Parnell.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I think the hon. Member must have anticipated the answer which it is my duty to give him. He will remember perfectly well that I rose on Wednesday evening and remarked on the silence of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. Hon. Gentlemen from Ireland have not availed themselves of the opportunities they had of taking part in this debate. [An hon. MEMBER: Opportunities on a Wednesday Sitting!] The hon. Member complains that opportunities have not been afforded to his Colleagues from Ireland to take part in the debate; but I have noticed that the hon. Member himself has been absent during the greater part of the debate. [An hon. MEMBER: Yes, but except—] I of the hon. Member from the debate for the last four days.

MR. PARNELL: It is very curious, Sir, but I have also noticed the absence of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have not been absent from the House more than an hour during the whole of the debate, and I can say this—that neither the hon. Member himself, nor the hon. Member for West Belfast, has, at any time, risen during the last four days. If they had risen, Sir, and could have caught your eye, I should have exerted whatever influence I may have over Members on this side of the House to have induced them to give way to those hon. Gentlemen. Seeing that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland have not availed themselves of the opportunities they have had of speaking in this debate, and seeing that this is the fourth night of the discussion, I do not think it would be right or proper to permit further discussion at a period of the Session when progress is required in the interests of the Business of the country. We should not have proposed this legislation if we had not felt its necessity and importance. I have stated repeatedly that we feel it to be our bounden duty to ask the House to proceed, with as little delay as possible, with the consideration and disposal of this great and important question. We cannot, therefore, consent to further adjournment at this stage of the debate, and I must, therefore, ask the House to come to a Division on the question before it at once.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): It is following rather a dangerous course to make remarks upon the presence or absence of individual Members during more or less of the period occupied by political debates. When the right hon. Gentleman opposite has had more experience in his present position—[“Oh, oh!” and interruption.] I wish to know, Sir, if I am disorderly in saying this? When the right hon. Gentleman has had more experience in his present position, he will find that observations of that kind are apt to be a good deal resented; they are liable to unintentional inaccuracy, and are not found to contribute to progress or harmonious debate. What I notice, as the result of much observation, is that there is much greater jealousy when these observations proceed from persons in great authority who are Leaders of the House. The hon. Member for Cork has observed that the Irish Members—the leading Irish Members—have not spoken in the debate beyond a very limited extent. I do not remember whether the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) and the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) are the only Irish Members who have spoken; but the right hon. Gentleman says that others might have risen and taken their chance of coming into the debate. That is true; they might have done that if they had chosen to establish a competition for that purpose; but then the effect would have been to shut out English and Scotch Members; and I think it was quite natural on their part to wish that the cause of Ireland, as they view it, should be defended by English and Scotch Members as far as it possibly could be. I think it would be most to the convenience and advantage of the House that we should not divide on this Motion for Adjournment—that is to say, that it should not be pressed to a Division. It is always a sign of the thickness of the fray when there are hostile Motions made for the purpose of adjournment on one side and resisted on the other. I can perceive that the fray is about to be thick enough; and particularly, I must say, after the very remarkable charges which have been made in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury—not altogether against myself, or against my Colleagues on the Front Opposition Bench, but against what he calls the Representatives of the Irish National League. I should wish very much that the Motion should not be pressed to a Division; but I am quite sure there will be fairness enough in the House to bear in mind this fact—that, in considering the further stages of the Bill, the Irish Members have as yet been hardly heard on the subject, and that full opportunity should be afforded to them for expressing their views. We have spent a greater number of nights in the introduction of the Bill than happens in most cases. There have been few instances in which a greater number of nights have been consumed; but I am bound to say that, in this instance, that fact is entirely and exclusively due to the precedent set by Her Majesty's Government in asking the House for urgency, without letting us know, in some official form, what it is they propose to do. I trust that we shall do all we can to keep down the heat of the moment, and that this side of the House, especially hon. Members below the Gangway, will be content to allow the Main Question to be put, and will urge on a future occasion that which I think they are entitled to stand upon—namely, that up to the present time the voice of Ireland has been very little heard on this question.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has, on this occasion, singularly and deplorably departed from what, in justice, I must admit is his usual courtesy. In my opinion, his reference to my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was a violation of the ordinary rules of courtesy which are observed and allowed to operate on Members of this House. The right hon. Gentleman has felt himself entitled to refer to the fact that, during a portion of the evening, my hon. Friend was absent from the debate. Now, I feel bound to say that, though it is a matter of common knowledge that the health of my hon. Friend has been far from robust, his attendance in the House, not only this evening, but since the debate opened, will compare most favourably with that of almost any Member of the Government, and of most Members of this House. It must also be borne in mind that, while my hon. Friend attends here voluntarily in the performance of a duty, his attendance will compare favourably with that of any highly-paid official of the Crown, some of whom have scarcely been seen here at all. What adds particularly to the incivility of the remark of the right hon. Gentleman is the fact that on a recent occasion, for an entire night, the Irish Members were expected to debate important Irish questions in the absence of the Ministers who ought to have been present to answer them. Not only were right hon. Gentlemen not here, but nobody could tell where they were. The right hon. Gentleman has done me the honour of making some personal reference to me. He has paid me a compliment which I do not deserve. He says that if I had risen to-night he would have used his influence—an influence which I am afraid, however, is not always effectual with his followers—to procure a hearing for me from the House. I did intend to speak this evening; but, certainly, what occurred early in the evening was not favourable to effective debate. The attendance after the opening speeches was extremely thin, and I had ascertained that my right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) desired to address the House, and I had no wish to put myself in competition with him, although, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) has told the House, in the remaining stages of the Bill it may be necessary for us to put ourselves in competition with English and Scotch Members. I also noticed the fact, which I have no doubt was noticed by hon. Members opposite, that a very able Member of the House—the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucestershire (Mr. Winterbotham)—rose six times, and, although for obvious reasons a speech was expected from him, he failed to catch your eye, Sir. Under those circumstances, I did not feel that if I had risen I could have any certainty that I would be called upon by the Chair. I desired to address the House at a period of the evening when the House was full, and the minds of hon. Members were likely to be influenced by the arguments which might be adduced; but what did I find? We all know that what takes place in the dinner hour is only in the nature of an intellectual excursion, and has no practical bearing upon the real progress of Business. But I learned during the dinner hour that the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) was to speak; that he was to be followed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt); and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) was to close the debate. The whole time of the House was therefore appropriated, and under the circumstances I did not feel called upon to rise, nor did I feel any certainty that, if I had done so, I should have been called upon. But although a Division may be taken to-night—for I do not imagine, after the appeal which has been made to him by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) will rise to-night—for Adjournment.

will take very good care that on the next stage, and indeed upon all subsequent stages of the Bill, whether English Members rise or not, or whether we rise first or last, we shall be fully and effectively heard upon this question.

Mr. PARNELL: In asking the leave of the House to withdraw the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, in deference to the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, may I be allowed to explain, in regard to the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury respecting my absence this evening, that I distinctly stated I had given up my right to speak to my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), and I fail to see what relevancy the remark of the right hon. Gentleman as to my absence during a portion of the evening has with the matter. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian thinks that a Division ought to be taken to-night, I ask the permission of the House to withdraw the Motion for Adjournment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton):

Sir, I rise to move the Amendment of which I gave Notice at the commencement of this day's proceedings, which is that at the end of the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) the words "except on Friday" be added. The House has just agreed, by a considerable majority, to give the Government a large portion of our time for the consideration of a Coercion Bill for Ireland, and I now ask the House to consider in what position private Members are placed. The Session has already lasted about two months, during which time private Members have not had a single day at their disposal. It may fairly be estimated that the discussions on the Coercion Bill will last two months. I take that as the minimum, and during that time private Members will get no day. We are told that after this Bill is disposed of there will be remedial legislation for Ireland. It is my individual opinion, and that of hon. Members on this side of the House who support the Government, that this legislation will also occupy two months, and that the Government will probably ask for the whole time of the House for the purpose. Then we are told that the Government intend to bring forward the rest of the Procedure Rules. These will require for their discussion another two months, and then there is Supply, for which towards the end of the Session the Government invariably ask for all the remaining days. This will make a total of eight months, during which private Members are not to have a single day for their Motions. I think it is not advisable to stretch the rope too tightly, and therefore I hope that my Amendment will be accepted. On Fridays many useful Motions are brought forward; Motions become Bills which, having been read a second time, pass into law, and it is in this way that on Fridays is sown the seed of future legislation. I observe that my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick (Mr. Marjoribanks) has on the Paper a very useful Motion in connection with harbours, for which he has obtained next Friday by ballot; and another hon. Member has a very useful Motion to make on the same day with regard to divorces. It is obvious, however great may be the desire to facilitate the Government endeavours to crush out all our liberties, that we ought to take into consideration the position of our sailors and the wives of our people. I take it as proved, again and again, that when the rope is drawn as I have said too tight, by taking every single day from private Members, there is a tendency to produce anger in the minds of those who think they are unfairly treated. Surely one day in the week is not too much to ask for the use of private Members. I point out to the First Lord of the Treasury that we have still in our hands the power to move Amendments. The right hon. Gentleman must know that there are 40 Members who will stand out, and who, if he does not give us one day a week, may be under the painful necessity of moving the adjournment of the House. We have acted with unexampled generosity throughout this discussion. We might have divided the House again and again, and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) has made it clear why he should demand the adjournment, in order to continue this debate on Monday; but we were generous, and allowed the Division to be taken. I hope that the First Lord of the Treasury will agree to this trifling modification of the Motion which I propose.

Amendment proposed, to add, at the end of the Question, the words "except on Friday."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. W. H. SMITH: I fully appreciate the generosity of the hon. Member for Northampton, and the extent to which he desires that the Government should have every possible facility for proceeding with the Business, as well as his anxiety to forward this debate. But I cannot think that it would be to the advantage of the House, nor would it be consistent with the spirit of the Motion which the House has already affirmed, that the exception which he suggests should be made. The feeling is that the House should proceed with their present Business de die in diem, and on that account I must resist the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The hon. Member for Northampton, in making the Government an offer which would have allowed them to proceed with other Business on Friday, had no intention of testing their views with regard to Procedure; but, by refusing that offer with a sneer at the generosity of my hon. Friend, they have shown the true value at which they appraise the Procedure Rules. I trust the House will arrive at a perfect understanding on this point. We were told that the Rules of Procedure were the great object in the mind of the Government, and that they were all of them almost equal in importance. The Government having refused the proposal of my hon. Friend, and seeing that urgency is required for the discussion of Irish matters, I take it to be an invitation to Members on this side of the House to consider ourselves free to put in force such portion of the Rules of the House as yet give us the liberty to move the adjournment of the House at Question time in order to discuss matters relating to Ireland. I have not the slightest doubt, under the circumstances, that my hon. Friends will be most happy to avail themselves of the constructive liberty which has been so kindly and generously conceded to them by the Leader of the House, and on behalf of my hon. Friends I beg to tender the right hon. Gentleman my warmest thanks.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of the proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere); at the same time, I do not think there is much to be gained by taking another Division at this hour. There is, however, one consolation. I have sat in this House for some years, and I have arrived at the conclusion that the time of the House is not likely to be occupied so much with this Coercion Bill as we might have anticipated before the last Division. This Bill is aborted before it is formed. The legions of the Government are deserting; neither the troops will face the guns of the constituencies. I believe this Bill—[Cries of "Order!"—]—I am giving reasons against the continuance of this discussion, which I am entitled to do. I am really acting in the interest of the Government; I am extending to them my compassion. There was a great fear on this side of the House that this Coercion Bill would take up a large part of the Session. I do not now think it will. I think that, although we must go through the struggle, the Bill is practically dead. The Government may go on for a time with a sort of suspended animation; but the division of a Party which cannot count on their supporters to stand by them on such a Division as this must be approaching completion. Therefore, if I were in the position of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, I should take that consolation to heart, and believe that before long we shall be delivered from the phantom of coercion, and go at once to the remedial measures of the Government, when I think we may hope that the time of the House would soon be free.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Having regard to the hour, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put.

Resolved, That the introduction and several stages of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion, including the Rules of Procedure, whenever the Bill shall be set down for consideration by the Government as the first business of the day.

BANKRUPTCY OFFICES (SITES)

[CONSOLIDATED FUND].

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Plunket.)

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Sir, this scheme proposes, for the relief of the Treasury, to draw upon a fund created by the fees in bankruptcy proceedings. The result is that by appropriating money for the building of offices the fund will be depleted, and the fees charged in bankruptcy proceedings correspondingly raised. In that way the intention of the Legislature, in passing the Act of 1883, will be entirely set aside, and the proceedings under it rendered unsatisfactory by reason of unfair charges on the estates. I shall, therefore, oppose your leaving the Chair, Mr. Speaker, unless there is some assurance given by the Government that the amount lost to the creditors under this Bill will be made good.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): This is only a formal stage of the matter, although it is, of course, a necessary stage. The Bill resulting will go before a Hybrid Committee. I do not quite understand the objection of the hon. Member. [Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Where are you going to get the money?] The 11th clause of the Bill provides that—

"All expenses incurred by the Commissioners under this Act shall be defrayed by the Treasury out of any surplus paid over to them out of the Bankruptcy Estates Account in pursuance of Section 76 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: provided that, if after any sum in respect of such expenses has been paid, the Board of Trade notify to the Treasury that an amount is required to answer the demands in respect of bankrupts' estates, and the securities and moneys held by the Treasury on the account mentioned in the said Section 76, are insufficient to pay the amount so required, the Treasury shall, for the purpose of meeting the deficiency, charge on, and pay out of, the Consolidated Fund, or the growing produce thereof, the sum expended in pursuance of this section, or such part thereof as appears to them to be required."

Money will be found out of these funds, and the Treasury will make good such sums as may be called upon.

Question put, and agreed to.

Matter considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the grant, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, of a sum to meet any deficiency which may arise in the payment of the expenses of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings incurred under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for the acquisition of property and the provision of new buildings for the Bankruptcy Department.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

IRISH LAND LAW BILL.

QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: Seeing the noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal in his place, I would ask him a Question of which I have given him private Notice—namely, When the Irish Land Bill will be printed and circulated among the Members of your Lordships' House? Also, I desire to ask him, if he is able to state the time when the Government will take the second reading?

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (EARL CADOGAN): In reply to my noble Friend I beg to say that, in pursuance of Notice already given, I propose to explain to your Lordships the Irish Land Bill of the Government on Thursday next. If it should be the pleasure of the House to read the Bill a first time, it will be printed and circulated immediately, and will, I think, be in the hands of your Lordships a day or two after that. In regard to the second reading, it is impossible for me to fix a day this evening; but I may say that it is the wish of the Government to proceed with the measure as soon as possible after the Easter Recess.

ALLOTMENTS BILL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF JERSEY asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they would introduce the Allotments Bill in that House at an early date? The Bill had been promised in the Speech from the Throne, and if it was to be passed it would be well that it should be passed early in the summer, so as to enable necessary arrangements to be made before Michaelmas; but, from the flow of words in "another place," there did not seem to be much prospect of the Bill being brought forward there. He felt sure that they would entertain in a kindly spirit a measure which was for the advantage of the country. It was very likely there might not be so large a demand for additional allotments as was sometimes supposed; but the introduction of a practical measure with fair and compulsory clauses, into their Lordships' House, would have a most beneficial effect in reducing the very high and, in some cases, extortionate rents which were exacted for allotments.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I am very sorry that the only answer I can give to my noble Friend's Question is that the Bill will certainly not be introduced before Easter. I cannot at present fix any particular day for its introduction.

THE EARL OF JERSEY: Will it be introduced into this House?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I cannot answer that Question.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) said, he could not foresee what the state of Business would be. It was necessary very much to arrange the introduction of Bills in this House in reference to the possibility of their being introduced into the other, and with reference to the possibility of their being passed in the other, and the time they would take in each House. The Government had not yet decided what course would be taken.

THE EARL OF JERSEY: I only asked the Question in order to get from the Government an assurance that the Bill will be introduced this Session under ordinary circumstances, and that there is no intention at present of shelving the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I can assure the noble Earl that there is no intention whatever on the part of the Government to shelve the question.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL— PETITION OF THE SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.—MOTION.

LORD BRAMWELL said, that last Friday he presented a Petition from the South Eastern Railway Company, praying that the Company might be heard by counsel at the bar against the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill. He might take the opportunity of saying that his clients, he was about to say—[Laughter]—he would adopt the word—his clients the Railway Company, who were represented by him, and who desired to be represented by counsel, had not presented that Petition in a spirit of obstruction. The application he was now making had not been originally suggested by them, but by himself to them. He wanted to present, not an abstract, but a concrete case—the particular case of this particular Company—upon the subject upon which they were called upon to legislate. The Petition stated two facts, neither of which could be contradicted. One was that under an Act passed in 1836 they made their line, and were empowered to charge certain rates and tolls. The other fact, equally indisputable, was that the Bill proposed to take away the right to charge these rates. It seemed to him only necessary to state these facts in order to obtain a favourable answer to the Petition that his clients might be allowed to employ counsel before their Lordships against the Bill which proposed to interfere with their rights. The noble Lord in charge of the Bill had stated that there was a special reservation by Parliament of its right to revise these rates and tolls. But no lawyer would raise such a contention, as this reservation was only to be found in Acts of Parliament passed long subsequently to the Company's Act of 1836. As he had said, he had not been requested by the Company to bring this matter before their Lordships, but he had made the suggestion to the Company himself. As they would be affected by the principle of the Bill now before their Lordships, they ought, in all fairness and justice, to be heard against it. It was not to be supposed that the case of the South Eastern Railway Company was so bad that it was not worth while to hear them. That he denied, and no lawyer would contradict him. What would be thought of a tribunal or Judge that first decided a case was too plain to hear the party, and then without hearing, decided against him? The Company he represented would be seriously affected by the Bill; and in fairness, reason, and justice, they ought to be heard upon it. He therefore moved that the South Eastern Railway Company be heard by counsel against the Bill.

Moved, "That the prayer of the petition of the South Eastern Railway Company, presented on Friday last, praying to be heard by counsel against the Bill, be complied with."—(The Lord Bramwell.)

The Earl of Jersey

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord STANLEY OF PRESTON) said, that when he came down to the House, he was prepared only to speak to the point to which the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) had begun by calling attention, and that was whether or not it was expedient that this Bill should be argued by counsel at the Bar. He (Lord Stanley of Preston) was prepared to show that it was not expedient for the House to acquiesce in the Motion which the noble and learned Lord had made. Having consulted the practice of the House on former occasions, in order to see what precedents there were for counsel being heard against Bills in their Lordships' House, he found that it was at least 40 years since any Motion similar to that which the noble and learned Lord had made had been proposed in that House. He would not weary the House by going through the authorities; but there were at least ten or a dozen measures with regard to which this proposal had been made, the latest occurring between the years 1835 and 1840. No doubt, in very exceptional cases, counsel had been heard at the Bar in opposition to measures. An important debate took place in the House on June 10, 1850, with regard to a Petition concerning the Australian Colonies Government Bill, when it was ultimately decided by a sufficient, though not a large, majority that it was not expedient for the Petitioners to be heard by counsel at the Bar in opposition to the Bill. Sir Erskine May, in his Parliamentary Practice, laid down the Rules which had always prevailed with regard to the discussion of Bills of national interest, and stated that it had not been unusual, when particular persons were affected, to allow them to be represented by counsel. In making that observation Sir Erskine May was doubtless referring to the practice of hearing counsel before Committees. With respect to this Petition, the Company in question had not communicated with anyone in charge of the Bill upon any of the grievances which they alleged. There was nothing, he maintained, complicated about the question to need their Lordships hearing counsel upon it. He would point out that the Bill did not touch the revenue of the Companies; and that it did not deal in anything like the sweeping manner stated with the traffic arrangements. For instance, as regarded the question of the reduction of fares, he had expressly stated, in introducing the measure, that it did not attempt to deal with them in any comprehensive manner. The noble and learned Lord would probably not contend that Parliament, in these latter matters, had reserved to itself the right of dealing with them on the grounds of general policy, bearing in mind, of course, the interests of the public on one hand, and those of the Companies on the other. As regarded this particular Petition, it was not presented till Friday evening before the debate. He had no doubt their Lordships would give it full consideration; but there was nothing about the case to induce them to reverse the uniform practice of the House for at least 40 years. Not only would the course proposed be exceedingly inconvenient; but it was difficult to see how the Petitioners would benefit by its adoption, inasmuch as there were very few counsel who would be so well able to lay their case before the House as the noble and learned Lord. The measure was, he thought, in the general feeling of the House, a useful and workable one; and the Company, as he had said, had not made any communication to those who were in charge of the Bill. He trusted the House would not accede to the Motion of the noble and learned Lord, for its effect would be only to lead to delay. It would not be productive of any advantage to the Companies, and it would be extremely inconvenient to the practice of their Lordships' House.

Lord BRAMWELL said, he should like to point out that the South Eastern Railway Company could not petition against the second reading of the Bill. What they asked was to be heard on clauses which particularly affected them. The noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade based his argument on the assumption that the Bill would not affect the revenue of this Company. If the Company had a guarantee to that effect from the noble Lord, of course they would desire nothing more, and would be satisfied. They, however, believed that it would affect them; and, in the name of justice, those who were going to be injured by this legislation should be heard before the injury was done. He did not understand Erskine May to say that such a Petition as that should not be heard. He asked, as a matter of right, that the Petitioners should be heard.

COLONIES (NAVAL AND MILITARY SERVICES).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

Moved for, "Address for Report of the Committee appointed last year to consider the position of officers in receipt of pensions and desirous of entering upon military or naval service in the Colonies; also the Correspondence resulting from that Report between the Committee and the Lords of the Treasury."—(The Viscount Sidmouth.)

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of Onslow) said, there would be no objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to lay upon the Table of that House the Report of the Committee or the Correspondence which followed; but he would point out that, in the latter case, the documents were not yet quite complete. The Government, however, would consider what Papers could be laid before the House. He would state the result of what had been agreed to. It was manifestly in the interests of the Empire that no obstacle should be thrown in the way of the Colonies organizing their own defences in such a way as to become a source of additional strength to the Empire, and the Government, therefore, had always been anxious to further the efforts of the Colonial Authorities in that respect. Many retired officers of the Army and Navy were at present forced to live a life of idleness, and it would be a great advantage to the Colonies that they should have the advantage of the services of those experienced officers. In that way the forces of the Colonies might be rendered efficient and trustworthy in case of emergency. What had been arranged was this—that a naval officer on the Active List would not draw his half-pay from the Imperial Government, but would look wholly to the Colonies for his remuneration; but, on the other hand, his services would count for increased pay and retirement allowance, and also for promotion. An officer employed as an engineer or torpedoist would be deemed to be in naval or military employment. Present holders of appointments in the Colonies would be given a month to decide whether they would hold under the old or the new arrangements. Any Army officer might count his time in the Colonial Service for pay and half-pay. It was hoped the effect of these regulations would be to give the Colonies the advantage of the matured experience of the officers of the Imperial Service. The present more rapid system of promotion caused by retirement after a certain length of service would give the Colonies more opportunities of availing themselves of the services of retired officers than they formerly had. It was not always convenient to present Papers which were not complete, and in ordinary circumstances it would probably have been better to wait; but, in view of the meeting of the Colonial Conference, he thought it would be very desirable that such Papers as were ready should be presented as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACTS—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in asking Her Majesty's Government, When it is proposed to issue an analytical index to the Evidence of the Royal Commission on the Irish Land Acts? said, there had recently been presented to their Lordships House a very voluminous Blue Book, containing the evidence given before the Land Commission, of which he had had the honour of being a Member; but the importance of that volume as a book of reference was extremely diminished by the absence from it of an analytical Index, one of the consequences being that anyone who desired to find out what the general opinion was upon a particular point was involved in a difficulty similar to that of the individual who searched for the proverbial needle in a bundle of hay. That there was an Index he was aware, because the excellent and painstaking Secretary to the Commission had begun to prepare it some weeks ago; and he (the Earl of Milltown) was certain it was not the fault of this gentleman that the Index was not printed at the same time as the Report. He hoped the noble Earl the Paymaster General (Earl Beauchamp) would be able to state that the fault was not with the Government Departments in having neglected to supply the Secretary to the Commission with the necessary assistance. Most mischievous results might follow from quoting isolated passages from the evidence of particular witnesses; and it was only by seeing how the general consensus of evidence went that an opinion could be safely arrived at as to the point to which the evidence tended. As he was on the subject of the Commission, he might be allowed to say a word on a personal matter. He saw by the newspapers that the other day a gentleman, in making a very furious onslaught on the Commission in general, elsewhere described him (the Earl of Milltown) as one of the most malevolent and persistent rack-renters in Ireland. All he could say was that, if he was a type of the rack-renter at large, the Irish tenant had not very much to complain of, for he had never in his life raised a rent, nor had ever a dispute with a tenant; nor did he deserve much credit on that ground, because the whole of his patrimonial estate—so far as the agricultural part of it was concerned—was let in leases for ever in the early part of last century. It would puzzle even the ingenious gentleman who had made the onslaught on him to demonstrate how he could possibly raise his rents, as these rents were at present less than a quarter of the prairie value. If this gentleman would make the discovery, he should be very much obliged to him if he would communicate it to him.

THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (Earl BRANCHAMP), in reply, said, that neither the Home Office nor the Treasury had any answer to give to the noble Earl in this matter. He (Earl Branchamp) could only give an answer similar to that tendered under similar circumstances by the Secretary of State—namely, that Her Majesty's Government had no authority or control whatever over a Royal Commission when once appointed. The noble Earl who asked for an acceleration of the work of preparing the Index must apply to the Chairman of the Commission, or the Secretary who had the work under his control.

QUESTIONS.

NATIONAL BOARD OF EDUCATION (IRELAND)—EXAMINATIONS FOR WORKMISTRESSES.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether in examinations for workmistresses, under the National Board of Education, it is usual to forward work done in presence of the Inspector of Schools to the Education Office in Dublin, in order to have it further examined; and, if he will state the general practice in such cases?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Commissioners of National Education inform me that for some time past the practice has been as stated, the object being that the work may be tested by a competent female authority.

LAND ACT (IRELAND)—MR. WRENCH, A LAND COMMISSIONER.

MR. T. M. [REDACTED] asked the Ch

Lieutenant of Ireland, On whose recommendation was Mr. Wrench made a Land Commissioner; to how many landlords was he agent, and who were they; is he the same Mr. Wrench whose conduct was condemned by the Court of Appeal, in December, 1885, for refusing to weigh for certain Catholics in Clones, where a sole right of weighing pork is asserted by the landlord to whom he was then agent; and, did the Government ascertain how many tenants had judicial rents fixed on the properties with which the new Land Commissioner was connected?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The office is not in the gift of the Irish Government. I have no information on the second and fourth paragraphs. With respect to the third paragraph, I am informed that Mr. Wrench's conduct was never condemned by the Court of Appeal. The action referred to was one in which no question of religion was involved, and turned solely upon the rights of a patentee of fairs and markets, whose agent Mr. Wrench was. The Court merely decided on certain questions of law, holding that the patentee could not sustain his rights to the extent claimed by him.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND) — THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE'S ESTATE, QUEEN'S COUNTY.

MR. LALOR (Queen's Co., Leix) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true, as stated in The Times of the 23rd instant, that the Marquess of Lansdowne, Governor General of Canada, commenced the eviction of his Luggacurran, Queen's County, tenants on the 22nd instant, when he evicted Mr. Denis Kilbride; whether he is aware that Mr. Kilbride's rent is £760, and his valuation only £424, which leaves his rent 80 per cent over his valuation; whether the Marquess of Lansdowne only offered a reduction of 20 per cent on Mr. Kilbride's rent, which would still leave the rent 44 per cent over the valuation; whether Mr. Kilbride has a lease of his holding, and is thereby precluded from the benefits of the Land Courts; and, as many of the other tenants are in a worse position, will he continue to employ the Forces of the Crown in the eviction of those people?

Mr. T. M. Healy

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I do not consider it any part of my duty to make inquiries as to particular transactions between individual landlords and their tenants, or to test the accuracy of every newspaper paragraph on such subjects. I think it right to state, however, that information has been voluntarily supplied to me which would seem to show that, while Griffiths' valuation was intended to be below the fair rent, the Marquess of Lansdowne actually receives less than Griffith's valuation, if interest on landlord's outlay be taken into account. The changes in the law which the Government are prepared to recommend will be announced on Thursday next in the House of Lords.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state from what source he received the information?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the source; but it is one in which I have confidence.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—GRAND JURIES, CO. DOWN.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Grand Jury empanelled for the County of Down, at the recent Spring Assizes, consisted of 12 landlords, and eight other gentlemen who are the agents of landlords; whether, in Ireland, Grand Juries are usually constituted in like manner; whether Grand Juries, in Ireland, are the only Bodies (save Coroners' Juries) that can ignore or find true bills against persons sent forward for trial before a Judge of Assize; whether these Grand Juries have power to present or reject all applications respecting the making and repair of roads, fences, bridges, and all other works to be undertaken by the county, besides the applications for compensation for malicious injuries, and presentments for the salaries of the County Treasurers, Clerks of the Crown, Clerks of the Peace, Secretaries to Grand Juries, Coroners, Sheriffs, Medical Officers to Prisons, and other county officials; whether the Baronial High Constables appointed for the collection of the assessments made by the Grand Juries are paid out of the county cess; whether the Grand Juries appoint the Baronial High Constables; whether they have power to appoint, and do appoint, certain persons to the office, notwithstanding that other candidates frequently offer to collect the cess at lower rates, and to give the security required; and, whether, under the circumstances, the Government will make provision, in their promised legislation on the Irish Land Question, to secure to the cess-paying tenant, by proper representation on the Grand Juries, a voice in the expenditure of the county monies paid by them?

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) said, before the right hon. Gentleman answered that Question, he wished to ask him, whether it was not a fact that all presentments which came before the Grand Jury were originated at Baronial Presentment Sessions; and, whether the powers of the former Body were not limited in almost all cases to refusing, rejecting, or confirming the presentments sent up to them by the latter?

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.) asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether he was aware that the Grand Jury of the County of Down was composed exclusively of Protestants?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am afraid I cannot give any information on that point. The empanelling, the duties, and the functions of Grand Juries are all regulated by Statute; and I am advised that any illegality or irregularity connected therewith would be at once corrected by the Judge of Assize on the matter being brought to his notice. The Government recognize that some change in the law is desirable as regards these subjects; but this, as well as other very important questions connected with Local Government, must stand over until more pressing matters are dealt with.

THE COLONIAL CONFERENCE— IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, during the visit of the Colonial Representatives to the approaching Colonial Conference, the Government will take into consideration the question of arranging for a special Conference between Representatives of the United Kingdom, and of the principal Colonies of the Empire, on the question of Imperial Federation of the United Kingdom and the Colonies in its political aspect?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): I understand that there is no necessity for any special arrangements for the discussion of the question of Imperial Federation, as that will be provided for, independently of the Colonial Conference, by those influential persons who have taken an active interest in the subject; but, in any case, the terms of the despatch inviting the Colonies to the Conference preclude Her Majesty's Government from taking the action suggested.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—GUARDIANS— COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Mr. William Newell Barron, Q.O., County Court Judge for County Monaghan, is on the list of ex officio Guardians for the Carrick-on-Suir Union for the year 1887; and, whether the Local Government Board have sanctioned this, having regard to the fact that, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, s. 23, County Court Judges are disqualified from acting as ex officio Guardians?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Several years ago the then Law Officers of the Crown advised that the section mentioned in this Question does not disqualify a County Court Judge from acting as an ex-officio Guardian of a Union in a county in which he does not preside as Judge. No part of the Carrick-on-Suir Union is in the County of Monaghan; and Judge Barron is, therefore, according to the legal opinion which guides the Local Government Board, not disqualified from acting as an ex-officio Guardian in that Union.

DOMINION OF CANADA — ARMED CRUISERS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is correct that the Dominion Parliament possesses authority to purchase and direct the operations of armed cruisers in Dominion waters, without the consent of the Imperial Parliament; if so, will he be good enough to inform the House the statute under which such authority was granted?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): By a reference to the 91st section of the British North American Act, 1867, it will be seen that the Parliament of Canada has power to legislate upon all questions of Militia, Military, and Naval Service and Defence. But I may add that in 1884 Her Majesty's Government were advised that all Colonies possessing responsible Governments are at liberty, independently of an Act of the Imperial Parliament, to provide and equip armed vessels for harbour defence and police, and other like purposes, within the waters of such Colonies respectively; their use being limited to those waters. It follows that the Dominion Parliament possesses the authority referred to in the Question without the consent of the Imperial Parliament.

FACTORIES ACTS — WORKING MEN INSPECTORS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, with regard to his statement on the 9th September, 1886, on the Vote for the Home Office, that he should always be disposed to exercise his powers in favour of appointing efficient and competent working men as Inspectors of Factories; whether he had acted in accordance with that statement in the case of the two recent appointments made by him; whether, in the future, as vacancies arise, he would be disposed to consider the claims of competent working men to those appointments; and, whether provision has been made in this year's Estimates for an increase in the staff of Sub-Inspectors of Factories?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have acted in accordance with the statement referred to, and the two appointments recently made by me were of competent working men with a practical experience of factory work and life. I have stated, more than once in this House, that it is not my intention to increase the existing staff of Sub-Inspectors of Factories.

DWELLINGS FOR THE WORKING CLASS — THE PEABODY TRUSTEES — THE PROPERTY TAX.

MR. MORRISON (York, W.R., Skipton) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is aware that, as disclosed by a recent Report of the Trust, the buildings erected by the Peabody Trustees (in respect of which Property Tax is remitted on the ground of charity) are let at profit rentals to skilled artisans—such as engineers, brass-finishers, bricklayers, carpenters, printers, compositors, and other persons of the good wage class, as postmen, policemen, &c.—and if he will remit the Property Tax in respect of the dwellings of the Societies established to provide improved dwellings for that class, or discontinue the remission to the Peabody Trustees, so as to preserve, as far as possible, equality in the taxation of the working classes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square), in reply, said, the exemption of the Peabody Buildings was due to the fact that any surplus which might arise out of the rentals of these houses was invested again in new buildings for the working classes, and that no person derived any profit from them. It was on that ground that they were exempted; and that exemption would, no doubt, equally apply to any other Societies who put themselves in the same position. The Societies which were now taxed were those which did derive a certain amount of profit.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Royal Commission on Public Works, Ireland, is expected to make its Report; and, when does Government propose to provide for payment of the additional expenditure incurred in unions scheduled under "The Poor Relief (Ireland) Act, 1886?"

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I was enabled to state last week, in reply to another hon. Member, that the Royal Commissioners had informed me that they are at present preparing their Report on Arterial Drainage.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) asked if it was true, as stated, that the members of the Royal Commission were paid ten guineas a-day, or any other such sum?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the same rule applied to them as to the members of any other Royal Commission.

LAND ACT (IRELAND)—A COMMISSION COURT, CO. WEXFORD.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the arrangements for the holding of a Land Commission Court in Gorey, County Wexford, during the present month, have been altered, and that no such Court will now be held until July next; whether he is aware that this change of plan has caused grave inconvenience, owing to the number of cases awaiting judication; and, whether he can state the reason for this change?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. Member appears to have been misinformed. The Land Commissioners state that no arrangement was made for the sitting of a Sub-Commission at Gorey during the present month, and no change has been made.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—BARRACK IN COOKSTOWN, CO. TYRONE.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is contemplated to remove the police barrack in Cookstown, County Tyrone, from its present position to a comparatively remote and inconvenient site; whether he is aware that at certain periods of the year Catholics find it difficult to pass through the Orange quarters owing to Party turbulence, and that by the removal of the police barrack they are left unprotected; and, whether, having regard to the peculiar physical shape of the town in question, he will take into consideration the advisability of establishing police stations at either end?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The police are obliged to remove from their present barrack in Cookstown, as the owner of the house requires it for other purposes and has given them notice to quit. There is no intention of taking a house in a remote or inconvenient site. On the contrary, efforts are being made to obtain one in a central situation, which would place the police in a better position than they now occupy for the protection of both parties in the town. It is not considered necessary to incur the

ADMIRALTY—DOCKYARD OFFICIALS—LORD BRASSEY'S "NAVAL ANNUAL."

MR. DWYER GRAY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to the disclosures in connection with the recent trafficking at Chatham Dockyard in Admiralty documents containing private information, Is it a fact that certain Admiralty officials of position are in receipt of yearly money, or certain donations of money, from Lord Brassey for the purpose of editing, or assisting in editing, his Naval Annual, which contains information drawn from Admiralty private and confidential documents, to which these officials have access?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): I understand that a gentleman connected with the Admiralty assisted Lord Brassey in the work of editing his Naval Annual. He had nothing to do with the supply, or collection, of the information, or with the matter it contained. The assistance given was altogether of a private nature, and in no way connected with office hours or public duties.

POST OFFICE—THE REGISTERED LETTER BRANCH.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is the fact that on the midnight duty, in the registered letter branch of the General Post Office, the "hand to hand" check system is not pursued; whether, during the last six months, several registered letters have been lost on that duty; whether it is the case that a junior sorter, named Cox, was required to perform a sorter's duty, without any pecuniary consideration being granted to him for the increased responsibility thereby entailed upon him, and was made responsible for the loss of a registered letter, and fined 10s., notwithstanding the fact that there was no proof of it having ever been in his possession; and, whether he will take steps to insure the safer transmission of registered letters, in the interests of the public, and in justice to the Post Office officials?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that when large numbers of registered letters are dealt with, it is impossible to make the charge and discharge in writing for each individual letter; but the acceptance of a certain number of registered letters by one officer from another officer without question is held to discharge the latter from further responsibility. It was the duty of the officer named by the hon. Member to ascertain the number of registered letters which he had to take over, and to check this number at the actual time he received them by the entries in a certain book. This he neglected to do; and when he subsequently checked the registered letters charged to him, the one now lost was missing. For this neglect of duty he was fined. The officer in question was paid an additional allowance of 2s. a-week in consideration of his employment on registered letter duty. The Regulations for dealing with registered letters are sufficient if properly carried out.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—MR. FERRITER, OF DINGLE.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Ferriter, of Dingle, is still in prison on the charge of having called out "Harvey Duff" and "Stringer" at a public meeting in Dingle on the 16th January last; how long he has been in prison; whether, considering that on the hearing of the case no evidence whatever was adduced to prove that the peaceable conduct of the meeting was in any way disturbed by Mr. Ferriter, or the least indication of an attack upon either the Government Reporter or the police was manifested, he will order his release; and, whether he will enable the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall, who was present at the meeting in question from first to last, to give him information as to what actually took place?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Owing to the shortness of the Notice given, I have not been able to receive replies to the first three paragraphs of this Question. As regards the last paragraph, I shall be happy to receive any information which the hon. Member may be good enough to furnish me with on the subject.

Mr. Raikes

LANDED PROPRIETORS (IRELAND), 1886—RETURN.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will consent to a Return of Landed Proprietors (Ireland) for 1886, in the same form as that ordered to be printed 23rd April, 1872, No. 167?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Return referred to was compiled mainly through the agency of the Inspectors under the Local Government Board; and these officers are now so fully occupied that, without an increase to their numbers, the preparation of a similar Return could not be undertaken at present. I am not satisfied that there is any such necessity for the information as would justify me in asking the House to agree to a special Vote for the purpose.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTIONS IN COOTEHILL—THE RETURNING OFFICER.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that Mr. Graham, senior, is acting as Returning Officer for Poor Law elections in Cootehill, Mr. Graham, junior, being at present clerk to the Guardians; and, if the facts are as stated, will he cause the Local Government Board to remedy the irregularity?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Mr. Graham, junior, Clerk of the Union, reports that, though his father was present and assisted him by opening the papers, he personally acted as Returning Officer, as he was bound to do, deciding each case himself, and recording the votes for the candidates. So far as the Local Government Board can form an opinion from the information at present before them, no irregularity took place in the proceedings.

EGYPT (ARMY OF OCCUPATION)—HEALTH OF THE TROOPS AT ASSOUAN.

MR. EDWARDS-MOSS (Lancashire, S.W., Widnes) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in view of the general tranquillity of the Soudan and Upper Egypt, it is intended to keep any British Troops at Assouan during the approaching summer; and, whether, if forces are needed at Assouan, it would be possible to relieve the present British Force by Egyptian troops during the summer months, in view of the great mortality among the British soldiers there during the hot weather last year?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to the danger to the health of British troops which may be caused by keeping them at Assouan during the hot weather, and I hope that the condition of affairs on the frontier may be such as to enable us to reduce this risk to a minimum.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND) — TRIAL OF HANNAH O'DONNELL AT LIFFORD ASSIZES.

MR. MC CARTAN (Down, S.) (for Mr. O'DONNERTY) (Donegal, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the information before, and the evidence at, the trial of Hannah O'Donnell, at Lifford Assizes, for alleged forcible entry, and the informations in several similar cases, disclose the fact that the police entered the houses of the defendants, interrogated the inmates, asked them to quit, and that, for over a month, they had been watching the houses from which these defendants had been evicted; whether the houses were for most of that time lying open; whether any bailiff or other person, on behalf of the landlord, was in possession, or watching the houses; whether anything was done from the day of the eviction by the landlord to secure the possession; whether the houses were built by the tenants; whether their time for redemption, after eviction, had expired; whether the police receive any remuneration for their services from the landlord in such cases; whether Sergeant Mahony was directed by the Lord Chief Baron to say if he had a Circular of Instructions for doing as above, and whether he claimed privilege for not producing it through claiming that he acted under a Circular issued several years before; and, whether he will call for further explanations as to this case?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): From the reports submitted to me, it appears that the police entered the house referred to, spoke to the persons whom they found trespassing there and requested them to leave. The period of redemption had not expired at the time. The police did not specially watch these houses, but acted as above mentioned, when passing through the locality in the ordinary discharge of their duty. They do not act as bailiffs, or receive any remuneration from landlords for any such services. Sergeant Mahony was not directed by the Judge to say if he had a Circular of Instructions; but he stated, in cross-examination, that he acted under a Circular issued some years ago, for the non-production of which he claimed privilege. As I have already intimated, the purport of that Circular was not correctly stated in the newspaper report recently quoted by the hon. Member.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—ALLEGED ILL-TREATMENT OF CONVICTS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the article in The Essex Weekly News of 17th March with reference to the alleged ill-treatment of convicts; and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.), in reply, said, he had obtained a Report from the Governor of the prison at which the convicts were alleged to have been ill-treated, and he was informed that the prisoners had greatcoats, and that the medical officer stated that they had not received any injury from their journey, although the weather was very inclement. He, however, intended to make further inquiry into the subject.

BURIAL FUNDS — PARISH OF LLAN-FROTHERN, MERIONETHSHIRE.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the lady who presented the additional portion of the burial ground of the parish of Llanfrothen, Merionethshire, made any stipulations, when the present was made 20 years ago, that the ground should be conducted within a certain time, the services of the Rev. Mr. Jones, and, ther-the then rector of the parish solicited and obtained subscriptions from the Nonconformists of the parish towards raising the wall of the new portion of the burial ground; whether there is any pathway or other mark to distinguish between the portions where the Burials Act of 1880 is or is not applicable; whether the deed, by which the present rector refuses to Nonconformists the benefits of the Burials Act of 1880, was made after the passing of that Act; whether, at the vestry of the parish held last Saturday, 20th March, the rector said that this new portion of the burial ground is as much the property of the parishioners as the highroad; and, whether he can take steps to prevent the rector from refusing to his parishioners the right of availing themselves of the benefits of an Act of Parliament, on what is admitted to be their common property?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have received a further communication from the rector of Llanfrothen on this subject, who informs me that he is unable to state what took place 20 years ago; but that when the land was conveyed in 1881 it was the wish of the lady that the funeral services should be conducted according to the rites of the Church of England. The rector is told that the parishioners did promise subscriptions towards building the walls; but he believes that all the expenses fell upon the rector and the churchwardens. The wall of the parish churchyard—the foundation of which is untouched—divides the two portions of the burial ground from each other. The deed was made subsequently to the Burials Act of 1880. The rector said at the vestry, in answer to an observation from some one, that the new burial ground was not his private property, that he was only a trustee, and that it was as much the property of the parishioners as the highroad on certain conditions, one of them being that funerals should be conducted according to the rites of the Church of England. I see no reason to interfere with the conduct of the rector in this matter.

INDIA (MADRAS)—FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for

Mr. T. E. Ellis

India, Whether the senior Member of the Madras Board of Revenue recently reported that he believes the Government to be regularly defrauded by its own servants of 20 per cent of its annual income; and, whether the Secretary of State will cause inquiry to be made into the whole system of revenue administration in the Madras Presidency?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): No; the loss of revenue reported as arising from improper remissions was not 20 but 0·3 per cent. The Secretary of State does not consider an inquiry into the "whole system of revenue administration in the Madras Presidency" necessary. He has, some time ago, directed an inquiry into the special point of precautions to be taken in the remission of land revenue.

INDIA (MADRAS)—OUTBREAK IN THE GUDEN DISTRICT.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, in the outbreak in July last in the Guden District, Madras, the police defended their station before it was burnt; how many police were engaged; what was the total of casualties on each side; and, who inhabited the two bungalows burnt by the rebels?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): There were 10 or 11 police at the station; but they allege that they were surprised while asleep, and they made no resistance. There were no casualties on either side. The two bungalows burnt were the property of the Government; but I cannot say whether they were inhabited at the time, or by whom.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—DUTCH CATTLE.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If information has been received from Holland to the effect that Dutch cattle are free from contagious diseases; whether the Regulations in force in Holland are sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, so as to allow the free importation of Dutch cattle into this country; whether any application has been made by the Dutch Government, during the last year, to place Dutch cattle on the same favour.

able footing as now exists with respect to cattle imported from Scandinavia; and, whether he will remove the present restrictions, so that Dutch cattle need not be slaughtered at the place of landing?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (LORD JOHN MANNERS) (Leicestershire, E.): Information has been received from the Dutch Government to the effect that Dutch cattle are free from contagious disease; and an application was recently made to the Privy Council to permit the landing of Dutch cattle without being subject to slaughter or quarantine. In reply they were informed that the Regulations in force in Holland, under which German sheep are allowed to pass through the Netherlands to be shipped at Dutch ports, were not considered to be satisfactory, and that, in the circumstances, the Government do not deem it expedient to relax the restrictions on Dutch cattle. We have not received any reply to this communication.

IRELAND—DUBLIN HOSPITALS—THE COMMISSION ON GRANTS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Commission on Grants to the Dublin Hospitals concluded its sittings a year ago; and, when the Report will be published?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Commissioners concluded their sittings a year ago, as stated. I understand they have had great difficulty in coming to any agreement on the subject of their Report; but it is now expected that it will be submitted to the Lord Lieutenant this week.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—THE CATTLE TRADE WITH IRELAND.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) (for Mr. O'DOHERTY) (Donegal, N.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether the attention of the Board has been called to the state in which Irish cattle are landed at British ports from cross-channel steamers; whether he will inquire into the cause of their arriving in worse condition, after eight or 10 hours at sea, than American cattle, after 10 or 12 days on the Atlantic; whether the Board's Regulations provide for ventilation and sufficient air space, or only deal with standing room; and, whether the Board will, in conjunction with the Privy Councils of Great Britain and Ireland, cause a Departmental inquiry into this important matter, with a view to meet the complaints of those interested in the trade on both sides of the Channel?

THE SECRETARY (BARON HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth), in reply, said, the subject of this Question did not relate to the Board of Trade, but to the Privy Council.

ADMIRALTY—(CHATHAM DOCKYARD) —MR. YOUNG TERRY.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S. W.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the statement taken from The Standard newspaper of the 25th instant is correct—

"Instructions from Whitehall have been received at Chatham Dockyard, directing that the son of Mr. Young Terry, as a consequence of his father's offence, be reduced from the rank of junior draughtsman, and transferred to Devonport to work as a mechanic?"

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): No, Sir. The statement in the Question is not true. The son of Mr. Young Terry has not been reduced, nor has his rank been in any way affected; but, with his assent, an arrangement has been made by which he will be transferred from Chatham to another Dockyard.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether the Board of Trade is prepared to recommend, at once, the construction of Harbours of Refuge in such positions as are considered most advantageous, with a view to saving the enormous loss of life and property which now takes place annually on the coasts of the United Kingdom?

THE SECRETARY (BARON HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I am afraid I cannot modify the answer I have already given my hon. and gallant Friend on this subject. I can only say that, while recognizing its importance, I must point out that, as the matter would necessarily involve a large outlay, it concerns those who make the financial arrangements of the country, as well as the Board of Trade.

ADMIRAL MAYNE asked, whether the hon. Gentleman would recommend the matter to the attention of the financial authority?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he could give no answer; the matter was receiving the consideration of the Board of Trade.

ARMY—THE AMBULANCE SYSTEM—SURGEON MAJOR SANDFORD MOORE,

DR. TINDAL ROBERTSON (Brighton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that Surgeon Major Sandford Moore, who originated and introduced into the Army the present ambulance system for the removal of the wounded from the field of battle, has been obliged to retire on the lowest rate of pension, in consequence of total and permanent blindness, induced, in the opinion of a Medical Board, by his extra literary duties; and, whether, under these circumstances, he would take into consideration the justice of granting to this officer some additional pension, to meet the increased expenses necessitated by his disability?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The case of Surgeon Major Moore is a very sad one; and I can assure my hon. Friend that there was every disposition to approach it with the utmost possible indulgence. But I regret to say that I found myself unable, after very careful consideration, to grant an additional pension to an officer whose ill-health takes the form of loss of eyesight.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE EXETER TRAINING COLLEGE—THE RECENT OUTBREAK.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, seeing that the students of the Exeter Training College still believe that those students who are suffering punishment for the outbreak which occurred have been punished unjustly, he will now cause an immediate inquiry to be made by Her Majesty's Inspector of Training Colleges into the circumstances of the outbreak; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the detailed statement received by him from the Principal of the Training College?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART-DYKE) (Kent, Dartford), in reply, said, that an Inspector would visit the College in the course of a month, and the strictest investigation would be made into the cause of the outbreak. Pending that inquiry, he could not make public the statement he had received from the Principal of the College; but the statement would be handed to the Inspector who would conduct the inquiry.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, AND THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1885.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it intended to adopt the recommendations of Lord Cowper's Commission as to extending the benefits of the Land Act of 1881 to holders of town parks and pasture lands, as well as to leaseholders; if not, will he now, or in the course of debate, explain the reason of the non-adoption of the Commissioners' Report on these points; and, can he give any estimate of the number of town park and pasture holders now excluded from the Act of 1881, and say on what data such numerical estimate is based?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. Member will excuse my declining to make a premature statement as to the intentions of the Government with regard to land legislation, a Bill on the subject being announced to be brought forward on Thursday. As regards the number of the holders referred to, I have no reliable information before me.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT (IRELAND)—ENGLISH OFFICIALS.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the allegation that the principal posts in the Inland Revenue Department in Ireland were filled by Englishmen, most of them transferred from minor positions in London to the Dublin Office, and promoted over the heads of the Irish Civil Servants, Whether the Controller of Stamps in Dublin, Mr. W. E. Phelps, was promoted from a minor clerkship in Somerset House to the head of the Dublin Office; whether the Controller of Legacy Duty, Mr. E. Freeth, was promoted within the past two years from a minor clerkship in Somerset House to the head of that Department in Dublin; whether the two Inspectors of Taxes for Ireland are Mr. Tarlton and Mr. Smith; whether all these officials are Englishmen, and fill the principal posts in the Irish Inland Revenue Service; whether there is a single member of the Board of Inland Revenue an Irishman; and, whether there is any instance of an Irishman having ever been promoted to an important position in that branch of the Public Service?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I am informed that the answer to the first Question is "No," and also to the second Question. The answer to the third Question is "Yes." The officials named are Englishmen; but it is not correct, as has been said, that Englishmen fill the principal posts in the Irish Inland Revenue Service, the principal offices of solicitor and collector being ably filled by Irishmen. With regard to the other Questions, I am informed that there are many instances of Irishmen having been promoted to important positions in the Inland Revenue and other Departments of the Public Service.

MR. J. E. REDMOND asked, if the hon. Gentleman had any objection to state under what circumstances the two Englishmen mentioned were promoted to their present position?

MR. JACKSON said, he had the information; but he thought the answer he had given would have satisfied the hon. Member. Mr. Phelps was not promoted from a minor clerkship in Somerset House to the head of the Dublin Office. He was appointed Assistant Controller in Dublin in 1871, having previously been a clerk in the Department of the Accountant and Controller General of Somerset House for 14 years, and was made Controller in 1875. In reference to Mr. Freeth, he might point out that he was not the Controller of Legacy Duty. There was no Controller of Legacy Duty in Dublin; but a Deputy Controller—a clerk of high standing and special qualifications in Somerset House—was appointed more than three years ago, because there was no one in the Office in Dublin who was considered competent to perform the duties.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: Am I to understand that the inference from my Question is correct, that these two English officials from Somerset House were promoted over the heads of the Irish Civil Servants in the Irish Office?

MR. JACKSON: I have endeavoured to answer the Question as put, because the inference which is possible to be drawn from the first Question, that Mr. Phelps was promoted from a minor clerkship in Somerset House directly to the head Office in Dublin, is not correct, as I have stated.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: That is not the point which I asked. The point which I asked was, whether these two Englishmen were promoted over the heads of the Irish Civil Servants in the Irish Office?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member any more information than I have already given. I have already stated that the inference to be drawn from the first Question was not correct under the circumstances under which these men were promoted.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): May I ask whether there is a member of the Inland Revenue Board in Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: I believe that this Question does not refer to the Board of Inland Revenue in Ireland, but to the Board of Inland Revenue in this country. I believe there is no Irish member upon that Board, so called; but I think the House will agree with me that many of these offices have been filled, and filled with great ability, by Irishmen.

EXCISE—BREWING LICENCES—COTTAGE BREWERS.

MR. AGG-GARDNER (Cheltenham) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in order to protect the Excise, and to enable the formation of an accurate estimate of the amount of beer consumed throughout the United Kingdom, he will cause such cottage brewers as are exempt from the payment of brewing licences to register their names, together with the quantity of beer produced by them, once in every year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square), in reply, said, the information that would be derived from the adoption of the suggestion was not likely to be so trustworthy or so complete as to make it worth while to impose such an obligation on the cottage brewers, or the additional duty on the Excise officers.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CONVICTION OF — WALKER FOR MANSLAUGHTER.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, now that the elder Walker (who murdered a policeman and soldier in Belfast, and shot a second policeman) has only been convicted of manslaughter by a Belfast jury, Can he state was the report correct that Judge Lawson on the former trial told the Tyrone jury, which disagreed, that they were bound to convict Walker of murder, and that he would not accept a verdict of manslaughter; or can he say what exactly took place on this subject, and what language the learned Judge used?

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked whether, in view of the imputation which had been cast upon Protestant jurors, the result of this trial was not sufficient to show that those imputations were unfounded?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): Judge Lawson charged the jury that if they believed the evidence, they would be bound to convict the prisoner for murder. The Judge did not say that he would not accept a verdict of manslaughter, because that point was never raised, as the jury did not agree, and stated that there was no probability of their coming to an agreement. With reference to the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Johnston), the result of the trial has been already published in the newspapers.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): In consequence of the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I beg to give Notice that I shall, at the earliest moment, call attention to the scandalous conduct of the Crown in reference to the trial of these two men.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. and learned Gentleman is well aware that that term would not be permitted in a Motion or Question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that, at the earliest moment, I shall call attention to the conduct of the Government in relation to the trial of these two men, and shall charge them with deliberately conniving at the escape of these two murderers from justice.

POST OFFICE—ELECTRIC CABLE BETWEEN GUERNSEY AND ALDERNEY.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that the cable between Guernsey and Alderney has been broken for some months past; whether there are, besides the 2,000 inhabitants of the island, a half battalion of Her Majesty's troops (the Gordon Highlanders) and a battery of the Royal Artillery stationed there; whether the Island is within a few miles of the French Coast, and might be captured and in the possession of an enemy for some days (Wednesdays to Mondays) before information could reach Guernsey and England; and, whether he will take immediate steps to have the cable repaired?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The telegraph cable between Guernsey and Alderney was broken in December, and will, it is hoped, be repaired early in May. The delay in restoring communication is due to the danger of employing a cable-repairing ship in such sea during the stormy weather of the winter.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—

THE RIOTS AT BELFAST—MR. W. M'HARDY, CHIEF CONSTABLE OF LANARKSHIRE—PRINTING HIS REPORT.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, during the past two months, constables have been employed in watching printers at Messrs. Aird and Coghill's, Glasgow, and at the office of The Hamilton Advertiser, Hamilton, whilst the printers have been engaged in setting up the Report of Mr. Wallace M'Hardy, Chief Constable of Lanarkshire, on the subject of the Belfast riots; and, if so, by whose orders the constables were thus employed; how many of them were so employed; and how their pay for this work, and the cost of printing the Report in this manner, will be provided?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) (who replied)

said, it is not the fact that constables were employed during the last two months in watching printers at either of the places mentioned while the printers were setting up Mr. M'Hardy's Report. It is the fact that during the printing off of the Report, which occupied a few hours, Mr. M'Hardy and one of his constables were present to prevent any copies being surreptitiously removed and published before it was officially issued.

MR. SEXTON: Has the Report been presented?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I am not aware.

ORDER—THE HALF-PAST TWELVE O'CLOCK RULE—BLOCKING.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the notices of opposition, set down against several Bills and Motions of much public interest and importance by the Junior Lord of the Treasury, are to be taken as the dissent of Her Majesty's Government to the principles of such Bills or Motions, or only to the time of night at which they may be brought forward for discussion?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): My hon. Friend will understand that it is impossible for me to give a categorical answer to his Question. In some cases the Government object to the principles involved in the Bills or Motions which stand for consideration; but in by far the greater number they are of opinion that the importance of the questions involved requires that they should be dealt with by the House at an earlier hour than 12.30. I wish it was possible to secure that important questions should not be taken at an hour that would not insure for them full consideration without putting a block against them.

THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE CELEBRATION—THE PUBLIC HOLIDAY.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, as only one public holiday is to be observed in celebration of the 50th anniversary of Her Majesty's accession, the Government have finally decided to fix such holiday for Tuesday, 21st June; and, whether Monday, 20th June, which is actually the date of such anniversary, would not be a more convenient day for the public generally?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The question raised by my hon. Friend has engaged the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but they find it necessary to adhere to the arrangement they have already made, that Tuesday, the 21st of June, shall be observed in celebration of Her Majesty's Jubilee.

REGISTRATION OF PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS—LEGISLATION.

MR. OHANOE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will grant facilities for the discussion and amendment of the alleged unsatisfactory laws relating to the qualification and registration of Parliamentary voters; and, whether he is prepared to assent to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider and report on the amendment and codification thereof?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, he would not enter into any engagement with regard to Parliamentary Business until progress had been made with the Irish legislation which the Government had announced to the House.

PARLIAMENT—ADJOURNMENT AND SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE—THE EASTER RECESS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S. W.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the statement which has appeared in the public Press is correct, that the Government propose to—"Continue the sitting of Parliament right through Easter, if the Second Reading of the Criminal Law (Ireland) Bill be not taken before Good Friday;"

and, if this statement is not correct, whether he will now state, for the convenience of the House, when the Easter Recess will begin and end?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government are most anxious to consider and to meet the convenience of all sections of the House; but they feel it to be their duty to ask the House to give the Bill for the Amendment of the Criminal Law (Ireland) a second reading before they can propose the usual Easter holiday—"Oh!"—and I say this, expressly disavowing any menace or threat to any hon. Member; but the House will understand that a measure which the Government regard as vital to the maintenance of law and order in Ireland—[Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Why don't you hang the Walkers?—and on which they stake their own existence, cannot be postponed even for the usual holiday, much and sorely as it may be needed.

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked, whether it was intended to read the Land Bill in the House of Lords a second time before that Assembly adjourned for the Easter holidays?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to give the hon. and learned Gentleman the information which he requests; but I will undertake to say that progress will be made very rapidly with that Bill in the House of Lords, and I expect it will reach this House before the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill has left it.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) wished to know whether, in the event of the second reading of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill not being taken out before that time, the House was to sit on Good Friday?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I hope, Sir, it is not necessary to make any statement with respect to that day.

Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that it is stated in the public Press that it has been arranged that the House of Lords shall rise the day after the introduction of the Land Bill until the 18th of April?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry to say that I have not been able to acquaint myself with the statements in the ordinary organs of public information, nor do I know what the arrangements of the House of Lords are.

Mr. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) asked whether there would be any, and if so, what interval between the introduction and the first reading of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill and the second reading?

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I hope there will be sufficient interval to allow hon. Members to acquaint themselves with the contents of the Bill.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—THE DIVISION ON THE MOTION OF URGENCY.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked, Whether the attention of the Speaker had been drawn to the fact that the number of votes in the Division List of last Friday was given as 349; whereas only 348 names appeared in the list, and whether the record would be amended in that respect?

Mr. SPEAKER: If that is so, the correction will be made in due course of time.

MOTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE. FIRST READING.

[FIRST NIGHT.]

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) in rising to move for leave to introduce a Bill—

"To make better provision for the prevention and punishment of crime in Ireland, and for other purposes relating thereto," said: I rise, Sir, to perform with what success I may, a difficult and responsible, and in many respects a painful task, under Parliamentary circumstances somewhat different from those which have usually attended those who have had similar tasks before in previous Parliaments. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] I do not allude to the fact, which I presume hon. Gentlemen had in their mind when they gave me that cheer, that for the first time we have, at all events, the legitimate Opposition against us. I allude rather to the circumstance that this debate has been preceded by a discussion on more or less the same subject which has extended over four nights. During that discussion we have had a remedy for the state of things existing in Ireland which I shall have to put before the House—we have had a remedy proposed for it by the legitimate Opposition; and though I do not mean to discuss that remedy now, I wish the House to have it in their minds, when they listen to the statement I have to make, and to compare it and its probable efficacy with the difficulties it is intended to meet. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite are of opinion apparently that at this moment if we could alter those judicial rents which were fixed before the recent fall in prices we should so completely remove all the causes of disorder in Ireland that we might indefinitely postpone the mea-

tures which I am going to ask the House to consider. I would ask the House to recollect, in the first place, that we also have proposals which we mean to make to the House at the earliest opportunity, dealing, as we think, in a far larger spirit with the land difficulties in Ireland. I would ask them also to recollect, what I before stated to the House that, with the same state of facts before them, the Gentlemen who brought forward the Amendment last Tuesday refused to touch judicial rents in 1885 or 1886; and I ask them further to recollect that even if the measure which they propose was carried out to its fullest extent, it must do very little to diminish the evictions of which they complain; and that, if I might remind them of a concrete case, it would do nothing whatever to prevent such occurrences as the Glenbeigh evictions, and the events which occurred on Lord Clanricarde's property. These occurrences produced the most painful impression on the public mind in connection with evictions in Ireland. That is all I can say about the remedy proposed for the present disorders in Ireland which the right hon. Gentlemen opposite have made themselves responsible for. There is an Amendment down on the Paper to-day—not put down and not standing in the name of any Member of the legitimate Opposition. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Well, I believe I was wrong. I believe we must now count among the legitimate Opposition the hon. Member for Cork and his followers. But there is an Amendment now standing on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) which asks us, before we proceed to consider this measure, to make further investigation into the state of Ireland. I am afraid that the House is already but too well acquainted with the state of Ireland, and if anybody entertains doubts as to the condition of that country, surely it is not the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends. They, at all events, if no other hon. Members of this House, should know to what an unhappy state that country is reduced. They should know the condition of Ireland as an artificer recognizes his own handiwork. If I may judge from the tenour of the speeches which were delivered by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench in the course of the debate which concluded on Friday, they are of opinion that we have no case for the Bill we are to introduce, because, as they think, the statistics of crime in Ireland do not show a state of affairs so grave that any strong measure of Criminal Law Amendment is justified. I stated before, and I state again, that we do not rest our case upon statistics of agrarian crime in Ireland. We take the view now that was taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone)—

"That you must not only consider the amount of crime, but you must take that amount into consideration in conjunction with its source, with its character, and with what it indicates and what it means."

That opinion, which I have already quoted to the House—and which the right hon. Gentleman thanked me for having quoted—I now repeat as exactly indicating the frame of mind in which Her Majesty's Government approach this question. We do not think that the amount of crime in Ireland is, taken by itself, a trustworthy indication of the state of the country. Much of that crime is merely in the enforcement, as everybody knows, and as was stated over and over again last week, of a system of intimidation and terrorism which there prevails. The amount of that intimidation and the amount of that terrorism is no more indicated by the amount of crime necessary to keep it in force, than the security which we derive from the law in respect of murder is indicated by the number of men whom it is annually necessary to hang in order to preserve our lives. But do not let hon. Gentlemen suppose because I preface my statement with these remarks that statistics in Ireland indicate a favourable condition of affairs in that country with regard to the operation of the Criminal Law. It is not so. Since 1845—the year in which the statistics of agrarian crime were first collected—there have been only seven years in which the present melancholy list of crimes has been exceeded in amount. In every one of those years was exceptional legislation in existence for the enforcement of the Criminal Law, except in 1880. It is true that in 1880, 1881, and 1882 the amount of agrarian crime was largely in excess of any that prevails now. But, Sir, though it is almost three years that they were of crime show not only a most formidable list of such crimes, but a steady increase during the last three years. I do not think I have the statistics with regard to the last three years. In any case, hon. Gentlemen will readily take it from me. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] They will hardly deny the statistics which are in the hands of every Member of the House—I shall not doctor them—they will hardly deny that the statistics of crime at this moment, for the 12 months, show an excess over the previous years, and that that excess shows no sign of diminishing. I am going to give hon. Gentlemen the statistics. But those statistics on the Table of the House are not the only statistics which are of interest as showing the amount of crime, and the failure of law in Ireland. At this moment, 498 persons in Munster, 175 persons in Connaught, 221 persons in Leinster, and 23 persons in Ulster are under special police protection. The number of policemen required to carry out the special police protection is 770, and some idea of the additional cost thrown on the taxpayers of the country by the condition of Ireland may be indicated by the fact that each of these policemen costs, on an average, £70; and that the total cost, therefore, for extra police required to give the necessary protection to individuals amounts to no less a sum than £55,000 a-year. So much for statistics. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I am afraid if hon. Gentlemen resent the shortness of time which I have taken over an argument on which I do not rely, they must be conscious of an enormous fund of patience if they contemplate the appalling length of the speech I shall make on arguments on which I do rely. We have two things to prove before we ask the House to assent to this Bill. We have first to prove that the law is not enforced over a large and important part of Ireland; and, secondly, we have to show that the vacuum left by the absence of the ordinary law is filled up by law which is not that of the Crown, and which is not that of Parliament. In order to prove the first of these propositions—namely, that over a large part of Ireland the existing machinery of the law is inadequate, I will ask the House for a moment to confine their attention to the West and South West of Ireland, the Counties of Mayo, of Galway, of

Clare, of Limerick, of Kerry, and of Cork—an area of about one-third of the whole of Ireland, and, roughly speaking, of about half of that part of Ireland exclusive of Ulster. I shall make as few quotations as I can, but I am afraid I cannot explain matters without making more than I could wish. I shall read some extracts from the charges of the Irish Judges delivered at the Assizes in the counties which I have named. I shall present them in geographical order, beginning at the North. I take first the charge of Judge Lawson in the County of Mayo. The learned Judge said—

"He regretted to say that on this, the first occasion on which he had the honour of presiding in this Court of the County Mayo, he could not say anything to them in favour of the state of things which existed in that county. In his opinion, judging from the official reports laid before him, he regretted to say the county was in a state of great disorganization. It was very hard to say how long that state of things would continue, or if there would be any remedy found to put an end to it. The present state of things was morally unsatisfactory, and, according to the reports made to him, approached as near to rebellion against the authority of the country as anything short of civil war could be."

An hon. MEMBER: What date is that?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): He does not say anything about crime.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The date of the Report is March 10. I shall now read an extract from the charge of Mr. Justice Murphy at County Galway. He says—

"Mr. Foreman and Gentlemen of the Grand Jury of the county of Galway.—The number of cases that are to be brought before you at the present Assizes is very small. I think in all it only reaches 16, and these offences, as represented to me in the lists furnished by the officers of this county, do not appear to be of a serious nature. If this return of offences manifested or indicated the condition of your county there would be presented to me the opportunity—of which I would, indeed, be very glad to avail myself—of congratulating you on the condition of your county. However, I regret to say, from the returns made to me by the Inspectors of the Crown and the officers of the county, it appears that any conclusion derived from the list presented for your investigation would be wholly incorrect. They report to me that there is a complete paralysis of law, that it is unable to protect many of the inhabitants in the exercise of their most ordinary rights, and that lawlessness is perfectly triumphant."

I now pass from the County of Galway to the County of Clare, where the Judge who presided, Mr. Justice O'Brien, said—

"I find by the usual returns which are compiled by the Constabulary that even with regard to the undetected crime there is a large increase since the time of the last Summer Assizes over the corresponding period of last year."

He goes on to relate certain horrible crimes which had been brought under his notice. He then proceeds to allude to a speech made five years ago by the present Lord Fitzgerald in that place, and Mr. Justice O'Brien says—

"Nearly five years have elapsed since that charge by Lord Fitzgerald, and no person can say after so long a period of time this country is not worse off in every respect—worse off in obedience to the law, worse off in the peace and security of life and property, and worse off as regards every class and every rank in that material prosperity, of which peace and security to life and property are the necessary foundations."

He goes on to say—

"All these returns which I have before me, and the information which has reached me from other quarters of an unquestionably authentic character, lead me to the conclusion that law to a great extent has ceased to exist in this county; the common rule of obedience which must exist in every civilized State and which every honest and well-disposed citizen is expected to perform and must yield, if unwillingly, is abrogated for the present by an influence and replaced by an influence fatal to industry, fatal to prosperity, fatal to every interest connected with the welfare of the community, and an influence that I still cannot but be persuaded is becoming dominant here and elsewhere through the want of courage and firmness in meeting it."

I pass from Olare to Limerick, and I hope the House will have patience with me. Mr. Justice Johnson said—

"Gentlemen, turning to the list of reported cases furnished to me by the authorities, I am sorry to say that the county presents no advance towards peace and order since the time that I last had the opportunity of addressing you. On the comparative calendar which is presented to me, the serious offences have not diminished, but increased. I find that firing at the person has increased by two; assaults inflicting bodily harm have increased from 13 to 24; cattle stealing has increased from one to four; maiming of cattle has enlarged from 9 to 16; intimidation has doubled, and the very serious offence of seizing arms and levying contributions has more than doubled."

An hon. MEMBER: How many were there?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He does not say how many. I am quoting his address. He goes on—

"I find here that in no less than nine cases parties of armed men"—this, perhaps, answers the hon. Member's question—"frequently disguised, and all under circumstances which enable them to avoid detection, and be made amenable, have gone deliberately roaming about through the country for the purpose of wreaking vengeance, or committing injury on the unfortunate inmates of peaceable homes, sometimes, as I have said, to the large number of 30, sometimes being smaller—varying from two persons to 30—sometimes their visits being accompanied with acts of brutal violence. I have a case before me where no one was made amenable, where a peaceable family were dragged from their beds at night, and the women of the house cruelly beaten. In another case before me, because a son had the courage to stand up for his father he was shot through the thigh. Now, gentlemen, it is quite idle for us to shut our eyes and say there is peace where there is no peace, while these things are going on through the country."

Now I come to the County of Kerry.

"These returns," says the learned Judge in his charge—[An hon. MEMBER: Who is the Judge?] Mr. Justice O'Brien. He says—

"These returns present a picture of the County of Kerry such as could hardly be found in any country that has passed the confines of natural society, and entered upon the duties and the relations, and acknowledged obligations of civilized life. The law is defeated—perhaps I should rather say has ceased to exist—houses are attacked by night and day, even the midnight terror yielding to the noonday audacity of crime; person and life are assailed; the terrified inmates are wholly unable to do anything to protect themselves, and a state of terror and lawlessness prevails everywhere."

"You can easily understand," he goes on to say—after giving some dreadful cases of crime, and the amount of damages which the Grand Jury had to present—

"You can easily understand that these things do not at all give you any idea of the material injury that arises from crime and disturbance in the loss of employment, the discouragement of capital, the injury to trade, and the multiplied consequences of all kinds detrimental to the community that arise from insecurity to personal property and life. To all these evils we have to add another, and, perhaps, the worst of all—that of which you are conscious, which experience and observation teach every day in all the forms of social life—a system of unseen terrorism, a system of terror and tyranny."

I now come to the County of Cork, and this is my last quotation, for which I apologize. Mr. Justice Johnson says—

"The list which has been furnished to me of the cases that will be submitted to you for the purpose of finding bills is exceeding small for a great county of this kind. It consists practically of only 14 cases, which are all crimes or offences such as everyone must expect to find in any agricultural community. Happy would it be if that represented the real state of affairs in the county. From the returns presented to me judicially, which it is my duty judicially to bring under your notice—from those returns I am unable to say that this great county is in an orderly or in a satisfactory state. The returns from this and the West Riding—and they cover a period of only about three months since the last Winter Assizes—show that in a considerable portion of this great county people who live in remote and isolated districts are subject to violence, alarm, plunder by day and by night—principally by night—from gangs of armed men, disguised, who rove through the country, seizing arms, plundering sometimes property, always with a show of violence, often accompanied with threats, and sometimes with assaults of the meanest and most dastardly character, and sometimes with grave results."

And after giving the usual melancholy account of the crimes to be brought before them, including one of a most horrible character, where a man's daughters were dragged out of bed by ruffians, who poured pitch on their heads, and cut off their hair with shears, he concludes thus—

"Now, as long as there is no security—and there can be no security in the part of the country where that takes place repeatedly and without detection or possibility of detection—so long as there is no security there is no order; so long as there is no order there can be no peace; and so long as there is no peace there can be no prosperity."

Now, I ask the House to observe that the men who give this testimony are not partizans—they are not politicians travelling about the country in order to make up a good Parliamentary case. They are Judges of the land—Judges of the High Court of Ireland—who, in the exercise of their duty, feel it incumbent on them to make these public statements as to the condition of the counties through which they travel; and I ask whether a more terrible picture of the state of society was ever drawn—[Cries of "Oh, oh!"—]—than that which is given in these charges? I heard one hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench opposite say "Oh." I do not know what power of colouring he may have at his command; but, if he could draw from his imagination a picture of a state of society worse than that given by these Judges, I can only say that I should think very highly of his skill as an artist. That shows the condition of that part of the West of Ireland—about, as I have said, one third of all Ireland, and about one half of that country exclusive of Ulster. Those charges exhibit the condition of public order in these districts. Now, what is the power of the law to meet that state of things? The hon. Member for East Mayo, the other day—when he was attacking me—said, what was the use of adding battalion of police to battalion, and raising the Estimates for the Constabulary Forces year after year; and I replied to him that it was in vain to raise the Force if the Courts of Law were incapable of fulfilling their elementary official functions. This is the evil which we have especially to meet. It is this existing paralysis of the Courts of Law which we have specially got to meet. Whence this paralysis of the Courts of Law? The first answer I have to give is that evidence to convict is not forthcoming. I shall not trouble the House with any long particulars on the subject.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): We want the particulars.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I dare say I can give enough to satisfy the hon. Gentleman. In the counties I have just enumerated the number of offences reported since the previous Summer Assizes amounted to 755. The number of cases for which there was no clue to the offenders was 536.

Mr. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): How many threatening letters?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The figures I am giving have no reference to threatening letters. The number of cases in which the injured persons declined to swear any information was 422. So terrified were they by the system of intimidation which prevails in those counties, that they dare not come forward to give evidence against those who outraged and ill-treated them.

Mr. PARNELL (Cork): Is the right hon. Gentleman now giving us the number of agrarian offences in those counties, or of all offences?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; these are the number of grave offences which the Judges had to try.

Mr. PARNELL: Agrarian?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No; not agrarian. I am sorry my voice has failed; but I distinctly stated that I was dealing with the counties the condition of which I have just described. With regard to the interruption of the hon. Member for Cork, it was a relevant one, and I am glad he made it, because I want to say a word of explanation to the House upon the term "agrarian offences" used in the statistics before the House. There is no doubt, I think, that the police have somewhat unduly restricted the cases which they describe as "agrarian." I make that observation simply to guide hon. Gentlemen aright, because it makes no difference in my case. My case is that the whole of this part of Ireland is sinking into absolute disorganization, and I decline altogether to confine my attention to agrarian crime; and I say that if in 422 cases out of 755 where injuries have been inflicted those who were injured did not dare to come forward to give evidence, it matters not whether the crime is agrarian or non-agrarian. It shows a condition of terrorism which this House is bound to deal with, and without delay. I have stated to the House one of the causes of the paralysis of the law. Another cause is that when they did come forward the juries, in the face of the clearest evidence, declined altogether to convict. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Hear, hear!] If I gather rightly the cheer which the hon. and learned Member for North Longford has just indulged in he highly approves of the action of these juries.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I repudiate that altogether. I referred to the action of those juries which refused to convict the Walkers and other Orangemen.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I accept the disclaimer of the hon. and learned Member; but he will admit that his cheer was ambiguous. I was very unwilling to trouble the House with a multiplicity of narratives, but I must do it. I will give them a case from County Roscommon. A man was tried at the late Spring Assizes for assault. In his charge Mr. Justice Murphy said—

"The case is clear. You can disregard the evidence if you please. It is perfectly uncontradicted," and so on. After half an hour's deliberation the jury returned a verdict of "Not guilty." His Lordship thereupon said—

"Gentlemen, your verdict is contrary to the evidence. It is your privilege to disregard the evidence and your oaths."

Here is another example from County Tipperary, one of the counties which the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley) told us was in a quite satisfactory state, in which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that some after-glow of the golden age still lingered. I will read some extracts to show how the juries did their duty, and I specially call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) to the fact that the cases I am about to give are not agrarian cases. The jury do not content themselves merely with giving a verdict against an unpopular landlord or in favour of the evicted tenant. Demoralization has passed far beyond that point. A farmer named Clarke was indicted for obtaining money by means of forged documents purporting to be given by the agent. The case was proved in the clearest manner.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Who says so?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Judge charged strongly for conviction; but the jury, which consisted principally of farmers in the same rank of life as the prisoner, disagreed. The next case is also in the favourite county of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley)—Tipperary. Two men, named Fitzgerald and Donovan, were charged with having assaulted two men on the high road near Cappawhite, named Crowe and Ryan. They were not unpopular landlords; they were not land grabbers; they were not men who had taken evicted farms. The evidence was perfectly clear, and the Judge charged strongly for conviction, but the jury acquitted.

MR. PARNELL: On what authority does the right hon. Gentleman make these statements?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am giving the House facts which I have ascertained from what I consider an authentic source.

MR. SEXTON: They are not facts at all.

An hon. MEMBER: They are falsehoods.

MR. PARNELL: What is your authority? What are you quoting from?

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Mr. Speaker, may I say one word?

MR. SPEAKER: It is very difficult for me to secure the proper conduct of orderly debate unless I have the co-operation of hon. Gentlemen. I must appeal to hon. Members for that co-operation. The right hon. Gentleman can be replied to subsequently in argument.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not exactly know what the hon. Member complains of. I am reading the information given to me of an authentic kind, upon my responsibility as a Minister of the Crown. Here is another case in Tipperary. A man named John Hogan—

MR. T. M. HEALY: Where is this from?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He was charged with a most horrible outrage on a respectable girl. He was acquitted by the jury in the face of the clearest evidence, and why? Because he was a well-known leader in that neighbourhood. That is, no doubt, a case indirectly connected with this agitation. Whether hon. Gentlemen have any reason to be proud of it I leave them to consider. The truth is that in Tipperary, as in other parts of Ireland, there is not the slightest chance of getting a conviction from a jury if either agrarian or Party questions come into consideration. Do not let hon. Gentlemen suppose that I think that Northern juries are immaculate. I make no such assertion. What I say is, that the whole mode of regulating the jury system in Ireland is one that makes it absolutely unworkable. Is there any man in the least acquainted with Ireland who is not aware that, if a case involving Party considerations comes before a jury, and if you know beforehand the political complexion of the men who compose that jury, you can tell beforehand not only what the jury will do, but how they will be divided in their verdict? And I ask you whether, in these circumstances, it is possible for the jury system to be—what it was intended to be—an instrument for the execution of justice? I heard of a case the other day singularly illustrating the frame of mind with which many Irishmen regard the jury system. There was a man over 70 years of age who applied to be excluded from the panel, and he was told that he should be so relieved. Next day he returned and said he would rather be on the panel, "for it might give him an opportunity of serving a friend."

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is a disgrace to make anonymous charges of that kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The charge I make is not against an individual, but against the system. Let the hon. Gentleman get up in his place and say if, in his opinion, the juries in Ireland may be trusted on Party questions to act according to their oaths. But, Sir, I regret to say that Party feeling is not the only nor the most tragic cause of the failure of the jury system in Ireland. Terrorism also prevails. I heard the other day of jurors in a respectable position who had begged of an officer whose duty it was to order some jurors to stand by that he would include them in the jurors to be asked to stand by. The officer refused, but said that if they did not come up to be balloted for he would not fine them. They, therefore, said that they did not dare to take advantage of this privilege, because they had been canvassed and they must appear. Hon. Gentlemen will see what that means. It means that they had been canvassed by friends of some of the prisoners for trial, and were told what verdicts they were to give. They were unwilling to violate their oaths; yet they could not free themselves from the tyranny which oppressed them. Is this to be wondered at when we see the Press of Ireland—at least, the organs of the hon. Member for Cork—publishing the names of jurymen who have given verdicts one way, and holding them up to public reprobation? That system has certainly been carried out by United Ireland, whose editor has actually defended it. Here is one sentence, to the effect that—

"The most besotted and bloodthirsty juror will, we fancy, moderate his eagerness for conviction if he knows there is a right of appeal from the dark security of the jury-box to the calm judgment of his neighbours in the world outside."

There is exquisite irony in the words "calm judgment of his neighbours outside." The judgment may be calm, but the modes of enforcing it are terrorism, Boycotting, shooting, and outrage. A gentleman wrote to United Ireland somewhat complaining of this method of procedure; and this remark is in the form of a footnote to the correspondent's letter. [An hon. MEMBER: What date?] The date is the 11th of December, 1886—

"In a self-governed Ireland it would, of course, be intolerable that men should not be allowed to differ freely in the jury-box and everywhere else; but in the state of chaotic conflict to which the English rule reduces us he who is not with us is against us, and must expect to be dealt with accordingly. That is not liberty, but it is the way of winning it, and the only way within our power at this moment."

What does this mean? It means that those who desire the separation of Ireland from England—[Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Does the hon. Member doubt it? The phrase used is "a self-governing Ireland." I will modify my sentence, because it does not affect my argument. I say those who desire a self-governing Ireland are prepared to promote that object by exercising avowed terrorism on every man and woman—on every man who goes into a jury-box determined on giving a verdict according to the evidence. I apprehend that the House will be satisfied, from the evidence adduced, that the jury system in Ireland is not now a workable system. The truth is that all Irishmen—those who are not terrorized—regard that system as a means of advancing their own political objects. They go into the jury-box only with the view of defending a partizan or condemning the conduct of an opponent. So long as you have a system which is worked in that manner, it is in vain to hope that justice will be administered in Ireland. I apprehend that having shown that over this part of Ireland a system of absolute lawlessness prevails to the extent I have described, I might almost rest there the case of the Government for amending the Criminal Law. But, in truth, the case does not rest upon that alone. It does not merely rest upon the fact that the ordinary law has ceased to fulfil its appointed functions. It rests not less largely upon the fact that the space which the law ought to fill is now occupied by the National League. Four nights of last week were mainly occupied by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite trying to white-wash the National League. It was represented by the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) as an innocent trades union which existed for the sole purpose of protecting weak tenants against strong landlords. If that were its object, not a single man on the Ministerial side of the House would have a word to say against it; we should accept it as we accept the trade unions which flourish in this country. I do not deny that there are men connected with that League in Ireland who have at heart simply and solely the good of the tenant; but in the tangled web of Irish politics there are very few perfectly white threads, and how far they go beyond the agrarian objects which hon. Gentlemen suppose they have in view, let them consider the number of persons actually Boycotted. It may be that some members of the National League have only in view these disinterested objects; but we cannot forget that the League leans in part upon those dark, secret societies which work by dynamite and the dagger—whose object is anarchy, and whose means are assassination. But leaving out of account the connection of the National League with secret societies, and taking only a few short public utterances of its members, I say that it is an absurd travesty of the facts to say that the National League has any resemblance whatever to a trade union which exists merely for the protection of the weak. Let me read one or two extracts from speeches which will bear out what I say. The hon. Member for North Wexford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), on the 7th of December last, made this statement to his hearers—[Cries of "Where, where?"—at Castlereagh—"You are not only to fight for a reduction of rents—"]

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): I never spoke at Castlereagh.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was the hon. Member for North Fermanagh (Mr. William Redmond). He said—

"You are not only fighting for a reduction of rents, not even for your homes and against landlordism. You are fighting to-day in the struggle in which your fathers fought, for the old immortal cause of Ireland having the right to govern herself. . . . And if you win in this, you are also striking a blow for Home Rule, the Irish nation, and for the green flag of our people."

[Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen appear to think that this is an innocent quotation. They forget what it was I was attempting to prove—that the National League is not merely a League for keeping tenants in their holdings—

MR. T. O. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): Considering the extent to which I have been responsible for the National League for the last four or five years, I claim the right, in face of the imputation of the right hon. Gentleman, to ask whether this was a National League meeting at all at which the hon.

Member for North Fermanagh had spoken the words?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Will the hon. Gentleman deny that the hon. Member for North Fermanagh is an important member of the National League? I apprehend the hon. Gentleman will not deny that the hon. Member for North Fermanagh is one of that Parliamentary Party which uses the National League as its main political instrument. At the same meeting the hon. Member for East Galway (Mr. Harris) said—and I call the attention of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian to the quotation—

"This is not a question between small reductions and large reductions; it is not a question of what a man is able to pay at present prices; and it is not a question of sympathy for good landlords or bad landlords; but, my friends, the great mighty question is whether the lands of Ireland shall belong to the people of Ireland, or whether they shall belong to the enemies of the people. I am not going to indulge in a No Rent Manifesto. But we put a programme before you that will lead to that result—that will first take one slice, then take a second slice, and we will keep slicing at it until nothing remains."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to Order; and I ask you, Sir, whether, seeing that the Government indicted the hon. Member for Galway for this speech, and that the Judge at the trial told the jury that they must not consider that they had the speech before them, as there was no proof that it was delivered as read out—I ask you, Sir, whether a Member of the Government can still produce that speech in this House in order to found his case upon it?

MR. SPEAKER: This is not a question of Order at all. It is done upon the responsibility of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: One more quotation I shall make from the speech of the hon. Member for South Galway (Mr. Sheehy). He said—

"He would advise the tenants not to be in a hurry to purchase their holdings, or to buy from the landlord anything that really belongs to themselves, and what was it in the land that did not belong to themselves? It must be beneath the ground."

That is going a step even beyond prairie value—

"There were other purposes they should never lose sight of—the resolve of the Irish people never to lie calmly under the British yoke, never to relax their efforts until they had the green flag free in their own country. They should never forget that was the first object of national organization. He appealed to them to remember their own interests, to remember the weakness of the enemy, and nothing could defeat them but their own cowardice. Ireland expects that one and all, young and old, will join hands against the dual enemies—landlordism and the English Government."

Now, Sir, have I or have I not now shown proof conclusive to the House that the leaders of this so-called innocent organization mix up—and intentionally mix up—a policy of terrorizing and plundering the individual with that of the disruption of the Constitution? And if that be so, I hope that we shall hear no more from right hon. Gentlemen opposite of this trade union theory as connected with the National League. If this were a mere barren theory—if hon. Gentlemen opposite contented themselves with going to Ireland and making speeches of this kind which led to no effect—I should be scarcely inclined to quarrel with them, and I should be the last to interfere with that particular display of their energy. But, unfortunately, these speeches are enforced by a mode of intimidation painfully familiar already to this House, but over which, I am sorry to say, I shall still have to detain them for a few moments. I allude to the question of Boycotting. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen would like me to read some anecdotes of instances in which Boycotting has been put in force. [Cries of "Go on!"] I will humour hon. Gentlemen; but I cannot always give the names in such cases for obvious reasons. In the West of Ireland, towards the end of 1886, a private meeting of the committee of a local branch was held, and afterwards a local newspaper published what purported to be an account of the proceedings and resolutions passed. The resolutions condemned a firm for supplying goods to an obnoxious trader, who was a shopkeeper who had supplied the police, and calling on the members to strictly Boycott obnoxious persons, on pain of expulsion.

MR. W. H. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I rise to Order, Sir. The right hon. Gentleman is reading anecdotes which imply serious charges against certain people in Ireland. I want to know whether he will have the common honesty to—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The imputation of a want of common honesty addressed to the right hon. Gentleman is out of Order.

MR. W. H. REDMOND: Mr. Speaker, I did not—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. W. H. REDMOND remained standing, amid loud cries of "Order!" and "Name!" but eventually resumed his seat.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The effect of the resolutions to which I have referred was that the traveller for the firm in question was refused orders by some traders.

MR. W. H. REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the name of the firm in question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would give the name if I could do so with safety to the parties concerned. It is a respectable Dublin firm.

MR. W. H. REDMOND again rose. [Cries of "Order!" and "Name him!"]

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Shortly afterwards the president of the branch was arrested for drunkenness, and a letter from the firm was found in his pocket, addressed to himself. The letter regretted and apologized for supplying goods to an obnoxious individual, and promised not to repeat the offence again. The Boycotted shopkeeper was refused a supply of goods by the firm soon after. Also in the president's pocket were found rough copies of the Boycotting resolutions which had been published in the newspaper. The following is a copy of the letter referred to:—

"To—(the president of branch National League).—(Address)—. Dear Sir, —We regret very much to find that we have given offence by sending goods to a party in your town who we now understand is in bad repute, and, had we been aware of it, of course we should not have executed his order, which was sent us by post and executed in the regular course of business, and trust you will kindly explain this, not only to your own branch, but cause it to be explained in neighbouring branches, as you can easily see we were not to blame, and, of course, will not supply his orders in future. However, we trust you will have the matter set right for us, as we should be sorry to give any offence in any way, and oblige yours truly, ———."

There are more serious cases than that; but that will sufficiently show the powers of the National League. Here, however, is another case. In 1883 a low-class butcher took the grazing of a small farm from another man, at a small annual rental, on the condition that it was to be surrendered at any time when demanded. In the spring of 1886 the landlord, not having received 1*d.* by way of rent from the butcher, sent for the latter to meet him at his house. At the same time he sent a similar message to a neighbouring farmer. At the interview the landlord said he wanted the land in order to let it to this neighbouring farmer; and the butcher expressed himself perfectly satisfied and agreed to surrender the land. Failing to do so, however, he was dispossessed, and in October, 1886, the neighbouring farmer took over possession. At a fair held in the same month this farmer was prevented from buying stock, owing to the intimidation practised by the butcher, for which he was subsequently prosecuted and convicted. After this the farmer and his family became very obnoxious, and he was referred to as a grabber at a meeting held in November at the chapel-gate after Divine Service; the local blacksmith, who for years had worked for him, refused to shoe his horses any longer; he had to procure the necessaries of life from a place some four and a-half miles distant; and his neighbours decline to hold any intercourse with him. At the end of 1886 this farmer was denounced as a land-grabber at a meeting, and in the beginning of the present year he was being vigorously Boycotted. Early this year one of his workmen was hooted and groaned at, and a few days afterwards a strange woman sent for the farmer and warned him to give up the farm. The wife of the working man who, as stated above, was hooted and intimidated, was confined a short time afterwards, and the local midwife refused to attend her, as being the wife of a man who worked for a Boycotted person. Was not that a terrible state of society? [Laughter.] Does anyone find that a ludicrous incident, or one for laughter? Recollect, this is not an agrarian case—properly speaking—for the tenant had voluntarily given up his farm and had not been evicted, and this is the result of it. [An hon. MEMBER: These are anonymous stories.] Then I will take another case. In December, 1881, Laurence O'Hara was evicted for non-payment of two years' rent of a farm in the Piltown district. His inability to pay was due to intemperate habits and idleness. The landlord placed caretakers on the farm until February, 1884, when it was taken by Pat Carrigan at the rent paid by the former tenant. Since then Carrigan has been rigorously Boycotted, and also anyone who speaks to him or has any dealings with him. At present six persons are wholly and 18 persons partially Boycotted for working for or associating with Carrigan. At various times during the past three years, several persons have been summoned before the local branch of the National League to answer charges of having spoken to or worked for Carrigan, or to get forgiven for having done so. In many such cases the proceedings were reported in the local National papers. Again, on the 2nd of August, 1885, at a special meeting of the Thurles National League, summoned by placard, and attended by about 180 persons, a resolution was adopted condemning the practice of dealing with obnoxious persons. This resolution was directed against Thomas Ryan, owner of the principal hotel, who was in the habit of letting cars to the police for eviction duty, and supplying Emergency men. In about a week Ryan found he was completely Boycotted, and hesought for forgiveness by the National League; but in the absence of Father Cantwell, the president of the League, nothing could be done. Ryan wrote to the National League towards the end of August, 1885, tendering his submission, and offering to accept any terms imposed on him. A special meeting of the League was summoned for the 30th September, 1885, to consider the case. About 300 attended, and by a majority of 270 it was decided that he was not sufficiently punished, and that the Boycotting should continue for six months longer. Another special meeting was held on October 11, 1886, and about 250 persons attended. Ryan's submission was then received, and the Boycotting was removed. Ryan has not let cars to the police or bailiffs since he submitted to the League. Here is another case which seems to be of peculiar hardship. A man—having made some money in America—about the end of October last year took an evicted farm. He paid a half-year's rent in advance, and bought 30 head of cattle, spending about £300. [Cries of "Name!"] No; it is one of those cases in which I cannot give the name. The National League immediately took up the matter, and a priest addressed his congregation about the "grabber," and condemned his action. The man attended this priest's chapel. [An hon. MEMBER: What chapel?] Hon. Members are perfectly aware that I cannot give the name. Having refused to give the name of the person concerned, I cannot stultify myself by giving any indication that may lead to his identification.

MR. W. H. REDMOND: That is a slander on the Catholic Church.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The man attended this priest's chapel, and after the address mud was thrown at him and he was hooted at. His servant attended before the National League and promised to leave his employment, and eventually it was found necessary to afford him personal protection. Believing he could not hold out against the Boycotting, he wrote to the priest asking to be allowed to hold the farm for the half-year for which he had paid rent, and that he would then give it up. The priest held up the letter at chapel, and told the congregation its purport, and asked if the man's request should be granted. They decided it should not be granted. It was then agreed to hold a public meeting about the case. The man has since been rigorously Boycotted. The hon. Member for North Fermanagh has told me that I am slandering the Catholic Church. I will read him a case which will show how the National League treat the Catholic Church when the minister does not happen to agree with them. A National League meeting was held at Ballinakill, near Woodford, County Galway, on the 13th of March, 1887, for the purpose, evidently, of preventing Sir H. Burke's tenants from settling with him. The parish priest of the place is the Rev. J. Calligy, who is unpopular with the disaffected, owing to his opposition to agitation. A leading Land Leaguer—Francis Tully—in addressing the meeting, said—

"I am sorry our priests are not with us to-day. If they were I would have a word with one of them. The Easter dues will soon be called, and I would advise you to pay it to the campaign fund, and let the old boy, Father Calligy, go and eat the turkeys in the big house. You can speak to him if you like, but there is no law to compel you."

It appears, therefore, that ministers of the Catholic Church who happen to incur the anger of the Land League are treated with very scant respect by the friends of Gentlemen opposite. Here is the last case I will read. Towards the end of 1886 a committee meeting of a local branch of the National League was held, and a car driver appeared before it, charged with having driven the police. On entering the room he tried to defend his action, and one of the members asked him to sign a guarantee that he would not drive the police again. He refused, and he was then turned out of the rooms. A Boycotting resolution was passed against him. He was Boycotted, and the demeanour of the people became so hostile that he subsequently attended the committee, asked for pardon, and promised never to drive police again. He was refused pardon, and, thereafter, he could only get provisions secretly, and no one would speak to him.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman—and I think it will save the time of the House—if we may take it that these alleged facts came from the officials of Dublin Castle, or from the correspondent of The Times newspaper?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Does the hon. Gentleman really suppose I would quote unauthenticated extracts from The Times, or from any other newspaper, as evidence on which to ask the House to increase the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland? There is one more special case which I will bring before the House, because it shows—as well as the anecdotes I have read to the House also show—that this Boycotting is in no sense confined to cases where there has been eviction of tenants. A farmer was Boycotted for having taken from a landlord grass land which had never been in the possession of a tenant, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. I do not know whether the House would desire that I should go minutely into the facts of the case. The man paid his rent in advance, when his attention was called to a resolution passed at a convention in Wexford, “that no landlord’s grass should be taken.” The House will observe that the resolution of the League in this case was not directed against land-grabbers, or against landlords who attempted to let lands from which a tenant had been previously evicted; it was passed against landlords as a class, and not in favour of any tenants whatever, and the persons who passed it were acting in the interest of a class war, and intended to make use of that resolution, as they would of any weapon that came to hand, to destroy a representative of that landlordism which, out of this House, hon. Members constantly and were never tired of denouncing. But if anyone desires to have an idea how far this system of Boycotting extends, and how the National League is mixed up with it, I should like that he would look at only one issue of United Ireland. I have here some eight or nine announcements which appeared in one issue only of one newspaper. The first was—

“County Sligo—the Rev. P. Lowrie, parish priest, presiding. It was passed unanimously that John Henry O—”

—I will not venture upon the Irish names—

“be adopted as the candidate for this electoral division; that Henry Brook send in his resignation at once, to save the expense of a contest. William Alexander, Sub-sheriff, was the only person who could be got to purchase the hay and straw got on a Boycotted farm, and saved by Emergency men.”

Now, here you have, first, the ordinary course of Boycotting; and, secondly, the extravagant pretension that by their system of Boycotting the National League are to manage local elections. Here is one from Meath—

“At next meeting, at Rathmore, 25th March, the people will be expected to pay their subscriptions for the year, as a remittance is due to the Central League.”

Then here is one from Kilkenny—

“The hon. secretary brought under the notice of the meeting that cars have been supplied at Clonmel to emergency men and others, and in the past week two cars were supplied to parties who were unknown. The hon. secretary also brought before the meeting the fact that, since last meeting, evicted land had been taken. The general feeling was that hunting should be stopped.”

So that you will observe that the National League are determined not only that the land from which the tenant has been evicted shall now be cultivated, but that it shall not, even in a state of nature, serve for amusement, or for any use whatever to mankind. Then there is this—

“At Drimore, a case of land-grabbing was postponed for the purpose of giving the accused parties an opportunity of being present.”

I will not go on with these extracts. The interest with regard to them lies in the fact that, as I have said, they are all taken from one issue of one newspaper, and they show the extent to which the system on which I have been commenting extends. If the House desires to know the extravagant pretensions of those who direct this terrible weapon of Boycotting, and how far they go beyond the mere agrarian objects which right hon. Gentlemen opposite think those persons have in view, they cannot do better than simply look down the columns of advertisements in the same newspaper with regard to evicted or surrendered farms. Would the House allow me to read out some of the other heads or titles under which persons are Boycotted? They included—"Care-taking on evicted farms," "Being unpopular as a landlord," "Acting as agent," "Associating with Boycotted persons," "Supplying necessaries to the police," "Purchasing necessaries from Boycotted persons," "Having accommodated obnoxious persons," "Not joining the National League."

MR. T. O. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would give the name of any person who had been Boycotted for not joining the National League? I shall be able to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman that the information he has been supplied with upon the subject is perfectly untrue.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: For "not joining the National League"—that spontaneous association of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle spoke. I hope hon. Gentlemen will allow me to state the case in my own way. My point at this moment is not the number of persons Boycotted, but the number of Provinces in which the National League presume to interfere to use Boycotting to carry out their will. "Not joining the National League," "being related"—that is being the father, the mother, the son-in-law, and so forth—"to a Boycotted person, being related to persons who have been Crown witnesses at one time or another," "for having given evidence in any case for the prosecution," "for driving police in the execution of their duty," "for not voting for Nationalist candidates at Poor Law Guardians' election," "for being appointed teacher at a National School, contrary to the wishes of the people," "for having caused his wife to change her religion," "for being suspected of having paid rent," "for not paying rent to League trustees," and, lastly, "for having obtained compensation for being shot at." I am glad to see hon. Gentlemen appreciate the humour of that. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman opposite will recollect that, in the earlier part of my speech, I dealt principally with that broad belt of the country which lies on the West and South West of Ireland, and I gave from the Judges' charges an account of the terrible condition of that region; but I would point out to the hon. Gentleman who thinks that the disorders of Ireland do not extend beyond its limits, that the very worst district in Ireland for Boycotting is the South Eastern Division. The Returns of the number of Boycotted persons are divided by the police, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian well knows, according to the districts of Divisional Magistrates—Western, South Western, South Eastern, the Northern, and the Midland. Well, the South Eastern—which includes the counties of Carlow, Kilkenny, Queen's County, Tipperary, Waterford, Wexford, and Wicklow—has a pre-eminence—an unhappy pre-eminence—as regards persons totally Boycotted, over any other Division of Ireland, and only falls short by one of the grand total, which includes those who are both partially and completely Boycotted. [MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Read the figures.] As the right hon. Gentleman asks me, I will read the figures. The number Boycotted in the Midland Division—would you like the counties too?—[MR. GLADSTONE: No.]—was 91, the persons Boycotted in the Western Division was 124, the persons Boycotted in the South Western Division was 282, the persons Boycotted in the South Eastern 281, and the persons Boycotted in the Northern Division was 58. In other words, on the date to which this Return refers, there were 836 wholly or partially Boycotted in Ireland.

DR. TANNER: How many Protestant Home Rulers were Boycotted?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Are there any Protestant Home Rulers out of the House? I think, Sir, I have given the House some idea of the extent to which this dreadful system of Boycotting extends. One consequence of it, however, has not been adequately dealt with. One of the main objects of the right hon.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Gentleman's Land Bill of 1881 was to give every tenant in Ireland, out of Ulster, a right of sale in his holding. That goodwill would amount probably in the South of Ireland to something between 15 and 20 years' purchase of the rent, and it was intended by the right hon. Gentleman that if in any case the tenant had to leave his holding he should have as one of his assets this most valuable tenant right. But the value of that tenant right has been absolutely destroyed by the National League. It is now of no use to the landlord, and it has been taken by force from the tenant. Under the baneful tyranny of the National League a tenant who has to leave his holding, or who elects to leave his holding, has now no power whatever of selling his tenant right. It has lost all value; nobody dares buy it; it is useless to the man who has it to sell, and it is useless to the landlord on whose hands it is thrown. Indeed, the action of the National League in this matter amounts to an absolute destruction of a valuable asset which was, as I have said, created by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. And those who pretend that the action of the League is directed towards the benefit of the tenant must surely forget that the most tyrannous landlords in Ireland have never done anything to deprive the tenants of their property comparable to what the League has done through their method of action. I have shown what the professed objects of the Leaders of the Land League are. I have described to you the terrible nature of the punishments and sufferings which the proceedings of the League inflict. I have shown you that the violent speeches which they make in Ireland are speeches which bear serious fruit, and which have terrible consequences; and I do not think that any Gentleman who has not given his mind to the subject can realize fully the gravity of the situation with which we have to deal. This League interferes not merely with dealings between landlord and tenant, but between buyer and seller, between father and son, between husband and wife. There are some diseased parasitic growths which mimicked with a ghastly success and healthy organism; they have the same laws of nutrition and decay, but they flourish according as the organism to which they are attached—weakens and perishes. Such is the Land League.

It imitates with a terrible fidelity the processes and operations of the Courts of Law. It has its own jurisprudence; it has its own methods of procedure, and its own forms of punishment, and the tyranny which results from this state of things is ghastly indeed. It strikes—as I have said—at every relation of life; it does not spare the relatives of those who have offended, and its influence extends even beyond the grave. Doubtless many of those whom I am addressing are very indifferent to the rights of landlords, and are not very sedulous for the preservation of the Union; but even to them I would appeal, with some hope of success, when I say that no tyranny, however grave, no tyranny however cruel, can compare with the anarchy which must prevail if you have at the same time in the same country two sets of tribunals and two sets of law—one the legal tribunal which gets no verdicts, the other the illegal tribunal which invests its own laws, its own methods of procedure, and inflicts with unerring certainty its own forms and degrees of punishment. Now, Sir, I have completed the broad outlines of the case which I desired to lay before the House. I have, I think, shown that crime is uncontrolled and unpunished in parts of Ireland, and that in other parts of the country which are more satisfactory as regards the open commission of crime this system of secret terrorism reigns absolutely undisturbed; and I conceive that in proving these two facts I have, I contend, made out an adequate case for giving to the laws those powers which they at present lack for fulfilling their functions. I now come to a brief—but I hope an adequate—description of the aims of the Bill which Her Majesty's Government propose to the House to meet this state of things. As I have told the House, the two chief causes which render our Courts of Law in Ireland inoperative are the difficulty of getting evidence, and of getting verdicts according to evidence. I trust that the general provisions of our Bill will aid greatly in meeting the difficulty of the first of those evils. We have one special provision directed towards that object, borrowed from the Crimes Act. We have borrowed from the Scotch law—a law under which I think hon. Gentlemen will not deny that it is possible for men to be both happy and free—we have borrowed from the Scotch law a plan under which it will be possible for magistrates to examine witnesses on oath, even in cases in which no person is charged before them with the committal of a crime. I need not, however, dwell on that provision. The House is familiar with it as part of the Crimes Act of 1882 of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). Then I come to the question of the difficulty of getting verdicts according to evidence. We propose, in the first place, to abolish the jury system altogether for certain classes of crimes punishable by a certain length of imprisonment. We provide that two magistrates shall have summary jurisdiction, and a maximum power of inflicting six months' imprisonment, with hard labour, for the following offences:—Criminal conspiracy, Boycotting, rioting, offences under the Whiteboy Acts, assaulting officers of the law, taking forcible and unlawful possession, and inciting to the above offences. I may say why in this Bill we do not propose to interfere in the slightest degree with the liberty of the Press. We entertain the hope that by giving magistrates power of summary jurisdiction for inciting to these offences we may be able to deal with that class of cases, and prevent the Press from being sharers in these crimes. Of course, it will be felt that if the jury system has really broken down it will not be sufficient to give this power summary conviction with the maximum power of imprisonment, and only for those offences. The graver criminal would escape if you leave the system in other respects unaltered. We, therefore again, with small modification, borrow from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby's Act of 1882, that—"If the Attorney General for Ireland shall certify that a fairer trial can be held in some other place in Ireland, the High Court shall direct that the trial be held in some other place in Ireland;"

with this limitation, however—a qualification which was not in the Act of 1882—namely,

"That the prisoner, if he can show that a fairer trial cannot be held in such a place, should have power to make representations to the Court to that effect, and the Court shall have power to direct accordingly."

Then we give power either to the defendant or the Attorney General to have a special jury in any case in which he may think fit, thus assimilating the criminal practice to what is believed to be the civil practice both in England and Ireland. But we are here met by a problem which has exercised the minds of other right hon. Gentlemen who have had to devise some plan by which the defects of the jury system in Ireland might be overcome. It is manifest that intimidation and Party spirit may extend to every part of Ireland, and need not necessarily be confined to the district where the crime takes place. How are you to meet that case? If the change of venue and a special jury are not sufficient to secure a fair trial, what expedient are you going to adopt to meet it? [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Send them to Belfast.] The difficulty of getting over the possibility—rather that you may not get a fair trial in any part of Ireland—is enhanced by this further consideration—that even if you could get a fair trial it may be at the cost of the lives, the property, and the happiness of the jurymen, on whom you fasten the duty of giving a verdict. We think, then, that it would be unfair to cast upon the shoulders of men, unpaid and arbitrarily chosen, the whole burden of preserving the fabric of law and order in Ireland. We, therefore, have been obliged to devise some means by which the very gravest class of offences may be tried by some other means than a jury trial in any part of Ireland. The method by which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby attempted to meet this difficulty was by having a trial by Judges without a jury—Judges selected from the Irish Bench. The Irish Judges, it is no secret, very strongly objected to that expedient, and I am not prepared to say that they were wrong. At all events, this is not the expedient which we think right to adopt. We prefer to retain, as far as we can, the spirit and principle of the jury system—so long as that jury system can be applied with some hope of obtaining a fair verdict; and we, therefore, under certain limits, which I will presently describe, propose that the Attorney General for England and the Attorney General for Ireland together may certify that a fairer trial can be had in England; and then, under the same conditions as to trials as are to exist in regard to change of venue in Ireland, the trial shall, ac-

according to the certificate, be held in England. [An hon. MEMBER: In what part of England?] The name of the place will be in the certificate. We are not of opinion that this proposal in any sense violates the spirit of the Criminal Law; but we are rather of opinion that it violates it infinitely less than the plan proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. We are aware that in certain circumstances it might be a hardship to a prisoner to be tried in England—that a prisoner might not be able to convey his witnesses, solicitor, and counsel from Ireland to England. Therefore we provide in the Bill that Irish counsel shall be allowed to practise in English Courts, and also that the State shall provide the necessary funds for conveying both witnesses and lawyers to London.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the fees? What is the scale of fees?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope we get a good retainer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Member for North Longford ought not to complain at all of that now. Sir, this proposal we intend to confine to certain specified crimes. From this list of crimes we have carefully excluded everything which can possibly be conceived to have a political complexion. We have excluded, therefore, treason, treason-felony, sedition, and seditious libel. The crime can be tried in England if it be shown, and only if it can be shown, that a fair trial cannot be had in Ireland, or that the jurymen are in fear of their lives and property from such a trial. The only crimes to which, under these circumstances, we propose to apply this provision are murder, attempt to murder, aggravated crimes of violence, arson, and breaking or firing into dwelling-houses. As I said before, we conceive that by limiting our proposal in this way, and by preserving to the prisoner the privilege of being tried before an impartial jury, we do much more to carry into effect the spirit of the English Criminal Law than we should do by providing instead some machinery analogous to that which was passed into law at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. Now, Sir, there is a further limitation which applies to every one of the provisions I have enumerated to the House. We recognize—and we gladly recognize—that there are parts of Ireland in which crime and lawlessness, and intimidation, and disregard of the law of the land are not in such a state as to necessitate such a stringency of the Criminal Law; and, therefore, we have provided that the provisions I have read shall only have application in those districts which are proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether it is in contemplation to establish any uniform system of panel-striking?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not object to the interruption; but I think the hon. Member will see that I should serve no good purpose by going into details of that kind at this stage of the discussion. If I can give the House an adequate idea of the proposals of the Bill, I shall be satisfied; and I hope that, so far as I have gone, I have succeeded in doing so. So far, we hope we have made adequate provisions for securing that the Courts shall give verdicts according to the evidence; and, one of the great objects which we have in view being to insure the adequate punishment of those who exercise intimidation, and as the various combinations with which Ireland is cursed chiefly carry out their purpose by means of intimidation, we are not without hope that these clauses will be sufficient in themselves to strike effectually at any unlawful association or combination for the purpose of intimidation. But, at the same time, we felt that we should not be justified in leaving the Executive absolutely powerless to deal with such associations in the event of the failure of our plan for the establishment of summary jurisdiction. We, therefore, have introduced clauses which we think will have the effect of dealing with the case of dangerous associations. The Lord Lieutenant in Council will have power—under certain limitations which I will describe—to make it an offence against this Act to have anything to do with an association for the commission of crime, for carrying on operations for or by the commission of crime, for encouraging or aiding persons to commit crime, for promoting or inciting to acts of violence or intimidation, or for interfering with the administration of the law or disturbing the maintenance of law and order. But we are of opinion that these powers—which we think necessary, but know to be extreme—should be exercised only under limitations which we do not propose to apply to the rest of the Bill. The Lord Lieutenant, according to our proposal, may make a Proclamation making such associations illegal. If Parliament be sitting at the time, the Proclamation must be laid upon the Table of the House within seven days from the time it is made; and if Parliament be not sitting it must be summoned forthwith in order that the Proclamation may be laid upon the Table within seven days of its meeting. If either House of Parliament shall, under those circumstances, present an Address to the Crown practically condemning the Proclamation, it will be of no force.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is to save the Orange Society when the Liberals come in.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: When the Lord Lieutenant has issued his Proclamation, he may choose certain specified districts in which it is to have effect. The Proclamation will, in itself, extend potentially to the whole of Ireland; but we hope that it will not be necessary to extend it in practice or put it in force all over the country. There are districts, I have no doubt, where the Land League is a perfectly innocuous association; but there are districts where it is a curse to civilization. We do not propose to make it binding on the Lord Lieutenant, because he thinks that the National League or some other dangerous association ought to be put down in one district—we do not propose to make it binding upon him to put it down in every other district in Ireland. I think I have explained, I trust clearly, the provisions of the Bill we propose. As I have explained that the application of the Bill may be limited in point of space, we do not propose that the measure shall be limited in point of time. We do not propose to put it in the power of any Government to compel their Successors to have to consider the condition of Ireland at a time when it may be perfectly impossible, through Parliamentary exigencies, to carry out their plans. I do not know whether the House will care to learn the distinctions between this Bill and the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. The main distinctions are these—his Bill was limited in point of time, and ours is not; his Bill was not limited in point of space, while ours is or may be; we have added to the offences which can be dealt with summarily criminal conspiracies in support of Boycotting, and Whiteboy offences and incitements to commit them. We have given to the prisoners what the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman did not give—a power to protest against the change of venue; and, whereas the right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal in certain cases with certain offences by Special Commission, we prefer to retain the jury system and to deal with them by change of venue to England. The right hon. Gentleman had certain powers in his Bill which we omit—certain laws relating to strangers, and certain clauses dealing with the Press. These are the main distinctions between us and the right hon. Gentleman. We think all the differences which separate our Bill from his are improvements. Some of them go in the direction of strengthening the Bill. The majority go in the direction, not of making the Bill more efficient, but of making it more equitable in point of working to any prisoners who may be tried under it. Now, Sir, I have laid my case before the House. I have explained our Bill to the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian told us on Thursday night that our Bill was a Bill for putting down agitation. Our Bill is a Bill, not for putting down agitation, but for enforcing the law. The law which we wish to enforce is not the law specially or particularly which regulates the relations of landlord and tenant. The law we seek to enforce is the law which gives in this country and every civilized country security to private individuals. It is the law which prevents your pocket being picked and your head being broken; it is the law which enables you to go home with some security that midnight marauders will not invade your house, fire into your dwelling, possibly shoot you, possibly drag your wives and daughters out of bed. There are those who talk as if Irishmen were justified in disobeying the law because the law comes to them in a foreign garb. I see no reason why any local colour should be given to the Ten Commandments. But, lastly, the laws which the Government seek to enforce are the laws which, as far as I know, are the same in every civilized country which even pretends to a glimmering of civilization. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: What about the Whiteboy Acts?] Nor do I think that any regard to local prejudices in Ireland need induce us to treat leniently those who shoot a man for no other offence than that he is suspected of a desire to pay part of his rent. I am quite aware that we are approaching the consideration of this subject under very peculiar difficulties. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian told us that never before in the history of Crimes Acts did the legitimate Opposition set themselves against the legitimate Government of the day.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): What I said was, that the Government of the day had never proposed coercion without knowing that they would have the support of both Parties in the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I accept the correction of the right hon. Gentleman. I do not retort upon him, though I think I might, as he retorted upon me, that he had forgotten his own speech. At all events, we have the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that three-sevenths of the House of Commons are opposed to the Government on this occasion. It is quite true that, for the first time in the history of this country, the victims of oppression, of outrage, of murder, have called upon the Government to protect them, and that Government has not been supported by the English minority. But, Sir, we do not take the view apparently now taken by the right hon. Gentleman, that our conduct in this matter is to be regulated by the views of the Opposition. If they fail in their duty—as I think they are failing—that is no reason, and that shall be no reason, why we should not do our duty. This may support us, or it may not support us; but we should be utterly failing in the first and elementary duty of Government if, through any fear of Parliamentary opposition, or any dread of a hostile majority, we were to neglect or defer, for one single day, the answer to the appeal which comes up to us from every part of disturbed Ireland. Sir, this will be my last word. Many of those who are most devoted in the cause of liberty pay but a cold and frigid respect to the cause of order. I will not ask whether, under some circumstances, these two great principles are or are not ever opposed; but I will say, and say boldly, that in this case they are united, and that if I appeal to one rather than to the other, it is in the cause of liberty that I ask this House to support us in breaking the yoke under which so large a part of Ireland is now groaning.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I know, Mr. Speaker, that I rise under circumstances of the greatest difficulty to reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, which has been prolonged over such a considerable length of time to so late an hour of this evening. Towards the close of his speech he informed the House of certain differences which seemed to him to distinguish his Bill from the Bill introduced some years ago by the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). There was, however, one difference which he omitted to mention. The Bill which was introduced by the right hon. Member for Derby in 1882 passed into law; the Bill which is now introduced by the right hon. Gentleman opposite will never pass into law. If I believed that the people of England—I will not say the Members of this House—if I believed that the people of England would be capable of passing into law such a Bill as that described by the right hon. Gentleman I would give up for ever the hope of seeing these two peoples—the English and the Irish people—shaking hands and uniting in peace in a common brotherhood. It is the old, old story again. For 700 years these two peoples have hated each other, and have struggled against each other, and many a bitter and sorrowful thing has occurred at both sides out of that long and terrible struggle; and, now after these hundreds of years in the 87th year of the pretended Union, what is the best proposal that can be made for bringing peace between the two nations? It is that Act by which the Government of Ireland has suppressed in Ireland every liberty for which the people of England themselves hold dear, and did not hesitate to fight, and to fight against the Throne, in days gone by. The best proposal that England can make for the Government of Ireland now, at this period of the 19th century, is to suspend every liberty that is dear to every man who is not a slave in his heart, and suspend them, too, without any limit as to time. All I can say is, that I would not put the right hon. Gentleman to the trouble of bringing me over to the Old Bailey to be tried, as I see he has exempted criminal conspiracy, but I would fall back upon methods—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Criminal conspiracy is not exempted from offences to be tried in England.

MR. DILLON: I thought you said it was. But if this Code of laws, the worst ever proposed, or dared to be proposed, by any Minister of England before—if this Code of laws should receive the sanction of a majority of the people of England, I, for one, would abandon public agitation, and would consider myself at least a slave, if I were to agitate publicly under such circumstances. I would do either of two things—I would either leave for ever a country where no freeman could live, unless like a slave; or, if the people were able and willing, I would be proud and happy to lead them into battle against such an infamous system. The right hon. Gentleman talked of civilized people approving of his Bill. I say there is not a civilized people on this earth who would not sympathize with any and every effort a people like the Irish could make, or dared to make, or would be justified by their resources in making, to resist so hateful, so infamous, and so oppressive a law. One thing I am certain of, and I warn you here of it, that though the resources of the Irish people are too limited, as compared with those of England, to oppose your tremendous power, though they may be downtrodden and disorganized, and crushed under the iron heels of your overwhelming Constabulary and military, so as to be seemingly to submit like cowards and slaves to such a Code of laws as this before the House, they never would, and will only wait until an opportunity comes for striking back against you. If I believed we were in the same position now with regard to the people of England as we stood in seven years ago, when this present struggle commenced, I would despair of ever burying the hatchet and sword between the two nations. But, Sir, it is a good thing for England, as well as for Ireland, that there sits upon these Benches a body of men who represent the convictions of a majority of the people of this country; and who, if I am not greatly mistaken by the expressions of sympathy and kindness I have received from them in private life, are prepared to stand by us to the utmost which Parliamentary law will allow us in resisting and opposing a system which can have only one result—the disorganization of society in Ireland and the driving back of the people of Ireland to those sad methods which resulted in so much bloodshed in the past. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has told the House that the Bill he is going to introduce will not be limited in point of time. No, Sir, it will not be limited in time. You cannot limit nought—you cannot limit nothing. The Bill must first come into existence before any limit can be put to it as to time, it must be passed before it has any operation at all; and I am greatly mistaken, and shall be greatly surprised, notwithstanding the Government has now a majority at its back, if it ever succeeds in dragging its hateful carcass through all the stages of this House. I will not waste time, Sir, in going into the details of this Bill. The Government appear to have culled from the whole of the 86 Coercion Acts that have gone before, the very worst provisions, and united them with provisions of such stringency which, so far as my historical reading goes, were never before proposed by any previous Coercion Government. I will say, Sir, before I proceed to say a few words on the case which the Government have endeavoured to make, it seems to me extraordinary that English Conservative Gentlemen will not pause and reflect now, after seven years of the later stages of this bitter struggle, on the fact which has been repeatedly told them by a late Chief Governor of Ireland, that after three Coercion Acts of the severest stringency have been passed by this House, and one of them administered by a man of very different mettle from the present Governor—that the Chief Secretary should be obliged to get up and state that the condition of the country is infinitely worse than ever it was before, and that these Coercion

Acts only made the people more embittered against English rule. That certainly ought to make men ponder seriously when another Coercion Bill is brought forward. An hon. Member, the other night, said he denied the Crimes Act had been a failure—he declared that it had put down crime, but what does Lord Spencer say, the man who administered the Act? He declared, in several speeches in England—and I read them all very carefully—that though by the Crimes Act actively and severely administered, he had reduced the amount of crime in Ireland to a certain extent, there was no improvement in the condition of the people, or in their feelings towards England? No. Lord Spencer declared during the three years the Act was in force he found the hatred to English rule had increased, the disaffection to the law, and the disorganization of the people of Ireland to be greater when he left Ireland than when he took up the reins of Government. Those are Lord Spencer's own words; and, Sir, before I leave this position of Lord Spencer's administration of the law, may I say this—Lord Spencer was our enemy while in Ireland, but I say this, that he faced us with the courage of a man, and while there in Ireland he did his duty manfully and well, and passed through an ordeal compared to which the hottest battle was but a trifling matter. He believed, whether true or not I cannot say, that his life was not safe day or night, and going into battle compared with that is as nothing; and sneers at Lord Spencer come very ill from Gentlemen on that Bench who knew nothing of the dangers which lie before them. [Cries of "A threat!" from the Ministerial Benches.] I make no threat. I have merely replied to the sneer cast the other night at Lord Spencer; because it was said he had gone back on his own words—had gone back on the policy he had tried to carry out in Ireland. Such a sneer comes very badly from the Treasury Bench. Lord Spencer never flinched in exercising the powers which were given him, and he showed a courage—whatever the result may have been—in which I am sure he will not be imitated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Let me now, Sir, go for a few minutes into the case made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Chief Secretary for Ireland for this, the 87th, and greatest of all Coercion Acts, which is to last for all time, which is to crown the great edifice and seal the Union between England and Ireland, by declaring to the world that that Union can only be held together by depriving the inhabitants of Ireland of every one of the liberties that any brave man would fight for. I would ask hon. Members who have listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, have they heard any case made out by the right hon. Gentleman for such a drastic Bill as this, or for any Coercion Bill at all? I declare most solemnly that as I sat and listened to the right hon. Gentleman my wonder grew piece by piece, for a more disreputable, a more wretched, and a more miserable attempt at making a case for a Coercion Act I never heard. I tell the right hon. Gentleman this—if he will allow me to take his place on that Bench for half-an-hour I would make a ten times better case for a Coercion Act from my own knowledge. I do not deny that there is some crime and some trouble in Ireland; but I say that the Chief Secretary has not proved the necessity for a Coercion Act. He stands up here and reads a lot of anonymous stuff about crimes in Ireland, supplied to him by permanent clerks in Ireland, and he cannot answer a single question in relation thereto. He depends upon Government officials in Dublin Castle to make up the unfounded and wretched trash he has produced; and the only thing the right hon. Gentleman has succeeded in proving is that he knows absolutely nothing of the condition of Ireland, this Chief Secretary of a fortnight or so. He only spoke what he was told. But suppose that all his facts were admitted, what do they amount to? The right hon. Gentleman specifically refused, at our invitation, to go into the question of the statistics of crime in Ireland, and why? Because they would have shown what his Predecessor (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) stated at Bristol not long ago—that the condition of Ireland in respect of crime was, with the exception of two districts, improving. It is unparalleled in the history of the 86 Coercion Acts that the Chief Secretary for Ireland should refuse to give any statistics as to crime in Ireland in connection with a Coercion Bill. The right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech by saying that he was of certain

Judges, who, he said, were notoriously fair-minded and unbiassed men, who were not making up a political case for coercion. I beg leave to take issue upon that point. A most extraordinary thing is that in the case of every Coercion Act the charges of certain Judges were ready for the Government to assist them in applying for coercive powers for Ireland. But what did these Judges say? Judge Lawson—and this affects the Division I represent—stated that the condition of Mayo could not be distinguished from a condition of actual revolution or civil war. The right hon. Gentleman carefully avoided giving the House a Return of outrages on which that charge was based. I am well acquainted with the whole county, and I challenge contradiction when I say that I am satisfied, from personal investigation, that the North, South, and Western Divisions of the County of Mayo—leaving out the Eastern Division, which I represent—are as peaceful as Essex, or Sussex, or Surrey. The law and the process of the law have just as much currency in North, South, and West Mayo as in any part of England. I am better acquainted with the condition of Mayo than Judge Lawson, for I have lived there for a long time, and my family are connected with it. The observations of Judge Lawson were based on the police reports which the right hon. Gentleman has not read for us. They say these reports have all reference to East Mayo. Now, I know East Mayo better than any other Division, and what occurred in East Mayo was this. East Mayo, under my guidance and advice, had almost universally adopted the Plan of Campaign. So far as the levying of rack-rents goes, there is not the slightest doubt that in East Mayo there has been some disorder, and the law has been impeded, but there has been no other disorder. But as to outrages and robbery and crimes of violence, they are wholly absent, and you are safer walking the roads of East Mayo at night than you are in walking through the streets of London. In my recollection, which extends over a considerable period, I have never known the district of East Mayo more peaceful. There is undoubtedly disorder, and there is undoubtedly Boycotting; but, in the cases where the landlords have given way, a more absolute condition of peace does not prevail throughout the whole of Ireland. But we are told that the law has been set at defiance. In that one respect it has, and I am proud to own in this House that I personally am responsible for the paralyzing of the law in that respect in East Mayo. I only wish that I had paralyzed it at Glenbeigh and in other districts in Ireland, and that every Member of our Party could have operated with as much success in his Division as I did in East Mayo. We managed to bring the people through last winter by means of the Plan of Campaign without violence. So far as I am aware, with but two or three exceptions, there was hardly a single eviction in East Mayo; and in all other respects the country has not been so peaceful in the memory of man. Yet, although there has been no special allegation of crime made by Judge Lawson, we have the general statement that the country is in a state of civil war, simply because by means of the Plan of Campaign I made Lord Dillon grant a reduction of 20 per cent—and simply because Lord Dillon and Mr. Rashleigh could not collect their rents, until they consented to the terms we proposed. That is what the civil war means. I will not go into the charges of all the Judges; but I simply call attention to the fact that with the solitary exception of Judge Johnson in the County and City of Cork, no specific details were gone into. In the case of Judge O'Brien and Judge Johnson, some districts have been described as very bad, but no details were gone into. The general statement was that a condition of "disorganization" prevailed. We know what that means. Disorganization in the minds of these Judges means combination against the payment of rent in cases where landlords refused to give reductions. That is what the Judges denounced. I do not know what the Chief Secretary's own view may be, but that is what the friends and backers of the Chief Secretary have in view. They speak of the disorganization of society; but there was only one in the whole of the extracts from the charges of the Judges which had any effect upon the House, and that was a case mentioned by Judge Johnson, where a girl's hair had been cut off. I say, unhesitatingly, that if we could discover the man who committed the outrage, supposing it was really committed, we should see that he was punished. We have denounced it in stronger language than you have ever used. If we could discover these men, they would be dealt with in a most summary fashion. Where I used to live, in America, such men, if found, would be lynched, and in a modified way they would, no doubt, be so dealt with in Ireland. But are we to be told that the liberties of a country are to be taken away because a set of young blackguards break into a house and commit such an outrage? If I were to take up the criminal literature of England, I would undertake to find cases compared with which the one cited by the Chief Secretary would shrivel up altogether. In all these cases the right hon. Gentleman made out no case whatsoever. When I pass on to the next portion of his speech, I find that his case is even a great deal weaker than it had been in the previous portion, because, in reply to our repeated calls for particulars, the right hon. Gentleman said—"Yes, I will give some cases." These cases were with regard to the action of jurors. In spite of his own contrary intention, we drove the right hon. Gentleman at last into giving us particulars. I do not know whether the House noticed it, but he gave us six or seven cases of the action of jurors, and it was a remarkable circumstance that in not one of them did the case arise in either of the six counties upon which he founds his legislation. He began with Roscommon. Now, Roscommon is not in the districts mentioned. The next was Tipperary. Tipperary is in a state of absolute peace. He never said a word about Tipperary in connection with bringing in coercion. He gives three cases in Tipperary, and what did he tell? He said that none of them were cases of agrarian crime at all. We must presume that he has taken the strongest and the best cases with which to illustrate his argument; but did anybody ever hear such a method of argument? He goes and undertakes to prove that, from the condition of six counties in Ireland, coercion is necessary. He is then called upon for particulars, and he takes refuge in other counties and cities—cases which do not refer to agrarian crime at all. ["Oh, oh!"] In not a single one of these cases did he give any particulars of what affected the juries. He simply says that the Judges charged strongly for conviction. Well, I have heard Judges charge strongly for conviction in England and juries disagree. In all parts of Ulster I heard Judges charge strongly for conviction and juries disagree. In these cases, he deliberately tells us, first of all that they have nothing to do with agrarian agitation, and nothing to do with politics; and then he gives us no proof whatever that the minds of the juries were unduly influenced one way or the other, and we are wholly without information as to the reasons why the juries disagreed. Of course, it may be that a friend or cousin of the prisoner was on the jury. He did not tell what the Judges said, and we were obliged to trust to the right hon. Gentleman's own descriptions of what took place. Now I come to another branch of his great argument, which was this. He denounced the National League. If the rest of his case was weak, this I think may be described as the weakest part of all. He undertook deliberately to prove that the National League was engaged in some desperately wicked work, the nature of it he forgot to mention. He did not state at all what his case was that he was going to prove against the National League, and I listened with great curiosity to hear what was the case that he would endeavour to make out against that organization. What did he do? He commenced by citing four meetings, in none of which had the National League anything whatever to say. That shows how much the right hon. Gentleman knows about Ireland. There were four meetings called under the Plan of Campaign, and acting under my advice; and in no instance had the National League anything whatever to do with those four meetings. When that was pointed out to him, the right hon. Gentleman said—"But the people were prominent members of the National League." Are we then to be told that any organization is to be responsible for every word uttered by every prominent member of the organization? But that is not all. Having referred to these meetings, he proceeded to quote an extract from these speeches, one by my hon. Friend the Member for North Fermanagh (Mr. W. Redmond); the second by the hon. Member for East Galway (Mr. M. Harris); and the third by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. David).

from any speeches of mine, although, unfortunately, I have made a good many. Now, I say that all the speeches he quoted were absolutely and entirely innocent. With the exception of one of them, they do not contain the expression of a single sentiment upon which there is the shadow of a shade of a foundation of establishing coercion. What did they say? All that these speakers declared was that, in their opinion, the object before the people of Ireland was not only to get reduction of rents, but to set themselves free, and to get the right of governing themselves. We all admit that. We never denied it; and yet he went all this way round to prove that the National League had set that object before the people of Ireland. All I can say is, that he took a very long détour to very little purpose; for if he had but obtained a card of membership, he would have seen that it is plainly stated thereon that the very first object of the League "is to gain legislative independence for Ireland." Of course, everybody knows that is the object of the National League. That was the most that could be made out of the great mass of speeches which are collected by the Government at enormous and idiotic expense, piled up at the Castle in Dublin—I suppose numbering about 10,000. We are entitled to say that out of all those speeches, he could not find any worse passages than those perfectly innocent ones which he has given to the House. With the exception of the quotation from the speech by the hon. Member for East Galway (Mr. Harris), as to the correctness of the report of which there is very great doubt, about "slicing down rents," I say there is not a single passage which, from our point of view, is other than perfectly innocent. That speech has been quoted over and over again, and I do not care to go into a discussion as to whether the report accurately represents what the hon. Gentleman said or not; but it is mere childish folly to say that any single sentence uttered by any man, in the course of a long political agitation, is to be taken as a justification for taking away the liberties of a people. It is preposterous, and it only piles on additional proof, if, indeed, additional proof were necessary, to convince any fair-minded man that the case of the Chief Secretary is so lamentably weak that he has been obliged to have recourse to these wretched quotations, which are picked out by the eagle eye of the Loyal and Patriotic Union for retail to the people of England. Now I come to the fourth branch of the right hon. Gentleman's case, and it is the only branch in which he plainly demonstrated himself—that is with regard to the practice of Boycotting. I am not in the habit in this House of making statements I do not believe in, and nobody denies that Boycotting is very prevalent in certain parts of Ireland. To an Englishman, not knowing the other side, the right hon. Gentleman's statement would present a terrible picture; but to us the right hon. Gentleman has again succeeded in proving nothing but his own ignorance of the country he has undertaken to govern. Evidently, from the strong language and strong rhetoric that he used, he made up his mind to lay on the colours as thickly as he could, and he went so far as to challenge right hon. Gentlemen opposite for a more appalling picture than the authentic facts before him presented. What did he do? I made a note at the time at random of some of the cases he brought forward. One was with regard to a well-known case at Thurles where Boycotting took place. It was the case of a man who came before the local branch of the League, and asked to be forgiven. He was not forgiven, and the Boycotting went on. What was the date of the case? It was the 14th of August, 1885. At the very time that this man was before the Thurles branch of the League asking to be forgiven and being refused forgiveness, the Tory Party were in alliance with us. They asked and they got our support at the Elections in November of the year 1885, and they knew right well of the Thurles case of Boycotting. It was publicly and notoriously before the country at the time. The newspapers took considerable interest in it; but it did not make the Tories refuse an alliance with the hon. Member for Cork, so long as, by his co-operation, they could secure a majority at the polls. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to quote a resolution passed a long time ago, condemning certain evictions, and declaring that, in the opinion of the meeting, no man should be permitted to hunt over the land. Does the right hon. Gentleman not know that farmers in Ireland are legally entitled to prevent any man hunting over their lands? And does he not know that it is one of the legitimate weapons by which we get reductions of rent in Ireland? I call it a fair bargain; but the last of the Boycotting cases is very amusing. The right hon. Gentleman, in bringing it forward, nearly wept over it, and he leaned over the Table to an unusual length. He was more emphatic and impressive in his manner than ever. The right hon. Gentleman said a labourer was working for a Boycotted man, that his wife was going to be confined, and that he could not get a midwife to attend her. Now, does he mean to put a clause in his Bill to compel midwives to attend women where they do not choose to do so? If so, I shall be prepared to oppose such a clause. I mention this to show the absurdity and the idiocy you are being driven into by attempting such an impossible task as that which you will be attempting by means of this Bill, if it passes. Do you suppose that by any Act of Parliament you can compel a midwife to attend a woman when she does not choose? There is a tragic side as well as a comic side to this subject—this is one of the comic sides; another was when a little boy, aged 10 years, because he whistled "Harvey Duff" at a passing policeman, was summoned for intimidation. These, Sir, are the results of idiotic legislation like this. I have now come to the end of the Chief Secretary's case, and I do not think there is really any case at all. The case which the right hon. Gentleman attempted to prove made out no case for any coercion at all, much less for such a terrific Bill as he proposes to introduce into this House. He has, indeed, made out a case that he should speedily leave the Irish Office. He succeeded to-night in proving, to the satisfaction of every Irishman, that he is actually moving in the dark in Ireland—that he is dealing with a condition of people and things about which he knows absolutely nothing. That being so, he is absolutely and entirely in the hands of the most dangerous gang of men that exist in any country. He is like a child in the hands of the men who have been the curse of this country and Ireland all through this century—the permanent officials of Dublin Castle and the landlords, whose interest it is to keep England and Ireland enemies; and, if it is the case, he is being borne along a road the termination of which it is not hard to see. He is now learning the lessons and hearing the stories from them with which dozens of Irish Chief Secretaries before him have been stuffed. He is learning that all you have to do is to have a continuous and strong Government and plenty of coercion; and these people who tell him this laugh at him behind his back. They know perfectly well that their day has gone by in Ireland; they do not expect, nor care, nor desire that—[here the hon. Member snapped his fingers]—about the Union. If you asked an Irish landlord to stake his life or any of his money on the maintenance of the Union, would you find one to do it? They care nothing about your Union, but a great deal about their rents. What is their opposition to Home Rule? They know that Home Rule is a question of a short time, and they want, under the shadow of this Coercion Act of yours, to thrust their hands up to their shoulders in the pockets of the British taxpayer—put their cash into carpet bags, and get out of the country before Home Rule is granted. They want to sell their estates for double their value. They want to leave you face to face with the impoverished tenants of Ireland, who will have been compelled, under this Coercion Act, to sign agreements to pay double, or nearly double, the price of their farms, and then they will leave it to the British Government to collect the money. If they get their money, you will find very few of them staying in Ireland to maintain the Union, or support your Government. Everyone knows that if to-morrow, by some great operation, you were to buy out all the Irish landlords at their own valuation, and give them, out of the British Treasury, the cash for which they eagerly long, the Loyal and Patriotic Union of the defenders of the Empire would vanish in smoke, and you would be left masters of the field—aye, but with a very unfortunate state of things to face—with an impoverished people who had signed agreements to pay enormous sums, and the Irish landlords, after cursing Ireland for generations, would have left you with a wall of separation between England and Ireland which it would tax the utmost ingenuity of English Statesmen to get over. Well, Sir, I have said enough.

Bill is not honestly brought before the House. I regret that I should be compelled to speak at any great length; but as there are not many Members listening to me, the infliction will be less. The question is one so enormous that, in fact, it is utterly impossible for me to attempt to deal with this case within moderate or brief limits, because what I contend is this, that this Bill is an attempt at coercion of a thoroughly dishonest character, and no case whatever has been made out for it. Furthermore, I contend that if it is passed, so far from restoring order in Ireland, or lessening the amount of crime, it will tend enormously—as all the previous Bills have done—to increase disorder in that unhappy country, to increase crime, and what is now known as important—to enormously increase and intensify that feeling, which so much has been done to get rid of in the past year—of hatred of the English people, of utter distrust of this House of Commons. There is no escape from the effect of the passing of this Bill. But there is another aspect of the case which, to my mind, if not to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, is no less important, no less vital, and it is this—that if this Bill be passed, which I doubt, and if it be carried out, as I do not in the least believe the Government will succeed in doing; with the vigour and courage which Lord Spencer displayed, it will undoubtedly enable the Government and the landlords of Ireland to inflict upon the people an amount of suffering and cruelty such as they have not endured since 1852. That being so, I feel it my duty to lay before even the present small audience some portion of the vast mass of information on the subject which has naturally come into my hands from the various districts of Ireland, and which shows the frightful system of persecution and extermination to which the tenants are subjected. Of course, it is manifestly impossible for me to go at full length into all the information I possess. I shall, therefore, commence by taking two or three typical cases of eviction campaigns—that is, eviction on a large scale—and first I will take the case of the estate of Mr. Daly, Ballyhaunis, County Mayo, on the borders of my own Division. There are 27 tenants who are rented at something like a fraction over 70 per cent over the Government valuation, and there is one instance of a poor woman who pays exactly three times the Government valuation. These tenants applied to me for protection about two months ago, and asked if I could put in force the Plan of Campaign. I said, "Certainly," and I requested some friends of mine to go down. The tenants paid in under the Plan of Campaign, and their rents are safely lodged where Mr. Daly cannot touch them. He served them all with summonses, and got them into Court, and so shocked was the County Court Judge (Judge Richards) at what he had heard, that he said to Mr. Daly in open Court—"Cannot you make some compromise; can not you give some reduction?" Mr. Daly replied—"Oh! they can go in the Land Court." "But," says Judge Richards, "would not it be possible to give them some reduction, without putting them to that expense?" But the landlord pressed the case, and got the processes. Now, these evictions, and it is significant, were the first that took place in Ireland after the new Chief Secretary was appointed. I omitted to mention that the tenants had offered to pay Griffith's valuation, which was 20 per cent higher than Lord Dillon's tenants had settled for. The money is where he can reach it, if he chooses to send for it, and he can have it at any moment. The evictions were carried out with great cruelty. Three hundred police were present, great expense was incurred to the British taxpayer, and the next day the tenants went back to their homes, and are there now. An indignation meeting was held at Ballyhaunis, and so strong was the feeling exhibited by Mr. Daly's neighbours that he has asked Mr. William O'Brien and the parish priest to arbitrate on the whole case. Had you this grand Bill in force, what would have been done? These poor people—steady, honest, industrious, prepared to pay more than a just rent—would be to-day lying in gaol, or starving by the roadside of Mayo; whereas they had brought this man to reason, and these poor people have been allowed to return to their holdings. The idiotic thing about the whole transaction is that the British Government has paid about £50 for evicting these people. This would be the result of your Crimes Act—"Pay your full rent, or out you go into the road." Now, I will take the case of the Lansdowne estate. It must have struck hon. Members and the English public with surprise at seeing the accounts given in The Times of the tenants worth their thousands of pounds leaving their magnificent places with nothing. I cannot understand how hon. Members in England can be so obtuse as to believe the men who are Justices of the Peace, prominent citizens, large farmers, will, because of intimidation, go out of their homes and leave behind them all their improvements. Lord Lansdowne, at an early stage of last winter, as I was informed, under the advice, and, perhaps, gentle pressure of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley) offered, without being asked, to return to the tenants on his County Kerry estate a reduction of 20 per cent on the judicial rents, and so a settlement was arrived at. But the Queen's County tenants, who were very highly rented, got no reduction, and none was offered them. The result was that they met together and demanded a reduction in the case of the majority of the tenants who were leaseholders, of 30 per cent, and in the case of judicial rents of 20 per cent. This being flatly refused, a great feeling was aroused among the tenants, and matters came to a deadlock which lasted some time. Then the tenants adopted the Plan of Campaign, and there cannot be the slightest doubt that they did so of their own motion and free will, and without the instigation of any other person. Then came the evictions; and, in connection with them, I want to take up the case of Denis Kilbride, whose case was mentioned in The Times by their correspondent, and it was stated that he was selected as one of the first tenants to be evicted, in order to make an example of him because he was one of the main promoters of the Plan of Campaign. We are told it is always outsiders who promote the Plan of Campaign; but everybody knows that this man was the chief promoter of it on that estate, and that he had been selected to be evicted first for that very reason. He and Mr. Dunn, whom you removed from the Bench for joining the Plan of Campaign, were the leaders of the movement, and though the agent tried to buy and bribe them off, they stood like men by the poorer tenants, and for this their names will never be forgotten in Ireland. Now Kilbride's farm was rented at £760, and his Poor Law valuation was £420. And now I will ask hon. Members' attention to a summary I have extracted from Reports of the Land Commissioners as regards reductions in Leinster in the four last months of last year. Here it is—

"September—Former rent, £51; Government valuation, £44; reduced rent £40. October—Former rent, £2,593; Government valuation, £1,845; reduced rent, £1,701; November—Former rent, £1,498; Government valuation, £1,311; reduced rent, £936. December—Former rent, £962; Government valuation, £713; reduced rent, £503."

In face of this return, which shows an average reduction of more than was offered by the tenants on this estate, Denis Kilbride has been put out of his holding, because he refused to pay—although he offered to pay 20 per cent over the Government valuation and 50 per cent over the judicial rents fixed on the estates all round him. This man was losing money on his farm under a rent that was a murderous rack-rent. That language is no exaggeration of the rent which I have proved from these returns to be of such a character. He is banished from his home, and probably robbed of thousands of pounds' worth of improvements, and driven out homeless on the roadside from a handsome house, because he will not pay a rent which is 50 per cent higher than the judicial rents, and will not betray his fellows. You must know that when men like this who are in the habit of paying their rents regularly and honestly, and against whom no breath of dishonesty could be breathed even by an Irish Chief Secretary; when they leave handsome homes and submit to see their wives and children, brought up in luxury, exposed to hardship—that a great belief in the justice of their cause must be at the bottom of it. If you pass this Bill, you are putting a weapon of persecution and tyranny, of cruel tyranny and spoliation, into the hands of men who have used these powers most unmercifully in the past. There is a description of these evictions in The Times of to-day which I recommend to the perusal of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. In it I read a description of an interview between the parish priest of Ballina and the correspondent of The Times, and, knowing what I do of The Times, I would earnestly recommend them to peruse it. The priest told the correspondent they would build houses for the evicted people, and they would support them. He says—"They will never yield;" and The Times correspondent says—"I am obliged to admit that Father Meara is one of the finest and best specimens of his class." Is that not enough to make Members of this House reflect? I will say a few words on another case which happened in the Rosalea district in last December. A man came to me in my own house in Dublin from the Rosalea district, and asked for my protection for a number of tenants who were about to be evicted. The tenants on the estate were all Catholics. I consented to take the case up. A day was appointed for meeting; 135 families received notices of eviction, and the Clones Workhouse was noticed to receive 635 human beings. The agent had stated over and over again that he would not abate his terms, which the poor people were utterly unable to pay. These terms included the cost of evictions. The condition of these people was simply this—they were poor mountain tenants, who had previously paid their rent, as long as they were able, from the proceeds of a peculiar kind of embroidery work done by the women of the house, and on account of this very fact the rents had been cruelly and outrageously raised in past years, because it was known these women could make large sums; but this peculiar work deserted the locality in one of those inexplicable ways nobody could account for. The women had no work to do, and the only way for them to obtain money to pay their rents was by selling their mountain cattle. But this means of obtaining money disappeared also, and the people were reduced to actual poverty. They had fallen into arrears and were about to be evicted for arrears of rent. I went down in January—it was one of the coldest days I recollect—the snow was six inches deep on the fields, and the cold was intense. It had been settled that the evictions were to come off on the Tuesday, and the meeting which I was to address on the Monday was proclaimed, on the ground that it was to be held for the purpose of obstructing the Sheriff in carrying out the evictions. The police were armed in order to prevent our meeting; but we held two large meetings, at the usual waste of public money. The police, I suppose, had 50 cars, and there were

200 police present to prevent the meeting. What was the result? The evictions were postponed on the plausible pretext that the weather was so bad. It was singular that my meeting was proclaimed because I was going to obstruct the carrying out of the evictions, and there was no word about the cold or the evictions being postponed, although my meeting was on the Monday and these on the Tuesday. Three or four days ago I received a letter from the priest of the district, in which he said—

"The poor people will never forget you for coming down and helping them in that struggle."

He added—

"The evictions which were to have come off last week have been settled on the terms originally proposed."

The agent actually accepted better terms than I originally proposed accepting—one year's rent, and giving a clear receipt up to May, 1886. But if the Government had had a Crimes Act, what would have been the result? There was no crime in that district; but if Judge Lawson went there, he would say law was not obeyed, disorder was rampant, and the Queen's writ could not run, because I held a meeting to protest against these evictions; whereas, the result has been that the struggle is ended, the landlord has got his rent, the people have been protected, and the district is at peace. I would invite the attention of hon. Members to this fact. Every single Englishman whom I know, who has travelled in Ireland, has become a convert to our views. I do not know a single case of any honest Englishman travelling among the people who has not come back a convert to our view of the case. I allude to these cases in order to show that, by allowing popular agitation, not only has injustice and cruelty been avoided, but also that wild revenge which is the inevitable accompaniment of coercion. I, therefore, urge hon. Members to pause very seriously before they embark on a course which will lead to things being done in Ireland that will make them disgusted with themselves, and sorry they have had anything to do with it. I desire now to turn for a few moments to the condition of the West of Ireland, and to read you a few words from that mine of information, the Cowper Commission

Report, which, though they come from a witness hostile to us, ought to have great force on Members of this House. Lord Cloncurry is well known as a bitter opponent of the League. He has lost £10,000 in his struggles with us in Ireland, and, of course, his whole evidence is tinged with hostility to our movement. He gives his evidence unwillingly to the following effect:—It has been shown that for the last few years the price of store cattle has been rapidly falling. He is a great grazier himself. Mr. Knipe asks—(Q. 20,728)— "Must it not have an injurious effect on the farmers from whom you purchased cattle?"

Lord Cloncurry answered—

"In the Western counties they must have felt the fall very much."

Mr. Knipe then asks—

"And consequently there must be a greater difficulty in paying rent?"

Lord Cloncurry to this answers—

"Yes; in Mayo it is a wonder to me how they pay rent at all. I could buy cattle for £8 a head there, that I could not buy for £14 10s.; but where I sell in England the prices have gone down."

"I wonder," says Lord Cloncurry, "how they can pay rent at all;" and yet I have been branded as a robber, because I asked Lord Dillon for a reduction of 20 per cent, and they have paid Lord Dillon less this 20 per cent, and Mr. Daly's tenants are going to pay, and so are all of them if they are treated like human creatures and not like beasts. I have just been dealing with a question which is admittedly one of the most serious connected with the serious state of affairs in Ireland—the probable operation of this Act, if passed into law, on the people in the Western parts of Ireland—and I have pointed out that one of the most determined upholders of landlord rights in Ireland is astonished, in his experience as a grazier, that the tenants in that part of the country can pay at all. I will turn from that now to some evidence given by a man who is as much to be taken as the representative of Western Irish land agents as any man, Mr. Henry A. Robinson, who was the agent of Mr. Berridge over the greater part of Western Connaught, and who, I very much regret to see, has become agent over the Island of Arran. Mr. Henry A. Robinson is a man who is typical of the harsh agents in the West of Ireland, and his evidence, " given in the Blue Book, is of the most supreme interest. I entreat hon. Members to study and carefully read the evidence of Mr. Henry A. Robinson before they put into the hands of men like him powers which enable them practically to treat the people of that part of the country like slaves—indeed, worse than any many man would ever dream of treating slaves—because they will enable him, and other men of his class, as he is at present engaged in doing, to drive them out like vermin. He was asked, in examination—

"Are the tenants unable to pay the rent? Do you think they are?"

He answered—

"They are able to pay whenever there is a demand for their small cattle. That regulates the rent more than any other crop. There is no crop that interferes with the rent. The potatoes are for their own use; but as long as there is a demand for their cattle they can pay."

This is a point I lean on; because here again is a declaration coming after Lord Cloncurry's declaration, that there had been such a fall in the price of small cattle that he wondered any tenant in Mayo could pay any rent at all. "Are the rents," he was asked, "being fairly paid?" He answered—

"They were being fairly paid, but they have an inclination to stop paying them."

"Since when?—They were fairly paid, very fairly, up to two months ago."

"Is it attributable to anything that has taken place in your neighbourhood?—I cannot say. There has not been any agitation in the neighbourhood; but reading and hearing that tenants have got a reduction elsewhere they expect a reduction."

"Have they asked you for an abatement?—Yes."

"Have you offered them any?—No."

"Are there judicial rents?—Yes."

"You gave no reduction on judicial rents?—We gave none."

"When were the judicial rents fixed?—At the very opening of the Commission."

"When the rents were being fixed in the province of Connaught they were something like 25 per cent higher than they were to-day. Have any been fixed recently?—No, none have been fixed recently."

That is the evidence of Mr. Henry A. Robinson, who is agent over a vast district of country in which the Plan of Campaign does not run, and that is more in the nature of a misfortune to the tenants. He has recently been appointed agent over the Islands of Arran, which are populated by a people whom, in my opinion, it is a shameful thing to ask to pay any rent at all. But Mr. Robinson contemplates, as soon as convenient, to descend upon the Islands of Arran and collect the rent. I should like the House to notice the way in which Mr. Robinson deals with the question of emigration. He is appointed because he has the reputation of being an exterminator, and because it is known that he will strike terror in the tenants. Like a great many other men, Mr. Robinson is in favour of emigration, and thinks that the people ought to be induced to emigrate because the land cannot possibly support all that are upon it decently. Asked whether the tenants were in favour of emigration, he says—

[First Night.]

"No, I think they are not. I think they are advised not to emigrate. They would rather remain as they are.

"They are subject to periodical famine?—Yes.

"And in a state of chronic misery?—Yes.

"And, I suppose, in a state of chronic discontent?—Yes."

Good God! is this the position that Englishmen are going to assume in their treatment of this question? Can it be possible that Englishmen are going to place in the hands of this man, and others like him, such powers as are proposed to be given in this Bill to harry these poor people as he is harrying them at present? I got a letter the other day from a priest asking me to give the protection of the Plan of Campaign to 27 tenants on Mr. Berridge's estate. I replied that I would, if all the tenants would join. I had a letter from him the other day, to say that the thing was hopeless—that the tenants were too cowardly to join. These poor people had asked for 20 per cent reduction on their judicial rents. They were flatly refused their request, and now they are under notice of ejectment; and the terms of Mr. Henry A. Robinson are that they must pay the full rent and costs of ejectment, which will nearly double the rent upon them. I can do nothing for them, and the only remedy and relief this House is going to give these poor people is to pass a Coercion Act, to enable Mr. Henry A. Robinson to rush into gaol any poor creature who dares to raise his voice against him. I now want to read a few words from the evidence of that rara avis in Ireland, a good landlord, because, even in the County Mayo, there are good landlords. I have been accused of asserting that there are no good landlords in Ireland;

but I have, on the contrary, always maintained that there were good landlords there, although they were in a minority. Where there is a good landlord in Ireland, we never hear of his coming to this House and asking for protection. On his estate there is no Boycotting or intimidation, or trouble with their tenants. For instance, Mr. Thomas Tighe is a landlord in the County Mayo and a Justice of the Peace. He was examined before the Commission, and was asked did any of his tenants hold under judicial leases. He answered—

"No. In '79 I gave my tenants unasked an abatement of 20 per cent.

"And you never interfered with them since?—Never.

"Were any agreements brought before the Court by which the rents were fixed?—No; the tenants took no action in the matter. I and my tenants have lived on the best of terms."

He was asked if he wanted to sell his estate? He answered—

"Yes; I offered to sell my Kilmainham estate at 20 years' purchase."

"Which they were glad to agree to, I suppose?—Yes; because the rents were fair."

This is in the County Mayo, where, according to the Government, the law has ceased to run. And yet Mr. Thomas Tighe has never had a word of difference with his tenants. There is further evidence to show how he had dealt with his tenants as follows:—

"You used to get your rents punctually before you sold?" (was one question put to him.)

"Yes; in 1879 there was a very bad year, and I stocked the land myself. I never compelled a tenant to strip his farm, or to sell his interest in it in order to pay his rent."

He added—

"I have stocked the land myself in bad years."

Those words contain the keynote of the whole matter, and disclose the secret of the remedy for a great deal of trouble in Ireland. It is too commonly the case that landlords allow tenants to strip their farms for the rent; and then this is what Mr. Tighe says of the people in Mayo, where everybody is supposed to be dishonest—

"I am happy to say that I have been very successful in this way, for the tenants I assisted got on very well, surmounted their difficulties, and honestly paid their rent."

I have quoted these words for the purpose of showing that when a landlord acts, as a Christian ought to act, he has no difficulty with his tenants; and, in every case of a contrary character, it will be found that the tenants are refractory because the landlord has been acting dishonestly, has been crushing them by his exactions, compelling them to strip their farms in order to pay the rent, and evicting them when he has pauperized them. I have endeavoured to show that where the landlord is just, the tenants will pay if they can. I have shown how men, acting for large and wealthy landlords resident in England, have been convicted, out of their own mouths, of the cruellest and most unmerciful conduct. So long as the Government allow such things to go on, it is criminal, in the highest degree, to think that they can restore respect for the law by simply bringing in a Coercion Act. As regards the County of Kerry, which is more typically Irish in many respects than any other, the condition of that one county, as compared with the rest, cannot justify the Government in robbing a whole nation of its civil rights. I wish to prove that Kerry, up to a recent period, has been admitted to be one of the most peaceable districts not only in Ireland, but in the entire United Kingdom; while now it is the scene of continued outrage and violence, and that the increase of crime is due to something apart from the nature of the people. Surely, when such a change as this has been wrought in the character of a people, men of honesty should first endeavour to ascertain the cause of the change before coercing the people. The cause of that change is not far to seek. The County Kerry was declared by no less an authority than Chief Justice Lawson to be unusually peaceful until 1878, since which date the list of evictions furnishes a significant reason for the increase of crime. In 1877, 18 families were evicted; in 1878, 26; in 1879, 70; in 1880, the number was 191; in 1881, it was 192; in 1882, it increased to 293; in 1883 to 403; in 1884 to 410; and in 1885 to 458. A total of 11,000 human beings were thus driven from their homes during the period in question. This is the cause, and the only cause, of the extraordinary change in the condition of Kerry. I would now ask hon. Members to direct their attention to the evidence of a Resident Magistrate with regard to Kerry. I will, however, remark beforehand that the Blue Book from which I have been quoting is not accepted by the Irish Party as an impartial reading of the case. It is a mass of evidence collected by a Commission which has been appointed in the landlord interest. On that Commission there was appointed one English landlord connected with the coercion administration of the country, two Irish landlords, one English economist—who might be impartial—and an Irish farmer who, it had been carefully ascertained before he was appointed, voted Tory at the last election. Not a single Representative of the mass of the people was placed on the Commission; but it comprised three Representatives of the landlord class. The President, Earl Cowper, the Earl of Milltown, and another Member asked leading questions to induce evidence in favour of the case of the landlords, which evinced a most unfair animus towards the Nationalists. I have myself at a meeting of the National League warned the people not to go near, and not to put any evidence before the Commission; and they apparently took my advice, for of 120 witnesses examined, I do not believe that 10 have endeavoured to state the Nationalist view. There is evidence in favour of that view, and it is doubly valuable, because given by unwilling witnesses for, excepting in Ulster where Protestant farmers are examined, the witnesses are almost exclusively officials, land agents, landlords' representatives, officials of the Property Defence Association, and of the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union. Therefore any justification that can be extracted from their evidence ought to tell with tenfold force in favour of the Nationalist Party. The Resident Magistrate to whom I alluded is Mr. Considine, of the town of Killarney. He is himself the son of a Limerick landlord. He had been explaining to the Commissioners that the League, so far as he knew, was doing its utmost to put down outrage. Thereupon Lord Cowper said—"I suppose it would be the game of the League at present to put down outrage?" "The game of the League!" that was a question which showed the animus of the President. "Yes," replied Mr. Considine; "I think they would desire to do so"—an answer in which he plainly reproved the President as far as he dared. Then the President, alluding to the Curtin case, remarked—"Only these people have got out of their hands." The reply was—

"Yes; in my judgment, the central authority of the League have been doing their utmost to stop these outrages; but I think it has gone outside their power to do so."

The witness was speaking of the limited district of Killarney; but does it not strike the House that this quotation shows a very unfair way of carrying on the inquiry? A most important witness was Mr. Davis, who for some years had been District Inspector of Constabulary at Castleisland, the worst and most disturbed part of Ireland.

"I am glad to hear," said Lord Milltown, "that Mr. Davitt has denounced outrage."

"Oh, yes," answered Mr. Davis; "he came down here specially and denounced outrage."

"Do you think it had any effect?"—"I should say it had."

"Did Mr. Davitt show any sympathy for the Curtin family?"—"I am quite sure he did; and I know members of his Party who were present at the funeral, and did everything to denounce outrages and prevent Boycotting."

I allude to this evidence, because it is, in my opinion, monstrous to accuse Irish Members, or any organization with which they are connected, such as the National League, of being in any way responsible, either directly or indirectly, for outrages; on the contrary, I assert that they have contributed enormously towards maintaining the peace, and the absence of outrage during a period of great distress and many evictions. When the Government's own paid officials admit that in all the worst districts of Ireland the influence of the League has been strained to the utmost to put down outrage, it is a preposterous and almost a cowardly thing to say that that organization has instigated outrages. I have never shrunk in this House from taking on my shoulders the full responsibility of any action of my own. I acknowledge that I have been acting in a combination in the shape of the Plan of Campaign against the payment of exorbitant rents, and also to a certain extent in Boycotting to carry out that object; but I assert that I have done more to prevent crime and outrage than any Government official. I would ask the attention of hon. Members to the evidence of Mr. E. Roche and the District Inspector of Constabulary in regard to the district of Castleisland. There the Land Act has operated to a very limited extent, owing to the fact that a large portion of the people are leaseholders. Rents are high, but abatements are made in some instances; evictions commence, then outrages take place, then comes the Crimes Act, and in consequence of the frightful blood tax, the rates in that district are almost equal in amount to the rents. In a district where crime is most rampant, it has been stated by the salaried magistrates of the Government that the influence of the Land League has been dead for years, and that Boycotting is carried out by an organization which they do not like to name. Well, what has been the result of five or six years of this rule in Kerry? You have brought the country into a state that is most deplorable, and, I must say, is a constant source of grief and shame and distress to all Irishmen. And what is your remedy for all this? Simply to continue to carry on the methods of coercion and blood tax which have produced these evil effects. And what, Sir, is the cost of this system? I say, Sir, that to support this system is the worst and most infamous use that the taxes of the country could be put to. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer went out on the terrace of the House of Commons and shovelled sovereigns into the Thames, he would be doing a more prudent and meritorious act than your agents are doing in Kerry. Mr. Heffernan Considine, one of the Resident Magistrates of Kerry, was examined before the Cowper Commission, and stated, in reply to Sir James Caird, that he knew one landlord who had a Boycotted farm on his hands and had been working it himself for two years. The rent of the farm was £70 a-year. There were seven policemen protecting the caretakers, and Mr. Heffernan Considine estimated that it cost the country £1,000 and the landlord £300 a-year to work this miserable farm of £70 a-year. That is certainly a glorious system for administering the taxes of England; and I venture to say that if any Member of the House were to investigate the circumstances of the evictions, he would come to the conclusion that the tenant was right and the landlord wrong. I am convinced that the people of England—if we can only reach the people of England—will put an end to this system which, according to the Chief Secretary, is to be perpetual. A great many land agents were summoned before the Commission; and I want now to direct the attention of the House for a few minutes to the character of the evidence given before the Commission by some of the agents themselves, which will show what a small amount of reliance can be placed upon the statement of Tory landlords who come from Ireland, and indignantly deny the charges we make against them. One of the agents examined was the agent of the Duke of Abercorn. I do not know whether I am correct or not, but it is believed in Ireland that the influence of the Hamiltons is most sinister and anti-Irish—it is believed that they were not sorry to get rid of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Randolph Churchill), whom they regarded as opposed to them in their Irish policy. I know, any way, that the Hamiltons are anxious to have a Coercion Act in Ireland; for, without a Coercion Act, they would soon be unable to levy their rack-rents in the North of Ireland. In fact, they are regarded by their own tenants and by the Ulster tenants as excessive rack-renters. Mr. Thomas M'Farland, the agent to the Duke of Abercorn, was examined and stated, in reply to Lord Milltown, that the tenants had always been well treated, and that there would be great reluctance on their part to sever their connection with the old family. He also stated that between 8 and 9 per cent would cover the cost of management, losses, and outlay upon improvements on the estate. So much for the opinion of Mr. M'Farland; but we shall see that the tenants' opinion is entirely different. A short time ago a meeting was held in St. Johnstone's Schoolhouse of the Donegal tenantry of the Duke of Abercorn. Everyone who knows the locality is aware that there were very few Catholics in the room. The chair was occupied by a Mr. David Robertson, a Loyalist, and he said—

"He was sure they would all agree with him that it was no wonder the country was in such a state of agitation when they found the tenant farmer in a worse position than he was 50 years ago, and tied down by law to pay rents reduced on an average only 10 per cent on rack-rents put on in 1858 when all sorts of farm produce were double what they were at present."

He added—

"There was one thing certain, a reduction of rent must come, if the tenant farmers were to live in this country. The Government would not do otherwise on the judicial side."

duction was to be looked for from the landlord from the State, and from the Land League. The last appeared to him to be the most popular and the most effectual."

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the hon. Gentleman to read from page 691.

MR. DILLON: It will be more interesting to the House to read the opinion of the tenants.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked what was the period to which the hon. Member was referring?

MR. DILLON: 1858.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Thirty years ago.

MR. DILLON: I desire to show what a good heart these Ulster landlords have for their tenants. Judging the names of the tenants who have recently spoken, I should say they were members of the Church of England or Presbyterians. And what did they say? They, it appears, had asked for a reduction of 30 per cent, which, they said, had been curtly refused; and at this meeting they asked his Grace for a more favourable reply, and one of the tenants said—

"They all remembered the time when they did not dare to assemble in a meeting like that to discuss their grievances, and when they had to submit to whatever kind of tyranny was bestowed upon them without raising their voices against it. They had reason to thank God, to thank the Legislature, and thank the spirit of the time that they were able to meet together that evening."

These are the affectionate tenantry of their beloved landlord, the Duke of Abercorn. That is a nice commentary on the statement of Mr. M'Farland; and I am inclined to believe that if these men had not the courage to speak out we would have the Hamiltons posing here as men who had the love and respect of their tenants, and from whom the tenants would not part even if they could. This only shows that the Northern Protestant, as well as the Southern Catholic, will use strong language when driven to the wall. If I had used in Mayo the language used by Mr. Samuel Crowe I should have been indicted; for that gentleman spoke of the 70 tenants who refused to sign his memorial as black sheep, and I shall await, with some interest, to see whether a prosecution under the new Coercion Bill is the result. It is quite true that there is no National League in that district, and why? Because the tenants dare not join it. The first case I will cite is that of a man who has held himself up to the public of England, and I believe successfully, as a model landlord. He has given evidence before the Commission of the most extraordinary and preposterous character ever placed before any inquiry. That gentleman is Mr. A. M. Kavanagh; and, when called upon to give evidence, he asked the permission of the Commissioners to deliver his evidence without being questioned. The result was a political harangue, extending over seven or eight columns, in which he denounced the late Government, the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and the Land Act, and declared he would give no abatement of rent, because none was required. That was his evidence before the Commission; but what happened? As ill luck would have it, the Land Commission went to Loughrea the other day and reduced some of this gentleman's rents. Among the reductions were, £17 17s. to £8. That was in the case of Thomas Haynes; in the case of Michael Comerford, the reduction was from £44 to £30; Michael Murphy, £14 to £7 15s.; and in other cases, £25 to £17, £13 to £8 15s., and £2 to 12s. 6d. This landlord of £20,000 a-year actually charged for a small holding £2, although the Land Commission said it was only worth 12s. 6d. No wonder Mr. Kavanagh denounced the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian; for that right hon. Gentleman had exposed to the world the infamy of the conduct of one who had hitherto postured before the country as a humane and honourable landlord. Mr. Kavanagh was asked whether, in these rents, there was included any interest on improvements made by the landlord. "No," he replied; "in this country it is quite the other way;" by which he meant that all the improvements were made by the tenants. Passing on, I come to another head of the landlord party. The landlords have been getting into a great deal of trouble lately, and the reason is because many people want to ask—"Why do not a large number of the tenants go into the Land Courts?" The answer is—"Because they dare not go in." If they had, they would have been sued for the hanging gale and for the arrears; they would have had their turf taken from them; they would have been appealed against and dragged from Court to Court at great expense. It is only recently that the landlords have become terrified by the Plan of Campaign, and that the tenants on the worst estates have received relief by plucking up courage to go into Court. I next come to another good landlord, who has not been found out until just lately. Lord Courtown is at the head of the Property Defence Association, and reductions have been made on Lord Courtown's property as follows:—From £52 to £38, £19 to £11, £15 8s. 6d. to £8, £67 to £31, £16 to £8 15s., and £28 to £14 15s. There is also a long list more. Had Lord Courtown been in this House, he, too, would have repudiated the charge of exacting exorbitant rents. Yet these are the men who the landlords of Ireland have not been ashamed to put forward as the champions of their class, and who last autumn would have persisted in declaring that rents were not too high. Why have not they chosen men like Mr. Thomas Tighe? Because such men will not do the dirty work which these associations require to be done. I have referred to the Land Corporation, and to the Property Defence Association, which have been established for the protection of landlords. But there is a third association of the kind—the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union—which has flooded the country with a greater number of lies than has ever been previously circulated. That association was founded for the purpose of proving that the great mass of the Irish tenantry were inhuman and discontented without reason; but its action from beginning to end has been a gross libel on the Irish people at large. At its head is a noble Lord who was once a Member of this House—Lord Castletown—and, unfortunately for him, some of his tenants recently went into the Land Court. When hon. Gentlemen knew the reductions that were made by the Court on Lord Castletown's estate, they will easily understand how it is that the Loyal and Patriotic Union spent so much money. It is because they have a class interest to defend. Their object is not the Union of the two countries; it is to stave off, if possible, the destruction of their rack-renting system, and to cover the exposure that is being made of the infamous way in which, as landlords, they have treated the people of Ireland. In Lord Castle-town's case, the reductions from the old rent were £10 to new rent £5; from £28 to £13 10s.; from £30 to £22; from £41 to £29; from £478 to £330; from £4 1s. to £2 10s.; from £18 to £10. Here is a pretty state of things for the head of the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union, which flooded the country with its boasts! Is that state of things creditable to the noble Lord? If, in speaking at this length, I can bring home to the minds of the people of England what is the real motive of these Gentlemen who talk about their preparedness to make sacrifices, I shall be content. Sacrifices forsooth! I challenge any Member of the Government to lay a finger on any single sacrifice that has ever been made by any Irish landlord for any purpose except the recovery of his own rent. So far from making sacrifices, these noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen of the Union were the very people who were not ashamed to come over from Ireland and ask the Lord Mayor of London to help them. Yet those very men are ready, and do not hesitate, to reproach me and my Colleagues of the National League, because, as they say, we were not ashamed to accept the earnings of the evicted tenants in America, and to be the instruments, as I am proud to be, of carrying out their wishes. At least, the Nationalist Party do not take anything from Englishmen. Nor, as a matter of fact, do we beg from our own flesh and blood. The money is forced upon us, poured out upon us by all classes in America to forward the cause of Irish freedom. To beg from Englishmen is reserved for the Irish rack-renting landlords, and Englishmen, if they knew the truth, would rather give to any object under the sun than to that. Make sacrifices? Why so demoralized have those men become, that they will not make any sacrifice even for themselves. Their rentals, in the aggregate, amount to £10,000,000 a-year; and how much does the House think they subscribe to the Tenure and Property Defence Association? Why, they subscribed last year only £3,000. And yet that Association talked to the English people of being turned out of Ireland penniless, and openly begged of them for help. That was the revenue of the Association for last year, and the banking account was overdrawn, so that they had to come to London to beg for aid. In contrast to this, I can tell the House that the poor tenants of Ireland subscribed £14,000 last year to their organization, while the rent-roll of these men who subscribed £3,000 only for theirs, was £10,000,000. No, those men will make no sacrifice for no principle and no object except that of collecting their rents and filling their own pockets. As a class, they care nothing for the Union; their pockets are their chief consideration; and if the House were foolish enough to allow them to take large sums out of the Treasury of England, they will desert Ireland and the Unionist cause, and they will abandon Ireland to the Nationalists, and leave them absolute masters of the field. As to the general policy of the Government for settling the Irish Question, I maintain that if we pass a Coercion Bill we must abandon purchase. I have no objection to a system of purchase, if it is made perfectly free. For a fair purchase, the first necessity is that the tenant should be free, and the price moderate and reasonable. If a Coercion Bill is passed, I will make it my business to go to the people of England, and warn them all through the country against advancing a single shilling to the Irish tenant for purchase. Speaking as an Irishman and knowing my countrymen, I will tell the English people that Irishmen will honourably pay back every shilling advanced to them by way of loan, so long as there is a firm and free bargain; but that it will be a dangerous thing to the Irish people, and to the English Exchequer, to carry out a system of purchase under a Coercion Bill. It will be madness on the part of the English taxpayers to consent to any purchase scheme while a Coercion Act is in force. Here is, by way of illustration, a case which has occurred under the Plan of Campaign, which I had had the privilege of putting in force.

MR. SPEAKER said, it would be travelling wide of the question to discuss the details of a purchase scheme on the Motion to bring in a Bill to amend the Criminal Law.

MR. DILLON: I recognize the propriety of the interruption, and will not pursue that part of the subject. I have addressed the House at greater length than I am in the habit of doing; but I believe it was impossible to overrate the gravity of the crisis. There can be no doubt that we have once more arrived at what the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has once described as the "parting of the ways." On one hand, there is a road which will lead inevitably to a repetition of all the miseries and troubles through which the country has passed for the last 87 years. On the other is a road which will lead to a speedy termination of all these troubles, and to a reconciliation which many believed to be impossible a few years ago. The inconsistency of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) in supporting this policy of coercion is astounding. It was only on the 9th of April last that the right hon. Gentleman said that the cause which made the recrudescence of crime in Ireland possible was the agrarian situation, and if the cause could be got out of the way, there would be nothing to justify recourse to coercive measures; and the right hon. Gentleman added that he would bring in a Bill to stay evictions for six months, and to provide for the settlement of arrears. What has occurred since the 9th of April to alter the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman? Why does he go away from those words now, and thus do violence to the teaching and principles of his past life and of his Party? There is not a single fact bearing on the case which was not known in April last. The only strong cases now brought forward date back to 1885, and the beginning of 1886. It is inexplicable that the right hon. Member should recede from that declaration, and should support a Motion which will put off for some time the possible reconciliation of the people of the two countries. For my part—for our part—it will be the duty of Irish Members to resist this measure in a way that the Rules of Parliament will permit of our doing. I believe we shall be supported in that resistance by the entire body of the Liberal Party and by the people of England. If the Bill passes, in spite of the utmost exertions we can make, I, on my part, shall continue to carry on the Plan of Campaign in Ireland. I do not care whether the Government try me in Dublin or at the Old Bailey—I will only say this, that if you succeed, by the aid of packed juries, in convicting me and putting me in prison, on your heads be the crimes and the horrors of the situation that will ensue.

Mr. Dillon

Mr. HALDANE (Haddington): The language in which the Chief Secretary for Ireland introduced this Bill, the nature of the charges which he has launched against the Irish people, and the temper with which those charges have been brought forward, illustrate the passionate inconsiderateness with which Englishmen, at certain times, approach the consideration of the Irish problem. We, at least, of the Liberal Party, with all our failings and with all the mistakes which we have committed, have learned one thing. We have learned that hysterical legislation cannot affect the consequences of acts the nature of which we have long since come to understand. The proposals now placed before us are so remarkable and of a stringency so extraordinary as almost to take one's breath away. I do not deny that there might be a state of things for which so extraordinary a proposition might be necessary. It might be natural if the Executive had to deal with a small body of conspirators, systematically banding themselves together to promote acts of rapine and disorder against the general well-being. Then, indeed, a proposition such as that which the Chief Secretary has placed before the House would be necessary; but whether that is the case now is an issue which is one of fact. I base my opposition to the Bill, not upon the nature of the propositions which it contains—although of those propositions I shall have something to say before I resume my seat—not upon any suggested satisfactory condition of the Government of Ireland, because I do not think the state of Ireland at this time can be described in any respect as satisfactory; nor do I base my opposition on any general considerations, other than a broad issue of policy. The policy which Her Majesty's Government are now bringing before the House can only, from the point of view of myself and those who think with me, end in disaster to the cause of social order in Ireland and in the disgrace and humiliation of the people of this country. The Government have introduced a certain amount of confusion into the issue. They say that to refuse to pass this Bill would be to deny to the Executive the means of maintaining law and order, and of carrying out the mandate entrusted to them. That is a proposition from which I wholly and entirely dissent. In my opinion, the duty of the Executive, not only in Ireland but in every other country that exists under Constitutional Government, is to carry out the enforcement of the law without the slightest regard to the reasons upon which such law and policy have been based. Certainly that is the doctrine which I should desire to support, and the history of this country illustrates the disastrous results of any departure from it; indeed, it affords numerous instances of the evils which have resulted in times when the Crown asserted a contrary doctrine, and sought to set itself up as possessing an authority co-ordinate with, if not superior to, that of Parliament. I, for one, would be no party to challenge the policy of the Government if I thought that the outcome of that challenge was the affirmation of a doctrine which, whether maintained in the interest of the Sovereign or the subject, I trust is for ever dead. That is not the question we are here to discuss, but something entirely different. We are sitting here, not as the Executive, but as the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, to determine the nature of the law which the Executive is to enforce; and we are within our rights and privileges when we say that we will not give the further sanction of our authority to any legislation unless it involves an enforcement of a reform of the law. I desire, as far as possible, to state the case I have to make to the House with fairness. It is impossible, on a question like this, in which Parties are separated by perhaps a greater gulf than there is any instance of in the records of this country—it is impossible to approach the question before the House otherwise than in a spirit more or less partizan, but I will undertake, at least, to abstain from anything like a misrepresentation of the condition of affairs. I will endeavour to state the facts with accuracy, and to avoid imputing to hon. Members opposite any motives or purposes which they themselves would not acknowledge. I have said that the question we have to determine is one of policy. The Government have passed from stage to stage of the policy they are now asking the House to sanction in its last development with the utmost regularity. It is not unedifying to see how they have done this.

It is long since they passed the point at which the ways diverge. They have become separated from us by a gulf which is ever widening. Her Majesty's Ministers have taken upon themselves the duty of restoring social order in Ireland by means which not only deprive them of the sanction of the majority over whom they have to rule, but which are opposed to the ordinary and common instincts of those very people. We, too, had a policy of social order; we, too, have sought to restore the permanent and just administration of the law in Ireland, but we sought to do so not by means of measures passed in the teeth of the wishes of the people with whom we had to deal; but by securing, as far as we could, the sanction of popular opinion, the good wishes and good will of the Irish people, and those instincts of order which we believe to exist in Ireland as well as in any other civilized community. Her Majesty's Government have now taken upon themselves a task which certainly is a task of great difficulty, and I am afraid we are not likely soon to see the end of it. We certainly have not seen the end of our difficulties in attempting the government of Ireland. The last thing we desire, and the last thing we should seek to do, is in the slightest degree to involve the Government in embarrassment in the discharge of a duty which is almost without parallel; but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the discharge of that duty will not only involve the Government in difficulty, but cannot fail to involve this country in an embarrassment no less than that in which it will involve Ireland. Let us look at the stages through which Her Majesty's Ministers have passed in the development of their policy. They set out with a denial of the necessity of that which they have entered upon now. The way towards coercion is paved with good intentions. The path which the Government have sought to tread is a path which has been fraught at every step with difficulties which they could hardly have foreseen. In the first instance, they set out with an abjuration of the doctrine of Home Rule, and I do not expect to see them in the slightest degree deviate from that principle. But what is their position now? To begin with, they find themselves face to face with the necessity of restoring social order in Ireland.

their own theory upon that subject, and they have announced that the absence of social order is due to the absence of prosperity and contentment in that country. Now in that idea is there not something like a confusion between cause and effect? We have heard, in the annals of civilization, of good government preceding contentment and happiness; but I do not think we have ever heard of contentment and happiness preceding good government? You cannot restore the one unless you take upon yourselves to secure the other. The Government, feeling the difficulty of their position, set out with the purpose of devising a policy which might assist them in compassing their object. Finding they did not possess knowledge sufficient to enable them to accomplish their object, they invented a policy of Commissions. Undoubtedly, there was a certain amount of wisdom in that. It was necessary for the Government, in order to satisfy the Irish people, to discover and ascertain the mode in which the Irish people were to be satisfied. But the Irish peasant was hungry. It is all very well to inaugurate a policy of Commissions, but a policy of that kind takes time, and you were required to legislate immediately—to deal with a case of social order as best you might. To undertake reforms in the law was no doubt part of the duty of the Government; but the Government forgot that their policy was essentially a policy which must take time. On their accession to Office they committed the fatal mistake of simply rejecting the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), forgetting that a policy, which in its place might be wise, might not be successful under circumstances which brooked no delay. That brought them to Policy No. 2. The late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) found it necessary, for the purpose of keeping up a condition of affairs that was found intolerable, to put pressure on the landlords of Ireland; but he forgot that Ireland was a country in which the people identified the landlords, in their own minds, with all that is most hateful—that it is a country where the necessity was recognized of the Government of the day ranging themselves on one side or the other; and a country which was accustomed to recognize the Government almost as a matter of course as ranging themselves on the side of the landlords. Her Majesty's Ministers forgot that they had to make an election on one side or the other; that they could not ride two horses at once, and conciliate the landlords and the tenants as well. The late Chief Secretary endeavoured to do something for the tenants, and he attempted to bring pressure to bear upon the landlords; but the tenants would not have it, nor would the landlords. They objected to a half-and-half policy, and called upon the late Chief Secretary to do one thing or the other. The consequence was that he failed. It was that circumstance which brought the Government to Policy No. 3—the policy which they are now introducing. It was necessary to take steps for insisting on the restoration of the observance of the law. The state of Ireland was a state which certainly admitted of only one verdict. That state was really—I will not say deplorable—but a condition of things in which it was necessary, and above all things essential, that some firm course of administration should be entered upon. Accordingly, the Government have entered upon such a course. We have heard to-night the propositions which have been placed before us by the Chief Secretary, and of which I took a rough note; propositions which can only be described as drastic in their stringency. Before you can form an opinion upon these propositions it is necessary that you should look at the existing condition of Ireland. The real Government of Ireland is at this moment in the hands of the National League. You have got before you the lamentable spectacle of a conflict between the de jure and the de facto Government—of the Representatives in Dublin Castle of the Treasury Bench at Westminster carrying on a feeble and somewhat spasmodic struggle with the irresistible influence of an organisation which is flourishing in every part of the country. The reason is not far to seek. The reason is that the National League exists because it is the real representative of the opinions of the majority of the Irish people. The issue, Sir, is one of fact. I, for one, do not like to learn that a rival to the Government exists; but, before suppressing it, there is a necessity for inquiring into the causes which account for its being there. I listened to a speech which was made the other night by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay). I have listened to-night to the speech of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and the view which my hon. and learned Friend took of the functions of the League was practically the view subsequently taken by the Chief Secretary—namely, that it is in itself essentially a secret society, enforcing its mandates by means of Boycotting, and enforcing Boycotting by means and artifices of a secret, violent, and highly criminal nature. Is that a view of the operations of the National League which is founded on fact? Is it a view which anybody would arrive at who considers the existing condition of Ireland? You have only to read the columns of United Ireland to find the doings of the League proclaimed in the light of day in every township and every district of the country. My hon. and learned Friend stated that the doings of the League are doings that are enforced by Boycotting. Undoubtedly they have been enforced by Boycotting; but how came they to be enforced in that way? It is because in Ireland Boycotting is the only way of getting out of the difficulties imposed by the carrying out of an unjust and unnecessary policy. You talk of the National League Party encouraging outrage; but what is the evidence of your own witnesses? Take that of Captain Considine—a gentleman who is certainly not likely to be prejudiced in favour of the League. You will find in the evidence of that gentleman a statement that the efforts of the League have been for 12 months past directed to putting down, as far as possible, crime and outrage. Perhaps Kerry is a county where you have more crime and outrage than in any other. It is said to be the principal centre of disturbance; and it is notorious that it is the district where the National League is less powerful than anywhere else. I know that hon. Gentlemen opposite feel most strongly on the subject of the issue in this case; but how is it possible for you to cure the existing state of things? How are Her Majesty's Government going to substitute for what is undoubtedly the de facto Government of Ireland a de jure Government, which I should certainly like to see established there, and which ought to be there, carrying on its work with the goodwill and assent of the general mass of the Irish people? The question is, how are you to make up your minds as to the meaning of this great popular movement? There may have been mistakes made in questions such as these before now. There has been no one who has been more uniformly wrong in his opposition to all popular movements than the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No man has formed judgments more adverse to popular movements than the right hon. Gentleman. I know that the right hon. Gentleman is a man of the highest integrity. I know that he is a man who would form no judgment as part of a conclusion at which he had arrived unless he believed that that judgment and conclusion were arrived at on proper and sufficient grounds. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a man whose judgment has often been wrong; he was wrong about the extension of the franchise in counties, and he became from the opinion which he formed on that question a political Ismaelite. I believe that there are not a dozen hon. Gentlemen opposite who will now express an opinion that the extension of the franchise which was made in that direction was an unwise one, and I say that the great question before us now is one which has to be decided on considerations of a precisely similar character. I now come to summarize the objections which I take to the Bill which has been shadowed forth by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. I am afraid that my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General will have his work cut out for him. The Bill certainly has its extraordinary—I might almost say its comic—aspects. I can well conceive my hon. and learned Friend meeting the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland and discussing evidence he had never seen, and upon the nature of which he has had no opportunity of forming a judgment, for the purpose of removing some trial from Ireland to this House. How is any Attorney General to form a judgment upon a matter of that kind? How is any man who does not know Ireland to form a judgment whether a particular trial ought to be removed or not? There is, however, something more. The Chief Secretary told us that the Bill is twofold. In the first place, it is to secure evidence; in the second, to secure verdicts; and he hoped by the Bill to be able to accomplish both of those objects. Now, how does he propose to obtain evidence? He re-adopts a provision which was originally contained in the Crimes Act brought in in 1882. No doubt that provision was not without its use. It was a provision which served, at all events, to obtain a certain amount of evidence which at the time was sufficient; but the circumstances under which the same provision is brought forward now are very different. Under no circumstances can you now count on being able to obtain satisfactory evidence in Ireland. You cannot do without evidence in Ireland unless you are prepared to carry on the business of the law by means of a drumhead court-martial, which is the only tribunal which would act without evidence. Then, again, how are you to obtain a verdict? There is a simple way of doing it. You may obtain it by constituting the tribunal in a particular way—a tribunal, for instance, which will act without that evidence which the law prescribes as necessary; but this Bill does not provide that. It is all very well to appoint magistrates with summary jurisdiction; but how are they to act? They cannot act without evidence, and the difficulty will be, as it has been in the past, in obtaining that evidence. So far as I can see, Her Majesty's Government have not advanced one step in the direction of obtaining evidence. There are a number of most extraordinary proposals put forward in the Bill. There is a proclamation of dangerous associations. How far is that to be carried? I presume that it means the immediate extinction of the National League. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] Well, you will extinguish the National League, and you will have to reckon with the consequences of your act. You will have to reckon with having driven agitation, which is now above-board, beneath the surface; and the effect of your legislation will be the formation once more of those secret societies which have been the curse of Ireland. We have been in hopes we might get rid of those secret societies for ever; but if the propositions of the Government are brought forward for bolstering up a bad land system they will inevitably result in the revival of secret societies. Much has been said about injustice to landlords. No doubt there have been instances of the most cruel injustice to landlords; but I am afraid that for one case of injustice to a landlord there have been 100 cases of injustice not less cruel, and not less disastrous to tenants. I admit that the condition of many Irish landlords is deplorable; but they are suffering from the system which now exists. For the rack-renting landlord who oppresses his tenants we can have no pity; but for other landlords we feel very great sympathy indeed, and if they are to be got rid of they must be got rid of on just terms. Some of those who have been returned to this House—and I am one of them—would only allow ourselves to be elected not only on the terms that we should be free to support a Land Bill analogous to that brought in by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone); but also that we should be free to support any other Bill which might be brought in by any Government—whether Liberal or Conservative—which proposed to deal with the matter on a just and rightful basis, without interfering in an inequitable manner with the tenants, and without doing anything that might unduly jeopardize or prejudice the interests of the British taxpayer. Let Her Majesty's Government bring forward such a measure, apart from any other measure, and I, for one, promise them that upon such a subject—a subject which is far too important to allow Party considerations to intervene—I will do my best to support any proposal they may submit to the House so long as it is framed in accordance with the ordinary conditions of prudence. There is, however, another reason which induces me to oppose the Bill which the Government have announced. I am prepared to oppose it because I believe it is a measure which will prove to be utterly useless. It is a Bill of which, stringent as it may be—and it is stringent to a degree that is appalling—it is not difficult to prophesy that it will be enforced with a hand more unsparing in its rigidity and its intensity than that with which the measure of 1882 was administered by Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan. What was the effect of that measure? No doubt a certain amount of crime was put down; but at what cost? You turned nearly the whole of Ireland into a condition of irritation, and made the people prepared to resist, almost to the last drop of their blood, a policy you are now seeking to revive. You made Ireland far more Nationalist than ever it had been before. Every Town Council, every Local Board, every popular assemblage in three of her Provinces declared in favour of the Nationalist cause. The influence of the National League was even felt in Ulster, where there were signs of the people stepping forward and taking part in the operations of the Land League with the rest of the Irish people. Every popular body took sides with what became, from that moment, the Nationalist cause. If that were so under the Bill to which I refer, how much more will it not be the case under the Bill which Her Majesty's Government propose to introduce; every line of which is calculated to make the Irish people hate this country and the administration of its laws far more bitterly, and with greater intensity and a greater sense of injustice, than was even the Crimes Act of 1882? I object to the Bill because it appears to me to be the necessary and logical outcome of a bad policy. I think that the bringing forward of this measure became an absolutely necessary step with the policy inaugurated by the Government last year. The evil was committed then, when they pledged themselves to oppose Home Rule in any shape or form; and we who cannot support them in that—we who are pledged to bring about a state of things in which the Government of Ireland may be carried on in different lines—are only acting with consistency when we declare that we will oppose this Bill in every shape, in every form, and from every point which the Rules of Debate in this House will permit. We have been taunted to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary with leaving the attack on this Bill in the hands of an Opposition which he said is not the regular Opposition. I deny that the Opposition to which the right hon. Gentleman referred is not the regular Opposition. For the purpose of opposition to this measure we are one. One Party is not fighting less stringently or less earnestly than the other. You have accused the Irish Members repeatedly of having violated every Rule of this House. Perhaps your accusation may not be altogether devoid of truth; but what was the occasion of it? You refused to listen to those eminent Irishmen—from Grattan down to Mr. Isaac Butt—who have addressed you in eloquent terms, and have endeavoured to obtain the redress of Irish grievances. You have refused to these men every act of justice. You refused even to consider the propositions which they have placed before you. You refused to consider their proposals until the Party came to be led by sterner men with a less rigid intention of observing the proprieties of debate. They have forced you to listen to their case. We were as wrong then as you are now, and they have compelled us to listen to the case of the Irish people. At length they have brought us to a state of things in which the Irish Party, so far from being a small minority of the House, is in alliance with the vast majority of the Liberal Party of this country. You say that we have changed our views. Yes; we have changed our views, and we have changed our policy. We have changed that policy at a moment which we believe to be not too late. We have taken up a position from which you will not drive us, either by your taunts or by any arguments you are likely to use. No doubt we—the Liberal Party—have also sinned against Ireland, but the fault we committed was committed in partial ignorance. You, however, through the medium of this monstrous Bill, and through the medium of your general policy, are about to inflict another grievous wrong upon Ireland, and for you there exists no such palliation. You will pass this Bill. [Cries of "No!" from the Irish Members.] Yes; the Bill will be passed, not by convincing argument, but by the mere weight of numbers. And, in making it a part of the law of the land, you will inflict a wrong on the Irish people, the consequences of which will only be measured by the disaster you will bring upon the administration of justice in Ireland, and the disgrace which that administration of justice in Ireland will inflict upon this country.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON (Devon, South Molton): In offering a general support to the proposals of the Government, I do not pledge myself as to the various details; but I shall rest my case not upon a question of rent, or the amount of crime, but on the plain duty—I may even say the honourable trust—which I feel is reposed in every Unionist Member of this House to support the only possible Unionist Government in enforcing the authority of the law, and securing to every Irish fellow-subject the absolute protection of the laws of the British Parliament. I am willing to confess that the outward and visible condition of crime, although by no means satisfactory, is not so serious as has been the case when former Coercion Bills have been introduced into this House. But the explanation is clear, although I am bound to say that it is not a very satisfactory one. In former times the forces of anarchy, when those forces were represented by Fenianism, by the Land League, or by the National League, were struggling for mastery in Ireland. To-day—I am ashamed to say so—the forces of anarchy are the masters of Ireland. Outrages are no longer necessary. And why are they no longer necessary? To quote the words of Sir Redvers Buller, “intimidation is rampant” in that country. Sir Redvers Buller was asked by Lord Cowper, “Are the tenants afraid of the League?” and the reply of Sir Redvers Buller was “Yes; they are coerced by the League; they are in fear of the intimidation which is rampant in the country.” These are the words of Sir Redvers Buller, whose evidence has been much quoted by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, and especially by the Irish Members. It is not the quality nor the quantity of crime. What necessitates the proposal of Her Majesty’s Government is the plain, avowed, and self-evident fact, which it does not require Blue Books to prove or disprove, that law and order are in abeyance in Ireland; and that while the Government de jure is that of the Queen, the Government de facto is that of the League. That is the position which we have to confront. It is a position in which the Unionist Party cannot acquiesce. I make no complaint of, and I bring no charges against, the Irish Party. They, at least, have played their part in this controversy and in this struggle with determination and with courage. I listened, as I always do, with great respect to the speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), and I felt that the sentiments of that speech constituted, if there had been no speech at all from the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant,

the strongest reason and claim for the stringent powers which have been asked for on the part of the Government. The Irish Members and the Irish Party are not afraid of using force. They believe in coercion. They are willing and are ready to employ coercion to coerce the tenants into performing the part they wish them to play in this contest, and they know that they must employ force, and sustain the application of force, to enforce the duty that was preached by the hon. Member for North Wexford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), and which sums up the whole principle of the policy and attitude of the Home Rule Party in this House. Speaking at Chicago, the hon. Member said—

“The duty of the moment is clear. I assert here to-day that the government of Ireland by England is an impossibility, and I believe it to be our duty to make it so.”

[Cheers from the Irish Members.] Quite so; that was most admirably expressed by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): Why do not you read on?

VISCOUNT LYNDINGTON: There is no necessity. That is perfectly clear from the Separatist point of view. For my own part, I do not believe that the English people are inclined to be over squeamish as to the means or manner in which they assert the authority of the law in Ireland. I think they have stronger nerves than is supposed by many Gentlemen who claim to represent them in this House. At least I am certain that what would discredit the Unionist Government, and not only the Unionist Government, but what would destroy once for all the Unionist Cause, would be for the Unionist Party to accept a tacit surrender and tacit acquiescence in anarchy. We have never surrendered Imperial interests to the arguments of despair and the forces of anarchy, and while we refuse to the Irish the right to misgovern themselves, we cannot, at the same time, refuse to govern Ireland ourselves. As long as there is a Unionist Party in the House and the country, it is our first, our foremost, and our primary duty to take every measure, whatever it may be, to prove to the English people that the government of Ireland by England is not an impossibility. But, Sir, I make no apologies for supporting coercion. And more than that, I say that unless we are prepared to accept the doctrine of separation, we must in some form or other accept the right of coercion. For separation, complete, frank, and openly avowed, there is something to be said. In this case, Irish Gentlemen, I should hope, would depart in peace, and English and Scotch Members would at least be left in this House in peace. But any intermediate policies, such as the respective plans of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), must involve some sort of contract between Parliament and the Irish people; and experience has shown that whenever the terms of a contract are distasteful to the Irish people they do not hesitate to repudiate that contract. They are not hesitating to day in regard to the judicial rents—a contract only made five years ago. They are not hesitating to exercise the full pressure they can bring to bear on Parliament in order to get Parliament to upset that contract.

AN HON. MEMBER: What does your own Commissioner report? What does Sir Redvers Buller say?

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON: I will come presently to Sir Redvers Buller. I should have thought that the Prime Minister would have had some feeling of regard for a Parliamentary contract which he was instrumental in getting Parliament to accept five years ago. [AN HON. MEMBER: The late Prime Minister.] Yes; the right hon. Gentleman is not Prime Minister now, owing to the exertions of hon. Members sitting on this side of the House. But supposing the policy of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian had been accepted by the House; supposing that the Imperial Parliament had imposed upon Ireland the tribute which was to exist under his Home Rule Bill, or that it had imposed upon the Irish tenants the obligation of paying to the Receiver General the instalments under his land purchase scheme; if it is wrong for the Government to apply coercion and to resist interference with the judicial rents—I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be equally wrong, equally immoral, and equally unjustifiable to have insisted upon the Parliamentary contracts entered into under his Home Rule Bill, and under his land purchase scheme? The rents which are denounced by the right hon. Gentleman and his Followers are not the rents of Irish landlords in the sense that they are rents fixed by them. The rights which the Irish landlords possess are not the old rights which they once possessed—the full and absolute right of confiscating their tenants' improvements. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) quoted a saying of Lord Clarendon, in which he described the Irish landlords as "felonious landlords." That expression was uttered many years ago; it was uttered before the legislation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. In those days that statement would have been accurate and natural; but circumstances are now changed. [MR. T. M. HEALY: Not at all.] I say that the circumstances are completely changed. I challenge Sir Redvers Buller—who made a perfectly wild and reckless statement when he said that whatever law there is in Ireland is on the side of the rich—I challenge Sir Redvers Buller, or any Gentleman in this House, to tell me of any country in the world where the occupiers of the soil possess advantages equal to or greater than those possessed by the Irish tenants. They have fixity of tenure, fair rents, compensation for disturbance, and free sale; and I should like to know from hon. Gentlemen what greater boons any Parliament could confer upon any tenantry in the world. But, Sir, there is another charge, and perhaps a greater one—one, at least, which carries with it great weight. We are told by the opponents of coercion that the whole history of coercion has been a failure. We are told that, whatever may be the necessities, whatever the conditions of Ireland, it has been proved by experience repeatedly and over and over again that coercion has failed. Well, many things have happened since 1846, and even since 1881. At the present moment the balance of Parties in this House is not held by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) but by the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington). The noble Lord holds the balance of power in this House, and in many constituencies in England. [AN HON. MEMBER: But not of his own constituency if he will try it again.] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian expressed a wish at one time that the Liberal Party should be able to settle the Irish Question independently of the Irish vote. That wish is, perhaps, now realized, though doubtless in a different sense and with a different intention from that which the right hon. Gentleman supposed or wished for; because to-day a Party exists in this House and in the country which is pledged as strongly as any Party can be to subordinate all their minor Party considerations to the supreme question of maintaining the Parliamentary union between England and Ireland. Then, Sir, another great change has taken place. Coercion is no longer a weapon open to the old objections. Coercion is no longer a weapon to enable unprincipled landlords to extract from oppressed tenants exorbitant rents. If coercion has failed in the past, I would ask hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House whether their remedial legislation has been so eminently successful? I myself am one of those who still believe in the value and in the advantages of the Land Act of 1881. I supported that Act in Parliament, and I still believe—and believe most earnestly and strongly—that the Act has conferred enormous boons on the Irish tenantry. That it has been desirable and necessary has been proved by the large reductions in rent which have been made by the Land Commissioners. I will go further, and say that that remedial legislation would have proved successful—and successful in its political effects—if hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway had allowed it to be so. If the remedial legislation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has failed, it has failed not because it has been bad, not because it has not been wanted, not because it has not conferred great boons upon the Irish tenantry, but because the right hon. Gentleman has never been able to resist that coercion which the Irish people have been able to put upon him to invalidate and destroy the effects of his own legislation. The Land Act has failed, and we are driven to the last resort—a large scheme of purchase to buy out the Irish landlords. What scheme that could ever be devised is likely to succeed until law and order are restored? Why is it that the vast majority of sales under Lord Ashbourne's Act have taken place in Ulster, where the landlords are not particularly anxious to sell? And why is it that in the other parts of Ireland, where the landlords have offered every facility to tenants to purchase their holdings, they do not take advantage of Lord Ashbourne's Act? [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Hear, hear!] The hon. and learned Gentleman says "Hear, hear!" I am afraid the explanation is that the tenantry in the South and West of Ireland have been constantly and insidiously indoctrinated with the belief that a little more pressure put upon the landlords—a little further delay—and they will get the land at prairie value, perhaps at less than prairie value; for under the Plan of Campaign, which has received the sanction of Gentlemen sitting on the Front Opposition Bench, an Irish tenant enjoys, I am bound to say, the unique position, enjoyed by no other man in the world, of having all the advantages with none of the burdens of ownership. The tenant is himself at once the judge and jury as to what rent he should pay. [An Irish MEMBER: Why not?] An hon. Member says "Why not?" From a tenant's point of view that remark can be appreciated. If I were an Irish tenant, of course, I should infinitely prefer the opportunity of discriminating whether I should pay my rent at all; but my point is that unless you can get the Irish tenantry to rely upon the law of this country as a basis of order and good government, no remedy which can ever be propounded by Parliament can possibly succeed, for no remedial legislation, however generous or beneficial, can possibly compete with the Socialistic advantages offered by the Irish Party. How can you expect any people to suffer the delay of remedial legislation which is to be obtained from Parliament, when they can take the law into their own hands and give effect once for all to their own remedies? I should like, Sir, in regard to this question of purchase, to revert again to a statement made by Sir Redvers Buller. He was asked by Mr. Neligan—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must remind the noble Lord that the question of purchase has no connection with the immediate discussion before the House, which is the introduction of this Bill.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON: I am sorry, Sir, that I should have trespassed beyond the limits of this discussion. I was anxious to show that remedial legislation is impossible without some reserved power of coercion. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) said, a few days ago, that—

“He thought no case could be pointed out in which a democratic Government had succeeded in coercing into friendship and love another nationality which formed a part of the same democracy.”

And then, speaking of the case of the American Rebellion, he said—

“They (the Northern States) then, with the characteristic practical good sense of the American, at last changed their course, and in 1876 President Hayes withdrew the Northern Armies from the South, genuine self-government was restored, and from that time till now the Southern States had been a perfectly satisfactory and well-governed country.”

Of course, no one ever heard of an individual or a State being coerced into love; but if my hon. Friend meant that no State has ever been coerced, by a democratic Government, into obeying laws not of their own making, I cannot agree with him, and I assure him that he is greatly mistaken. If the House will allow me, I should like to answer his allusion to the Southern States. The hon. Member for Aberdeen ought to know that the military Governments of which he spoke were a temporary measure, and that the Southern States came back into the Union, not by the exercise of self-government, but under the authority of the American Congress, in which they were not represented, and under Acts which their people had no part in enacting. My hon. Friend spoke of Tennessee, and, making his own history as he went along, he led the House to suppose that Tennessee had come back as an ordinary self-governing State into the American Union after, and not until after, President Hayes withdrew the Northern armies from the South in 1876.

MR. SHIRLEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster): Is the noble Lord in Order in referring to a speech made in this House in another debate during the present Session?

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord, I imagine, is referring to a speech in what may almost be called a stage of the Bill now under discussion, and I cannot rule that he is out of Order.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON: Before I was interrupted I was referring to the point made by the hon. Member for Aberdeen in regard to the case of Tennessee. I was remarking that the hon. Member seemed to suppose that Tennessee came back into the Union as an ordinary self-governing State after the Northern Armies were withdrawn from the South in 1876. As a matter of fact, Tennessee came back into the American Union under the Imperial Act of a foreign Congress in July, 1866. [An hon. MEMBER: Not a foreign Congress.] It was a foreign Congress in the sense that Tennessee was not represented. Again, to touch upon this question of American Home Rule; and, again, to show that the American democracy did not hesitate to exercise the right of coercion, the Reconstruction Acts of the American Congress, which over-rode the self-government of the Southern nationalities, to quote the words of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, were sustained by the Supreme Court in the celebrated case of “Texas v. White,” seven years before the withdrawal of Northern troops referred to by the hon. Member. In that case (1869) the American Supreme Court held that the ordinances of secession passed by the Southern nationalities had been absolutely null, that the seceding States had never been out of the Union, though the Home Rulers of every one of those nationalities had voted them out of the Union; and that during and after the rebellion they had no Governments competent to represent those States in their relations with the National Government. The extent to which coercion was applied by the democratic Government of the United States to compel these seceding nationalities into friendship and love was signally illustrated in the case of the wealthiest of the Southern States—Georgia. That State, after the defeat of the rebellion, passed laws, in the exercise of her perfectly Constitutional Home Rule, declaring negroes incapable of holding office, and refused to ratify, as she was legally entitled to do, a certain Amendment—the 15th—to the American Constitution. For this the American Congress refused her people their right to be represented at Washington; nor was that right allowed until Georgia had been coerced into revoking her State laws and ratifying the objectionable Amendment in 1870. So much, then, for the case of American Home Rule. The whole history of the treatment of the South by the North, the whole conduct of the American democracy in asserting the authority of the Union, is in distinct and absolute favour of the unquestionable and unquestioned right of every democracy, and a proof that a democracy can exercise the most powerful, potent, and stern coercion. As it is with the American people, so I believe it to be with the English people. I grant that they are radical in their sympathies, that they are deeply impressed with the necessity of far-reaching, far-searching reforms; but they have no sympathy with disorder or with outrage. They love their own freedom; they love their own Parliament. I believe they are disgusted at the conspiracy—I can call it nothing else—which is attempting inside the walls of this House to paralyze our Business.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I rise to Order. With great respect to the noble Lord, I wish to ask whether it is in Order to speak of a conspiracy within the walls of this House?

MR. SPEAKER: Conspiracy of the kind referred to is a very strong expression for the noble Lord to use. If it was applied to any section of the House, I think the noble Lord will feel that he ought to withdraw the expression.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON: I will apologize to the hon. and learned Member for having offended his very delicate sensibilities—[“Withdraw!”]—and assure him that my remarks had no special reference to him. My experience in addressing public meetings is that the people of this country are beginning to regard with impatience what must appear to them to be the unjustifiable means of standing between the vast majority of the House, who are sent here to represent them with the distinct and definite object of carrying on, first and foremost, the Business of Parliament, and effecting, first and foremost, the vindication of law and order in Ireland. In conclusion, let me say a few words in reply to a taunt which was addressed pointedly to myself and to other Gentlemen who sit on the Opposition side of the House. It has been repeatedly said that the clamour for coercion comes from those who have not the courage to sit side by side with those with whom they act. [“Hear, hear!” from the Irish Members.] Quite so; we are looking for the example to be set by the Party which is led by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. If my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale is the master of the Cabinet, the master of the Opposition is the hon. Member for Cork. The Liberal Unionist alliance on that point with the Conservative Party is an open and avowed alliance, an alliance of which we are not ashamed. The noble Marquess at the head of the Government and the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale at the commencement of this alliance stood shoulder to shoulder at one of the largest public meetings ever held in London; and I challenge the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian to stand shoulder to shoulder at any great English meeting on an English platform with the master of his policy, the hon. Member for Cork. And, Sir, I maintain, apart from other questions and other considerations, that the Liberal Unionists have as good and as unquestioned a right to sit on these Benches as any Member of the Party led by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. We have surrendered no opinion—no Radical, no Liberal opinion—what we have not surrendered are our own convictions and our own independence; we have only surrendered minor and Party considerations to the supreme question of the hour—the question of the Union. Whatever our fate may be, and wherever we may sit in the House, I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite and hon. Members around me that we shall not be influenced by taunts; but that we shall be guided by the single desire to preserve unimpaired, and at all costs, the full and absolute supremacy, in all parts of Her Majesty's Dominions, of Imperial law and Imperial authority.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): Sir, I scarcely think that the Government are to be congratulated on the only defence that has been heard tonight of their policy, and still less do I think that the Liberal Unionist Party are to be congratulated on their spokesman. The Government are not happy in their defenders, for during the long and somewhat tiresome speech we have just listened to, there has been no argument on the question before the House—namely, the introduction of the Coercion Bill. The Liberal Unionists are scarcely to be congratulated, because I think the noble Lord, in the first sentence of his speech, put their position in a far too candid way for their feelings or their prospects. The noble Lord, according to his own statement, is going to support this Bill, not in consequence of the figures in connection with agrarian outrage—not in consequence of the movement for a reduction of rent—but he and his fellow-Liberal Unionists are going to support it because they think that by opposing it they might dislodge the present Government from power. The speech of the noble Lord is a repetition of the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) some time ago, when he said that he would vote in favour of no proposal which would have the effect of dislodging the present Cabinet from the Government Bench. I do not think I should be doing justice to myself, or the subject under discussion, if I were to dwell for a single moment longer on the speech of the noble Lord. Sir, there are circumstances connected with the introduction of this Bill which distinguish it from every proposal for coercion which has been made in recent years in this House. This is the third Coercion Bill which has been proposed during the six years I have sat as a Member of this House; and, Mr. Speaker, I may truly say that, bitter and humiliating as has been the work of an Irish Nationalist during those years, there has been no part of that work so absolutely hateful as being compelled to rise here time after time to protest against the suspension of the Constitution of his country by men whose minds have been made up beforehand on the subject, and who have been less guided by considerations of national equity than by considerations of Party exigency and discipline. Up to the present moment there has been no single subject of domestic or foreign concern on which men of different English Parties and the most widely divergent political views have been able to agree, save and except only the passage of coercive legislation for Ireland. I rejoice to think that that day has passed; and that we have had, with regard to this Bill, a noticeable departure from the experience of the past. We have now before us the spectacle of the Liberal Party standing forward as the defenders of Irish liberties. That example must exercise an enormous influence upon the Irish people; it will teach them the lessons of patience and self-restraint in the face of terrible provocation. It will comfort them in their present hour of trial and need, and it will teach them that it will not be their fate very much longer to appeal in vain for justice either to the English Parliament or the English people. In what I have to say with regard to the introduction of this Bill—I desire to appeal to reason and argument alone, although it is difficult for an Irishman to pass by without some expression of resentment the insult to his country which is conveyed in this proposal. For my own part, I desire to treat it simply as if it were an ordinary Bill depending for its passage on the weight of reason and argument which is brought to bear in its favour. Of course, I recognize the fact that there are two kinds of coercionists in this House—two distinct classes of hon. Members, who have agreed in supporting coercive Parliamentary legislation, but who do so from very different motives, and for very widely different reasons. The arguments which must be addressed to these two classes of Members on the introduction of this Bill are, consequently, of a somewhat different character. First of all, there are those who believe that Ireland is unfit for Constitutional liberty, who regard the Irish people as irreclaimably savage and as hopelessly disloyal. Such Members support coercion on principle. They have faith in the sword; they believe that, under certain circumstances, force is a remedy. Those men are straightforward and honest—their policy is at least intelligible; and, for my part, regarding them as I do, as open foes, I have much more respect for them than I have for hon. and right hon. Members in other portions of this House, who, although they never lose an opportunity of denouncing coercion in theory, are always prepared to vote for it in practice. To those who support coercion on principle, I ask permission to submit a few questions. Do they not really think that the time is past when coercion can be looked upon as a remedy in Ireland? Is all past experience to count for nothing, and the entire history of the past to be disregarded? If coercion were a

remedy either for Irish discontent, disaffection or crime, Ireland to-day would be the most peaceable, contented, and loyal part of the Empire. Coercion has been the only policy which has been perseveringly applied to her by every English Party in turn. Eighty-six Coercion Acts in 86 years! One Coercion Act for every year since the Legislative Union. Has the result been so satisfactory? Has the condition of the country improved so much? Have the Irish people become so contented with English rule that the Government of England at this day still believe in the policy of repression? I believe that even with the English Tory Party this policy of perpetual coercion has exploded. Of one thing I am certain—namely, that those who support such a policy or principle cannot stop short at this Bill. If they hope for the success of their coercion, they must make it thorough. This Bill is drastic enough in some respects, but it is half-hearted and cowardly in other respects. I assert that if coercion is to be the method of government, you must go further than this Bill, and in the end disfranchise Ireland, and do away once and for all with this empty mockery of Constitutional Government; but though they may still be many who regard Ireland and coercion from this old-world point of view, there are few who have the courage to say so. Let me turn to the other class of hon. Members who are the professors of the doctrine that force is no remedy, and who believe that coercion is simply a hateful and desperate expedient. I admit at the outset there may be occasions on which such men might find it their duty to vote in favour of proposals of this character. Is this such an occasion? I assert that before such men can conscientiously vote in favour of such a proposal as this, it must be proved to their minds satisfactorily—first of all, that an exceptional state of violence and crime exists in Ireland to-day; secondly, that the ordinary law has absolutely broken down in its dealings with this exceptional state of violence and crime; thirdly, that the proposals which are now made are likely, judging by the history and experience of the past, to be efficacious; and fourthly, that such social disorder as does exist does not spring from the stupid and persistent refusal of the Imperial Parliament to remedy admitted grievances. Now, let me briefly take these four points in turn. Does an exceptional state of violence and crime exist in Ireland to-day? I wish, in the first place, to give a warning to English Members to be careful how they believe what they read and hear on the question of Irish outrage. There is at this moment an unscrupulous and widespread conspiracy at work, with the object of misleading English public opinion, and inducing the belief that Ireland is in an exceptionally criminal state; whereas, in reality, Ireland is comparatively tranquil. That conspiracy has its agents everywhere; in this House, and in the Press, and upon the platform, and its hand was recently detected in the columns of The Times newspaper, and more than one of its calumnies have been openly refuted within the walls of this House. The system of manufacturing bogus outrages as a preparation for Irish coercion is of very old origin. It has been at work as a preparation for every Coercion Bill which has been introduced into this House since the Union. So far back as 1814, an Irish Judge disclosed from the Bench the true nature of this conspiracy. Mr. Baron Fletcher, in charging the Grand Jury of County Wexford in 1814, spoke as follows:—

“Much exaggeration and misrepresentation have gone abroad, and the extent and causes of disturbances have been much mis-stated. Several advertisements in newspapers now before me describe this country as being in a most alarming state of disturbance; whereas the country never enjoyed more profound tranquillity. These advertisements have been, I understand, republished in the prints of Dublin and London, and have naturally excited strong sensations. It may not be uninteresting for me to explain those misrepresentations and exaggerations which have impelled the Legislature to swell the Criminal Code Session after Session with new Statutes for vindicating the peace of this country.”

Sir, these words are as true to-day as they were on the day on which they were spoken, and I call upon English Members to take their facts about Irish outrage and crime, not from platform statements of Unionist or Tory orators in Ireland or in England, not from the statements in Unionist or Tory prints in Ireland or in England; but from the hard figures of the official Returns, and from these alone. Now, Sir, I do not hesitate to say that at the present moment, and for a considerable time past, agrarian outrages in Ireland have been considerably below what I may be forgiven in calling their normal average. It is a significant commentary on the character of the land system which you have maintained in Ireland, that from the very first it has been associated with agrarian crime. The numbers of these crimes have risen and fallen from time to time, but the crimes have never, under your land system, entirely died out; and it is not difficult for anyone, who reads aright the miserable history of the land war of Ireland, to see that right through this history outrages have followed eviction, as surely as disease has followed famine. Every period of agrarian distress has been marked by an enormous increase of agrarian crime; and the explanation is to be found in the fact that the Irish landlords have used every period of agrarian distress as a fitting opportunity to evict their poorer tenants. In 1847—that terrible year of famine and pestilence—agrarian crimes rose to the terrible number of 20,986, and we had the explanation at the beginning of the following year, 1848, when so eagerly were the landlords using that period of famine to evict their tenants that this Imperial Parliament felt called upon in very shame to pass an Act to make it illegal to evict tenants on Christmas Day and Good Friday—the two great festivals of the Christian year. Now, in 1848, the agrarian outrages numbered 14,000; in 1849, 14,903, and in 1850, 10,639—and so on year after year until the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) laid his hand to that great work of remedying Irish wrongs which he has not yet completed, but which we believe he is destined yet to complete. In 1870, the right hon. Gentleman passed a Land Act which seems to us to-day a very small measure; but, Mr. Speaker, it placed some obstacles in the way of evictions, and, in doing so, it tended to sensibly diminish agrarian crime. At the present moment, agrarian crime of a serious character in Ireland is practically unknown, and agrarian crime, even of a trivial character, is rare. I listened with amazement to the speech which was made to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. A. J. Balfour). I listened with amazement to his figures until we drew from him the reluctant acknowledgment that those figures did not refer exclusively to agrarian crime, but to crime generally. Mr. Speaker, if we are to go into crime generally, or ordinary crime in Ireland, then I say, Ireland can challenge comparison with any part of the United Kingdom. But, Sir, we are dealing with agrarian crime, and what are the facts? I have in my hand the official Return for the three months ending December last, and let hon. Members when they listen to the figures remember that at this time Ireland was suffering from a depression in prices so great that the Government's own Commission acknowledged that the depression practically made the payment of the full judicial rents impossible. This Return, which we were told to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not sufficiently comprehensive as to include all classes of agrarian crime, is divided into 38 different columns or classifications of agrarian crime. Of these 38 classes, no less than 25 are absolutely blank for the whole of Ireland. Sir, during those months there has not been a single case in the whole of Ireland of murder, manslaughter, attempt to murder, conspiracy to murder, assault on police, cutting and maiming the person, taking and holding forcible possession, demand or robbery of arms, riots and affrays, appearing armed, administering unlawful oaths or rescuing prisoners. In point of fact, there has been an absolute absence of all the more serious crimes of an agrarian character; no less than nine out of the 32 counties are absolutely free from any sort of agrarian offence even of the most trivial character; and in only five of the 32 counties do the agrarian crimes amount to a double figure, and of the total of the so-called agrarian offences during the three months—namely, 166, no less than 72 were threatening letters, a most contemptible form of outrage I acknowledge, but still scarcely the kind of outrage to warrant the suspension of the most elementary rights of the Constitution. The total of offences, large and small, including threatening letters in 1886, was 1,025. I heard the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland say in his speech that there were only seven years since 1844 in which the agrarian crimes were fewer than they were last year. Well, I challenge that statement, and I am prepared to maintain that the outrages which were committed in 1886 were down to the lowest level of any year, and I believe were absolutely below the total of any year from 1844 to 1880. But, Sir, in June 1885, the Tory Party came into Office and they found the Crimes Act in operation, and they most wisely determined to allow that Act to drop—but upon what ground? On the ground that Ireland was free from serious crime, and that the ordinary law was sufficient to maintain social order. I repeat that was a most wise decision, and one which the subsequent further diminution of agrarian crime amply justified. But, Mr. Speaker, what was the state of agrarian crime in 1885? I have the Return here. Why, Sir, will it be believed that this Return shows an enormously larger number of agrarian crimes than the Return for the three months ending December 1886. Not only that, but the Return for June, 1885, was not free from murder and other serious agrarian offences; whereas, the Return for the three months ending December, 1886, as I have shown, is absolutely free from a single agrarian crime of a grave character. Now, in June, in 1885, we were told that Ireland was sufficiently free from crime to justify the abandonment of coercion; and now, at the beginning of 1887, although crime is considerably less, we are called upon to believe that coercion of a drastic character is absolutely essential to maintain law and order. The real difference in the situation is perfectly plain. In June, 1885, the Tory Party thought they could best retain Office by conciliating Ireland, and to-day they seem to be of opinion that that desirable end can best be obtained by coercing and insulting her. But, we may be told that it is not the crime before Christmas last, but the crime since Christmas which has necessitated the introduction of this Bill. Well, I regret that the Government have not felt it their duty to issue official Returns of agrarian outrages for the months that have elapsed since last Christmas. We have consequently no means of telling whether the number of serious offences has increased or not. If it has increased, then I beg English Members to bear in mind that it was since Christmas only that the Government commenced to interfere with the action of the Leaders of the people; it is only since Christmas that the Government have commenced to suppress legitimate agitation, and to break down, as far as they can, the combination of the tenants for their own protection against rack-renting. I have no intention of allowing myself to be drawn into a discussion of the Plan of Campaign; but I beg English Members to note that, according to this contention of the Government, so long as that Plan of Campaign was allowed to work unmolested on the few estates the landlords of which refused reductions, which Lord Cowper's Commission acknowledged to be fair and just, so long was agrarian crime repressed; and it was only when these landlords were allowed to recommence evicting that agrarian crime increased. But I deny the statement that agrarian crime has increased in any serious proportion since Christmas last. It is true, I believe, that there has been some Moonlighting in one district of one county of Ireland. I cannot conceive how you hope by the provisions of the Bill we have heard described to-night to put down Moonlighting; but, even if we were able by proposals of this character to detect and to punish those who were guilty of Moonlighting offences in one district of one county of Ireland, I utterly deny that that is a justification for a Coercion Bill of this character, which will suspend the elementary rights of the Constitution all over Ireland. What has been the experience of the recent Assizes? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) made some quotations to-night from the charges of the Judges; but, Sir, he was most unfair in not giving us more information about the recent Assizes in Ireland. Now, the recent Assizes conclusively show that over the greater part of Ireland there has been an utter absence of crime. In the County of Meath there were only four cases, in Westmeath one, in King's County five, Longford five, Leitrim four, Carlow six, Louth one, and Sligo three. And I have extracts from some of the charges made by the Judges. Baron Dowse opening the Assizes at Maryboro', Queen's County, said—

"The state of affairs is much the same as I found in Carlow, and as my brother Andrews found in the County Kildare. The country on the whole is very peaceful. You have only four cases to consider altogether."

Mr. J. E. Redmond

Mr. Justice O'Brien, who has been quoted more than once in these debates, delivered a charge to the Grand Jury in the City of Limerick, in which he said, "substantially and really there is no crime at all." In Rosecommon, Judge Murphy congratulated the Grand Jury on the condition of their county, and in Fermanagh, Louth and Tipperary, the Judges going Assizes bore testimony in their charges to the peaceful character of these counties. It is true that the Grand Juries in some of these places have passed resolutions in favour of a Coercion Bill. Mr. Speaker, it may be interesting to the House for me to read what took place in reference to the Grand Jury in one county; it will give hon. Members from England a fair index of the value to be placed upon the statements that proceed from these bodies. In the Queen's County the Judge, Baron Dowse, spoke as follows:—

"The cases are of the usual class to be found in large communities like the Queen's County. There is nothing in them to disclose to any great extent anything like conspiracy against property or law and order; but, as I say, the class of offences is what you may expect in a large community like this."

The County Inspector, the man responsible for the peace of the county, when examined before the Grand Jury, said, speaking of the state of the county—

"I do not say it is in a happy state. I say crime is dead in the county. There is no crime in it at all."

But, immediately afterwards, the Grand Jury unanimously adopted the following savage resolution:—

"That the Grand Jury of the Queen's County consider it to be their duty to record their conviction of the absolute necessity of the adoption by the Government of such legislation for Ireland as may restore the confidence of the loyal, bring the social disorder to an end, and stop the revolutionary action of the National League, which, if persisted in, will eventuate in the ruin of all classes."

Now, Sir, I think I have shown clearly enough what value is to be placed upon the demands proceeding from bodies like the Grand Juries of Ireland. We ask, is this the evidence upon which you rely to support the contention that Ireland is in a state of exceptional crime? You say you have secret information. What is that secret information? Why should it remain secret information, when we are expected, on the strength of it, to disregard the figures

Return, and to believe that Ireland is in a state of crime? What are the sources from which your information is derived? Is it supplied by the paid magistracy, whose official existence may be said to depend in great measure upon the continuation of a state of coercion and turbulence? Is it derived from the Constabulary, whose promotion so often depends upon the detection and commission of crime? If so, I consider your sources of information tainted, and I call upon the House to refuse to sanction a Coercion Bill, as to the necessity of which not one satisfactory tittle of proof has been offered. But it would not be sufficient, even if the Government had satisfactorily proved that Ireland was in a state of crime and turbulence. They must show, in addition, that the ordinary law has broken down; and that I defy them to do. How have they attempted to do it? They assert that trial by jury in Ireland has broken down. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland quote statements to that effect, delivered from the lips of the Irish Judges in the different counties of Ireland? Because no such statements exist. How many Moonlighters brought up for trial before juries in County Cork and elsewhere were improperly acquitted? No, Sir, the one notorious case in which apparently jurors had violated the obligation of their oaths took place in County Tyrone in loyal Ulster; where, I suppose, we shall be told a Coercion Act is not required at all. On the 16th December last two Orangemen, named Walker, were brought up for trial on the charge of having shot an English soldier and a policeman in the streets of Belfast. Mr. Justice Lawson, in his charge, laid it down emphatically that any person, who, in endeavouring to escape from justice, shot down a police officer, was, without any further evidence of malice aforethought, guilty of murder. "In this case," he said—

"Grave consequences were involved. We are administering the law in the sight of the whole Empire, and it will be a dreadful thing if it can be supposed that a jury of this country will fail to perform its duty."

After some deliberation, the foreman of the jury announced that there was no possibility of their agreeing, and his Lordship said they must have wilfully made up their minds to disagree. The jury again retired, and later in the evening they came back with the same answer, and the Judge then said—

"I have said all I can to you. It is highly discreditable to the jurors of this country that in a case like this they cannot agree. The juror who would violate his oath under circumstances such as surround this case is a man I look upon as second in guilt only to the man whose case he has been investigating. I discharge you."

These men have been put on their trial again. The men were brought up for trial in Omagh last December, but the Crown Prosecutor never dreamt it was necessary to move to change the venue of the trial to a place where Orangeism was not so strong. He never thought it necessary to order a single jurymen to stand aside, though that practice is so common in other parts of the country. The prisoners have been brought for trial again before another jury in the North of Ireland, and with what result? In the case of one man, notwithstanding the statement of the law, which was clearly laid down by Mr. Justice Lawson, that murder was the offence, the jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter, and the second prisoner was acquitted altogether. Now, Sir, I repeat my assertion that in Ireland, generally, trial by jury has not broken down. What has to some extent broken down, is the system of jury-packing upon which the Government have been wont to rely in Ireland, in order to obtain the conviction of political opponents. The awakened interest which has been aroused in England by the recent trial in Ireland has had the effect, it appears, of making it difficult for the Irish Government satisfactorily to pack Irish juries in political cases, and indeed, they have recently had unpleasant experience of finding Conservative, Protestant jurors, specially selected by themselves to convict, refusing to do so. The Daily Express, a newspaper which is the organ of the Government and the organ of the Tory Party in Ireland, recently threw a flood of light on this question. They wrote the other day—

"The times demand plain speaking. Trial by jury for political and quasi-political offences has been ever more or less of a make-believe and pretence in Ireland. Down to the present time the Crown has succeeded in enforcing the law by such an arrangement of the jury system as in political trials would secure the presence of men upon whom the Crown officers could rely. Owing to causes into which we need not now inquire, that system cannot be further pursued, and the Government is compelled to cast about for new methods of enforcing the law."

Yes, here is the truth; it is not that trial by jury has broken down; it is not that Irish jurors refuse to convict men charged with outrage and crime; but it is that the English Government are no longer able satisfactorily to pack juries to obtain the conviction of political opponents. Trial by jury, in its dealing with ordinary criminals, has not failed. The ordinary law, in its dealings with crime, has not broken down, and I call upon this House to refuse to sanction the suspension of the elementary rights of the Constitution simply because the Irish Government no longer find it easy, with precision, to pack Irish juries to obtain a conviction of their political opponents, like my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). Now, Sir, I pass to the next point—to the consideration of the question whether the special laws now proposed are likely, judging by the history and experience of the past, to be efficacious. I have no intention of wearying the House by entering into the history of the failure of the 86 Coercion Bills that have been introduced and passed since the Act of Union. The very fact that there have been 86 such Acts in 86 years ought, I think, to be conclusive of their inefficacy. But let me say a word with reference to the two last Coercion Acts you have passed—namely, the Coercion Act of the late Mr. Forster and the Crimes Act of 1882. Was the Coercion Act of the late Mr. Forster a success? We know that under it crime increased a thousand-fold. The late Mr. A. M. Sullivan, who long enjoyed the respect of all parties in this House, summed up the results of Mr. Forster's régime in these words—

"He (Mr. Forster) found Ireland alarmed and disturbed. He left it a volcano of human passions on one side, a Bastille of Government vengeance and caprice on the other. The 'village ruffians' and 'midnight marauders' went apparently untouched—nay, multiplied in numbers and increased in insolence and of crime; while mayors, magistrates, Members of Parliament, public representatives of every degree were seized and flung into gaol on mere suspicion, without accusation, evidence, investigation, or proof. . . . The inevitable result appeared. The secret societies became masters of the situation. Crime grew rampant."

I ask, has that terrible record no terrors for the Government? They will answer,

no doubt, that their Bill is framed rather upon the lines of the Crimes Act of 1882. Then, I ask, was the Crimes Act of 1882 a success? Sir, the memorable speech of Lord Salisbury at Newport last October has been quoted before now. It cannot be quoted too often in the course of this discussion. Lord Salisbury, after abandoning that Act, and speaking with the official knowledge which he possessed, said—

“The effect of the Crimes Act has been very much exaggerated. While it was in existence there grew up 1,000 branches of the National League. The provisions of the Crimes Act against Boycotting were of very small effect. It grew up under that Act because it is a crime which legislation has a very great difficulty in reaching. I have seen it stated that the Crimes Act diminished outrages. That Boycotting acted through outrages, and that the Crimes Act diminished Boycotting. It is not true—the Act did not diminish outrages. Boycotting was the act of persons proposing to do things which in themselves are loyal, and which are only illegal because of the intention with which they are done. What is the use of an Act of Parliament against a system such as that? As far as Boycotting is liable to the law, as far as legal remedies can reach it, do not imagine the Government are passive in putting the remedies of the ordinary law in action. The truth about Boycotting is that it depends upon the passing humour of the population. I doubt whether in any community law has been able to provide a satisfactory remedy.”

Here, then, is the testimony of the head of the present Government to the effect that the Crimes Act was a failure, that it did not diminish crime, and that it did not interfere with the working of Boycotting. And yet to-night we are asked to give leave for the introduction of a Bill which is framed, in most of its particulars, so far as we can judge, on the lines of the Crimes Act of 1882. Sir, this Bill, if introduced and passed, will fail. It will, I honestly believe, tend rather to increase than to diminish crime. It will, while it is in operation, baffle all attempts at reconciliation and postpone all peaceful settlement of the Irish Question. I ask now the last question which I proposed at the commencement—namely, does the social disorder which exists in Ireland spring from the stupid and persistent refusal of this House to remedy admitted grievances? Sir, if so, no sane man can regard this Bill as a remedy. Yet, no sane man, so far as I know, denies the existence of grievances in Ireland, or denies the fact that it is from these grievances that outrages spring. In 1823, Lord Brougham made a memorable speech within the walls of this House on this very point. In the course of it he used these eloquent and significant words—

“We were driving six millions of people to madness, to despair. . . . The greatest mockery of all—the most intolerable insult—the course of peculiar exasperation—against which he cautioned the House, was the undertaking to cure the distress under which she laboured by anything in the shape of new penal enactments. It was in these enactments alone that we have ever shown our liberality to Ireland. She had received penal laws from the hands of England, almost as plentifully as she had received blessings and advantages from the hands of Providence. What had these laws done? Checked her turbulence, but not stifled it. We might load her with chains; but, in doing so, we should not better her condition. By coercion we might goad her on to fury; but by coercion we shall never break her spirit. If the Government was desirous to restore tranquillity to Ireland, it must learn to prefer the hearts of the Irish people to the applause of the Orange Lodges.”—(2 Hansard, [9] 1277-8.)

Yes, Sir; but the Government answer, no doubt, is that they do not deny the existence of grievance, and that they have a remedial policy. Sir, they did deny the existence of grievance last September. They cannot deny it now, for the Report of their own Commissioners, the evidence of their own officials, and, indeed, the common knowledge in the possession of everyone acquainted with Ireland, all combine to show that the position of the tenantry in the poorer parts of Ireland is absolutely desperate and calls for immediate relief. They say they have a remedial policy. Yes, Sir, and it has been the curse of successive English Governments in Ireland that they have been “everything by turns and nothing long.” They have been half-hearted in remedial policy, they have been half-hearted in coercive policy, and they have failed in both. They halt half-way between conciliation and coercion. No remedial measure ever went to Ireland unaccompanied by coercive enactments; and I say whatever of good there may be in the land proposals which you are about to make will be robbed of all its value by the hateful and unnecessary Bill which is now before the House. Every measure of reform which ever proceeded from this House to Ireland was delayed until too late, and then accompanied by insult. You have never yet learnt the lesson that to rule the people of Ireland you must first win their confidence, and that you can only win their confidence by first trusting them. By your half-hearted remedial policy you have failed to conciliate Ireland, by your coercive policy you have failed to intimidate her; and yet, in spite of the experience of the past, you insist upon treading the same ruinous and blood-stained path. What a spectacle does not England present to the world to-day—in the Jubilee year of Her Majesty's reign, and in the 87th year of the Legislative Union. You claim success for the rule of your Imperial Parliaments, and you ask for renewed coercion. You point to the record of diminished serious crime with pride, and yet you ask for fresh powers to enable you to rule the country. But yesterday you enfranchised the mass of the Irish people, and to-day you declare that, so far from being capable citizens, they are not worthy of exercising the common rights and privileges of the Constitution. You call on Irishmen to be loyal to England, and you persist in keeping English law what it has been for centuries in Ireland—namely, an engine of national humiliation and oppression. On what sound reason or argument does this proposal rest? It is not called for by an exceptional state of violence or crime. There is no proof that the ordinary law has broken down in its dealing with outrages. All history tells you that coercive legislation has been a failure, and all your experience, and the evidence of your own officials, tell you that such disorder as does exist springs from the refusal of your Parliament to do justice to the people by remedying their grievances. Is Irish disaffection the reason for this Bill? Sir, this accusation of Irish disloyalty is a common one in the mouths of Englishmen. When I hear it I am often inclined to ask what does loyalty mean? What does it mean here in England? It means the loyalty of the people to a Government of their own; it means the loyalty of a free people to a free Constitution. What have we in Ireland to be loyal to? Is it to a Government, the very reason of whose existence is that it is opposed to the wishes and aspirations of five-sixths of our people? Is it to a Constitution, the blessings and privileges of which we have never in 86 years been allowed freely to share with our English and

Scotch and Welsh fellow-subjects? Is it to a system of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) once said—

"It is a system which is founded on the bayonets of 30,000 soldiers encamped permanently as in a hostile country."

Henry Grattan once said—

"Loyalty is a noble and a wise principle; but loyalty distinct from liberty is corruption."

You deprive the Irish people deliberately and persistently of the rights, privileges, and liberties which you freely give to the meanest of your Colonies, and yet you ask them to be loyal to your rule. No. Loyalty has never yet sprung from such a policy. The only loyalty you have in Ireland is the loyalty of a selfish class, animated by, perhaps, the basest of all human motives, the desire for continued ascendancy; but that loyalty which unites in one common bond of interest and affection, and which grows stronger in time of danger and trial—that loyalty, under the present system, you do not deserve, and most assuredly you shall not obtain. Let me ask this one question in conclusion. Will this Bill, if passed, do good in Ireland? Will it tend to diminish crime? Will it produce amongst the masses of the people of Ireland greater sympathy with law, and with the administration of justice? Sir, in 1866 the senior Member for Birmingham used some very memorable and very significant words in this House. He said—

"All history teaches us that it is not in human nature that men should be content under any system of legislation and of institutions such as exists in Ireland. You may pass this Bill. You may put the Home Secretary's 500 men in gaol. You may do all this, and suppress the conspiracy and put down the insurrection; but the moment it is suppressed there will still remain the germs of this malady, and from those germs will grow up, as heretofore, another crop of insurrection and another harvest of misfortune. And it may be that those who sit here 18 years after this moment will find another Ministry and another Secretary of State to propose to you another administration of the same ever-failing and ever-poisonous medicine."—(3 Hansard, [181] 693.)

Sir, 18 years after these words were spoken we had a literal fulfilment of them. I ask Englishmen and Scotchmen, are they willing for 18 years more to tread the same blood-stained and disgraceful path. There are men who will rejoice at the introduction of this Bill. I ask English Members to consider who they are. The Ulster Tory Party will rejoice. But are they safe guides for Englishmen on this Irish Question? Why, these are the men who opposed the Ballot, the extension of the Franchise, the Church Act, the Land Act—every effort ever made by the English Parliament to remedy Irish grievances. They are the men whom the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) thus described. He said—

“The Ulster men have stood in the way of improvement in the franchise, the Church, and the land. They have purchased Protestant ascendancy, and the price paid for it has been the ruin and degradation of their country.”

Are English Members to-day prepared to take their Irish policy from these men? But there are others who may rejoice at the introduction of this Bill—those who constitute what has sometimes been called the extreme faction of Irish politics, who openly tell you that they hate the idea of reconciliation between the two nations; men who fear reform, who hate open agitation, and who welcome coercion because it tends to drive discontent beneath the surface, and to give new vitality to secret organization. I am here to-night to declare my deliberate conviction that in the introduction and the passage of this Bill you are playing directly into the hands of such men. But, on the other hand, all those who hope for a peaceful and a speedy settlement of the Irish Question will deplore the introduction of this Bill to-night. Sir, we upon these Benches have often been called “Irreconcilables.” If I were an “Irreconcilable” I should vote with a free heart in favour of this Bill. But it is just because I am one of those who hope for the near approach of the day when this great question at issue may be settled upon peaceful and honourable lines, and within the limits of the Constitution, that I deplore the introduction of this Bill, that I denounce it, and that I shall do all in my power at every stage to defeat it.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Illingworth,)—put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

VOL. CCCXII. [THIRD SERIES.]

ORDER OF THE DAY.

METROPOLITAN OPEN SPACES ACT (1881) EXTENSION BILL.—[BILL 171.]

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Dalrymple, Sir Charles Forster, Mr. Houldsworth, Mr. Reid, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Salt.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Interpretation Clause).

Mr. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): Mr. Courtney, I beg to move to insert, after “respectively,” in line 15, page 1, the words “and the expressions ‘rural sanitary district’ and ‘rural authority’ respectively.” The object of this and the other Amendments which stand in my name is simply to extend the powers of the rural sanitary districts as well as the urban sanitary districts.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after “respectively,” insert “and the expressions ‘rural sanitary district’ and ‘rural authority’ respectively.”—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): At this point I should like to say that some time since I put a block on the Books against this Bill. I removed the block on the distinct understanding that the progress of a similar Bill relating to Ireland would not be interfered with. I find that the understanding has not been kept; and, therefore, I shall certainly put down a number of Amendments against this Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Words inserted.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you do now report Progress and ask leave to sit again, and I do so upon the ground that we took our block off this Bill upon the distinct understanding that the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) would put down Amendments making the Bill applicable to Ireland. We had brought in a similar Bill dealing with Ireland, and two Ulster Members had blocked it. It is impossible to expect us to keep faith with you if faith is not kept with us. We distinctly understood that the opposition to the Dublin Open Spaces Bill would not be persisted in, and that the hon. Baronet would apply some of the provisions he proposes to Ireland. I have looked through the Amendments of the hon. Baronet; but I do not see any to that effect. I have no desire that this Bill should not be proceeded with; indeed, I have a strong desire it should be passed; but what I want to know is why our Open Spaces Bill should be blocked while yours is proceeded with? Under the circumstances, I shall certainly object to the English Bill being proceeded with, unless our Bill on similar lines is also allowed to be proceeded with.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I am very sorry there should have been any misunderstanding on this point. I think hon. Members around me will bear me out when I say that what I said when the Bill was last before the House was that I would put off the Bill for a few days, in order that hon. Members below the Gangway should have an opportunity of putting down whatever Amendments they thought fit. Certainly I have no objection to the Bill being extended to Ireland; but that might be done on Report. I hope the Committee will now proceed with the Bill.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I am bound to say, in support of my hon. Friends (Mr. Healy and Dr. Tanner), that the impression left on my mind was that there was an understanding between the other side and this that fair play should be given to the Irish Members in respect to what they proposed in reference to open spaces in their own country. I understood at the time that a Bill had been introduced relating to open spaces in Ireland; but I do not know in what way the understanding was to be carried out—whether by the amalgamation of the Irish Bill with this, or otherwise.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): It is perfectly evident that the hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock) misunderstood me on the last occasion the Bill was brought forward. I laid it down as a matter of agreement that I would remove my opposition to his Bill if the opposition to the Irish Bill were removed. The hon.

Baronet came to me and expressed astonishment that, as we had a Bill on the Paper proceeding on exactly similar lines to his, I should enter a Notice of opposition to this Bill. I must say I never made any such agreement as the hon. Baronet appears to think. I never said anything about putting down Amendments to this Bill, and never had any intention of doing so. What I suggest is that the further consideration of this Bill in Committee should be deferred until some arrangement is arrived at with respect to the Irish Bill. I do not care in what way a modus vivendi is arrived at. Perhaps the hon. Baronet's Friends who sit upon the Ministerial Benches will yield to his remonstrances, and withdraw their opposition to our Bill; or, possibly, the hon. Baronet will propose Amendments making this Bill applicable to Ireland.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead): I have often observed that agreements made outside break down when matters come to be discussed in the House. The reason in nine cases out of 10 is that no two Members can be expected, in a private agreement made in the Lobby or Library, to bind all the other Members of the House. I do not know anything about the difficulty which has arisen; but I hope my hon. Friends below the Gangway will allow this Bill to be proceeded with to-night. Several Members, including the hon. Baronet the Member for Walsall (Sir Charles Forster), who are deeply interested in the question of open spaces, have remained to assist in the passing of the Bill. At present, the Preamble relates to England and Wales only; the difficulty which has occurred could be surmounted by the insertion of the word "Ireland."

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): As I have put down a block to the Irish Bill, I wish to explain that I shall be very glad to withdraw it. I think the system of blocking has been carried on to too great an extent; but the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) certainly set me the example. If he will remove some of the blocks to the Bills brought in by hon. Members on this side of the House, I shall be very happy to remove mine.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): My recollection of what took place on the former occasion is that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway complained of the blocking of the Irish Bill, and said that what they would have to do, under the circumstances, would be to endeavour to engraft on the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for the London University (Sir John Lubbock) the provisions of the Irish Bill. Personally, I am very much interested in the Dublin Bill. I consider both Bills to be of great utility.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): After what has been said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) I will not press the Motion to report Progress. Perhaps it is as well that some progress should be made with the Bill, but that we should not altogether lose our grip of the Bill. Under the circumstances, I ask leave to withdraw my Motion; but I shall renew it before you, Mr. Courtney, absolutely leave the Chair, so that we shall reserve to ourselves the opportunity of amending the Preamble and title of the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead): I beg to propose the omission of all the words from "the expression 'burial ground,'" in line 16, to the end of the clause. The object of this Amendment is to provide that the definition of a burial ground shall be that in the Act of 1881.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, leave out from "the expression 'burial ground'" to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. W. H. James.)

Question,

"That the words 'the expression "burial ground" shall mean a burial ground, whether consecrated or not, which has been at any time set apart for purposes of' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Extension of provisions of Metropolitan Open Spaces Act to urban sanitary districts).

Mr. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): The Amendment which stands in my name is rather a consequential than a substantial one. It is to prepare the way for introducing some words which will bring in the Act of 1877 as well as the Act of 1881. The Act of 1877 was the first Act which gave these powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works; and it is very desirable that, in extending the powers to rural or urban authorities, the powers contained in the Act of 1877 should be conferred, as well as those contained in the Act of 1881. I beg to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 23, leave out "Act," and insert "Acts."
—(Mr. Houldsworth.)

Question, "That the word 'Act' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the word 'Acts' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. W. H. JAMES, Amendment made, in page 1, line 23, after "Act," by inserting "as amended by this Act."

On the Motion of Mr. HOULDSWORTH, Amendment made, in page 1, line 23, after "except," by inserting "Sections four, five, six, seven, and eight of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act of 1877, and of the Act of 1881."

On the Motion of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Amendment made, in page 1, line 25, by leaving out "1885," and inserting "1855."

On the Motion of Mr. RITCHIE, Amendments made, in page 1, line 26, after "thirteen," by inserting "of the last mentioned Act;" and in page 1, line 27, after "district," by inserting—

"And any and every rural sanitary district in respect to which the sanitary authority shall have been vested by the order of the Local Government Board."

On the Motion of Mr. CHANNING, Amendment made, in page 2, line 2, after "authority," by inserting "and every such rural authority."

On the Motion of Mr. W. H. JAMES, Amendment made, in page 2, line 6, after "Act," by inserting "as amended by this Act."

On the Motion of Mr. CHANNING, Amendments made, in page 2, line 10, by leaving out "urban," and inserting "such;" and in page 2, line 10, at end, by leaving out "urban," and inserting "such."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Expenses).

On the Motion of Mr. LONG, Amendment made, in page 2, line 17, by leaving out "and as if they had," and in-serting "deemed to have;" and in page 2, line 18, at end, by adding—

"And shall be defrayed accordingly, and the purposes of this Act shall be deemed to be the purposes of 'The Public Health Act, 1875.'"

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Extent of Act).

On the Motion of Mr. LONG, Amendment made, in page 2, line 19, by leaving out "to the Metropolis or."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Bye-laws) struck out.

Clause 6 (Short title) agreed to.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead): I beg to move the insertion of the following clause after Clause 1:—

(Amendment of "The Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881.")

"(1.) The principal Act is hereby repealed to the extent in the first column of the Schedule to this Act mentioned.

"(2.) In any licence or faculty granted by a Bishop under the principal Act or this Act in relation to any consecrated ground, there may be specified such conditions as to the mode in which such ground may be used for purposes of recreation as to the Bishop may seem fit."

New Clause (Mr. W. H. James) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause be read a second time," put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead): I now beg to move the following clause:—

(Amendment of "The Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884.")

"In 'The Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884,'—

"The expression 'burial ground' shall have the same meaning as in the principal Act as amended by this Act, and the expression 'disused burial ground' shall mean any burial ground which is no longer used for interments, whether or not such ground shall have been wholly or partially closed for burials under the provisions of any Statute or Order in Council."

New Clause (Mr. W. H. James) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam): I am afraid I cannot accept this clause, because it leads hereafter to a clause getting rid of the prohibition against the playing of games in these disused churchyards. I am perfectly well aware I shall be told that the Act of 1881 expressly imposed on the Metropolitan Board of Works the duty of forbidding games in open spaces as well as in disused burial grounds. If it were only a question of allowing games in open spaces, I should have no objection to the clause. The public have had no notice of such a provision as this, and therefore it would scarcely be wise to adopt it.

MR. W. H. JAMES: I cannot hold that any acts of desecration would be permitted by the Local Authorities.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): No games are allowed to be played in churchyards, and I think that if a provision were imported into this Bill which would allow games of all kinds to be played in burial grounds, there would be a certain shock to public feeling. Not only so; but many of these churchyards are so situated that games could only be indulged in to the danger of the buildings and the windows of the buildings surrounding. The Government cannot consent to the insertion of this clause.

MR. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I am sure we all share the view of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie), that no games should be allowed in burial grounds. At the same time, it would be very undesirable to prevent games being played on other open spaces.

MR. RITCHIE: I propose to move an Amendment which will enable Local Authorities to allow games to be played on open spaces other than churchyards.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I sympathize with the object of my hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. James); but, in view of the understanding arrived at on the second reading, I feel bound to support the Government upon this occasion.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER (Walsall): I also fully sympathize with the view of the hon. Member for Gateshead; but I trust he will not endanger the passing of the Bill, which I regard of much importance, by pressing the clause to a Division.

MR. W. H. JAMES: I fear I must yield to the appeal of my hon. Friend (Sir Charles Forster).

Question put, and negatived.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes): I beg to move the insertion of the following clause:—

(Bye-laws.)

"All the provisions with respect to bye-laws contained in sections one hundred and eighty-two to one hundred and eighty-six (both inclusive) of 'The Public Health Act, 1875,' shall apply to all bye-laws from time to time made by a Sanitary Authority under the powers of this Act, and the penalties imposed by any such bye-laws may be recovered in a summary manner."

New Clause (Mr. Long) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause be read a second time," put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. W. H. JAMES: As a point of Order, Sir, I should like to know whether it is not competent for me to proceed with my Amendments in regard to the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member, in putting his Amendments on the Paper, has proposed to "insert the following Clauses 1 and 2." Well, those have been incorporated in the Bill, and all the rest of the ground is covered.

MR. HOULDSWORTH: The next Amendment I have placed on the Paper is one of considerable importance in large, populous towns where there is property of the kind dealt with in this Bill, especially property held by Ecclesiastical Corporations. It is for the purpose of enabling such Corporations to make gifts of land for the recreation and exercise of the public. Many cases in the country exist where Ecclesiastical Corporations have land which they would gladly dispose of in this way if they were not prevented by the present state of the law. I propose to insert the following new clause:—

(Power to Corporations to make free gift of land.)

"Any Corporation or Corporations, person or persons, having power to sell and convey land under any Act, charter, letters patent, or otherwise, may, in like manner, voluntarily give and convey any open space, as defined in the principal Acts, to any Urban Sanitary Authority, and such Urban Sanitary Authority may accept the ownership thereof, and hold the same in trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation, and may from time to time make bye-laws for the regulation of such open spaces."

New Clause (Mr. Houldsworth) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I agree to accept this clause; but as it has been decided to extend the operation of the Bill, it will be necessary to make some alterations. It will be necessary to leave out, after "bye-laws," the words "for the regulation of such open spaces," in order to insert other words which I shall propose.

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton): Corporations cannot convey land without the consent of the Lords of the Treasury.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): This is an extremely wide clause to insert in a Bill of this character on the Motion of a private Member. It seems to me a very objectionable thing to give permission to a Corporation to give away its land for this purpose without laying down definite restrictions, and I do not think the clause is drawn at all in a workmanlike manner. It seems to me highly objectionable and reprehensible to allow a clause of this nature to be put in a non-contentious Bill like this without its having been carefully considered, and I would take leave to suggest that the proper course to adopt would be this—namely, for the Government, before they attempt to amend the clause, to put down upon the Paper the alterations they propose, so that hon. Members may have an opportunity of considering them. They should be printed, so that we can see them and discuss them on Report. In some Corporations you have a great deal of jobbery, and you can never tell how a clause of this kind will work unless you take the precaution to lay down distinct limitations. I think the clause as it stands at present is open to very grave objection. I should like to know if the Government have considered the matter in all its bearings?

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down that this is a most startling proposition to put before the House in a Bill of this kind. The hon. Member, in moving the clause, says that Ecclesiastical Corporations are prepared to make use of land for open spaces. Yes; but we have to ask whether the lands that these Ecclesiastical Corporations are prepared to give away so freely are really theirs to give? Then lands of this kind might be given away in a most improper manner, and in a most improper spirit. The property may really belong to a large area, and yet may be given away for the benefit of a very small area. I would ask the Government to give us more time to consider the matter before requiring us to give Ecclesiastical Corporations, or any other Corporations, such powers as these.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): My own constituency is very much interested in this clause. In a very poor suburb of Manchester that forms part of my constituency there is a large amount of unutilized land. It is the only land out of which a recreation ground can be obtained for an especially poor population — factory workpeople, and so forth. This land belongs to the Dean and Canons of Manchester. They are willing to give a sufficient amount of this land to form recreation grounds, none of which at present exist, for this population. But they cannot now do it without the leave of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. As the law now stands, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners do not feel justified in allowing any of this land to be given away for this or any other purpose. They only allow it to be sold. This clause will enable the authorities to give it away for the purpose of exercise and recreation grounds. All parties are desirous that this power should be conferred on Ecclesiastical Corporations, and it is only required that this House shall give the necessary legal authority. I would entreat the Committee not to throw any obstruction in the way of this clause, because I assure hon. Members that it is the only way these poor people can obtain recreation grounds. The passing of this clause will not injure anyone in the country.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I rather suspected, from the quarter from which this clause came, that there was some political move at the bottom of it. I am convinced of it now. Since the Redistribution Act you have towns divided into different constituencies. Some of those are of a Liberal character and some are of a Conservative character, and the Ecclesiastical Corporations that exist in connection with these constituencies may have a majority on them that may be Liberal or Tory. You may have gifts made under such a clause as this by a political majority to a constituency of the same shade of politics for the purpose of preserving it, or to one of a different shade of politics for the purpose of converting it. I maintain that you would open the door to some extent to most improper practices; and I submit that it would be well for us to see what the Government propose as an Amendment before giving an opinion upon such a clause. What are the suggestions the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has to make? Whatever they are, I think it desirable that we should have further time to consider them.

Sir JAMES FERGUSON: The Amendments my right hon. Friend is proposing are only to bring the clause into harmony with other clauses which have been agreed to. Without them the clause would be inconsistent with those other parts of the measure. The Amendments are only of a verbal character. I can inform the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, in reply to observations he has just made, that there are a great many poor Irish people in the district to which I have referred, and in which the Dean and Chapter desire to present land for recreation grounds. These poor Irish people will be greatly benefited by these recreation grounds, for at the present moment they have no places of the kind to avail themselves of.

Mr. FINCH-HATTON (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I would point out that it is not proposed, by the powers contained in the clause, to hand over land to irresponsible persons. They will be exercised in favour of properly appointed, responsible persons, and I think that is a sufficient safeguard.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam): It may be as well to remind the Committee of what is the law as regards the Metropolis. According to the Act of 1881, owners of open spaces are allowed to avail themselves of the powers of the measure, and the Interpretation Clause says that owners may be Corporations.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I am not at all satisfied with the explanation given by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. This land, which we are told is vested in the Dean and Chapter of Manchester, really belongs to the whole of the diocese, like the Cathedral. It may be situated in the district which the right hon. Gentleman represents, as also may the Cathedral; but that does not alter the fact that it belongs to the whole diocese, and that it would be a misapplication of public property to give it to a single locality. I say, as my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy) has stated, that there is a deal of jobbery in matters of this kind on the part of Corporations. I suppose, if the people of Manchester want open spaces, they can obtain them as the people of other towns do. If the Dean and Chapter have open spaces in the right hon. Gentleman's district, I suppose they have not got them in other localities. What, then, are those other localities to do? I object to this probable action of the Dean and Chapter in giving away public property to a particular district, and I hold it to be a total misapplication of trust funds. This land is public property, and I maintain that it is quite contrary to the functions of such a body as the Dean and Chapter to act this part, and to come forward and distribute, after their own fancy, particular parts of property within a small area. I feel bound to add that it is altogether unworthy of a place like Manchester to come here begging in this way for land for recreation grounds. The town I represent has gone to work in this matter in a legitimate manner. They have made themselves liable for the cost of these recreation grounds out of the rates of the community. Open spaces are required as much in other places as in Manchester. I would urge the Committee to insist on some time being afforded us to consider the clause and the proposed Amendments before any attempt is made to advance them.

MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman loses sight of the fact that the clause will not put an obligation on these Corporations in any way. It will merely give power to the Corporations to sell and convey. I think the clause is of too much importance to be discussed and decided now; it would occupy too much time at this hour of the morning (1.55 A.M.); therefore, I would suggest to the hon. Member (Mr. Houldsworth) that he should withdraw it now and bring it up again on Report.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: The clause says, "voluntarily give and convey any open space;" and I object to public property being given away in this eleemosynary manner to a place like Manchester, particularly under the circumstances described.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman's insinuations are perfectly gratuitous. He is speaking from his own inner consciousness, without the slightest knowledge of the facts of the case to which I referred. The open space I alluded to is not in Manchester at all, but in a poor suburban district which can get no assistance at all from the wealthy Corporation of Manchester. There is no district in the United Kingdom more dependent as this on a free gift of land for recreation purposes.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I based my statement entirely on what fell from the right hon. Gentleman himself. What he said was that the Dean and Chapter of Manchester were willing to give for the benefit of these poor people land which they hold in trust, and I say they have no right to do so. I base my whole case on the statement of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to know whether it is really competent for a private Member to propose a clause of this kind? It would be contrary to all the Rules of the House to allow such a thing as this to be done. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) is to be allowed to postpone the clause I cannot help it.

MR. HOULDSWORTH: As there is so much objection to the clause I will withdraw it now, and will bring it up again on Report.

THE CHAIRMAN: On the point of Order, I may say I had serious doubts whether this clause could be proposed by the hon. Member; but, on referring to the principal Act, I saw that it empowers trustees to make these gifts, therefore I thought the Motion might be made.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes): I do not know if I am in Order, but I should like to propose to alter the title of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: No. We come next to the Preamble.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think I am correct in saying that it will not be contrary to the understanding which seemed to be arrived at a short time ago if the Chairman now reports Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MR. LONG: I was about to suggest to the hon. Gentleman that it would be desirable to reprint the Bill. He will see the necessity of this when he considers that both the title and the Preamble have to be amended. The hon. and learned Gentleman will not lose control over the measure by allowing the present stage to pass.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If we can adopt that course and be in Order I should be glad; but I understand you, Sir, to offer a negative nod. The promise of the hon. Member (Mr. Johnston) is somewhat militated against by the fact that the Dublin Bill is also blocked by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald).

THE CHAIRMAN: It would not be possible to make the proposed alteration in Committee.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam): It is very desirable that this Bill should be reprinted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If the Government will re-commit the Bill, I will consent to withdraw my Motion.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am afraid I cannot come to any absolute engagement, because the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. T. M. Healy) will see that the provisions of this Bill apply to Local Authorities in England, and are not at all applicable to Local Authorities in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is rather unusual for the right hon. Gentleman to throw over his own Under Secretary. I merely fall in with the suggestion. If the Government will agree to re-commit the Bill, it will enable us to take the course now suggested of amending the Preamble. The Government will not be bound to accept our Bill. All we want is discussion. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) will consent to the course suggested by one of the Members of his own Government, we, or I at least, will repudiate anything like an agreement on the part of the Government to accept the principle of any Amendment we may propose.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. T. M. Healy) would lose anything by allowing us to take the Preamble and to have the Bill reprinted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: There is a favourite saying in Ireland, "Keep a firm grip while you have a hold of it."

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I cannot see what objection there can be to deferring the further consideration of the Bill until Thursday. One Bill comes on a Wednesday, and if hon. Gentlemen do not behave in the way they are expected to behave, and carry out the arrangement entered into, we shall be perfectly free to take whatever course suggests itself to us. I trust the hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock) will now allow us to report Progress.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I should like to say I have already requested the Clerk at the Table to remove the block which stood in my name, and I have no doubt the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald) will do the same.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday.

MOTION.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT ACTS AMENDMENT (WESTMINSTER) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Burdett-Connis, Bill to amend "The Metropolis Management Act, 1855," in relation to the Parishes of Saint Margaret and Saint John the Evangelist, Westminster, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Burdett-Connis, Mr. John Talbot, Mr. Tomlinson, and Mr. Seager Hunt.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 203.]

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC
BILL.—(No. 32.)

(The Lord Stanley of Preston.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 (Short title and construction) agreed to.

PART I.

COURT AND PROCEDURE OF RAILWAY AND CANAL COMMISSIONERS.Establishment of Railway and Canal Commission.

Clause 2 (Establishment of new Railway and Canal Commission).

THE EARL OF JERSEY said, he moved to omit the first "three" and to insert "two," as he thought two appointed Commissioners with a Judge of the Supreme Court to preside on all occasions would be much better than having such a Judge to preside every now and then. It was for the interest of all that the Court should be a strong one, and he was sure that his noble Friends who took special care of the railway interest would agree with him that it was essential that the new tribunal should be one which would inspire confidence. The fact of one of Her Majesty's Judges being a Member of the Commission would give it a status which it would not otherwise possess.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 18, leave out the first ("three") and insert ("two.")—(The Earl of Jersey.)

LORD HERSCHELL said, he had spoken in that sense on the second reading of the Bill, and he supported the Amendment in the interests of traders and economy. The proposed change would be of advantage to all the parties who came before the tribunal. The existing Railway Commissioners sat on 30 days in 1873; on 114 days in 1874; on 88 days in 1876; on 81 days in 1877; on 42 days in 1878; on 55 days in 1879; on 30 days in 1880; on 49 days in 1881;

on 48 days in 1882; on 42 days in 1883; on 59 days in 1884; on 44 days in 1885; and on 23 days in 1886. It was obvious that if the tribunal had a legal Commissioner assisted by a Judge in all important matters there would be a great waste of judicial force. There would be a large number of days in the year on which the legal Commissioner would be entirely unoccupied; whereas, if they had a Judge in all cases, it seemed to him the Judge would be able to do the whole of the work of the Commission; and, in addition, he could do a great deal of most excellent public work in performing the ordinary duties of a Judge of the High Court. It would, therefore, be an economical arrangement to the public to have the Chief Commissioner a Judge.

LORD BRAMWELL said, the noble Earl, in introducing the Bill, said the Commission had worked satisfactorily; but the opinions of at least some of the counsel who practised before it did not bear out that statement. He did not see why those questions should be tried in a different way from the ordinary cases which came before the Courts of Law. To have a Judge to preside would involve no extra expense, because, when not engaged in the railway business, he could perform ordinary judicial duties. If it were thought desirable that a Judge should have assessors that could be provided for, as in the case of the Admiralty Division of the High Court. The Amendment seemed to him a desirable one.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON) said, it had been the wish of the framers of the Bill to make the Court as strong as possible, so that it should have the complete confidence of those—traders and others—who resorted to it. The proposed form would, in his opinion, tend to a continuity in the decisions of the tribunal. He did not think the figures quoted by the noble Lord supported his conclusions, and he thought that they rather proved that the legal Commissioner would amply suffice for the work which had to be done. There would be many things to do which would not require the attendance of a Judge of the Supreme Court; but any man who had some legal knowledge would be able to transact the business. He submitted that the clause, as it stood, would be the most advantageous, would work satisfactorily, and would do all that the trading community required. He could not, therefore, agree to the Amendment.

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, he strongly maintained the necessity of having legal authority on the Commission. Lawyers were in the habit of seeing both sides of a question, which few of what lawyers called laymen were able to do, even if they were clergymen. In the long run, it would be far cheaper to have a good Judge constantly engaged in this tribunal, because there would then be fewer appeals. He did not see that it need add to the cost, seeing that such Judges already existed. The noble Lord at the head of the Board of Trade had been induced to make the proposal contained in the Bill by people who wanted a strong Court—not a legal one, and strong enough to overrule law and everything else. It was put forward as a reason for continuing the present Railway Commissioners in office, or some of the same kind, that they had a great deal more experience in railway matters than Her Majesty's Judges. Were their Lordships aware of the nature of the decisions given by them? In one case they ordered the South Eastern and the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Companies to expend money in making a new station. Luckily, in that case there was a remedy by prohibition, and they were told they could do nothing of the kind. If it were left to the discretion of Sir Frederick Peel and Mr. Price, the aid of a Judge would never be invoked. That was shown by the fact that in nearly every case in which there was a discretionary appeal they refused to allow it. There were other reasons why a Judge should be placed permanently on this tribunal. Many fresh matters, some of which had hitherto been under the sole cognizance of the Courts, were to be placed in the jurisdiction of the new tribunal created by the Bill. They were to have authority in the matter of parish rates; they were to decide on the expediency of new works; and they were to decide as to what were reasonable facilities and undue preferences. These were not powers which should be intrusted to a tribunal not presided over by a Judge. The fact was that traders really wanted protection, and to have the legitimate effect of railway competition in reducing rates abolished. The only persons qualified to decide questions of mixed law and fact in a manner which would be satisfactory to all parties concerned were Judges.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) maintained that the railway and trading interests would be better satisfied by the Court as constituted by his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Preston). He did not know whether the noble Lord who had just spoken was against the proposed tribunal altogether, or only against that particular form of it which was touched by the Amendment. He was aware that there were some persons who attached more importance to the decision of a Judge than they did to that of a jury. But the question was whether, when they were about to erect a new tribunal, it was not better to appoint at its head those who were familiar with the peculiar class of questions that would have to come before it? The noble Lord had remarked that a Judge would cost nothing, because we had plenty of them already; but the fact was, that our Judges had at present more work than they could get through, and that was the reason why the arrears of causes in the Courts had become almost a national scandal. If one of these Judges was to form part of the tribunal, he would have to accompany it to different parts of the country, so that the cost would certainly not be thereby decreased. The noble Lord had said that Judges would be better able to decide questions as to undue preference; but if some inflexible principle of law were to determine those questions this tribunal was not required at all; while if they were to be determined according to some equitable principle as between the railways and the traders, then a Judge would not be wanted. The noble Lord appeared to forget that under the present Bill an appeal was to be given in these cases for the first time. For his own part, he could not see that in a tribunal specially selected, with an appeal to the Judges, as was proposed by this Bill, there would be any element of weakness.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that it was desirable to settle one thing at a time. The question immediately before their Lordships was whether there should be a Judge at the head of this Commission, and if it was decided in the affirmative, the details could easily be arranged. He (Lord Brabourne) would leave it to his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor to settle how the Judge should be obtained; and he could, at the same time, settle with his Colleagues whether, in all cases and in all parts of Her Majesty's Dominions, a jury was so infallible and superior a tribunal as he had seemed to indicate. This Commission would have to deal with cases which affected most important interests and property of very great magnitude, and such property and interests should not be dealt with by an inferior tribunal. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Grimthorpe) did not often understate a case; but in the instance which he had quoted—that of the Hastings case against the South Eastern and Brighton Companies—he had omitted one important point. In spite of the objection raised by the Companies, the Commissioners had insisted upon taking the facts before the points of law involved. For seven days they were thus engaged, and the parties were put to an entirely useless expense; because at the end of that time, their decision having been given against the Companies, the latter proceeded by way of prohibition, and the Superior Courts of Law reversed the decision, and pronounced that the Commissioners had acted ultra vires. This would never have happened if the Court had been presided over by a Judge. It was most desirable, in the interests of the public as well as of the Railway Companies and the traders, that this should be a strong tribunal; and, therefore, he was in favour of the proposal that it should be presided over by a Judge. He said that the Railway Companies desired that quite as much on behalf of the public as on their own behalf, and they did so emphatically in the interests of cheapness. For if the tribunal was strong, it would command the confidence of the suitors and the public, and the number of appeals would be much fewer than if the case were otherwise. He (Lord Brabourne) had not gathered from the speech of his noble Friend in charge of the Bill that he had a very strong feeling against the proposed alteration, and he earnestly pressed upon him its adoption.

LORD HENNIKER said, that last year the traders were very much opposed to the appointment of a Judge upon this tribunal, and they still held that view. He hoped the Government would consider very carefully before agreeing to the appointment of a permanent Judge. The traders desired a tribunal that should be easily available, and not one that would entail great expense on those appearing before it—a Court, too, which would command the confidence of both the traders and the Railway Companies. At the same time, he believed the traders would be glad to give way to some extent, and would be content to accept the proposition of the noble Lord that a Judge should be called in on certain special occasions.

LORD HERSCHELL said, that, in the interests of the traders, no useful purpose would be served by calling in a Judge for special occasions. He did not think that the cost of appealing to the Commission was likely to be greater because of a Judge being permanently appointed to preside.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) said, the question appeared to be whether the Court ought to be dominated by a legal official or by expert laymen? So far as questions of policy were concerned—questions of policy as apart from the pure interpretation of the law—he apprehended that a body of expert laymen was as reliable a tribunal as a body of Judges. The only question was whether the intention of the Bill was purely to establish a tribunal to determine questions of law, or whether there was something beyond? If it were only to determine questions of law, why not go to the ordinary Courts of Law? Why need they have a special tribunal at all? In the determination of those questions some element of policy must be introduced. In the interpretation of the principles laid down in the exercise of the powers and discretion of the Commission there was an element of policy of a grave character in which the balance had to be held fairly between the two great and important interests of the trader and the Railway Companies—a policy which required knowledge of a special kind that Judges, with all their omniscience, did not possess in a greater degree than other subjects of Her Majesty. For those reasons it seemed to him that it was wise to provide that the expert element should predominate in the Court. As to the suggestion that if they were to have a lawyer, they should have one of the best, his only answer to that was the question of expense, and who was to pay it. He did not feel any objection to a Judge as such; nor did he feel any objection to a £5,000-lawyer as compared with a £3,000-lawyer. It was very possible that the £5,000-lawyer might be the better lawyer of the two, but he certainly would cost £2,000 more. What he wished to impress upon their Lordships was that if they had a Judge they must have the whole of a Judge, as there was no portion of the existing judicial strength which could be cut off and applied to this purpose. He was not certain, however, that the same feeling would prevail in the other House. At the same time, if the House of Commons were inclined to appoint a special Judge, he was not disposed to withstand what appeared to be the dominant desire.

LORD BRAMWELL said, the objection was that a Judge of an inferior character was to be appointed and was to sit with two laymen, who would have an equal voice with him both on questions of law and fact.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 19, after the word ("shall") insert ("be a superior Court of record and.")—(The Earl of Crawford.)

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON said, that the proposed Amendment would make a considerable alteration in the constitution of the Commission. He would, therefore, ask the noble Earl to withdraw his Amendment at present, and it could then be considered on Report.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Appointment and tenure of office of ex officio Commissioners).

LORD GRIMTHORPE, in moving to leave out the words "styled the Chief Commissioner and shall be of experience in the law," in order to insert "a barrister who has been in practice for ten years," said, that if two members were lawyers, one of them being a Judge and the other a lawyer of experience, there was no objection to their being assisted by an expert. The question was whether the Court should be mainly legal or mainly non-legal.

Amendment moved, in sub-section (2), page 1, lines 25 and 26, leave out from ("shall") to ("law,") and insert ("a barrister who has had a practice for ten years.")—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of the Earl of JERSEY, Sub-section 2 omitted.

Amendment moved, in page 2, lines 10 and 11, leave out Sub-section 6.—(The Earl of Crawford.)

LORD FITZGERALD opposed the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Appointment and attendance of ex officio Commissioners).

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 23, after ("years,") add—

"And in case of the inability of the ex officio Commissioner to attend, the Lord Chancellor or the Lord President of the Court of Session, or the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, as the case may be, may appoint another Judge as deputy for the one who is unable to attend, for such time as may be necessary."—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, he would accept the Amendment, with the alteration that the Judge appointed should be "in lieu of" instead of "as deputy for" the one unable to attend.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

LORD BRAMWELL suggested that before Report this clause should be amended so that a Judge might not be appointed a Commissioner without his consent. That was done by Lord Cairns at his (Lord Bramwell's) suggestion, with reference to the Court of Appeal.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Cases requiring attendance of ex officio Commissioner) struck out.

Clause 6 (Sittings of Commissioners).

On the Motion of The Lord BRAMBURNE, the following Amendment made:—In page 3, line 11, after ("pre- side") insert ("and his opinion upon any question of law shall prevail.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Provision for complaints by public authority in certain cases).

THE EARL OF CRAWFORD begged to move an Amendment, the object of which was to give a locus standi before the Commissioners to any association of traders or freighters, or Chamber of Commerce or Agriculture, duly certificated by the Board of Trade as being associated. The Bill proposed to make it necessary that such association should receive a certificate from the Board of Trade that it was a proper body to make complaint, the object of the Amendment being to withdraw the option of refusal from the Board of Trade.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 25, leave out ("may obtain,") and insert ("shall have obtained.")—(The Earl of Crawford.)

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON said, he objected to the Amendment on the ground that it went a great deal too far, and might cause great inconveniences.

Amendment negatived.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that he had given Notice of Amendments requiring that authorities complaining of Railway Companies should show that their cases were proper subjects of complaint, and that those whom they represented had been aggrieved by the action of such Companies. As, however, he found that there were practical difficulties in the way of these Amendments, and that the strengthening of the Court by the enactment that a Judge should preside would lessen the fear of ill consequences, he would withdraw those Amendments, and only move to amend the clause by inserting words requiring associations of traders and Chambers of Commerce and of Agriculture to give security for costs, so that the Companies might not be exposed to wanton attacks from penniless suitors.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 29, after ("determine,") leave out all the words to the end of the clause, and insert—

("Provided always that the Commissioners shall first be satisfied that such authority has, or those whom it represents have, been aggrieved by the matter complained of, and that such authority shall, previous to the hearing of the said complaint, give such security as may be approved of by the court for the costs of such hearing.")—(The Lord Brabourne.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he thought the proposal was a very strong one.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE thought that it would be impossible to obtain costs from these associations.

LORD HALSBURY pointed out that the individual members of such associations might be made personally liable.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he was desirous that it should be clearly understood that the individual members of such associations were to be personally liable, in which case there would be no necessity for requiring security for costs.

LORD BRABOURNE expressed himself satisfied with the understanding that the Government would introduce words carrying out the suggestion of the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

On the Motion of Lord STANLEY of PRESTON, Amendment made, in page 3, line 30, at end of clause, by inserting—

("And any of such authorities may appear in opposition to any complaint which the commissioners have jurisdiction to determine in any case where such authority, or the persons represented by them, may be aggrieved by any determination of the Commissioners upon such complaint.")

LORD BRABOURNE said, he had a similar Amendment on the Paper; but he would accept that of his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Preston) in lieu thereof.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Jurisdiction.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (Jurisdiction over tolls and rates).

Amendment moved,

In line 17, at end of clause, add—"In addition to the difference mentioned in section eight of the Railway Act, 1873, any difference arising between an individual, company, or corporation, and a railway company, under any agreement in writing between such individual, company, or corporation, shall be one of the matters of difference which shall, on the application of either party, be settled by the Commissioners.

"Section nine of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, shall be read so that the Commissioners shall hear and determine the difference therein referred to on the application of either party to the difference."—(The Earl of Crawford.)

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON opposed the Amendment.

LORD BRABOURNE also objected, on the ground that the tribunals selected by the parties to an agreement was often of the essence of the agreement, and it would be a strong and unjust measure to alter that tribunal, in the interest of one party to the agreement, by a clause in this Act.

Amendment negatived.

Clause amended, and agreed to.

THE EARL OF JERSEY moved to insert, after Clause 10, the following new clause:—

“A railway company shall, at the request of any person delivering or desiring to deliver to them goods for transmission, furnish a through rate, and shall, for that purpose, take such action as may be necessary under section two of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, and section eleven of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, and such person shall be entitled to be heard before and to obtain the decision of the Commissioners in relation to such through rate. The rate to be charged for the carriage of merchandise traffic shall be calculated by the shortest route for such traffic between the point of departure and the point of destination.”

He would observe that he had proposed the addition for the convenience of traders.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that there was no difficulty in obtaining through rates at present where there was sufficient traffic to justify the demand. There was no public need of this clause, and a similar one, after full discussion, in 1873 had been refused.

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON said, he must oppose the introduction of the new clause on the ground that it was unnecessary.

New Clause negatived.

Clause 11 agreed to, with Amendments.

Amendment moved,

In page 4, line 26, at end of clause, insert new clause—“11A. All questions arising under section seventy-six of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, shall be within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, who shall have power, notwithstanding the restrictions and conditions in such section, to make such order as they may think reasonable for enabling the junctions of the branch railways in such section referred to to be made with any railway at such point or points as the Commissioners may determine, and no agreement already made or to be made with any railway company shall prevent the use of any existing or future branch railway by any person or persons for any traffic which the owners of such branch railway may authorise, and every facility shall be given for the passing of such traffic on, to, and from the line of railway with which such branch railway communicates or shall hereafter communicate, and the before-mentioned section seventy-six and this Act shall apply to the making of branch canals to communicate with any existing or future canal: Provided that no future branch railway shall run parallel with the railway so as to compete for traffic with the railway.”—(The Earl of Crawford.)

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON said, he was unable to assent to the introduction of the clause, because the subject to which it related did not come within the proper scope of the Bill.

THE EARL OF CRAWFORD said, he would appeal to his noble Friend (Lord Brabourne), as representing the Railway Companies.

LORD BRABOURNE stated that, in his view, the proposed clause would be an unwise and unjust interference with the engineering of railways, and would have a tendency to restrict the giving of sidings and other facilities by Companies. Extraordinary demands were made nowadays, and he had recently received a circular from a gentleman who proposed that Railway Companies should provide sidings at every station for the reception of perishable produce, to be sent off to market by the next available train. On the ground of safety, however, as well as for other reasons, the clause proposed by his noble Friend was open to grave objection.

New Clause (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 12 (Power to award damages).

LORD BRABOURNE, who had an Amendment to substitute for (“for such damages as they may think fit”) the words (“any damages to which he may be entitled by law,”) said, he would withdraw it on the understanding that it should be considered on the Report.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved,

In page 4, line 32, at the end of clause, insert (“Provided that such damages shall not be awarded in respect of any matter arising more than one year before the complaint was made.”)—(The Lord Stanley of Preston.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, it was not clear that the word “damage” included “overcharge.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Orders on two or more Companies).

LORD GRIMTHORPE said, he rose to move to add, at the end of the clause—

“But no company shall be required to execute any work which the Commissioners do not find and declare that they ought to have done out of their ordinary working expenses without raising any fresh capital.”

So far as he could make out there was no limit whatever on the powers of the Commissioners. They might order the Companies to make a new station, and there was to be no appeal from their decision. Nothing could be more serious than such a possibility. How were the Companies to raise the necessary capital if they had not enough to carry out the works ordered by the Commissioners? Some restriction ought to be put upon the unreasonable exercise of those powers.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 2, add (“but no company shall be required to execute any work which the Commissioners do not find and declare that they ought to have done out of their ordinary working expenses without raising any fresh capital.”)—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON said, that with regard to the Amendment of his noble Friend, he thought some limiting words would be required in some part of the section. Undoubtedly, as the words now stood, they were without limitation, and required some amendment. If the noble Lord would withdraw his Amendment and give him the benefit of his advice with regard to the matter, he would move an Amendment on Report.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14 (Jurisdiction as to rating appeals).

LORD BRABOURNE said, he wished to amend the clause by providing that rating appeals, to which any Railway Company was a party, should be transferred to the Commissioners, either on the motion of the Court of Quarter or Assessment Sessions itself, or upon the application of either party. As the clause stood, a Court of Quarter Sessions or Assessment Sessions could only transfer rating appeals to the Commission with the consent of both parties.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 5, leave out (“with the consent of both parties,”) and insert (“either of its own motion or upon the application of any party.”)—(The Lord Brabourne.)

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON said, he would accept the Amendment now, subject to its being freely considered in “another place.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 agreed to.

On the Motion of The Lord BRABOURNE, Clause 16 omitted.

Appeals.

Clause 17 (Appeals on certain questions to superior court of appeal).

LORD GRIMTHORPE begged to move an Amendment permitting an appeal from the Commissioners to a Superior Court of Appeal on questions of fact. He contended that, considering the importance of many of the cases which would come before the Commissioners, and the fact that the majority of the Commissioners was not likely to be composed of lawyers, it was of extreme importance that appeals on questions of fact should be allowed.

Amendment moved, in page 6, lines 1 and 2, leave out (“upon a question of fact.”)—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

LORD BRAMWELL said, he should support the Amendment. In his opinion it was most unreasonable not to allow appeals on questions of fact. Confessedly, this tribunal would be an inferior one to the Superior Courts, and he could conceive no possible ground on which appeals on questions of fact, which existed and always had in the Superior Courts, should be denied in the admittedly inferior tribunal. Moreover, until an appeal was heard, it was impossible to say whether it was upon a matter of fact or law; but, as the Bill stood, the Court of Appeal, after hearing a case and coming to the conclusion that the Commissioners made a mistake of fact, would yet be powerless to interfere.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the object of not permitting appeals on questions of fact was to reduce the expenses of litigation as far as possible. He feared that if these appeals were allowed, the Railway Companies would be at the longest purse, with the cost of litigation with the Commissioners.

people would be afraid of seeking justice against them. The limitation of appeals to questions of law was not unknown in our legislation.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that it was a dangerous doctrine that rich men should have a less effectual remedy than poor ones. Questions of law and fact were so mixed in these cases that unless an appeal was allowed on the facts justice could not be done. The present Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) had expressed a strong opinion, before the Committee of 1882, that "an appeal, both in law and fact, from the Commissioners should be as of right." With regard to the long purse of the Railway Companies, it should be borne in mind that the expenses to which they were put by these proceedings really fell upon their shareholders, many of whom were comparatively poor men, in the shape of diminution of dividends. He trusted the Amendment would be adopted.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 20; Not-Contents 18: Majority 2.

Amendment disagreed to.

Amendment moved,

In page 6, line 18, to leave out ("unless special leave be given by such Court to appeal to the House of Lords.")—(The Lord Henniker.)

LORD HERSCHELL said, he thought that the noble Lord appeared to be unduly afraid of giving Railways a power of appealing to the House of Lords. During the last five years, although the Railway Companies had had the right to appeal in hundreds of cases in which they were concerned, they had only exercised that right in 12 instances, and the appeals against decisions in their favour had been 9. Where the parties had been left perfectly free, therefore, appeals had been very rare and infrequent. Leave to appeal would not be given in frivolous cases; it would only be granted when there was a really serious and important question of law to decide. If they rigidly shut the door to such appeals, they would have this difficulty—that when some important question had been decided, perhaps adversely to the traders, it would not be seen till afterwards, neither by those interested, nor even by the Court itself, how grave were the results of the decision that had been come to; and, in the absence of appeal, there would be no power of alteration or modification. The refusal of the power of appeal would tend to create a condition of uncertainty which would become a fruitful source of litigation.

LORD STANLEY OF PRESTON said, he was decidedly opposed to the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 and 19, separately, agreed to.

Clause 20 postponed.

Clause 21 (Appointment of officers, clerks, &c.)

Amendment moved,

In page 7, line 15, after ("appoints") add:—"One of such officers, who is to be designated for that duty by the Chief Commissioner, shall be an ex officio member of the committee for the time being acting under the Railway Clearing Act, 1850, and shall have access to all the minutes of its proceedings, and shall be supplied with copies of all its bye-laws, resolutions, and regulations, and shall, subject to the approval of the Commissioners, give directions for the publication of such bye-laws, resolutions, and regulations as he shall judge to be of public interest."—(The Earl of Crawford.)

LORD BRABOURNE said, he strongly objected to the Amendment, and thought his noble Friend could hardly be serious in proposing it. There was certainly an Act of Parliament which enabled the secretary of the Railway Clearing House to sue and be sued; but the association itself was of a voluntary character to facilitate the internal working of the Companies, and apportion the receipts of through traffic between the Companies interested. It had nothing to do with the relations between the Companies and the public; and if his noble Friend was right in principle, he did not go nearly far enough, but should, to be consistent, propose that an officer of the Court should be an ex officio member of every Railway Board. The clause was a monstrous one, and his noble Friend must have been imposed upon by some clever outsider, since he never would have proposed such a clause as his own idea.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 22 and 23, severally, agreed to.

REGENT'S CANAL, CITY, AND DOCKS RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I am one of three hon. Members who have put a Notice down on the Paper in opposition to the second reading of this Bill. I therefore trust that I may be allowed to explain the reasons which prompted me to take that step. Several of the London Vestries, and among them the Vestry, of the Parish of St. Pancras, have petitioned against the Bill, not because they object to the construction of this railway, but because they did not believe that it was a genuine enterprise or that the promoters intended to carry it out within a reasonable time. They say in their Petition—

"That great inconvenience and loss has been caused by the Company delaying so long the commencement of the work, and that in these circumstances their application for an extension of time should not be complied with, unless they can show that they have a reasonable prospect of commencing the works within the ensuing 12 months."

The House will be aware that the line was originally authorized to be constructed on the recommendation of a Hybrid Committee in 1882. For the construction of the railway a certain sum of money was raised, and the purchase of the Regent's Canal which is now worked by the Company was virtually completed; yet, down to 1885, nothing further was done to carry out the work for which the permission and authority of Parliament had been obtained. In that year an application was made to have the Standing Orders set aside in order that the Company might pay interest out of capital. On that Motion a debate took place in this House. The opposition to the Motion was led by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Barnard Castle Division of Durham (Sir Joseph Pease); but the second reading was carried after a speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who was then President of the Board of Trade. In urging the House to pass the second reading of the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman said there was another consideration which at that moment was not altogether unworthy of the attention of the House. If permission were given to this Company to raise capital and the capital were raised as was proposed, a very large amount of employment would be given to the working classes of London of which they were sorely in need. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by stating that he thought the House would do wisely to pass a Bill of this kind, the proposal of which was undoubtedly a bona fide one. The promoters urge exactly the same reasons now. They say that if the Bill is passed

there will be a further extension of time for three years for the construction of the line, and that—

"The amount of money to be paid for wages and the purchase of materials cannot fail to benefit trade most materially."

To that proposition I am perfectly agreed; but what induced me to set down on the Paper a Notice of opposition to the Bill was, that during the whole of this time the neighbourhood affected by the proposed railway has been kept in a state of suspense, and the owners and occupiers of property have been most prejudicially affected. I could give many instances of this, but I will content myself with one—the example of Christ's Church in Maida Vale. I believe that that Church stood in need of repair, but the congregation have been unable to place it in a proper condition owing to the uncertainty which existed in regard to the progress of this Bill; for the Church, being in the prescribed area of the provisions of the Bill, would have to be under-pinned. This is only one of the cases of inconvenience and injury which the Bill has occasioned owing to the promoters not having taken steps to acquire possession of the property scheduled in the Bill. As a necessary consequence, a considerable amount of property has suffered most severely. Assurances, however, have been given to me and to other hon. Members that if this Bill is passed there will be a genuine attempt to commence the work within the next 12 months, and that the capital will very shortly be raised.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

MR. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to several Bills.

REGENT'S CANAL, CITY, AND DOCKS RAILWAY BILL.

MR. LAWSON resumed. There can be no doubt that the works proposed to be constructed under this Bill will be of great convenience and utility to the inhabitants of the Metropolis generally; and I think the promoters have made a weighty statement when they assure the House that the capital has already been almost subscribed, and that they propose to commence the works at once, and certainly within the present year.

Mr. Lawson

If that be so, and I believe they mean to commence the undertaking, I shall be very glad to withdraw my opposition to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I thought it necessary, last week, on behalf of my constituents, to put down a Motion for the rejection of the second reading of the Bill which I now wish to withdraw, for very similar reasons to those which have been given by the hon. Member (Mr. Lawson). There has been a considerable amount of anxiety in the neighbourhood through which this railway is to be constructed, to secure the commencement of the works. It is now some five years since the original Act was passed; and the House will fully understand the great disappointment which has been felt, especially since 1885, by those who looked forward to a large amount of employment in consequence of the construction of the railway. I have, however, been privately informed by the promoters that there is now every reason to believe that they will be able speedily to go on with the work, and, therefore, I beg to withdraw my opposition to the present stage of the Bill. I shall, however, be prepared to renew it if I find at the next stage that matters are not in a satisfactory state.

MR. PIOTON (Leicester): I also beg to withdraw the Notice of opposition which stands in my name on the Paper, partly on the same grounds as those which have been advanced by the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) and the hon. Member for East Finsbury (Mr. J. Rowland); but partly on another consideration, and one which I think also requires attention. This intended line will pass through the North Western portion of Regent's Park, and will practically divide it into two. It is feared that the construction of the line may inflict a great deal of damage upon this neighbourhood, and unless great care is taken in carrying out the works, permanent injury may be done to one of the principal resorts of the Metropolis, which in the spring and summer months is the delight of many thousands of the London people. The walk along the side of the canal extends for about half-a-mile in that part, and is really very attractive. In the summer time you will see crowds of children and grown-up people disporting themselves there for a holiday. This railway, it is feared, may destroy the amenities of this part of the Regent's Park altogether. I believe that this objection was taken when the Bill was originally brought forward, but after this neighbourhood, as well as others in the Metropolis, has been kept in a state of suspense and uncertainty, and has suffered so much damage during the last five years, I think they have a right to ask the Committee who will deal with the Bill to take such additional precautions as may be necessary to provide that these parts of the Regent's Park shall be secured for the enjoyment of the people. I do not wish to press my opposition to the Bill at the present moment, but I reserve to myself the right of doing so in case the duties which, in my opinion, lie on promoters of the measure are not properly fulfilled.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I think it is satisfactory to find that the opponents of the Bill have practically withdrawn their opposition. Trade in this locality has been considerably depressed, and it will be of great advantage to the working classes that the line should be constructed. Owing to the depression of trade, the Company have not hitherto been able to raise the capital which they were authorized to raise. But I am now informed that if this House will give them an extension of time, they will be able to raise the necessary capital; and the construction of the line will no doubt afford a very useful means of communication between this district and the Great Western system, the London and North Western system, the Great Northern at King's Cross, and the Midland at St. Pancras. By means of this line, communication will be opened between all those important railway systems and the London Docks, and there will consequently be a considerable decrease in the cost of bringing coals from the Midland Counties to the London Docks. The line will also be of great advantage to the working classes, seeing that they will also be able to be conveyed for a distance of 12 miles at $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a mile. It will also give a large amount of employment to the unemployed, because I understand that the promoters propose to spend some-like £3,000,000. When the Bill before the Committee, and if it is found that the promoters are in a position to raise the capital, I am told that the passing of the Bill will result in an expenditure of £10,000 a-week among the working classes of the Metropolis. I am, therefore, glad to see that hon. Gentlemen have withdrawn their opposition to the Bill, and I venture to hope that it will be sent up to a Select Committee, by whom, no doubt, it will be carefully considered and sent back to this House.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that when the Bill was brought in, there were circumstances connected with it which induced me to oppose it. The proposition which I most strongly objected to was one for the payment of interest out of capital. I maintain that that was a provision which ought not to receive the sanction of this House. The proposal was defended by the right hon. member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who was then President of the Board of Trade, on the very plea which has been put forward now—namely, that the construction of these works would provide a large amount of employment for the poor of the Metropolis. Since then, no doubt, years of depression have passed over our heads; but the employment anticipated has not been provided, and the principle of paying interest out of capital has been found to be inoperative. I venture to say that as long as fraudulent principles of this kind are sanctioned in a Private Bill, the public will continue to treat them with the discredit they deserve. I do not desire to oppose the further progress of this Bill; but if capital is to be used in this country in the employment of the poor, it must be spent in those things which are productive and not dead, and when the capital reproducing again finds employment for other people. Many of the speculations sanctioned by this House have, in my humble opinion, interfered with the interests of those who have to send traffic over the railways. No doubt this House has the right to grant monopolies; but it should take care that those monopolies, when granted, are carefully and properly used. When you begin to spend double what is required for the regular object, it is plain that the principle is one which must in the end be detrimental to the best interests of the trading community. I will not occupy the time of the House with further observations upon this Bill; but as long as these clauses remain in it for paying interest out of capital, I believe the shares will not be taken up by the public.

MR. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I am very glad that the hon. Members have withdrawn their opposition to this Bill at this stage. I support the Bill for this reason: Hon. Members will notice that the Great Western is the great coal-carrying railway to and from South Wales. The Great Western Company carry coals from places in South Wales for something like 6s. 3d. per ton; but in order to take them from Paddington down to the London Docks, they are charged at such a rate as practically prevents them from using the Great Western Railway for the carriage of coals. Therefore it is that I am so much interested in this Bill, and that I am glad that the opposition is withdrawn. The charge of 2s. 6d. per ton now imposed will, I believe, be reduced to 1s. 1d. if this Bill is allowed to proceed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

BELFAST MAIN DRAINAGE BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration of Lords Amendments read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Lords Amendments be now considered."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to move that the debate be adjourned until Thursday next.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be adjourned till Thursday next."—(Mr. Sexton.)

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid): On behalf of the promoters of the Bill, I am willing to consent to the adjournment proposed by the hon. Member opposite, because I believe the House is anxious that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) should have an early opportunity of addressing the House on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, and I have no desire to delay that opportunity by a Private Bill discussion.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

QUESTIONS.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES—DEPREDA-TIONS BY FOREIGN ON ENGLISH FISHERMEN—THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

SIR SAVILE CROSSLEY (Suffolk, Lowestoft) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, What is the reason of the great delay in presenting the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the depredations by Foreign on English fishermen in the North Sea, and when the Report will be placed upon the Table of the House?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Report in question was laid on the Table of the House last Thursday.

SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES—ENDOWMENTS—LEGISLATION.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he can give any indication of the time when he expects to be able to introduce the Bill for the better endowment and reform of the Scottish Universities, which Her Majesty's Government have promised?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): This Bill would probably have been introduced by this time, as it was in active preparation when my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant left the Office of Secretary for Scotland. That change necessarily caused some delay; but it is hoped that it may be introduced shortly.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF VETERINARY SURGEONS—FEES FOR ADMISSION.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether, by the Charter of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, the fee chargeable for admission as a Member of the Royal College is limited to a maximum of thirteen guineas; whether this is confirmed by Statute; whether, by the Regulations affecting the examinations for the diploma of the Royal College, applicants who have studied at the Veterinary College in Edinburgh, or elsewhere, may be caused to pay very much more than thirteen guineas, in some cases as high as thirty guineas, before obtaining admission; and, whether, in the event of such Regulations being contrary to law, he will take such steps as may be competent to him to secure that right is done in the matter?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The fee chargeable for admission to the Royal Veterinary College is £13 13s. which is fixed by a Charter of 1883, in conformity with the Statute 44 & 45 Vict. c. 62. When a student comes up for the necessary examinations and passes, no larger sum than £13 13s. is paid; but should he fail he is permitted to present himself again, on condition that he pays the fees for the new examination. If in any case the sum of 30 guineas has been paid, it must have been in consequence of the student having been accorded many chances of passing after repeated failure. I do not see any ground for interference.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POST OFFICE AT GRANGEGEITH.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.) asked the Postmaster General, What reply he received to his telegram as to the proposed post office at Grangegeith?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The Report in reference to Grangegeith, for which I telegraphed, duly came to hand. It appeared from that Report that a post office at Grangegeith, with a postman from Slane, would not be warranted at the cost of the revenue, even though the post was confined to three days a-week; but I directed further inquiry to be made as to the guarantee that would be required to make good the loss if a post six days a-week were established.

SEED SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT, 1880—ISSUE OF SEED.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, before the passing of "The Seed Supply (Ireland) Act, 1880," the Local Government Board issued a Circular to various unions, stating the maximum amount of seed which they could issue to each tenant under the Act; if the amount of seed so named was totally erroneous; if, in consequence of this mistake on the part of the Local Government Board, considerable delay was caused in putting the Act into force; if this mistaken Circular was the cause of much subsequent hurry in the issue of the seed; and, will he cause an inquiry to be made into the mistakes originating in the issue of this Circular?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It is not the case that there was any mistake made by the Local Government Board in regard to the Seed Act. The facts are that, owing to the urgency of the matter, the Government of the day authorized the Board to communicate with the Guardians of certain unions enabling them to anticipate the passing of the Bill and to purchase seed to be distributed under certain conditions. The Bill was, to some extent, modified when passing through the House, the effect being somewhat to enlarge the powers of the Boards of Guardians. I am not aware of any ground for a general inquiry into the matter.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ROBERT KELLY AND THOMAS SCULLY.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Robert Kelly and Thomas Scully have been arrested and returned for trial to the Court of Assize, recently held in the City of Cork, on a charge of threatening to shoot one Michael Keohane; whether these young men have been imprisoned for a period of five weeks, bail having been refused for their appearance at the Assizes; whether, when they appeared to answer the charge, the Crown refused to send a Bill before the Grand Jury; and, if the foregoing statements are true, what redress is to be made for the injury inflicted on these young men?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, the statements contained in the first two paragraphs of the Question were substantially correct. Upon considering the informations, he came to the conclusion that the prosecution should not be conducted by the Crown officials; but he did not admit that any injury was inflicted on the persons referred to. They were returned for trial in the ordinary course, bail being refused.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) asked, could the right hon. and learned Gentleman say by what magistrates the bail was refused, and whether one of them was a Resident Magistrate?

MR. HOLMES said, he could not say.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTIONS—BANTRY UNION.

MR. GILHOLLY (Cork, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether District Inspector Crane, stationed at Bantry, attended at a recent Poor Law Election in the Seafin Electoral Division of the Bantry Union; whether he instructed Constable Quinn to give a voting paper, belonging to a Mr. Johnson, to Mr. J. E. Barrett, J.P., one of the candidates; whether Constable Quinn, knowing his duty, declined to obey the District Inspector's instructions; and, whether it is in accordance with the Police Regulations for District Inspectors to interfere in Poor Law Elections?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The District Inspector was present on the occasion, in the discharge of his duty, for the preservation of the peace. He denies that he in any way interfered with the election, or gave such instructions to the constable as are alleged in the Question.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—CORN MEASURES—LEGISLATION.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any legislation with a view of simplifying the weights and measures now in general use, and especially those used in the sale of corn; and, if so, when they propose to introduce their Bill?

THE SECRETARY (BARON HENRY DE WORME) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The question of legislation in connection with the Weights and Measures Act is, as I informed the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) last month, receiving the attention of the Department. In view, however, of the important questions now engaging the attention of Her Majesty's Government, I can give the hon. Member no pledge that any measure of legislation on the subject will be introduced this Session.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—FORCE IN MILLTOWN.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If a large force of Constabulary, accompanied by the County and District Inspector, was drafted into Milltown on the 6th and 7th instant; if such a large force was necessary; and, if its presence there will entail any expenditure on the barony or on the County of Galway?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): An extra force was drafted into Milltown on the dates named, as a precautionary measure, there being reason to apprehend some lawless acts. No extra cost will be entailed on the locality thereby.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—VACANT CORONERSHIP OF DONEGAL.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that there is a vacancy in the office of Coroner in a district of the County of Donegal; whether there are at present only two polling places at which the poll for the election of Coroner for the said district can be holden; whether the qualification of electors, voting at the election of a Coroner, is the same as the qualification entitling a person to a vote at the election of a Member to serve in Parliament; whether upwards of 7,000 persons are entitled to vote for the election of a Coroner for the said district; whether the fact that the polling places are limited to two will, in effect, disfranchise the greater part of the constituency, regard being had to the distance of the polling places from the residences of the voters, and the grave inconveniences thereby entailed; whether he has power, under the provisions of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 37, or under those of any other Statute, or at all, to direct a Special Sessions of the Magistrates of the said district, to be holden for the purpose of fixing and determining the place or places within the said district at which the poll in such election shall take place, or whether he has any, and what, powers to increase the number of the polling places; whether he will take any, and, if so, what, steps to remedy the inconvenience to which the voters are at present subjected, and to increase the number of polling places; and, whether, pending the taking of these steps, a stay will be put upon the issuing of the writ for the election of the Coroner to the Sheriff of the County of Donegal?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I understand that no such vacancy has been as yet notified to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland; and I do not, therefore, know to which of the five Coronerships in the County of Donegal the hon. Member refers. If, however, he will be good enough to repeat the Question, specifying the Coronership, I shall endeavour to answer it.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)— ARKLOW HARBOUR WORKS.

Mr. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, What was the cost of repairing the damage to the Arklow Pier, caused by the giving way of the foundations during the progress of the works; what was the expenditure, beyond that originally contemplated, in strengthening the work to enable it to resist further damage by storms; have the Board of Works followed in any material way the recommendations of the engineers appointed by the Treasury to report upon the work, with a view to avert further disaster; and, is it a fact that a serious formation of silt has already formed at the entrance to the Harbour, near the end of the South Pier?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The cost of repairing the damage caused by the giving way of the foundations of the Arklow Pier was £1,228 10s. The expenditure of the strengthening of the work has been £3,085. The Board of Works has followed in a material way the recommendations of the engineers; but at the unanimous request of the Town Commissioners and the Local Committee, who were appointed to watch the progress of the works, they did not carry out these recommendations fully. Some shoaling has taken place on the outer end of the pier, but the entrance to the harbour has been very materially improved, transhipment by lighters not being required, as heretofore. It is probable that still further improvements would be effected by the completion of the north groin.

LABOURERS' ACTS (IRELAND)—WORK-ING OF THE ACTS.

Mr. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will give a Return, in the form shown on to-day's Paper, showing the working of the Labourers' Acts (Ireland), from the beginning up to the 25th March, 1887?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have no objection to the proposed Return, except on the ground that it would be somewhat defective, as it would only deal with cases in which orders have been actually made, leaving out all pending cases. I shall communicate further with the hon. Member as to the alterations in the form which, as I am advised, would lead to a more complete and useful Return.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DONEGAL WORKHOUSE — THE BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

Mr. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware of the condition of the Donegal Workhouse for the past four years, through the action of the Protestant majority of the Board of Guardians of that institution; whether these Guardians, under the Chairmanship of the Orange Grand Master for County Donegal, have systematically excluded Catholics from every official position in the house; whether, when on two occasions a vacancy for schoolmistress arose, they at each time set aside the Catholic candidate, though more eligible, and appointed a Protestant; whether they refused several applications for a catechist to teach prayers and Christian doctrine to the Catholic children; whether, afterwards, they on several occasions declined to appoint a Catholic assistant teacher to the workhouse, although strongly recommended and sanctioned by the Local Government Board; whether he is aware that 90 per cent of the inmates, and nearly all the children, are Catholics; whether he is aware that Sir George Trevelyan, who was Secretary in the Liberal Government, and the Local Government Board expressed disapproval of the conduct of the said Guardians; whether the parish priest, the Very Rev. Hugh M'Fadden, resigned the chaplaincy of the said workhouse, on account of the persistent refusal of the Protestant majority of the Board to grant a religious education to the Catholic children; whether, in consequence, the workhouse of Donegal is without a Catholic chaplain for the past four years, 90 per cent of the inmates without divine service in the house on Sundays and holy days, and without the opportunity of practising their religious duties; and, whether the Government will take any, and, if so, what, means to remedy grievances suffered so long?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): This matter has been frequently before the House during the last few years, and I fear I can add nothing to the answer given to a Question in similar terms last April, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley.) It is greatly to be regretted that the local differences cannot be arranged; but neither the Government nor the Local Government Board has any power to interfere.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked, if the Local Government Board had power to disband, if he might so call it, Boards of Guardians, as they did in the case of the New Ross Board of Guardians?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; the Local Government Board have power; but it could not be exercised in such a case as this.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— DEATH OF HANLON—ARREST OF SUB-INSPECTOR SOMERVILLE AND CONSTABLE WARD.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) (for Mr. MAURICE HEALY) (Cork) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the statements made in The Cork Daily Herald of the 24th instant, with reference to the conduct of the police on the occasion of the arrest of Sub-Inspector Somerville and Constable Ward for the murder of the man Hanlon; whether it is true, as stated therein, that, at the Youghal Station, before the departure of the two prisoners—

and that, notwithstanding the efforts of Sub-Inspector Kerin, "the cheering was renewed again and again;" whether this demonstration was renewed at the Killeagh and Mogeely Stations, and at other stations along the line; whether the Regulations of the Royal Irish Constabulary permit bodies of the Force to cheer persons under arrest and charged with serious crime; and, what action the Police Authorities propose to take in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am informed that the only foundation for these allegations is that shortly before the departure of the train one cheer was given by the men in the railway carriage. The Inspector General does not approve of this having been done, and he will so inform the men. It is not, as I am informed, a fact that the District Inspector had to use any efforts to restrain the men from further demonstrations, or that the cheering was renewed along the line.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—SUB- INSPECTOR MILLING.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) (for Mr. MAURICE HEALY) (Cork) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Sub-Inspector Milling has received a favourable record in respect of his behaviour on the occasion of the dispersal of a public meeting held in Cork in December last, in connection with which he was charged with assault by the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), and returned for trial by the local Bench of Magistrates; and, whether a number of the constables engaged with him on that occasion, and also implicated in the assault, have been similarly rewarded?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am informed that the officer named, and a number of his men, did, upon the strong recommendation of their superiors, receive a second-class favourable record for promptitude and firmness shown upon the occasion of disturbance at Cork on the occasion referred to.

Mr. Mac Neill

EMIGRATION AND IMMIGRATION— STATISTICAL TABLES.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether he can give any further statistical information with regard to the emigration and immigration from and into the United Kingdom of foreigners to and from countries in Europe; and, whether he will consider the expediency of so altering the form of the statistical tables relative to emigration and immigration from and into the United Kingdom, as to more clearly distinguish between movement of population within the Empire, and loss of population to the Empire, by emigration beyond its limits?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): A Memorandum on the subject of Emigration and Immigration Statistics has been prepared in the Department of the Board of Trade, which fully answers all the questions raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. This Memorandum I will give to the House.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—WAGES, &c., OF LIMERICK POSTMEN.

MR. H. J. GILL (Limerick) asked the Postmaster General, Whether, at present, the Limerick postmen labour under the following disadvantages, amongst many others:—that whereas in Belfast postmen receive 26s. per week, in Limerick, with the same number of working hours, only 22s.; that for sick pay Dublin postmen, when married, receive full wages, when unmarried, two-third wages, whilst in Limerick both married and single postmen receive only half wages; that in other first-class offices good conduct stripes are given every fifth year, whilst in Limerick at very irregular and long intervals; whether, in Limerick, promotion is very seldom given to deserving and qualified postmen; and, whether he will consider the case of the Limerick postmen, with a view of placing them on an equal footing with the men in other first-class Irish offices?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that at Limerick the wages of the postmen are 18s., increasing by 4s. a week annually to 22s.; that these are the same as at Plymouth, Paisley, and other towns; and that as they have proved amply sufficient to procure and retain the services of well qualified men, there is no intention of raising them. I am not aware that in Dublin or elsewhere any difference of treatment exists, in the matter of sick pay or otherwise, between married and unmarried men; or that at any town good conduct stripes are given every fifth year, or at the end of any other stated period. In the United Kingdom there are three or four towns, of which Dublin is one, where, by virtue of an old regulation, which it is not proposed to extend, the postmen, when absent ill, receive two-thirds of their wages. At all other towns they receive only half. Good conduct stripes are bestowed as they become vacant.

MR. H. J. GILL asked, if these other towns were ranked as first-class offices same as Limerick?

MR. RAIKES: I believe they are; but I am not sure.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—ARREST OF JOHN MALONE AND RICHARD MAGEE.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can state if John Malone and Richard Magee were inmates of the workhouse at New Ross when arrested on the night of the 21st ultimo; what charge was made against them; by whom, and where, was the charge first made to the constabulary; whether they were arrested in the workhouse; at what hour of the day, and under what authority, the arrests were made; whether he will give a copy of the charges which were entered against them in the charge book on admission to the police barrack, and also a copy of the convictions; whether any of the workhouse officials, or any other persons, were examined as witnesses for the complainant, and the nature of the evidence given in support of the charge; and, whether he will state the name of the complainant, and give the date on which Malone and Magee became inmates of this workhouse?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, that Malone and Magee were both inmates of the Workhouse, the former since the 10th of December, 1886, and the latter since the 18th of December, 1885. The charge against them, which was made by the master of the workhouse, was that they were found, between the hours of 12 and half-past 12 o'clock at night, in the female section of the workhouse for the purpose of committing a felony. They were arrested by constables, who found them secreted there. A large hole had been broken by them in the wall of the nursery, and a ladder was discovered against the wall. The master of the workhouse and the two constables were examined, and proved the facts already mentioned. The complainant was the master of the workhouse. As regards the charges and convictions, these were public documents, and could be obtained by the persons interested in the usual way.

MR. J. E. REDMOND asked, was he to understand that these men, for an offence committed while inmates of the workhouse, had been convicted under the Vagrancy Act?

MR. HOLMES said, there was nothing in the Vagrancy Act to prevent them from being so convicted.

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND) — POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK AT ARCHIESTOWN AND DALLAS, MORAYSHIRE.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Government will establish a Post Office Savings Bank in the village of Archiestown, and also in that of Dallas, Morayshire?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The matter to which the hon. Member refers is still under consideration, and I hope to be in a position to arrive at a decision very shortly.

RIVER THAMES—POLLUTION BY HOUSE BOATS, &c.

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Thames Conservators have decided to take any effectual steps to put a stop to the pollution of the waters of the Upper Thames, by preventing house boats and steam launches draining their sewage directly into the river?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have been in communication with the Conservators of the River Thames on the subject of their proposed bye-law prohibiting the casting, or suffering to fall or flow into the river, any sewage or other offensive matter, and the effect of that bye-law with regard to house-boats and steam launches. The Conservators have forwarded to me a copy of a letter which, as soon as the bye-law referred to has been approved, they propose to address to the owners of house-boats and steam launches requesting that they will, without delay, make the necessary arrangements in the fittings of their vessels in order to comply with the bye-law referred to. They state that any closet communicating with the river would obviously be an infraction of the bye-law, and cannot, therefore, be permitted.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND)—THE DEBATE—THE CHIEF SECRETARY'S SPEECH.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will consent to refer the cases he quoted to the House on Monday, 28th, as proofs of the necessity for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law in Ireland, to a Select Committee, for investigation as to their truth or otherwise?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I do not think a Committee would be in a better position than myself to test the accuracy of the statements of fact which I laid before the House.

LAW AND JUSTICE — COLONIAL JUDGMENTS—THE COLONIAL CONFERENCE.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a measure dealing with Colonial Judgments; and, whether the amendment of the Laws relating to the operation of such Judgments in this country, and to the operation in the Colonies of Judgments obtained in the Courts of the United Kingdom, could be included among the subjects to be discussed at the approaching Colonial Conference?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): It is intended that this subject shall be discussed at the Colonial Conference; and the question whether there should be legislation respecting it will be decided after the opinions of the Colonial Representatives have been so ascertained.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)
—YOUGHAL—COUNTY INSPECTOR BROWN RIGG.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether County Inspector Brownrigg has paid the fine lately imposed on him by the Youghal Bench of Magistrates for assault?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The fine having been in the nominal sum of a farthing, without costs, I have no doubt that, as usual in such cases, it was neither paid nor levied.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)—
INOCULATION FOR ANTHRAX.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the Government will take steps to draw the attention of farmers to the success in France of M. Pasteur's system of inoculation as a preventive against anthrax, and otherwise encourage its adoption generally in this country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (Lord JOHN MANNERS) (Leicestershire, E.): Experiments in inoculation with the virus of anthrax and other diseases are being carried on; but, up to the present, the results are not so satisfactory as to justify any recommendations as to its general adoption in this country.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—PALACE YARD—A GLASS SHELTER.

MR. W. BECKETT (Notts, Bassetlaw) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has fulfilled his promise, made in August last, that, before the present Session of Parliament, he would do his best to provide some protection from the weather for Members alighting at and leaving the House; what has prevented the work being done; and, if he will have a plan prepared of a suitable glass and iron roof extending across the causeway outside the Star Court, with the view of effecting the much desired object?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): Provision has been made in the Estimates (£300) for a covering in the Star Chamber Court to protect Members from wet when alighting from carriages; and if the House should see fit to vote the money, the work will be taken in hand at the earliest opportunity.

NAVY—H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CON-NAUGHT—INSPECTION AT ADEN.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Duke of Connaught proceeded a few weeks ago to Aden to inspect that station in a Government troopship; and, whether it is the custom of Commanders-in-Chief of the Bombay Presidency to be furnished with one of Her Majesty's ships on such occasions; and, if not, why this mode of transit was adopted when all Indian troopships were required for the service of the troops in Burmah?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Duke of Connaught proceeded a few weeks ago, in the ordinary course of his military duty, to Aden, not in a troopship, but in a despatch boat kept especially for such service. The despatch boat in question was not required at the time, or at all, for the service of the troops in Burmah.

EGYPT—DETENTION OF ZEBEHR
PASHA.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Zebehr Pasha is still in confinement at Gibraltar; and, if so, how long it is intended to retain him there; whether he has ever been condemned to imprisonment by any tribunal; and, whether he has ever had an opportunity to reply to any charges which may have been brought against him, or even been made aware of the charges; what these charges are; whether it is in accordance with law to retain a man in prison in a British fortress for above two years; who is not a subject of Her Majesty; who is the native of a country with which this country is not at war; who has never been condemned to imprisonment by any tribunal; and who has never been informed of the nature of the charges against him; and, whether any individual, either a subject of Her Majesty or other, may be seized in his own house in the night, placed on board a British vessel, conveyed to a British fortress, and there detained as a prisoner, and the action of Habeas Corpus suspended in his respect by an order of the Governor of the Fortress in Council?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Zebehr Pasha is still detained at Gibraltar. On every ground, Her Majesty's Government are very desirous to release him as soon as this shall be deemed expedient with reference to the security and tranquillity of Egypt. The question of doing so is at this moment under consideration. Similar Questions to those of the hon. Member were asked and answered in 1885. My Predecessor, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, informed the House that he had been arrested on grounds of military necessity; and Mr. Evelyn Ashley subsequently stated that an Ordinance was passed by the Governor of Gibraltar authorizing his detention there. The then Attorney General (Sir Henry James) also explained that the necessary steps had been taken to render it legal. I may mention, as the hon. Member speaks of retention in a fortress, that, as a matter of fact, Zebehr Pasha has all along inhabited the summer residence of the Governor, and his detention has been rendered as little disagreeable as possible.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the Under Secretary give an answer to the last part of the Question?

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, the Question was a hypothetical one. The necessary steps were taken to render the detention of Zebehr Pasha possible at Gibraltar.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) wished to know whether this gentleman had not a right to sue on a writ of Habeas Corpus?

SIR JAMES FERGUSON: Certainly not. An Ordinance was passed in Gibraltar legalizing his detention there. As to the legal point, he must refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by the then Attorney General on the 30th of March, 1885.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) asked, when the Government would be in a position to state upon what grounds Zebehr Pasha was detained; whether it was a fact that the British Government had utilized the services of this man during a considerable period in Egypt for the purpose of communicating with the rebels in the Soudan; and, whether it was not upon the failure of these negotiations that Zebehr had been arrested by the British Government on account of having communicated with the rebels, although it was at the instigation of the British Government that those negotiations had been opened by Zebehr?

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, he could not give any further information than that given by the late Government as to the detention of Zebehr Pasha; it was on the ground of military necessity or expediency.

MR. DILLON gave Notice that, on the earliest opportunity, he would call attention to the cruelty of the continued detention of this Arab.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. JEREMIAH HEGARTY, J.P., CO. CORK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, On whose recommendation was the name of Mr. Jeremiah Hegarty forwarded to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland as being a fit and suitable person to appoint as magistrate in the County of Cork; whether it is a fact that Mr. M'Carthy O'Leary, D.L., Millstreet, County Cork, a local Catholic magistrate, refused to recommend Hegarty for the Commission of the Peace; whether Hegarty stated, on oath, at the trial of Martin Forrest, of Rathcoole, this winter, that he was bailiff to the Cork Defence Union; and, whether he owns and occupies the premises in a part of which it is stated his son sells porter and spirits by retail?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have already stated that Mr. Hegarty was appointed upon the recommendation of the Lieutenant of the County and other local persons of influence. I do not know who may, or may not, have declined to join in the recommendation. I have seen no report of the trial referred to; but, from the nature of the assurances which have been given to me, I cannot think that Mr. Hegarty gave such evidence as is alleged. I do not think it is any part of my duty to make inquiries, or announcements, as to the private property of individuals.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked, if this was the same Mr. Hegarty who was severely reprimanded by the Master of the Rolls some time ago for advancing money belonging to a minor under the protection of the Court?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the hon. Member to give Notice of the Question.

DR. TANNER asked, whether it was not a fact that Hegarty was held in universal detestation in that part of the county?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not answer.

ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES — A SELECT COMMITTEE OF EXAMINATION.

MR. MASON (Lanark, Mid) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When the Government intend to move for the appointment of the Select Committee, already promised, to examine and report upon the Army and Navy Estimates?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am prepared to move for the Committee at once, if an understanding is arrived at that the Motion will be accepted without debate.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention had been called to the fact that the House of Lords proposed to adjourn for the Easter holiday before the second reading of the Land Bill; and whether, under these circumstances, he would ask this House to read the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill a second time before Easter?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): My attention has been called to the arrangements of the other House; and it is the intention of the Government to ask this House to give a second reading to the Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Law in Ireland before Easter, notwithstanding that the Bill for the amendment of the Land Laws will not be read a second time before Easter. That Bill will be printed immediately after it is introduced into the House of Lords on Thursday.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman be content to have the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill printed in the same way immediately after its introduction?

MR. W. H. SMITH: As a matter of course, the Bill will be printed immediately after it is ordered to be brought in.

MR. O'HANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What appeal did he propose to give under the provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill in cases to be dealt with under the summary jurisdiction to be given to the magistrates?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): An appeal to the Chairman of Quarter Sessions and the Judge of Assize.

PARLIAMENT — DIVISIONS OF THE HOUSE (PAIRING) — DIVISIONS ON THE 21st MARCH.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) asked the hon. Member for the Norwood Division of Lambeth (Mr. Bristowe) a Question of which he had given private Notice, Whether the Division Lists of theittings of the House on Monday, March 21, in which his name appeared as having voted in the Divisions No. 78, 79, and 80, were correct; whether it was not the fact that he paired with the hon. Member for West Nottingham for the night before Division No. 78 was taken; and, whether he could state any grounds for having so voted in face of the recognized Rule governing the practice of pairing between hon. Members of the House?

MR. BRISTOWE (Lambeth, Norwood): In reply to the Question of my hon. Friend, I beg to say that his statement is correct. Probably from inexperience, on the morning of the 22nd I arrived about 10 o'clock and entered into the Lobby, taking part in the first Division. On the second Division, having heard that there was some doubt about the Regulations of the House, I applied to the Whips for information, and was told that it was competent for me to enter into the Division Lobby. Consequently, I did so. Afterwards the hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) arrived, and in his presence we consulted, among others, my right hon. Friend the Member for the Dartford Division of Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke), who stated that he, having been a Whip for 12 years, considered I was quite entitled to vote. Under these circumstances, I took part in the three Divisions; and I hope,

Mr. Speaker, that this may serve as an occasion for having this matter settled; for it is a most unpleasant thing that there should be any question in regard to a matter of this kind—and that a private Member should be suspected of doing something which he ought not to do—a practice which I should be the last to enter into.

MR. ARNOLD MORLEY (Nottingham, E.) asked the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Akers-Douglas), as the senior Ministerial Whip, the following Question, of which he also had given private Notice:—Whether 25 Members of this House supporting Her Majesty's Government had paired for the night during the Sitting of the House on Monday, March 21; whether, notwithstanding that they so paired, they voted in several Divisions, such Divisions taking place during the continuance of the Sitting; whether the act of so voting is not in opposition to the recognized Rule governing the practices of pairs between Members of this House; whether it is a fact that during the same Sitting of the House the junior Member for Bolton (Colonel Bridgeman), supporting Her Majesty's Government, was paired for the night with the hon. Member for Cardiganshire (Mr. W. B. Rowlands), and during the night, without the previous consent of the hon. Member for Cardiganshire, the name of the hon. Member for Kirkcudbright (Mr. Mark Stewart) was substituted for that of the junior Member for Bolton; and whether, notwithstanding the pair was still in existence, the junior Member for Bolton voted in several Divisions?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): I rise, Sir, to a point of Order in regard to the Question that has just been put. I wish to ask, whether there is any precedent for discussion in this House as to arrangements which may take place between Members with regard to Divisions; whether the practice of pairing has ever been formally recognized by this House; whether pairs are ever recorded by the House in any of its records; whether it has ever been the practice of this House, in its corporate capacity, to take any cognizance whatever of the practice known as pairing; and, whether, if such be the case, a departure from the ancient practice might not be attended with the utmost possible inconvenience?

Mr. Bristowe

MR. SPEAKER: I was informed that it was the intention of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. Morley) who acts in an official capacity for Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, to ask a Question on this point of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Akers-Douglas) who acts in a similar capacity for the Supporters of the Government. I was not aware that any Question on the subject was going to be put to a private Member of the House. That, I think, was rather irregular. I thought it would be for the convenience of the House, as a matter affecting, in some sense, the Business of the House, that I should throw no obstacle in the way of the hon. Gentleman asking the Question, especially as there was great doubt in the minds of hon. Members as to what the proper course was; and that I should allow a quasi official statement to be made which might set the minds of hon. Members at rest, and establish a precedent for the future.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): May I supplement the Question which has been put to the Secretary to the Treasury by asking, whether any of the Gentlemen referred to took part in the Division on the Closure?

THE PATRONAGE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's): In answer to the Question just put to me by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool, I beg to say that, as far as I know, no Member who was paired for the night voted in the Closure Division. In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, I believe that some 25 Members of this House, Supporters of the Government, paired for the night on Monday, the 21st instant; but I cannot admit that they voted "during the continuance of such pairs." Of these Members, 22 voted after 9.30 in the morning of Tuesday with my sanction; and, in so voting, I contend that they were acting in concert with, and not—"In opposition to the recognized Rules which govern the practice of pairs between Members of this House."

I have always understood that a pair entered into for "the night" is only intended to hold good until the morning, and that if two Members wish to pair for the whole Sitting, such an arrangement is specified in the Pair List by the words, "For Sitting." On the occasion alluded to, several hon. Members came down to the House desiring to vote in the Closure Division, but, acting upon my advice, refrained from voting until after 9 o'clock in the morning, at which time I considered there could be no question but that pairs "for the night" had lapsed. I was supported in this view by my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council (Sir William Hart Dyke) and by the Leader of the House, to both of whom I submitted the question, as well as by my own experience in being myself allowed to vote under similar circumstances after the All-night Sitting in January, 1881. With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, I had, at the time, no knowledge of the action taken by the junior Member for Bolton. I may, perhaps, be allowed to add that if any doubt as to the definition of a "night pair" exists, I am as anxious as the hon. Gentleman himself to arrive at a clear understanding on the point. And I would suggest that those who are generally considered responsible for the organization of the various Parties in this House should meet and agree as to a ruling upon this point, of which ruling I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will gladly avail themselves.

Mr. R. W. DUFF (Banffshire): Will the hon. Gentleman kindly say when that Rule as to "night pairs" was established? As Whip from 1882 to 1885, when we had several All-night Sitzings, I am quite satisfied that no such Rule was ever established. The invariable Rule was to pair for the Sitting, however long that Sitting was. In order that I might not trust to my own memory, I referred the matter to Lord Kensington, who was a Whip for 12 years, and he answers me that, to the best of his recollection, this is what has invariably happened.

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: Perhaps I also might be allowed to say that I have consulted authorities on this point. I consulted my Predecessor, Lord St. Oswald, my right hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Sir William Hart Dyke), my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University (Sir John Mowbray)—as one well acquainted with the Rules of this House—and my right hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire (Mr. Solater-Booth), who all agreed with me. I can only repeat that I am most anxious that this point should be settled. Whatever I did I did in perfect bona fides, and I sent for no Member to vote on the Closure Division, or until 9 o'clock in the morning, when his pair for the night I thought certainly must have expired.

Mr. ARNOLD MORLEY explained that his only object in raising the question was in the interest of hon. Members on both sides of the House, and in the hope that it might lead to the adoption of some rule which would be generally recognized, and he gladly accepted the suggestion of the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE. FIRST READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th March],

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of Crime in Ireland; and for other purposes relating thereto."—(Mr. Arthur Balfour.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian) said: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great pleasure to the very able statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) last night, and the observations I made were, in the first place, that the issues were so extremely grave as to make it desirable, so far as I was myself concerned, to take a few hours for reflection before attempting to offer any suggestion or opinion to the House; and, secondly, that the House itself, whether from the gravity of those issues, or from being startled by the nature of the propositions which the right hon. Gentleman himself described as extreme propositions, was—particularly on the other side—under the influence of some degree of surprise, perhaps—it might seem hardly courteous to say bewilderment—but was in a state, at least, of momentary uncertainty, when the right hon. Gentleman, notwithstanding the ability of his speech, sat down amid the silence of his Friends. I have already stated my opinion of the character of his speech, and my opinion, if I am right in the observation I made—as to which I have not the smallest doubt, so far as matter of fact is concerned—and I hope I have not put it so as to convey the slightest shade of disparagement of the ability of the right hon. Gentleman. There can be no doubt that last night was an historical night in the proceedings of the House of Commons. It was, in some senses, a complement to an important night of the first Session of 1886, when I myself had the arduous duty of proposing to Parliament what was known as the Irish Government Bill. I then ventured to state that, in the judgment of the Cabinet which at the time existed, we had arrived at the point where two roads met, or, rather, where two roads parted—one of them the road which marked the endeavour to govern Ireland according to its well-understood Constitutionally-expressed wishes, within the limits of safety to the Constitution; the other the road which had been principally marked by extra-Constitutional—some would say un-Constitutional—measures, repressing the liberties of the people, and which, if it were pursued at all, it then appeared to us might threaten to grow more and more marked and pronounced in their character. At the same time, there was some dissent from that opinion, and a considerable number of Gentlemen—with whom we had been in close political alliance down to that date—considered that there was a third course open to them, a course of Liberal concessions to Ireland, stopping short of what we had proposed—namely, the creation of a legislative body with a responsible executive, and based upon the principle of concession, on the one side, which they deemed liberal and yet safe; but upon careful avoidance of coercion on the other side, which, therefore, they declined to admit was the alternative for a plan such as we proposed. Later on, I will refer again for a moment to the opinion which has now been brought to the test. But I will only now describe the views with which I have looked upon the state and prospects of Parties in the interval which has elapsed since the Election, so far as Ireland is concerned. I know, Sir, that at the Election, in the midst of the crushing defeat which the late Government sustained, their Friends were aware that in the midst of that crushing defeat, both Liberals dissenting from the course they pursued and large numbers of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House expressed an anxious desire to make large concessions to Ireland in respect of the management of her own affairs. I did hope that we might have before us a course not so happy as that which I should have anticipated from a full and definite measure; but, at any rate, a course in which we should be engaged simply in discussing what opponents, if we were obliged to differ from them on the question whether the measures proposed by them, and admitted to be beneficial in themselves, were or were not sufficient. In such discussions I am certain that there would have been many of us who would have had every disposition to meet the Party now in power without compromise of our own opinions. Yet, to accept readily and thankfully measures which were good in themselves, and which might also be good as tending to exhibit some degree of increased confidence on the part of the Conservative Party, and those linked with them in the conduct and dispositions of the people of Ireland. We were desirous that no time should be lost by the Party opposite in the preparation of such measures; and we expressed the desire, but the expression was treated as a kind of treason against the existing Government, and we were at once rather peremptorily told that no attempt should be made to hurry the Government in its pace. We were disappointed in respect to Ireland by such a warning, but unwilling to raise controversy on the subject. And we did not utter a word of complaint. Eight months had now elapsed since the accession of the present Government to Office. Where is that fair vision of promises, falling short of our extravagant designs, but at the same time kindly beneficial, in a liberal and conciliatory direction? They have all vanished into the thin air—with the exception, of course, of the vision of the future Land Bill, of which the main thing we know is that it is admitted that it has omitted and excluded the chief recommendation of the Royal Commission of Earl Cowper appointed by the Government. With that exception, there stands before us nothing but the figure of coercion—bare, gaunt, and bald, but, alas! too familiar to all our recollections. Sir, I intend to oppose the Motion for the introduction of this Bill. No Amendment has yet been moved, but I see that there stands in the name of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) an Amendment—"That the House do resolve into a Committee on the state of Ireland." I certainly should support that Amendment as being, I believe, the Parliamentary form. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Well, Sir, I hope I have said nothing offensive. I will not knowingly say it. It is impossible to speak upon a subject of this kind in weak and emasculated language; but gravity and calmness are important, and to be valued on such matters just in the same proportion as they are difficult to maintain. I will, however, honestly, and to the best of my ability, endeavour to maintain them, and I certainly do not depart from them in re-stating what just now fell from me—namely, that when objection is taken upon the very broadest grounds to the policy of an important and extra-Constitutional measure proposed by the Government, there can be no more regular and no more convenient method of opening the question than by moving for a Committee of the Whole House on the state of Ireland, which, according to well known and familiar Parliamentary precedents, opens the whole subject of Irish policy, and enables hon. Members to bring into contrast with the course proposed the various, and, possibly, very numerous grounds upon which they think another course should have been preferred. I shall oppose the Motion, and I shall support the Amendment—if it be moved—upon grounds which I will shortly state—namely, that the allegations upon which this proposal is founded are absolutely insufficient and unsatisfactory—that they do not cover the grounds upon which alone, on all former occasions within my recollection, Parliament has been asked to pass measures in abridgment of public liberty; that the Bill, which has been described as extreme, seems to have been raised in its stringency in proportion to the thinness and the poverty of the statements which were alleged; and that, so far as I am able to form a judgment, in which I cannot expect and do not ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to concur, the measure, instead of being a cure, instead of being a palliative, will do nothing, can do nothing, but aggravate in their deepest seat and foundation the worst disorders of Ireland. This is no dilatory plea. I do not deny that the case of Ireland is a grave case—God forbid! We never should have put aside all the course of Liberal policy last year, and subjected ourselves to, temporarily, almost destruction as a Party, which we knew was our possible fate, if we did not believe it to be a grave and extreme case. But this we knew or thought. We knew that Ireland must be compared with herself. The right hon. Gentleman has returned to a subject from which he will get no profit whatever—namely, an observation of mine—a common-place observation and a truism—that, in considering crime in Ireland, you must not look solely at its amount, but you must look at its character, its area, its roots, and consequences. If there be one common-place more familiar than another in discussions upon Irish social disorder, it is the observation that in Ireland certain classes of crime are symptomatic, and must not be considered simply with regard to the person guilty and the person injured, but with regard to the feeling they manifest, and the sympathies or antipathies they draw forth. But that handy common-place observation has no effect whatever in supporting and strengthening the present case, because that comparison of crime, in the case of Ireland, in reference to character, and not as to quality, with crimes in other countries, has no force at all. Where a Government is proposing to introduce a coercive measure for Ireland, it is bound to show the existence of some strange and exceptional state of affairs, that exceptional character being measured not by the reference of Ireland to other more happily conditioned countries, but by comparison between Ireland as it is at one time and Ireland as it is at another. One word more upon the position of the House in reference to this matter. I am extremely sorry to find that the sharpness of the issue which the Government has found it necessary to raise may, and it is likely even to be, aggravated rather than allayed by the methods of proceeding adopted. In the first place, there has been withheld from us all the information—official information—which, in a matter of this kind, is habitually placed before us. In the second place, we have been required to submit to an absolute suspension of our free initiative on every subject, and a majority of more than 80 Members has sustained the Government in exacting a new and indefinite suspension of that initiative; and now the Leader of the House acquaints us that, in consequence of the fact that the Government has a certain power, which power all former Governments, on every occasion, have subordinated to the Rules and usages of Parliament, and in some degree to those alleviations of public toil which nature demands and custom has established—that those are all to be set aside, and we are told that no Recess or adjournment of the House will be allowed until the Bill has been read a second time. Do not let the right hon. Gentleman think that he entirely removes the sting from an announcement of that kind by stating that he does not use it as a threat. If I am walking in Parliament Street, and am met by a man who says, “If you walk another yard I will knock you down, but I do not mean it as a threat”—in such a declaration I do not think there is much comfort. But there would be more consistency in such a declaration, or more comfort in the alleviating addition made to it than by informing us—as the right hon. Gentleman does—that while he means to ride over us, as he has hitherto done in respect of information, and by the entire absorption of the time of the House for months now rapidly multiplying, he expects us also to do what I have just indicated. I will not dwell upon that point, and should not have referred to it save that I had always observed that it was possible for the Government, by much consideration for the usages of the House, and even some for their opponents, to avoid sharpening, and to procure mitigation, of the bitterness of political strife. Now, Sir, what is the case made by the right hon. Gentleman? I affirm that he has not even attempted to make good the allegations which it has been the fixed custom of Parliament—and of Parliaments less reformed than this, and less based on the broad foundation of popular suffrage—uniformly to exact. He has withheld from us all figures, except a very few extracted across the

Table last night. He said something of the enlargement of crime in Ireland in the last three years; but he did not refer to Parliamentary figures. He gave us no means of testing his allegations. If, nevertheless, by the kindness of a friend I have obtained what is sufficient, I undertake to show the House the nature of the ground over which he takes the Government, and on which the Government rests in proposing what they feel compelled to call an extreme measure in restraint of national liberties. He said that for three years there had been an increase of crime in Ireland. Sir, I shall decline to examine the increase of crime in Ireland between 1884 and 1885, because, such as it was, it occurred before the present Government were in Office at the close of 1885—an increase which they did not deem at that time, nor did they deem it during the months of the autumn when the Elections were approaching, nor at the close of the year when the Elections had taken place—they did not deem that the increase justified the proposal of a repressive Bill, and they met Parliament reserving that question for future consideration. But I have got—and I take—the figures for 1885 and 1886. Do not let the House think there was much change, but there had been a change undoubtedly between 1884 and 1885. There had been an increase in the number of threatening letters, from 422 to 512. That increase the Government of that day—identical, except as to one or two individuals, with the present Government—did not deem a sufficient ground to justify them in asking Parliament for an increase of the stringency of the law. I have got the figures for 1885 and 1886; and I have got the crime Returns by the Constabulary divided into “threatening letters” on one side, and “cases other than threatening letters” on the other. Now, Sir, with respect to threatening letters, they are a social inconvenience—a social mischief; but it would be ridiculous to speak of them in connection with such a question as the legislative restraint of the liberties of the people. Otherwise, we have to grant that, whereas in 1885 there were in Ireland 432 threatening letters, in 1886 there were 507 threatening letters. That difference in the increase of 75 letters, I presume, will not be alleged by Her Majesty’s Government as the broad ground on which they ask Parliament to give its sanction to an extreme measure of repression. How does the case stand with reference to cases other than threatening letters—because that is the first count in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman? He kept back the figures, but I have got them. He prudently had no desire—

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): They are all before the House.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Before the House! Before the compilers of public papers—before those who can go and bury themselves in the papers of successive years, and in the Library, and add up the figures, and do the work which ought to be done in Public Offices for them, and which, on every occasion that I have known, has been done.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman asked me for a Return of the figures a few days ago. I put it in the hands of those whose business it is to prepare such Returns—and the Return is now on the Table of the House—at the first opportunity.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In supplement to that, I may say I return my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the mercy he has shown me. I am not finding fault with the right hon. Gentleman or the Government for want of courtesy. I am speaking of their total failure to discharge a public duty, such as is, by usage and precedent, bound to be performed by the Government asking Parliament for extreme powers of this kind. I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has ever read of the way in which Lord Althorp introduced the Coercion Bill of 1833—the great precursor of an important series of measures? He will find that Lord Althorp did as Mr. Forster did in 1881. He at once put before the House the necessary information. I will not go further in this matter. I will at once put the House in possession of the whole breadth and substance of the Government's case. The right hon. Gentleman went so far towards enlightening us when he came to the point of his speech last night as to say that there had been an increase for the years 1885 and 1886, which I am going to test. The cases reported in 1885, other than threatening letters, were 512. The cases reported in 1886—which the right hon. Gentleman describes as exhibiting an increase of crime that has had to do with and apparently forms the main part of the foundation for the demand for what he calls an extreme measure—had risen—how much does the House think—from 512 to 518. [Laughter from the Home Rulers and cheers.] I shall make good my point—my first assertion—of the total insufficiency of the allegations of the right hon. Gentleman in support of his demand of such a grave and extreme nature.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said I did not rely on these figures.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: If the right hon. Gentleman did not rely upon them, why did he use them? That does not in the least mend his case, because our contention is—and it is proved by Parliamentary history—that the right hon. Gentleman, as the practice of Parliament invariably has been, has failed to produce and make good these allegations of an exceptional extension of the prevalence of crime, as the necessary ground for an application for increased stringency of the law. I ask the Government to meet that allegation, and overthrow it if they can. Then the right hon. Gentleman does not rely upon an exceptional state of crime in order to justify the case for coercion. He does not rely upon that which all Governments and all Parliaments have been accustomed to give as an essential condition. Well, Sir, was his account of the charges of the Judges complete? I get no answer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What was the point?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My words are—Were the accounts of the Judges' charges complete?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman asks for an answer. I think my account of the Judges' charges was complete—for the counties I mentioned.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What does the right. Gentleman say in regard to the County of Tipperary? Did not he quote anecdotes of outrages there? I believe he did in the County of Tipperary. The County of Tipperary, then, was within his view. Why did not he give the Judge's charges there? I have the honour of knowing that Judge, because he was Solicitor and Attorney General in a Government with which I had the honour to be associated; and he is a man whose abilities are well known to many hon. Members of this House. But the charge of that Judge was totally contrary in its effect to the apparent bearings of the charges quoted by the right hon. Gentleman; and I again ask, why have we not an impartial and complete representation—if it was to be made at all—of the charges of the Judges? And, Sir, what were the charges quoted by the right hon. Gentleman, as far as the extracts are made to enable us to judge? The rest of the charges I have not had an opportunity of reading. They were totally different, I will only say, from the charges which I have commonly heard quoted to influence debate, as having been delivered by Judges; because the charges upon which I have known reliance to be made have been charges in which the Judge was dealing with judicial facts, and gave his opinion upon those judicial facts, and, consequently, could have his opinion tested by men of ordinary reason and information. But these charges were passages detached altogether from the consideration of judicial facts. They were passages soaring into the region of speculation. In more cases than one the only judicial fact noticed by the Judge was the smallness and the fewness of the offences; and then the Judge indulged in reasonings in order to prove that with this absence of extensive crime there was a most formidable state of things, in which the Judge may be right or wrong, but in respect of which he carried no judicial authority whatever. He is entirely exempted himself from those tests to which, in his ordinary duty, he is subject when he is dealing with judicial facts in a judicial manner. Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman goes on from the charges of the Judges to the anonymous evidence. I am far from saying such information must necessarily be unreliable; but the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be under the impression that when a Minister or a Government has had certain information, and has satisfied himself upon it, he has nothing to do but to come down to this House and state that he has satisfied himself upon it, and thereupon obtain increased stringency of the law. Again, it appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman's Government have emancipated themselves from all regard for Parliamentary precedent and usage.

There is an alternative. When they have got a very grave state of facts, either in Ireland or in a Colony, or in any portion of the country, it sometimes happened that it would be too great a responsibility for the Government to take upon itself the production of the names of all the persons who have been instrumental in establishing that state of facts. That I admit; but the course that is repeatedly taken, and which was taken by the Government, is to go to a Committee of this House, to lay before that Committee the facts and the names, and it is in the discretion of that Committee to call for further proceedings, and then for the Government to come to this House fortified with the judgment of that Committee formed from all quarters of the House. Why has that not been done? I decline to accept unanimous assurances that the right hon. Gentleman seems to think, for the first time, so far as I know, that this duty ought to be imposed upon Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned one pointed case of outrage, where the name was withheld. He mentioned one horrible case of an outrage—I am not sure whether the name was Hogan—an outrage upon a girl, where her hair was removed and pitch poured upon her head. It was a very bad and abominable outrage indeed. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking with perfect simplicity, appeared to think that removing of the hair and pouring pitch upon the head was a Nationalist invention. If he turns to his Irish history, he will find it was an invention of the Governors of Ireland. It was the practice of the soldiery and the yeomanry, in whose traditions some hon. Members of this House have declared their glory, in the unhappy and disgraceful period preceding the unhappy incorporating Union. The right hon. Gentleman quoted another case in which I do not know why the name was withheld—a case in which a tradesman had apologized to the National League for having unwarily dealt with some persons that he ought not to have dealt with. Why should the gentleman's name be withheld? He had made good, apparently, his footing with the National League. He had what is called eaten humble pie. He had nothing to fear. If the gentleman's name was withheld, it was withheld for fear he should be Boycotted from very different quarters, and I must presume that there were possibly very good reasons for withholding the name. Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to the point that referred to Boycotting. Some hon. Gentlemen, under an irregular impulse, which it is always best to endeavour to suppress, cried out—"How many of those Boycotted were Protestant Home Rulers?" The right hon. Gentleman sneeringly said—"Is there such a thing as a Protestant Home Ruler outside of this House?" Yes, Sir; there are Protestant Home Rulers, and there are Protestant Home Rulers who have come under the lash, not for their Protestantism, but for their Home Rule, notwithstanding their Protestantism. The cases are very rare in which Boycotting does anything worse—and God knows that is bad enough—than to deprive people of the sole and honourable means of subsistence—some persons on account simply of disapproval of their political opinions. Well, Sir, I had a case made known to me a few weeks ago, when I was called upon to subscribe for the support of a Protestant clergyman who was turned out of his curacy in the Disestablished Church for this reason—and no other reason was even alleged—that he was a Protestant Home Ruler. The right hon. Gentleman, if he will examine a little, will find that there are not only Protestant Home Rulers, of whom he may hear in the course of time, but likewise that there are Protestant Home Rulers who have suffered for their opinion. Well, Sir, I come to the subject of Boycotting. That really, I think—as far as I can pretend to give an opinion—is pretty well the foundation of the case of the right hon. Gentleman, because the rest—and particularly this part of it—is either of a very insufficient character, or is so shrouded by the anonymous, that it is hardly fit that ordinary Members of Parliament should intrude into all that mystery and reserve. But the Boycotting can be dealt with, and the figures which the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to give us across the Table at our request showed that there was a total of 836 persons in Ireland either partially or totally Boycotted. Now, that, I am not wrong in saying, appears to be a principal part—aye, the principal part—of the foundation for this extreme demand which is made on the House. Well, Sir, has that ever happened before? What happened in October, 1885? In October, 1885, there were partially Boycotted 714, totally Boycotted 165—total, 879. The Government have 836 cases, and they form a conclusive ground for changing the law in respect of liberty. But in 1885 there were 879 such cases, and they formed no such ground at that date, which was a month before the General Election. And not only so, but Lord Salisbury grappled with the fact that there existed this large number of Boycotted cases, and he boldly contended that they formed no ground for legislation, and it could not be dealt with by legislation. I ask any Member of the Government who may next enter into this debate to show us the difference between the Boycotting which prevailed in 1885, and which was inaccessible to legislation, and the Boycotting of 1887, which not only is to be accessible to legislation, but which is to form a main—the main—ground of the demand of the Government for it. Beyond this, what have we from the right hon. Gentleman except generalities? Intimidation! "Intimidation," says a Member of the Government, in citing from a high authority—namely, Sir Redvers Buller—"Intimidation is rampant." Yes, Sir; but there is a point of the utmost importance to be observed in order to form a sound and thorough comprehension of what is meant by intimidation. Exclusive dealing, which in the general sense of Boycotting—at any rate, of Boycotting until it assumes an extravagant form—is divided by a thin and fine line from intimidation. Intimidation is a word which requires much sifting and scrutiny before you can judge what value attaches to it as the demand for extra-Constitutional legislation. Now, Sir, there is one mark which attaches to intimidation in its grosser forms which is infallible, and it is this—that intimidation, wherever it is real and prompted by an illegal spirit, breaks out into crime. In 1881, when we had to propose a great measure of coercion with respect to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) says—and, I believe, rightly—that it was an ill-chosen measure, our proposition was this—that as to the agitation which was then carried on—whether we were right or wrong is not now the question—the question is what

allegation we made and what allegation was generally accepted by the House and felt to be generally necessary for our case—the allegation we made was that “wherever agitation went crime dogged its footsteps,” and through the country crime increased, and not only intimidation, but intimidation with crime and outrage, were becoming rife through the land in proportion as the movement then going on, being generally against the payment of rent, gained head. But now the admission has been generally made by men giving a cordial and almost a delighted support to Her Majesty’s Government, though some of them sit on this side of the House—the admission has been made that the intimidation which now prevails in Ireland is generally detached from crime and outrage. Do not let them suppose that I am endeavouring to entrap them in quoting that admission or assertion of theirs. Nothing of the kind. It is no dangerous admission or assertion made by them. It lies upon the face of the facts, because, whereas the essential condition of any legitimate or tolerable application for increased stringency of the Criminal Law is that you should prove the exceptional predominance and prevalence of outrage, it is admitted and undeniable that at this moment there is no such exceptional prevalence and predominance of outrage. Therefore, Sir, this intimidation, which is said to be rampant, and which I have no doubt in certain parts of the country is rampant—and it is a very painful circumstance that it should be rampant against any individuals in the exercise of their legal rights—this intimidation seems to be generally separated from outrage. That is the last ground upon which the Government appears to place this extraordinary demand for what they describe as an extreme measure. We have, therefore, this extraordinary state of things—that the demand is now made upon the reformed House of Commons to do what, in my opinion, would be one of the most formidable breaches of trust that any popular Assembly possibly could perpetrate. [Laughter.] I wish I could qualify these words. I do not dispute the taste of hon. Gentlemen. On the contrary, I assure them that if I use a word beyond the necessities of the case, as I measure it, I would gladly soften it. In my opinion, it would be one of the very gravest and grossest breaches of trust which a Representative Assembly could commit to relax the conditions upon which alone it has been its rule to give a sanction to changes in the Criminal Law for the purpose of giving it increased stringency against a particular portion of Her Majesty’s subjects. No case, Sir, in my judgment, has been made for such a demand; there has not even been, I might almost say, the shadow of a case presented to satisfy the ordinary conditions; while on the other side there has been a candid confession of the absence of evidence. The right hon. Gentleman has been good enough to give us a sketch of the provisions of the Bill. It was no fault of his if a person like myself, or many other persons, felt it impossible to form any accurate estimate of the exact value and extent of each provision as he delivered it. We shall certainly ask for full opportunity to examine its provisions when they come before us in proper shape. We shall ask and press reasonable requests to the effect that, in the first place, every Representative of an Irish constituency, and, in the second place, that every Representative of a constituency on this side of the water who values liberty himself, or who knows that it is valued by those who sent him here, shall have full and ample opportunity to sift and scrutinize and weigh the extreme proposals which the Government have felt it their duty to place now before us. I shall not, therefore, go into particulars now; but I shall mention only two points. The first is, that Irish trials in the cases defined by the right hon. Gentleman are to be held in London before English juries. There have been some sinister predictions in the newspapers of a proposal of this kind. I thought it my duty to the Government not to believe them. I did not believe that I should live to see the day when a proposal so wounding, so insulting, so exasperating, so utterly in contrast with the whole of the lessons that Irish history teaches, would have been submitted to a British House of Commons. We shall have an opportunity of saying more upon this when we have the exact definition before us. But this I know—that a trial by jury means trial by our Peers—trial by those who are as nearly as possible in the same circumstances—according to the favourite language of modern science, in the same environment—with ourselves, that this is the exact reversal of that fundamental principle that, whenever we do interfere with trial by jury, it is above all things to be desired that you should avoid the capital and fatal error of sacrificing the substance while you keep the form; and that nothing can be worse than to give to the Irishman the cruel and the grievous wound that such a proposal as this would inflict. I never saw such a blow struck at the national feeling of Ireland. I may be quite wrong—I have no authority on the subject—but the impression I derive from anything I know about the history of Ireland is that an Irishman feels and suffers more profoundly in his nationality than in any other thing whatever. I might, perhaps, quote a famous sentiment of Mr. O'Connell to illustrate in some degree my meaning. Mr. O'Connell, as a very young man of perhaps 25, took an active part and gained his first distinction as an opponent, together with the bulk of the Irish Bar—much to their honour—of the measures of the British Government and a portion of the ascendancy party in enforcing the Legislative Union of Ireland against the will of the nation. Mr. O'Connell, as a lawyer, defended his social position, but he solemnly and publicly declared that whatever his own individual position might be, he would far rather see the whole of the Penal Laws restored by an Irish Parliament and an Irish authority, and continue to subsist in Ireland under Irish authority, than he would see a law pass for the purpose of giving away the national existence of Ireland by the extinction of her Parliament exercising that authority. I think if hon. Gentlemen opposite would construe that declaration in the spirit in which it was uttered, they would feel that there was a great deal of nobleness in that declaration, and that the country where it was uttered was a country where national feeling was, above all things, within the limits of safety and prudence, to be considered. Well, Sir, before people condemn that excess of national feeling, if it be an excess, they should recollect how the whole history of Ireland has gone to intensify that feeling, and to make it the governor and the regulator of every other feeling that the people possessed. If that be so, I must own I do not believe—I make no complaint, imputation, or insinuation against the honest intention with which this provision has been devised—but I claim my right to form an impartial estimate of it. I do not believe the wit of man could possibly have devised a scheme more likely to aggravate every mischief that exists in Ireland, and to stimulate rather than allay the anti-national feeling of hatred and enmity. I would say one word with reference to the provision, or rather absence of provision, as to duration. The right hon. Gentleman humorously said that the absence of limitation of time compensated for the presence of the limitation of space—a limit, however, apparently entirely dependent on the will of the right hon. Gentleman and the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I used the words “intentional limitation.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Well, Sir, that I must say makes one's blood run cold. It is, indeed, a very sad state of things that, after 87 years of the working of the Legislative Union—which was, no doubt, intended by many even of those who used such incredibly guilty means to effect it, to be the harbingers and certain seal of peace and goodwill between the two countries—after three generations of men have gone on cobbling at the business of coercion, struggling as we could—with good intentions, no doubt, and here and there with intervals when the sun of liberty might rise unclouded upon Ireland—at least for a time—that now, what we proposed as a temporary remedy is to become a rule for the subsistence of the Irish people. The brand of inferiority is to be placed on them for ever, and they, in the full enjoyment of a representative system, are expected to acquiesce in, to welcome, and to embrace and hug the law which salutes them with such favours. In fact, Sir, this is the first attempt, as far as I know, to work into an affirmative proposition the contrary to that which has often been delivered in this House as a negative proposition. I believe it was the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) who first declared that “force is no remedy,” and that expression has in our hearts and sentiments obtained an almost universal acceptance. We are now called upon to entirely reverse the order of our thoughts and proceedings on this point, and to support a Bill which embodies the affirmation of the principle that force is a remedy. This Bill, it will not be denied, is a complex one when considered as a Bill to amend the Criminal Law. All I heard of it last night—although I must not presume to speak as a lawyer—shows that it is a complex measure, and I need not apologize to the House for not endeavouring to enter further into its provisions, such as in their general character they have been described by the Government. Now, by whom are these provisions to be carried into law? We have been challenged by the Government to give our support to the Advisers of the Crown, and it becomes necessary to examine the question not only of what is the action, but who are to be the agents. Of course, the principal agents must be that Party which constitutes the largest—by much the largest—of the four minorities into which this House is divided. They will supply numerically the strength of the Divisions by which the matter will be decided. What is their responsibility? In my opinion, a very great responsibility, and yet, at the same time, as far as I can judge, it is far from being the greatest. If this Bill is to be carried, I cannot despair that some of these Gentlemen—I cannot but cherish the hope that if they think the case produced by the Government requires coercive provisions, would yet shrink from some portions at least of this Bill, especially from such unheard-of portions as those to which I have lately referred. I cherish that hope, and will not abandon it, because I have seen this—that Gentlemen of Conservative opinions go to Ireland with upright English minds, and warm English hearts, though perhaps with a bias against Ireland, to a certain extent, but with no hopeless obstinate, incurable determination or hatred against her, who after a little time have come to change their views as to Ireland. I see that Lord Carnarvon goes to Ireland and adopts opinions to an extent not precisely defined in favour of Irish national aspirations. Sir Robert Hamilton went to Ireland, and for all I know he may have been as good a Tory when he went there as any. [Cries of "No, no!"] Does any Gentleman happen to know the contrary? This I can say—because I had a hand in sending him there—that he was not sent there as a Liberal, and I never heard in my life that he was a Liberal. He certainly had not the smallest element of a Home Ruler in him; but he appeared to me a fair average of the best men in the British Civil Service, with, probably, no strong political opinions. Undoubtedly, all his prepossessions were adverse to Home Rule, but his mind and his heart were open, and I should like to know what hon. Gentlemen think were his sentiments when he left? Well, Sir, I will not speak of other distinguished gentlemen; but I know there are other distinguished gentlemen in the Irish Civil Service at this moment who have gone to Ireland and undertaken practical work in connection with the Land Act, and who have, in consequence, become profoundly convinced that it is for the interest of us all to grant Ireland self-government in her local affairs. I therefore do not despair of hon. Gentlemen opposite, nor will I presume to censure too severely the course taken by any hon. Gentleman; but they must not censure me unless they can reply to me, because I am unable to give the vote which is going to be given or has been given by the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham, by the noble Marquess the Member for Kossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), and by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James). Can I be wrong—can I deserve censure—when these great and tried friends of liberty give such votes? I am not now saying whether the vote is right or wrong. I am not censuring them—I am asking where the responsibility lies? Numerically, it so happens that although the highly distinguished section of Liberal politicians to whom I refer is the smallest of the four minorities in this House, although the Party opposite is far more numerous, yet, numerically, the cast is in their hands, but I do not look so much to the numerical as to the moral responsibility. The moral responsibility, in my opinion, covers and shields the action of hon. Gentlemen opposite in a manner such as their best hopes could scarcely have conceived. It cannot be supposed that I am questioning the responsibility of others, or that I am questioning the title and the duty of my noble Friend and my right hon. Friends and others to whom I have referred, to act according to their own consciences in this matter. They have done that. They have a perfect right to do it. We all have a right to give application to our principles, to speak for ourselves, to determine for ourselves, and act for ourselves in this most solemn matter; and to make it a matter of personal complaint and petty bickerings is, in my opinion, morally wrong and intellectually futile, childish, and contemptible. Each Gentleman retains his right of full, free agency as much at least as we do, though he could hardly do more, and his whole duty is to act according as his judgment and conscience dictates. Still, they cannot conceal from themselves that the question is whether they, and none but they, shall lay upon Ireland the yoke that is now proposed to lay upon her—without production of any of the proofs which it has been the uniform practice of Parliament to require of the Government to supply—to lay upon Ireland the yoke which would, certainly, be questioned. If I speak thus freely of others, I do not flinch from admitting the responsibility that rests upon those who sit in this portion of the House, and who form the great bulk of the Liberal Party, even in the House, and still more in the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has made an appeal to us. He said—

“I have said this was the first time that a Coercion Bill had ever been proposed without the assent of the two great Parties in this House.”

The citation of the right hon. Gentleman was quite inaccurate, and the correction that I hastily supplied—though I think it was a great improvement on the citation—was not as accurate as it might have been. I have the power of reference. I never said, as far as I know, anything about the case of all Coercion Bills in that respect. What I think I said was, that I spoke of the case of the Bill of 1881; and I said my experience was, and my language was at the time, that we never could have carried that Bill except by the general concurrence, amounting nearly to unanimity, of the whole of the Members for Great Britain. The right hon. Gentleman, standing upon that ground, says that it has been the uniform practice of the Opposition of the day to support the proposals of the Ministry of the day in the main and in the bulk. I suppose he meant, and without reference to details, for increasing the stringency of the Criminal Law. The right hon. Gentleman is quite inaccurate, and has not borne in mind the Bill of 1846, on which not only did the bulk of the regular Opposition refuse to support the Ministry of the day, but they actually threw out the Ministry of the day upon it. But the question is, whether we are, in consequence of the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, to abandon the attitude which we have taken up? Now, Sir, in my opinion, we cannot abandon it, and we cannot abandon it for the sake of the Government, as well as for our own sakes. A great change has been brought about in Ireland; and I believe it is quite true that, though grave social evils may remain in the country, and must remain until serious legislative changes take place and have had time to work, yet the position assumed by the bulk of the Liberal Party in this country has had the effect of applying a singular and a most valuable mitigation of what might have been a most intolerable evil. You must recollect what is involved in these two propositions, both of which seem to be undisputed—one, that in other times intimidation, exclusive dealing, and strong public feeling against the administrators and the administration of the law habitually broke out into extensive outrage, telling its own tale in the statistics of the country; but now this had ceased, and although there is a stronger feeling than there ever was, and a more national feeling than there ever was, with which the Government feel themselves in conflict, yet it is admitted, although that national feeling is charged as the author of combination and intimidation, that, as a rule, this combination and intimidation, whether mischievous or otherwise—that I am not going to discuss—has not broken out into outrage. Have hon. Gentlemen opposite—have the present Government—considered the enormous change that has been brought about in Ireland as regards legality and as regards abstinence from violence and crime? If not, let them listen to the case which I will give them in less than a minute as it stood in 1832, and why I quoted it in a speech last year on the 8th April. In 1832 the homicides in Ireland were 240, in 1846 they were 65.

[Night.]

The cases of attempts to kill, happily unfulfilled, in 1832 were 209; in 1885 they were 37. Serious offences of all other kinds in 1832 were 6,014; in 1885 they were 1,057. The total number of the whole criminal offences in Ireland in 1832 were 14,000; in 1885 they were 2,682. It is right to bear in mind that there has been a large diminution of population since 1832. On account of that diminution, reduce the offences in 1832 to bring about a corresponding reduction from 14,000 odd to 10,000; and the case stands thus—that the whole criminal offences in Ireland upon the same population in the course of these 53 years had diminished to one-fourth of what these were. It is under these circumstances when you find your difficulty in your way—and I do not for a moment diminish or extenuate the difficulty—that an extreme measure in restraint of liberty, and in augmentation of the stringency of the Criminal Law, first offers itself to your judgment and to your hands. Why is it that this has been the case? It has been because, in a certain sense—I am sorry to say a very qualified and partial sense, in a very chequered sense—the process of relief has been sadly intermittent. This period since 1832 has been the first period that any, even of the most sanguine and the mildest Judges of Ireland, have been accustomed to recognize as the period of reparation or improvement in British legislation. I heard an hon. Gentleman the other day, in an animated speech, say—“Surely we have a long period of atonement and reconciliation.” That was a speech made from that side of the House—“atonement and reconciliation”—and the language from that side of the House. What have been the “atonement and reconciliation?” Measures which your conscience has always compelled you to denounce. Such has been the general effect even during the whole of that long period of very partial measures of benevolence, very partial forms of amended procedure, on the part of the Imperial Parliament. Now, since the General Election of 1885, since the deliberate Constitutional declaration of the voice of Ireland, since the judgment of the bulk of the Liberal Party was passed upon that application, to the effect that it was safe and just and ought to be complied with, the attitude of the people of Ireland has been removed from crime and outrage in a degree never before known. Why has there been this severance between intimidation and the natural consequences of intimidation? Why have you totally failed to make good the proof which, in all other applications for coercive legislation, has been made in abundance before the House? Because the Irish people know that they had here a large, if an insufficiently large, body of men who had deliberately adopted their interests as the interests of the Nation and the Empire, and were ready to abide by them to the last. Consequently, Sir, in my view, if we were to accede to the appeals made by the Members of the Government and to adopt their language, we should do them no good; we should not only do ourselves, but them also, an infinity of harm; and I believe their first effect would be and must be a retrogression of the Irish people in the great social progress that they have, happily, made, an increase of the space they have yet to traverse before they arrive at a thoroughly satisfactory conclusion and a decided return towards a condition of things which, I rejoice to say, through well-meant, even if partial efforts, has in great part passed away. We have upon us, in my opinion, a very great responsibility, because although we are a minority—and it is not the minority, but the majority which prevails—undoubtedly, I grant that the numerical strength which we give to the opposition to this Bill renders it a more formidable opposition, and I will not affect the humility of denying. I believe it will carry very considerable—possibly more than very considerable—weight with large portions of the people of this country. I have a duty as well as owing responsibility for others. I do exactly the same for myself and for all those who may be at all disposed to claim partnership with me or to give me the slightest portion of their confidence, and I say for myself and for any of them who allow me to ask for them we have a power—greater or smaller—but a real power to assist the Irish people and to commend their case to the people of this country; but it is a power which depends upon their moderation and their legality. So long as we continue to find that the action we pursue has had the effect of depriving the Government of those materials of criminal statistics which in all other cases the Government have produced in order to obtain more stringent legislation; so long as we find that our course powerfully tends to produce this restraint of crime, so long, undoubtedly, we shall be bound and shall rejoice to see others persevering in it; and I trust that—be we few or many—and I believe we are many, and we shall be more—[cheers—]—and I believe that that belief of mine is shared by many men—not by all men—shared by many men who do not concur in our opinions. With that belief we certainly, as I hope, shall resist this deplorable proposal, and shall still remain convinced that in resisting it, and in serving the cause of Ireland, we are still more essentially and effectually serving the cause of Britain and its world-wide Empire.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Sir, the Government are not unaware of the immense responsibility which is placed upon them by the Bill they are now introducing; nor are they unaware of the degree to which their difficulties will be increased by the fact that the regular Opposition will do their utmost to defeat it. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, in his eloquent peroration, spoke of the assistance which was rendered to the Executive Government, by the fact that a large portion of the Liberal Party are now united to the National League, and of the restraints which are in consequence imposed.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I did not say that. I think, Sir, it was a slip of the tongue on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. I said nothing of a union between the Liberal Party and the National League.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman. I then understand that there is no "union" now between the Liberal Party and the National League; but I listened, I cannot say with what anxiety, to hear from the ex-Prime Minister some words condemning the action of the National League, which has substituted its own authority for the authority of the Queen throughout Ireland. I listened, however, in vain. I did not hear a single expression fall from his lips which would seem to condemn any of the processes of the National League. The right hon. Gentleman does not object to that statement; but, having regard to what has fallen from hon. Members opposite, who either belong to the National League, or support it, I think we are entitled to know on what ground the right hon. Gentleman can say that there is no union between the Liberal Party and the National League. Or is his contradiction confined to this—that he did not say in so many words that there is such union? In some significant words which fell from him in his last sentences the right hon. Gentleman spoke of legality and moderation in connection with the present attitude of Irish Nationalists. "Legality and moderation" were his words, and I rejoice that there is so much of these qualities now displayed in the cause of the National League—whatever that cause may be—and that the League is not stained with outrage at the present time to the same extent as, even to judge from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, it has been stained in the past. But does not the right hon. Gentleman think that if there has been a cessation of outrages it has been in deference to the union which the Nationalists have established with the bulk of the Liberal Party? Sir, we rejoice in the fact; but I ask hon. Members on both sides of the House to consider the danger which is involved in the admission made by the right hon. Gentleman. Supposing that the union between the Liberal Party and the Members of the Irish Nationalist Party should not continue so cordial as at present, and supposing the present Government to be expelled from power, and the Liberal Party to return to power, and supposing that they could not meet the views of the Nationalist Party from Ireland, where, then, would be these influences of moderation and legality? The right hon. Gentleman and his Party would then be at the mercy of the National League. [Cheers and ironical laughter from the Home Rule Members.] I am deducing this from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It is a most dangerous argument to insist on—that the absence of outrage in Ireland is simply due to a temporary alliance of Parties. I do not wish to say this by way of offence, but as a warning of danger. In the opening of the speech of the right hon. Member for Mid

Lothian he found fault with the Government because we had urged this matter on. He again alluded to the reproach he brought against us a few days ago—that we were suppressing individual initiative. I admit the argument of the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly conclusive, if, as he seems to consider, the present state of Ireland is not so dangerous to every interest, both of Ireland and of Great Britain, as it appears to Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government, and the great majority of the people of Great Britain believe, to use a strong but not at all an exaggerated expression, that the state of Ireland is intolerable, and that, notwithstanding the statistics to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, the Government would be disgraced which allowed with equanimity such a state of things to continue. We do not desire to leave Ireland in its present condition; we desire to amend the law for the punishment of criminals, and then to proceed with our other Irish legislation. Several times the right hon. Gentleman spoke of this Bill as our remedy. We have stated over and over again that this Bill is not our remedy, and that we look to land legislation to be the true remedy for Ireland. We wish to pass this Bill, in order to frustrate designs which would render nugatory our measures of land legislation. The right hon. Gentleman said this Bill stood gaunt and bare. But that is not so. This measure is only part of a much larger programme, and its first object is to secure that liberty to all classes of the people without which all remedial measures would be futile. [Ironical cheers and laughter from the Home Rule Benches.] Hon. Members below the Gangway were extremely sensitive to the slightest interruption of the right hon. Gentleman. I admit that, after his 50 years' experience and service, he is entitled to special consideration; but at the same time hon. Gentlemen will, I hope, recognize that others are also entitled to a patient hearing. I was stating that our intentions are misrepresented, for this measure is intended to restore to Ireland that liberty which is necessary to the success of any reforms whatever. Let me now allude to a point on which the Chief Secretary had much to say, but which was scarcely referred to by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, to the amount of intimidation. The right hon. Gentleman laid great stress on statistics, and seemed to argue that, unless it could be shown by statistics, that outrages had largely increased, there was no ground for interference. The contention of the Government is of a different character. We say that the very triumph of lawlessness explains the fact that outrages are not so numerous as they have sometimes been. The National League has established its supremacy in almost every corner of Ireland, and hence the absence of those crimes which before were committed for the purpose of attaining this end. Does it strike hon. Gentlemen opposite, as a great advance in civilization, that the National League is at present supreme in the greater part of the country? The right hon. Gentleman has made no allusion to the tyranny of the League. He spoke of the moderation and legality of the League.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said nothing of the kind. I said nothing of the moderation and legality of the League.

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, what did the right hon. Gentleman say? I must press him for an answer.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said that our power to assist the Irish people depended on their moderation and legality.

MR. GOSCHEN: Not upon the moderation and legality of the League?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Upon the moderation and legality of the Leaders of the Irish people.

MR. GOSCHEN: If the right hon. Gentleman is relying upon the moderation of the Leaders of the Irish people, does he rely upon moderation such as we heard in the speech of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon)? Before I deal with the particular point urged by the right hon. Gentleman, let me say a word upon the manner in which reforms are frustrated at present by the National League. I wish to establish this point, because it disposes of the assertion that we say that force is the only remedy. What we say is that it is necessary in order that reforms may have free play that the administration of justice should once more be made effectual. But I have to answer the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman and the inquiries which he has made. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman was as conspicuous for what was not in it as for that which it contained. I did not hear one word from the right hon. Gentleman in condemnation of the violent language with which the Judges of the Irish Bench were yesterday assailed—Judges most of whom had been appointed by the right hon. Gentleman himself. They were appointed by the right hon. Gentleman, and never in this House has anyone listened to a more violent attack on those Judges than we heard from one who is now engaged in the same campaign as the right hon. Gentleman, and whose speech was enthusiastically cheered by the right hon. Gentleman. Have we come to this—that the Judicial Bench in Ireland is not to be supported, or that attacks on its occupants may be passed over in silence by ex-Prime Ministers and ex-Ministers? I hope that before this debate closes we may have some expression of regret which may show the people of Ireland that however anxious hon. Members opposite are to redress their grievances they do not share in that view of the Irish Bench which is proclaimed aloud by their allies—I fear in such a manner as greatly to increase the difficulties with which that Bench has to deal. I was about to speak of free sale and the manner in which it is frustrated by the League. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that because free sale illustrates the value of the tenancy at the existing rent, therefore that boon, which was given to the Irish tenants by Parliament, is at the present time being withheld by the action of the League, lest it should be seen that there are men willing to take tenancies at existing rents? Are hon. Members not aware of this? Let me tell them of an instance. There were two tenants who were hopelessly insolvent, who owed rents for three or four years. [Interruption.] [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Quote the case.] I am speaking of what I know. I know this from the landlord to whom it happened. [Ironical Home Rule laughter.] Then do hon. Members not believe the landlord? [An hon. MEMBER: Very often not.] I am sorry once more to have to turn away from my point; but this is so suggestive that I would put it to the House and to the general public. No evidence seems to be accepted by hon. Members below the Gangway unless it comes from their own friends. They do not accept the evidence of landlords; I do not think they accept the evidence of agents; they do not accept the evidence of the police, of Government officials, of Judges, of anybody connected with the Executive Government, or of gentlemen who write to Members of this House. I should like to know whose evidence they do believe? [Laughter and interruption.] Hon. Members below the Gangway will remember that we are not speaking exclusively to convince them—indeed, it would be a hopeless task—but to put our case before the British public; and the British public will know, and hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench will know, whether it is right to disregard the evidence of magistrates, of police inspectors, of landlords, and of agents, and only to accept the evidence of those who are connected with the National League. That is the essence of the demand that is made. If any speaker says that he has heard anything from policemen or magistrates, or anybody not connected with the League, there is a loud peal of laughter from hon. Members opposite. We may understand what it means in this House; but it is not so easily understood outside the House. At all events, let us establish this point in this most important debate—that there are truthful men in Ireland even outside the circles of the National League. I must ask the House to excuse me this long, but I think not entirely unnecessary, digression. I was about to relate the case of two tenants who were three or four years in arrear, and were hopelessly insolvent. The landlord offered one of them £100, and the other £80, for the goodwill of the land, and to excuse the whole of the arrears, if they would leave their farms. No; they would not do so. The parish priest was communicated with, and he made this remark to the landlord—"If you were to offer £1,000 they would not dare to accept your offer. The League forbids it." Is not that coercion? What would be the good of our introducing a measure to assist the tenants if the National League interfered to frustrate it in the manner in which they are now frustrating free sale? Under the tyranny to which they are at present subjected the tenants can on no conditions accept the terms offered to them either by the landlords or by the Government, in any form that is repugnant to the demands of the National League. I have spoken of the way in which attempts are made to coerce the tenants. I will now pass to the point on which my right hon. Friend dwelt so much—namely, the statistics of crime; and I will again repeat what I said the other day with respect to the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley). They simply look at those crimes which can be put into statistics; and, if I understand aright the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, then, in his opinion, Ireland may to-day be in as disturbed a state as possible, the whole law may be set aside, the National League reign supreme and interfere with every department of civil life, may be the absolute ruler of the land, and may ruin the prosperity of the country, and cause farms to lie waste; but if there is no rising barometer of crime, then the Government is to stand helplessly by, the administration of justice is not to be carried out, and we are to do nothing. That has not always been the view of the right hon. Gentleman himself. What did the right hon. Gentleman say with regard to this? He used these words—

“What we have founded ourselves upon has been, above all things, the failure of the administration of justice. It is the administration of justice which constitutes the safety of the private individual, and which is the true guarantee both of rights and liberties.”

Well, is the administration of justice satisfactory at the present moment? That is a point which the country will understand, and it is one which was not dealt with by one sentence of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman cannot say that justice is administered and criminals are punished, but only that there are not sufficient statistics to enable him to judge of the present condition of Ireland. The House will remember the quotations read to it by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland as to the charges of the Judges in Ireland. They were alluded to in his speech by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and he spoke as if the Judges had gone out of their way in describing this state of things.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In the quotations.

Mr. Goschen

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not quite understand the distinction.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I know nothing but the quotations. The quotations were given as proofs of a case, and I dealt with them as such.

MR. GOSCHEN: As the quotations stood does the right hon. Gentleman think that the Judges had gone beyond their province, and that what they say ought not to be considered because they were not dealing with any specific crimes which had been committed? I do not think I am misrepresenting the right hon. Gentleman; but it strikes me, though I may very possibly be wrong, that the people of England will not think that these quotations from the charges of the Irish Judges can be set aside on the technical ground that they were not at the time passing judicial sentences on any particular crime. I wish to call attention to this once more; I admit that it is part of our case. My right hon. Friend says we have made out no case. I think we have made out this case, that the administration of justice is breaking down in many parts of Ireland, and is breaking down by the confession of almost every party in Ireland. Hon. Members below the Gangway are not satisfied with the administration of justice, and certainly those who are concerned in the detection and prevention of crime are not satisfied. Here is what Mr. Justice O'Brien says, and the ex-Prime Minister will not repudiate his great authority—

“No person can say that this country is not worse off in every respect than it was five years ago—worse off in obedience to the law”—

so says the Judge; but, as it was not put in tabular form, it is of no account, and we have got no Parliamentary case—

“worse off in the peace and security of life and property.”

Did I hear an hon. Member say this was monstrous? Is it monstrous of a Judge to have said it, or is it monstrous on my part to produce it, or is it not monstrous to disregard it? Here is what Judge Lawson says—

“The country is in a state of great disorganization. The present state of things approaches as near to a revolt and a rebellion against authority as anything short of civil war could be.”

Are we to disregard those charges of the Irish Judges? Are we to put them aside as evidence which is not worthy of the consideration of the House? Is it not notorious that for months and months past the administration of justice in Ireland has been attended with such difficulties that criminals have escaped, and that at three Assizes—I call the attention of the House particularly to this point—the prosecution in many serious cases has had to be abandoned because it was the opinion both of the Judge and the prosecuting counsel that with the existing panel of jurors no verdicts could possibly be obtained? I am, I trust, fulfilling that part of the duty which is imposed upon the Government by my right hon. Friend; I am endeavouring to establish whether or not there is a case for a Bill of this kind. But more than that, when the attempt is made to bring prisoners to justice, is it not a fact that jurors are in fear of their lives? And on this point let me deal with one of the weightiest parts of the indictment of my right hon. Friend. He spoke of that very strong clause in our Bill which changes the venue from Ireland and enables prisoners to be brought from Ireland to England. I admit the gravity of the change. I admit the gravity of any situation in which you have to interfere with that which has been the glory and the privilege of Great Britain and Ireland—namely, the jury system; but I ask in justice that it should be considered at the present moment not only what is the position of the jury system in Ireland and what is the position of the jurors. The secrecy of the ballot-box has been invaded. The names of the jurors who are in favour of a particular verdict are published. Is not that a violation of Constitutional practice? My right hon. Friend said, and said justly, that this was a great change which we were introducing; but is it not a great change that individual jurors should be held up to the odium of their fellow-countrymen for having done what their oaths demanded? We are deeply convinced that it is our bounden duty to do two things—to endeavour to bring criminals to justice, and at the same time not to impose a duty almost too heavy to bear upon the loyal and the law-abiding portion of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland. Men say—"Why not continue to try by jury in Ireland?" But do they think of the perils to which the jurors in Ireland are exposed, having to choose very often between the safety of their persons and obedience to their oaths? I say it is our duty to endeavour to recognize this state of things, and if we can to remedy it. We have no business, because we may have some objections on Constitutional grounds, to neglect the consideration of the safety of jurors in Ireland. I invite a reply to that point. It is one which has been passed entirely by in the debate. What other securities can be found than those which are placed in the Bill? There was a provision in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) for a Special Commission; but the Irish Judges were said to have objected to it. I think that jurors in Ireland, if consulted, would also object to the terrible duty which they have to perform; but they are not asked! They have to be summoned and put in the jury-box, and it is with a view to their security as much as anything else that we feel it our duty to propose a clause like this. But I should also allude to the challenge made by my right hon. Friend with regard to the administration of justice in Ireland. Let me say this—that in the year 1886, out of 1,056 cases of agrarian offences, there were only 64 convictions; out of six cases of murder there was only one conviction; out of 16 cases of firing at the person there was only one conviction.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): What year?

MR. GOSCHEN: 1886.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): How many of those were threatening letters?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have not got the exact number of threatening letters.

MR. PARNELL: Of the 1,056?

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): How many were in Belfast?

MR. GOSCHEN: All these matters can be exposed in the debate. Here are some statistics which I commend to the representatives of the unofficial tribunals in Ireland, where conviction and punishment follow very swiftly upon the commission of any offence—Out of 21 burglaries there were only four convictions; out of 43 cases of firing into a house there were no convictions; and out of 73 cases of maiming cattle there were no convictions.

[Second Night.]

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): How many people were made amenable?

MR. GOSCHEN: I doubt whether that inquiry is relevant. And yet right hon. Gentlemen say there is no case for strengthening the Criminal Law. Is that a state of things which can continue, or which it is right should be continued? Well, then, the right hon. Gentleman dealt with Boycotting and intimidation, and I really must complain respectfully of one method of my right hon. Friend. I do not think that during the whole course of his eloquent speech he devoted two sentences to denouncing any of those evils which at present are rampant in Ireland. His method was this—the old, and what I thought almost exploded, method of showing that other persons behave as badly.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): He did denounce them.

MR. GOSCHEN: The enthusiastic supporter of my right hon. Friend keeps up a running commentary on my speech as I proceed; but perhaps he will remember the case of the girls who had pitch poured upon their heads.

DR. TANNER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman—[Cries of "Order!"] I rise to a point of Order. I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman, as the Member for the constituency in which the outrage is alleged to have been committed, what is his authority for the statement which I have had repudiated? I was told—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman can state that later in the debate.

DR. TANNER: I ask the right hon. Gentleman's authority for the statement, and let him give it.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman has not listened to what I was saying. I was not charging this against the National League, or against the constituency which the hon. Gentleman represents, but it was spoken of by the ex-Prime Minister. I do not know whether he called it an outrage or not; but when the right hon. Gentleman finds a case like that, instead of simply condemning it, he quotes some parallel case. I am sorry I have caused this interruption, but I wanted to call attention to the method of the right hon. Gentleman. Not only did he employ it in this particular case, but in another which I will presently mention. While speaking of this case the right hon. Gentleman could not resist putting forward, as if by way of palliation, some similar outrage committed even as much as 100 years ago. Now, what can be the effect—I do not want to say what is the intention—of that process of reasoning? It seems intended to supply an argument to ignorant people in Ireland and to enable them to say—"Oh! the same thing was done before by the Saxon." It was the same when the right hon. Gentleman came to Boycotting. When he came to Boycotting he said that, he too, could tell of cases of Boycotting. Does that make the matter better?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I was answering simply the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I made the cases a present to the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman was answering the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who complained of Boycotting, by citing cases where there had been Boycotting on the other side. That is precisely the method of which, with all due respect, I complain. [An hon. MEMBER: Can it be denied?] I do not know whether it can. It is possibly true; but the effect which is produced upon ignorant people by that process of reasoning is that Boycotting is a kind of legitimate weapon. I should have liked to have heard a full repudiation by my right hon. Friend of the practice of Boycotting, which no one could express in more eloquent words than he could have done.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: So I did. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, if the right hon. Gentleman says he did condemn the practice, I can only say that he did so with something less than his usual eloquence.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I condemned it strongly.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman has strongly condemned it; and I only wish that he could have condemned it without reference to the tu quoque argument. I desire, however, to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman. Is Boycotting a subject with which he would recommend the House of Commons to deal, and, if not, why not? In this connection he used again the tu quoque argument, quoting from Lord Salisbury a passage to the effect that it was impossible to deal with Boycotting; but I think if I am not much mistaken that the right hon. Gentleman himself had clauses prepared to deal with this practice of Boycotting. I presume they were effective clauses, and possibly those clauses have assisted us in constructing this Bill which is to take away their liberties from the people of Ireland. Is the crime of Boycotting one that ought to be dealt with and can it be dealt with by Parliament? Boycotting is a most serious problem, and if it is not solved it will be ruinous to the happiness and prosperity of far more than the 800 or 900 people whose miseries seemed so little to impress the right hon. Gentleman that he was able to speak of them as a small number, and one not justifying the introduction of stringent measures in this Bill. But can Boycotting be dealt with? It is a remarkable fact that the number of cases of Boycotting at the end of the June quarter of 1885 was 300. The Crimes Act lapsed in August. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] Yes; and it appears to me to have been a great mistake. [Ironical laughter and cheers.] I am not thinking of the controversial part of this question. [Laughter and cheers.] I admit that the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly within his right to hurl these taunts at us; but in this crisis of the state of Ireland is it the best way of dealing with this question to hurl recrimination to and fro? Well, there were 300 Boycotting cases at the end of the June quarter. The Crimes Act lapsed in August, and at the end of September the Boycotting cases had reached 850; and, therefore, though the Crimes Act was not primarily aimed at Boycotting, the effect of the removal of the Crimes Act was that Boycotting immediately grew to threefold its previous amount. I leave the House to draw its own conclusion. It seems to me to be possible to deal with Boycotting. But is this system of Boycotting only the comparatively innocent Trade Union system, perhaps of exclusive dealing, or anything of that kind? I know that my right hon. Friend has read the Blue Book which has been presented to us; and when he says there have been no documents presented to Parliament to justify our case, he seems to me to forget that there is a large volume of evidence which has been placed in the hands of hon. Members. Well, looking only at the cases in the Blue Book, to what extent has not this system been carried so as to reach the utmost limits of immorality and barbarism? Can hon. Members have read, without emotion and horror, the case recorded where the father of a dying child was not allowed to buy the necessaries for that dying child because he had been Boycotted?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Where is this? [Interruption and cries of "Order!"]

MR. GOSCHEN: I will give chapter and verse if you want. The case will be found in the Blue Book, Question No. 24,507, and this is the extract—“Burke's child—

MR. T. M. HEALY: What Burke? There are plenty of Burkes in Ireland. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. and learned Member should not scoff at the idea of this man's dying child. The case occurred in Wexford, not one of the most disturbed districts in Ireland. If the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to refer to it, he will find it at page 24,507 in the Blue Book—“Burke's child became ill of bowel complaint. The coarse yellow meal produced this disease.”

MR. T. M. HEALY: Rack-rents; rack-rents! [Home Rule cheers, and Ministerial cries of "Order!" and "Name him!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. and learned Member for North Longford not to interrupt so continuously.

MR. GOSCHEN: Rack-rents! This man had taken a farm which he was anxious to have. It was not rack-rents. He was willing to pay his rent, and he had the means of buying better things for his child; but the edict had gone forth from the National League that he was to be Boycotted, and he could not get the necessaries for his dying child. Talk of rack-rents! There are barbarities inflicted on the people of Ireland by others than the landlords, and evictions, too, are imposed on them by the inexorable decrees of that League to which hon. Members opposite belong. But let me continue the quotation—

“He went to a neighbouring country shop to get white bread or white flour—I forget which—for his sick child, and he was refused

[Second Night.]

it. They would not give it to him. That sick child was refused what was necessary for its health on account of Burke's crime of taking an evicted farm."

That is in the Blue Book that has been read by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, for he quoted from it, and yet things such as these did not seem to have attracted his attention. Again—

"Last summer—a younger child still, one lately born—the local midwife refused to attend the wife in her confinement, and she was delivered by the aid of an old woman, who was the only person to do anything for her. The child that was lately born became ill and died. Not a person came to the wake. He could get no person to dig the grave for him, and he had to dig the grave himself for his own child. That is a thing unheard of in this country. It occurred last summer, and things are going on in the same way exactly."

These things do not appear in those tabulated statistics which are to form part of our case for the Bill. Hundreds of cases of this kind may be produced by all those who have evidence of what is going on in Ireland at this time. It is this class of misery with which you have to deal, and not only shots in the legs or violence to the person. Much of this misery is endured, not by landlords, but by labourers, and by tenant farmers themselves, and it cannot be tabulated by the police; but, at the same time, it is an outrage on the civilization of this country which we ought to attempt to put down. Careful study of the Blue Book will show many cases of the kind I have quoted—how a starving labourer is hired by a man and has to leave at the end of the week because his employer is obnoxious to the League. A system of this kind is destructive to the industry of Ireland, destructive to her agriculture, to her commercial prosperity; it is sapping the foundations of society. It is this state of things with which we have to deal, and with which we intend to deal. It has been our lot to have to propose stringent measures, I admit; but we have to grapple with an organization of which the measures are far more stringent than ours. We have to grapple with a tyranny which is established in every portion of Ireland. The late Prime Minister and his Colleagues do not seem conscious what a degradation it is to the Government of this country—of which they were the ornaments—that it should have to retreat in almost every portion of Ireland before the tribunals of the hon. Member for Cork. It is a disgrace to this country that it should have to do so. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian spoke of a breach of trust. He said this House would be committing a breach of trust by passing measures of this kind. We, too, have a trust which has been placed in our hands; we think we have a trust to which it is our bounden duty to be true. A trust has been placed in our hands by the people of the country, and the breach of trust will indeed be great if we cannot restore the authority of the Queen and the law, respect for the Judges, and liberty to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland.

MR. LAWRENCE GANE (Leeds, S.): I ask the attention of the House as the Representative of a constituency which contains no inconsiderable number of Irish electors, and a much larger number of English electors who heartily sympathize with their Irish fellow-subjects in their present struggle, and who, through me, will protest with all their power against the proposed measure. I have been struck in this, and preceding debates, with the marvellous respect of Ministerial speakers for law, and, simply, as law. No man in this House respects law more than I do. As an Englishman, I instinctively respect and obey the law; and as one of Her Majesty's counsel, I shall be the last man to say one word in support of any unjustifiable resistance to the law. It is not, however, sufficient to tell people there is a law which they must obey, unless that law can be shown to be based upon justice. It has been impressed on the House the other evening that law should be enforced everywhere against everyone, irrespective of the justice or injustice of the law. I do not admit that proposition. Even now, there are on the pages of the Statute Book many laws which no sane man would dream of endeavouring to enforce. It would be quite easy, as every lawyer knew, to cite such cases by the dozen—laws which, although they have not been repealed in the letter, are nevertheless practically repealed, and which no authority would be idiotic enough to attempt to enforce. During many years our Irish fellow-subjects have heard enough of laws; and unless laws are recommended to them, because of their inherent justice, the future will record failures as disastrous and humiliating as the past. Serious as this question is, I cannot forbear reminding the House of a prayer once uttered by one of the greatest preachers of his time, "O Lord," he said, during a great national crisis—

"O Lord, grant that we may not despise our rulers, and O Lord, grant especially they may not act so that we shall have to."

I heartily pray that our Irish fellow-subjects may not despise the law, but I also pray that we in this House may see to it that the law is not such that they cannot help despising it. Bearing in mind that now, for the first time since the Union—for the first time, indeed in English history—the people of England, as distinct from the classes, have the settlement of this question in their own hands; I think it is worth while to ask whether this measure, introduced with such a flourish of trumpets, and for which we are asked to set aside the Business of the nation in its favour, is, in the faintest degree, likely or able to deal effectually with the mischief it is sought by it to cure. To judge by the speeches on the other side, and after hearing the description of its provisions as given by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour), one would have thought that a perfectly God-given measure was about to be introduced. It seemed to me, in listening to those speeches, that a measure nobler, more statesmanlike, and more practicable than any the House had ever seen was about to be introduced. Was ever a great promise followed by such a humiliating failure? It was thought we were to have a great, sovereign, everlasting principle of justice to solve this great problem—that, smaller measures having been tried, at last we were to have a new departure, which while startling us by its novelty, would nevertheless justify the innovation. What have we seen? Simply a Bill containing the old, bad, stale, hackneyed remedies for dealing with this Irish Question. The worst of these remedies have been selected here, and put together to solve this great problem. In Ireland there is, undoubtedly, wide-spread misery and disaffection. I cannot believe that this results from any peculiarity in the Irish character. I believe, as a great statesman has said, whose voice is not now often heard in this House, that not only is force no remedy, but that, wherever we find there is this discontent, the cause is generally to be found in misgovernment. It is the Business of the Government and of Parliament to try to discover the true cause of the discontent and the misery of Ireland, and then to bring to bear upon them remedies which will go to their very root. If the National League has been the means of lessening crime, the proper policy of a wise Government would be, not to stamp out the League, but to ascertain what is the secret of its power to stamp out crime, and to endeavour to copy it, and to use it on behalf of loyalty and good government everywhere. So long as the National League promotes loyalty and order, so long we ought to work with it; so long as the Government produces measures tending to reproduce crime, so long let them be resisted. I would rather have a National League, though proscribed by the Government, than have a Government vaunting its wisdom and encouraging crime by initiating exasperating measures on every hand. Would not a wiser policy be to ask what is the cause of Irish discontent and misery? and then to bring to bear upon those causes remedies which go to the root of them. When a house is on fire, we may silence the alarm-bell, but that will not put out the fire. Can any sane man suggest that the measure of the Chief Secretary is likely to produce either prosperity, loyalty, or happiness in Ireland? At whatever sacrifice of consistency, would it not have been better for the Government to set themselves to see what is the cause of Irish discontent, and to remove it? Can anyone dream of the measure of the Chief Secretary as a remedial or healing measure? Is there a single clause in it which will tend to make the most earnest Irishman earnest in the desire to see the two countries united in a real bond of union, or which appeals either to his head for his wisdom or to his heart for his generosity? Looking at the Bill, and the flourish of trumpets with which it was introduced, has there ever been more dismal or certain failure suggested than this? Even supposing the Bill does not pass, its very introduction on the part of the Government is enough to produce antagonism of the most dangerous character, and to it is calculated to exasperate the Irish people, and drive them into acts of re- crimination, of Boycotting, and of outrage. The condition of things in Ireland is such that people are perhaps led by very extreme men into unwise action. What does the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer amount to? It shows simply that both Parties, such is the condition of Ireland, are burnt when they come to deal with it. I am the last man to say one word in defence of any outrage, or any breach of the law; but it does not do for those who are guilty of Boycotting in one fashion, to blame harshly those who are guilty of Boycotting in another fashion. What we have to do is not to cast recriminations from side to side; but to ascertain what has led to Boycotting and to outrage, and to remove it. In spite of what may be said about and against some of the verdicts of the juries, no man can look back through the long years during which Englishmen were battling with their opponents for freedom—as our Irish friends are now doing—and not be thankful for trial by jury. In the world's history has there ever been a case in which a nation has so persistently, through long stretches of time, maintained an attitude of intense antagonism to the ruling power; of disloyalty, of discontent, and a condition of misery such as has marked the pathway of Irishmen, generation after generation, without there being a cause for it? It is surely not to the advantage of the Irish people to have their country torn by these dissensions. With an elder sister like England at her side, there may be an Ireland so free and so glorious, and which should stand in the world so strong and so noble, that any Irishman may well be pardoned if, instead of gloating over her distresses, he longed for that more glorious possibility. The other night we were told that those who supported the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) were mad. I hope there is not one of us who will not be proud to be considered mad, if the other thing is to be accounted sanity. In the long run the so-called madmen amongst politicians and theologians have not had a bad time of it; for madmen and fanatics of yesterday become the heroes of to-day. Surely, the madness is on the part of those who give Ireland a voice, and now refuse to listen to that voice. In the wisdom of Parliament, Ireland was given an opportunity of expressing her opinion, and now, when she speaks through her 85 Representatives, I do not say the House ought to grant what she demands, but it ought, at all events, to treat her demands with as much respect and dignity as the demands of any section of English Members. I ask those who represent the Liberal Party to resist this measure with all their power. Has there been known in this House, for many years, a measure in such direct and humiliating antagonism to all the glorious traditions which have made the House of Commons famous? The wisdom, the statesmanship, and the patriotism of the Kingdom are supposed to be, in this House, concentrated on this great problem of Irish discontent and Irish misery. At least, those who long for a new departure have a right to say that there is not a single suggestion, not a latent idea, in this Bill which has not been tried again and again, and that in proportion to the extent that it has been tried has been its failure. Law is only deserving of respect when it is based upon justice and tempered with mercy; and the Bill before us will be found lacking in everything which can commend it to a Constitutional Assembly such as this.

MR. AUSTIN (York, W. R., Osgoldcross): I must ask for the indulgence always extended to Members addressing the House for the first time. At this moment the attendance of hon. Members is very thin.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present, House counted, and 40 Members being present.

MR. AUSTIN, continuing, my excuse for rising at this hour is that I have the honour of representing an English county constituency that contains many Irish voters, and as I have heard a great deal from right hon. Gentlemen opposite about the necessity for this measure, I have resolved at once to give a firm and unflinching opposition to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in speaking of this Bill, spoke of it as being in the interests of liberty and freedom in Ireland. When the right hon. Gentleman was speaking I was reminded of the painful circumstance of the Revolution of 1792, and of the saying of Madame Roland, which I recommend to the right hon. Gentleman, "Oh, liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" The right hon. Gentleman, in speaking of the state of Ireland, only carried us back for some four or five years. He spoke of the disorder that now reigns in the unfortunate country. But I will carry the right hon. Gentleman back in the history of Ireland to the beginning of this century. I would point out to him that the lawlessness, the crime, and the disorder now in Ireland are as nothing to what they were at that time, and the difficulties of the Government are as nothing to what they then were. Some 44 years ago, a statesman whose name was illustrious in the House, the late Sir Robert Peel, in assuming the reins of Government, said—"Ireland is a grave and a great difficulty;" and Ireland has continued down to this hour during this long period of time the great difficulty of our statesmen. It has wrecked Ministries; it has broken up Parties. During all those 75 years Ireland has been governed by coercion, and the Government declare that that system must still be pursued. The history of Ireland has not yet been written, and when it is dark will be the chronicle of the wrongs of that unfortunate country. The right hon. Gentleman, in referring to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), made the charge against him that he had made an attack upon Her Majesty's Judges. I fail to see or to recognize in the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman anything in the nature of an attack upon Her Majesty's Judges. What he did say was that they went behind their charges to matters which were not strictly within their province. I happen to know something of the public administration of justice, and it appears to me that they have gone beyond their province in those charges. It is a remarkable fact that Irishmen were prosperous and successful everywhere but in their own country. A contrast is sometimes drawn between the state of Scotland and that of Ireland, but the two countries have been very differently treated. To Scotland its own laws and its own Church has been continued without change, and Scotland has practically enjoyed Home Rule, for that which the bulk of the Scotch Members want is always done. The Government has no mandate from the English democracy in favour of this Bill, which puts the Irish people practically outside of the Constitution. If the Bill is carried, they will find themselves in a similar miserable condition of despair at its non-success as their Predecessors. No real remedy for the state of Ireland will be found until the national aspirations of the Irish people are gratified. The present policy of the Government is doomed to failure, for the rights of 5,000,000 of people cannot be permanently trampled under foot. Sooner or later this Parliament will have to legislate in harmony with the wishes of the Irish people, and thus bring about a real union between the two countries. I do not believe that there is any desire on the part of the Leaders or of the people of Ireland for separation. On the contrary, their national aspirations may, by wise statesmanship, be gratified, and at the same time turned to the strengthening of the Constitution of the United Kingdom.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) said, he was glad, as an Irishman, to have an opportunity of expressing his sentiments on what he took to be the most iniquitous and uncalled-for measure ever laid before Parliament. He regretted that he had not the language at his command properly to stigmatize the measure; he could only say that if it were passed and carried into practical effect, his belief in the sense of fair play and justice to which Englishmen laid claim would be very much diminished, if not altogether dissipated. He had listened with attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), and he maintained that as had been well said during the course of the debate, the right hon. Gentleman had made out absolutely no case for the introduction of such a measure. They had been told, before the introduction of the Bill, that the facts he would lay before the House would abundantly justify the measure; but on yesterday evening the right hon. Gentleman had laid absolutely no facts before the House. It was true that the hon. Gentleman had told the statistics of crime since 1880; but he had quoted nothing to support that contention. The Government had been asked to lay on the Table of the House a Return showing the number of the outrages in 1881, and in the present year; but they had not seen their way to doing so. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted a number of anonymous authorities in support of the position he had taken up—authorities which had been concocted in Dublin Castle—and when asked to give names, he sheltered himself behind the very convenient subterfuge that the persons who gave the information would be likely to suffer at the hands of the National League were their names disclosed; but they had had no verification of the facts quoted. The case made out by the right hon. Gentleman was not such as would warrant Members of that House passing a measure which practically abrogated the liberties of the Irish people. Had Boycotting increased so very much? The evidence of Captain Plunkett before the Cowper Commission proved that Boycotting had been quite as strong in Ireland, and had extended over as wide an area at the time when the Crimes Act was in force as at the present moment. Then the right hon. Gentleman had made a great deal of capital out of the charges of the Judges at the recent Spring Assizes. He quoted portions of certain charges made on one or two occasions; but he very conveniently overlooked the fact that there were many other charges made by Irish Judges at the recent Spring Assizes which showed there was no need for a Coercion Act. At the Limerick Assizes, Mr. Justice O'Brien, in addressing the Grand Jury of the city, had told them that there was substantially no crime with which they had to deal; in Queen's County, Baron Dowse said that the state of the country was much as he had found to be the case in Carlow; and Mr. Justice Andrews had found Kildare on the whole very peaceable; in Roscommon, Mr. Justice Murphy had spoken of the small number of crimes requiring the attention of the Grand Jury; in Fermanagh, Chief Baron Palles had congratulated the Grand Jury on the peaceable condition of the county. In Down, Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, at Dundalk, had spoken of an absolute freedom from crime; and in Sligo, Judge Lawson;

Sir Thomas Esmonde

Chief Baron Palles, in Cavan; Baron Dowse, in North Tipperary; Chief Justice Morris, in Tyrone; and Baron Dowse, in Waterford, of which county he (Sir Thomas Esmonde) was High Sheriff, congratulated the Grand Juries on the peaceableness of all these counties. The Chief Secretary made the Charges of the Irish Judges the one fact he advanced in support of his Coercion Act; but he (Sir Thomas Esmonde) would say that, if any weight could possibly attach to the utterances of the Irish Judges, it should be allowed that the condition of Ireland at the present moment was one of the most absolute peaceableness. They were also told that Irish juries would not convict; but, if that were the case, it was not because they had not been well packed, and it was certainly not the fault of Dublin Castle, for, as things went now, the practice of jury-packing had been raised to a fine art. But though the House had been told that Irish Juries would not convict, they were given no proofs that juries were so remiss in the discharge of their duties. To his mind, the only juries who refused to convict, in the face of the clearest evidence, were the Orange juries of the North, and he could point out two cases in which the juries who refused to convict were supporters of the Government. Such was the case in connection with the murderers of the boy Curran, who was chased into the Alexandra Dock, at Belfast, by a mob of Orange rowdies and drowned. The case was tried eventually at Downpatrick, and one of the murderers was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude; while a number of those who were charged with participation in the atrocity were acquitted by a thoroughly loyal jury. Altogether, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and the case he put forward in support of his Bill, was the most extraordinary exposition of a preposterous case ever made in the House; it might be best described, in the right hon. Gentleman's own phrase, as a "filled up vacuum." He (Sir Thomas Esmonde) did not deny that there was crime in Ireland; but it only existed in one or two places, and he would point out that there was more crime in England in one month than in Ireland in 12 months. If a measure of that kind was to be passed for Ireland, a similar measure should be passed for England. The Government,

however, did not ask for such a measure to be passed for England, because they knew that the English constituencies could not tolerate such an outrage on their Constitutional liberty. In Ireland there was a certain amount of crime, and a certain amount of lawlessness; but that lawlessness was, to a great extent, on the side of the Supporters of the Government; and, in any case, the lawlessness in Ireland was directly due to their action. Shortly after the right hon. Gentleman (the late Chief Secretary Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) made his speech in that House, in which he threatened the Irish Members with something stronger than batons, the Irish police, stirred, he supposed, by that speech, in one case certainly distinguished themselves in an extraordinary way. A number of police were engaged near Tralee, watching for moonlighters. They were in ambush in the house of a farmer named King, and they stated that, during the night, a party of disguised men came for the purpose of Moonlighting. At any rate, the cry of "Moonlighters" was raised. They fired, and shortly afterwards a young man named Lenahan was found lying in the house of his employer. He was perfectly riddled with buckshot. He was a farm servant, in the employ of the farmer in whose house he died; and in his dying deposition he stated that he was standing at the door of the house when he was shot by the police; and yet this was one of those cases which figured in the pamphlets of the Loyal and Patriotic Union as a Moonlighting outrage. Another incident also came under his notice. A short time ago a party of emergency men were engaged in protecting Park House against nobody at all. These men, after drinking in a public-house, came out and fired off their revolvers in the gaiety of their hearts. They reported that they had been attacked; but the police discovered that none of the firearms possessed by the farmers of the district had been recently used; and it subsequently transpired that the emergency men had fired off their revolvers in a drunken spree. At a place called Portumna, a policeman named Hayes fired his rifle into the house of a farmer, the inmates of which narrowly escaped; and yet, for this offence, Hayes was only fined the small penalty of 10s. He would like to ask, if any person suspected of Nationalist principles had fired a shot into a neighbour's house, would he have been allowed to escape on the payment of a fine of 10s.? In another case, the emergency men employed on the Brooke estate in County Wexford, whilst in a state of intoxication, threatened to fire their revolvers at unarmed people, for which offence they were let off on payment of a small fine. Almost all these cases testified to the laxity which prevailed in allowing armed emergency men to go about the country, sometimes in a state of intoxication, to the terror and danger of the people. With regard to the evictions on the Shirley estate, there could be no doubt they were being carried out under circumstances of great brutality. In one case, in which a widow asked to be allowed to remain in the house, because her child was dying, the agent refused to accede to the request, on the ground that he obtained a decree two years ago; but the woman's husband died, and she took advantage of it. That was the way things were done in Ireland; and he would ask fair-minded men if that was not, in a great degree, an excuse for much of the lawlessness which followed evictions in Ireland. During the evictions which were carried out at Coolgreany, the police rushed on the people and batoned them indiscriminately, without the slightest provocation, seriously injuring many of them. Only for the intervention of the parish priest of the district, no doubt, bloodshed would have ensued. This case, of which so much had been made in debate in the House, and in which the conduct of the people in merely defending themselves against open attack had been paraded before the public as an example of the lawlessness prevailing in the country, owed its serious nature directly and solely to the action of the police, who had attacked the people without the slightest provocation. He could only say that the wonder was that there was not more crime in Ireland, considering the condition of things in that country, and considering the provocation which was offered to the people by the Supporters of Her Majesty's Government. But the fact remained that, except in a few counties, where the misery of the people was greatest, and where the demands of the landlords were most exorbitant, there was absolutely no crime at all. Moreover, where there was most disorder the people were disorganized and defenceless, and were neither members of the National League, nor had they adopted the Plan of Campaign; and by attacking the National League the Government were going the very best way to work to stimulate secret societies. Where the people refused to fulfil their obligations, it was because they were unable to do so, and where they combined in self-defence, it was because there was absolutely no alternative; and he held that where they had done so the landlords were mainly answerable. He would ask the attention of hon. Members to the rental of an estate in County Clare, where evictions were then being carried on.

MR. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. Baronet's attention to the fact that he is wandering from the Question before the House.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE said, he would bow to the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman. He was absolutely unable to realize how the Government could have the audacity to declare that the state of Ireland was unsatisfactory, considering the depressed condition of the agricultural industry; or that the attitude of the Irish people warranted coercion, considering the gravity of the crisis through which they were passing. The Government, like every other English Government, knew absolutely nothing of the country which they undertook to govern. But this Government had succeeded, better than any previous Government, in making plain the rottenness and viciousness of the system under which they lived in Ireland. He held the Government also greatly to blame for having scoffed at the warnings given them last Session by the Irish Members, who then pointed out the dangerous consequences that would attend the rejection of the Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) to meet the exceptional condition of Ireland in the grave crisis which was upon them. He asked, what stronger proof of the incapacity of the Ministry to govern Ireland Constitutionally could be given than the fact that they had thrown the Irish people on their own resources to maintain the peace of the country during the last few months, and forced them to adopt exceptional expedients to neutralize the endeavours of the Supporters of the Government to disturb public tranquillity. The Government had imprisoned Father Fahy because he declined to admit that he was guilty of an offence which he had never committed; while in Belfast rioters were allowed to go unpunished. The Government, in fact, had shown over and over again that they could not govern Ireland, and, what was more, that they did not know how to govern Ireland. Because the Irish people had refused to take the law from Proclamations, which were not worth the paper they were printed on, their meetings were suppressed, and the people were bludgeoned. Now, all that having failed of its purpose, the Government asked for additional power to carry out their policy of fomenting anarchy. He would very much like to know, did the Government wish to stir up rebellion in Ireland? If they did, they were going the very best way about it. At any rate, the Nationalist Members had done their duty in endeavouring to withstand a measure which they believed would have the most deplorable result; and if this measure was passed and carried into effect, he trusted the British public would lay the blame at the door of those who were responsible for the consequences—the Tory Government. He charged the Government with directly inciting the Irish people to break the law. He charged them with endeavouring to stir up bad blood in all parts of Ireland by a Bill which could only make confusion worse confounded. What good did the Government expect from this Bill? What good ever had come from coercion? They had been favoured with it ever since what was called the Legislative Union. What they wanted in Ireland was remedial, not coercive legislation — alleviation, not aggravation. Coercion would not pacify Ireland, or attach the Irish people to the Imperial connection under whatever form it might be employed. Coercion had never succeeded in crushing out the national spirit and aspirations of the Irish people, and never would succeed. They had tried to govern the Irish people for 87 years, but they had never submitted to their government. They could never remove Irish discontent until they had won the affections and fairly consulted the in-ereasts of the Irish people; until the claims of the Irish people were conceded—claims which the Irish people intended, one day or other, to enjoy. They declared—and always would declare—that Englishmen had no right, under Heaven, to govern them; and so long as Englishmen persisted in governing them against their will, and so long as they refused them the concession of those rights which they claimed as a nation, so long might Parliament count upon the disaffection and the hatred of a people who were designed by Providence to be the natural friends of England.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton): Sir, the speakers who have addressed the House from the Opposition side have made no attempt to grapple with the arguments which have been adduced in support of the Bill. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Southern Division of the County of Dublin (Sir Thomas Esmonde), who has just sat down, only attempted, in the early part of his speech, to grapple with the question of the charges delivered by the Judges. He maintained that some of those charges do not show the existence of a large amount of crime. But the contention of the Government is, that it is only in particular parts of Ireland, and in certain counties, that there is serious disturbance. What answer, then, is it to say that in certain other counties there is less crime and less disturbance? Then, as to remedial measures, they constitute the chief proposals of the Government, as they did those of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone); but the right hon. Gentleman has not to-day helped us by making any suggestion with regard to the present Bill. All the right hon. Gentleman said was that the Government ought to begin with remedial measures, instead of which they are beginning with coercive measures. Surely, the right hon. Gentleman failed to observe the very important announcement made by the Government that remedial measures will, in fact, form the best part of their programme. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated most distinctly that the reason why Her Majesty's Government have commenced with coercive measures is because remedial measures would not be permitted to pass by the Home Rule Members opposite. I have only risen, Sir, for one purpose. It has been said that hon. Members on this side of the House have come here as the Representatives of the Irish landlords. That is not the fact. Anyone who takes the trouble to refer to Dod's Parliamentary Companion will see that the constituencies who have returned the majority of Members on this side of the House include among them all the large cities of the Kingdom—such as Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Hull, Leeds, Bradford, and Nottingham. Surely, it cannot be said that great and important towns like these have returned the Representatives of the Irish landlords. On the contrary, I think the Ministerial Members may claim to represent the Democracy of England with quite as much justice as the Opposition. We are accused of wishing to enforce coercion, in order to obtain the payment of impossible rents. If that were the object of this Bill, I would certainly oppose it as warmly as hon. Members on the other side of the House. What I wish to see is that Moonlighters are coerced, and that freedom is restored to the Irish tenants, labourers, shopkeepers, and jurymen. It is because I believe that the Government have that object in view that I shall support them, and I am satisfied that in doing so I shall have the cordial sanction and approval of my constituents.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I try to explain the position which I, as a Liberal Unionist, take up on this question of coercion. I am opposed to coercion, root and branch; and I intend to oppose the measure of the Government by every Constitutional method which is open to me. It is very hard to separate myself from those with whom I have been in political alliance, and to lay myself open to the charge which has already been brought against me of being a deserter and a traitor; but feeling, as I do, that the policy of coercion is not merely a tactical blunder, but that it is absolutely contrary to the best interests of the Unionist cause, and fatal to the prospects of Liberal Unionism, I cannot refrain from speaking out and saying that I shall give my vote without the slightest hesitation on every occasion against coercion. I oppose coercion, not because of Election pledges, although that is one reason why I might very well oppose it; but I have always spoken against coercion as an old, a worn out, and a useless remedy, and I oppose it on the ground which I stated just now—because I am a Unionist. I have always held that the very essence and kernel of Unionism is to maintain this Parliament intact in its constitution, unquestioned in its supremacy over the whole Empire, and in no way, Sir, do I believe that we can so much endanger the supremacy of Parliament as by bringing home to the hearts and minds of Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen, that we have no way of meeting the Irish difficulty or of governing Ireland except the old and hateful policy of coercion, which has been tried so often, and never successfully; that we have learned nothing from the study of history; that Unionists have nothing to offer for the solution of this most difficult problem, but that resort to a worn out remedy, and that we can still do nothing but attempt to govern Ireland by methods absolutely contrary to the wishes and desires of the great majority of the Irish people. Sir, I know that no words of mine can influence the action of the Government, and induce them to draw back from the course upon which, no doubt after full deliberation, they have resolved upon entering. I feel still more sadly that no words of mine are likely to influence many of my brother Unionists, and to divert them from a course which is absolutely suicidal from their point of view. I speak with sadness, because I think they are throwing away a grand and glorious opportunity for the Unionist cause. They have got a great Unionist majority in the House, and God knows when we shall ever again have such a chance of settling once for all upon safe lines this Irish problem, which has so long puzzled our ablest statesmen, demoralized our Parliament, and is ever present as a danger to the Empire. It is because I am a Unionist, and feel the responsibility of allowing Unionist opportunities to slip away, that I regret the course which the Government have thought fit to enter upon. We all know what the cause of the disease in Ireland is, and why have we not the courage to aim straight at it? We cannot pretend we do not know what the disease is. We have only to look at the past history of Ireland to discover what it is. Earl Grey, in 1846, in weighty words, after enumerating the past Coercion Acts, objected to their renewal, and said—

“Again, in 1846, we are called upon to renew the same policy. We must look further—we must look to the root of the evil—the state of the land, and the habits of the people in respect to the occupation of the land, are almost at the roots of the disorder.”

Speaking of the evictions then going on, he denounced them thus—

“That such things could take place were a disgrace to any civilized country.”

Let me read the words of Lord John Russell, in the same year—

“We have here the best evidence that can be procured”—

he might be speaking of such evidence as that contained in the Blue Book of Lord Cowper's Commission—

“and all tell you that the possession of the land is that which makes the difference between existing and starving amongst the peasantry; and that, therefore, ejections out of their holdings are the cause of the violence and crime in Ireland.”

I have no wish to weary the House; but there is one more quotation which I must give—a quotation from a speech of the great tribune of the people, the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright)—

“It is in the eternal decrees of Providence that so long as the population of a country are prevented from the possibility of possessing any portion of their native soil by legal enactments and legal chicanery—then outrages should be committed, were they but as beacons and warnings to call the Legislature to a sense of the duties it owed to the country which it governed.”

Our own Commission proves it. Anybody who has carefully studied that Blue Book will find quite enough to account for all the disorder and all the outrage we have in Ireland. And yet we do not try to go to the root of the evil, but go back to that old and crooked policy which we have tried so often, and which has always proved a failure. And there is another point which we must not forget. Every Member of this House knows what was said by the late lamented Mr. W. E. Forster—a man of thorough honesty and conviction. He said that these Crimes Acts—this exceptional legislation—was only aimed at “a handful of village ruffians.” That idea has been exploded long ago. We all know now that the coercion proposed by

Mr. Winterbotham

Her Majesty's Government is aimed at an organization which, rightly or wrongly, possesses the confidence of three-fourths of the people of Ireland. By coercion, we are not fighting "village ruffians," but an organization which, in the words of Sir Redvers Buller, the people look to as their salvation. We ought never to have allowed any organization to stand to the people of Ireland in such a relation as that, and it would not have been so if we had only done our duty. What is going to be the result of this coercion? We can easily imprison 500 or 1,000 people; but how long are we to keep them in prison? And when the imprisoned men come out, will they not come out with ten times more influence than when they went in? Indeed, I do not know that imprisonment under a Crimes Act would not be the hall-mark and stamp of a man as fit to be a future Member of Parliament; and any priest who is sent to prison will come out fit, in the eyes of the Irish people, to be a Bishop. I have, on many a Unionist platform, declared that what has been stated by many of my Liberal Friends, who disagree with me on this subject, is untrue and false—namely, that there is no alternative and no middle course between coercion and Home Rule. We have denounced Home Rule, and we have declared that we would show how mistaken a policy it is, if a Unionist majority was returned to Parliament; that we would show the English people that we are as anxious as possible to give to Irishmen all fair and reasonable powers for governing themselves with regard to their own local affairs. That was our Unionist platform. We denounced coercion again and again. We went in for equal laws and equal liberties, and I, for one, decline to be divorced from the declarations which I made upon many platforms in the course of the Unionist campaign. What we are now asked to do is to make the laws unequal and to abridge the liberties of Irishmen. I maintain that it is a great blunder to suppose that all Irishmen, or that all so-called Nationalist Irishmen, hold extreme views. I know many Irishmen who support Nationalist candidates, and yet are very far from holding extreme Home Rule views. They say—"You have attempted for 87 years to govern Ireland by constant resort to coercive measures, and by exceptional legislation, and you have failed. You have now come reluctantly to the opinion that there is no way out of the difficulty—that English prejudices and English methods are so deeply-rooted and deeply-seated that there is no way out of the difficulty but Home Rule in some shape or other." These are not men who ought to be driven into extreme opposition. The Government will be wise if they would appeal, while there is yet time, to moderate Irish opinion. I do not mean that coercion, in some circumstances, may not become possible and even right, and I wish to guard myself against saying a word that may be supposed to cast a reflection upon the conscientious and honest views of hon. Gentlemen opposite. No doubt they have come to the conclusion that they are right. I hold that they are wrong, and I, for one, will never consent to try coercion until all other means have failed. There are only two ways of maintaining the Union. The one is by a patient continuance of legislative remedial measures, not forgetting that we have not been free from blame in the past, and that English Members owe a debt to the Irish people. That is one course; the other course is the old course of coercion and brute force, which, in the past, we have been so ready to try, and which has always failed, but which, nevertheless, we are now going to try again in circumstances absolutely unjustifiable. Of these two courses I will never consent to give my voice in favour of coercion until we have tried and exhausted the other expedient which goes to the root of the matter. Put that right which your own Commission has told you is wrong, and then, having done justice to Ireland and established wise and approved laws, you can command the complete adhesion and obedience of Irishmen to those laws. It is from this point of view, retaining my Unionism most thoroughly, that I am willing to grant to Ireland local self-government; but not Parliamentary independence. I am altogether opposed to coercion, and I shall give to the proposition of the Government all the opposition in my power.

MR. W. HAYES FISHER (Fulham): The hon. Member who has just sat down may be justly described as neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red-herring. The hon. Member appears to think that he is invited to vote for what he calls coercion only. Now, I have studied the Blue Book as well as the hon. Member, and I find that, although remedial measures are prescribed for Ireland, the Blue Book tells me that before remedial measures could take effect it is absolutely necessary that measures for the restoration of law and order should be passed. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Bill of the Government has been introduced to suppress an organization which has won the hearts of the Irish people. Now, the real object of the Bill is to meet the case of the "village ruffians," which were described by the late Mr. W. E. Foster, and the aim of the measure is to meet the dastardly acts which have been committed by those "village ruffians" in Ireland. I should like to know, when Her Majesty's Government propose a Bill of this character, why they are not entitled to expect the support of the hon. Member who has just sat down? He tells us that he is opposed to coercion, root and branch; but, proceeding with his speech, it was not long before he came to the conclusion that he was not opposed to coercion, under every possible circumstance. I should like to put a case to him. Suppose, for instance, that the hon. Member dared to assume that the Plan of Campaign has been organized by men who, acting with the most perfect sincerity and honesty, have taken up the Plan of Campaign, solely for the purpose of forcing rack-renting landlords to give proper reductions to their tenants—suppose the hon. Member takes that view, then I can understand that he might refuse to any Government the power of meeting that Plan of Campaign, and the action of those who are endeavouring to enforce it; but suppose that in the ensuing winter, Her Majesty's Government have to confront this state of things—suppose that hon. Members sitting below the Gangway issue a No-Rent Manifesto or that the Catholic Church in Ireland, headed by Archbishop Croke, embark in an opposition to the payment of all taxes, would the hon. Member refuse to give any power to Her Majesty's Government to enable them to deal with such a state of things? Would the hon. Member be prepared to give perfect immunity to those who advocate either a No-Rent or a No-Tax Campaign throughout Ireland? If he says that he is not willing to give immunity to those who advocate such a programme, then I ask him if he is willing to grant the Government sufficient power in case such a programme is put forward next winter for dealing with it. I am afraid that I have not been able to discover much argument in the speech of the hon. Member, and if the House will permit me I will leave the remarks of the hon. Member and turn to the case which Her Majesty's Government have put forward in favour of the Bill. We have heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) that he has founded his case against the Bill, to a great extent, on the fact that the Government have put forward a totally inadequate and inefficient case for coercive measures. In 1881, the right hon. Gentleman stated that he attached very little importance to mere terrorism, but that there was abundant proof of the gravity of the crimes committed. That remark was made in answer to the very charge which he himself has brought against Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion—namely, that the Ministry are relying upon altogether insufficient evidence and inadequate statistics as to the amount of crime and outrage which exists in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman on that occasion told us that it was on such a case that the Government were entitled to demand coercive legislation for Ireland. So far as the Government rely upon the Blue Book, they rest as the right hon. Gentleman said he rested in 1881 "on the graver and not on the more trivial cases. [Ironical cheers from the Home Rule Members.] Yes; we rely, as he then said he relied—

"upon the aggregate of those cases and the circumstances connected with them, upon the source from which these offences have sprung, upon the combinations by which they are supported; and it is upon the total failures of the administration of justice in the attempts to detect and punish crime, and not upon those selected items and units that we rest our case."

That is exactly our case; but we do not rest upon this case only, but upon the acknowledged existence of Boycotting and intimidation which prevails throughout Ireland. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that he was very much surprised that because Her Majesty's Government, when they were in Office at the end of 1885, did not introduce a Coercion

Bill, that they should be prepared to introduce one in 1887. I dare say it may be that Her Majesty's Government are wiser than they were in 1885; but I do not think it lies in the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to upbraid Her Majesty's Government for introducing a Bill providing for change of venue and special juries to meet the difficulties of the present situation, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman in 1885 was anxious to have those powers given to his own Government, as appears from a letter addressed to the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect what occurred in October, 1885? I have here a copy of the letter which he addressed to my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland; and he states in that letter—

"As to the clauses which might be generally termed procedure clauses, and the most important of which related to special juries, change of venue, and Boycotting, our opinion was not that they should be absolutely re-enacted, but that the Viceroy should have power to put them in force together, or separately, as and where he might see cause."

Those words were written on the 10th of October, 1885; and I want to know, when the Government of the right hon. Gentleman were prepared to bring forward a measure of that kind, what were the statistics as to crime and outrage at that time in Ireland? I know that whatever is quoted from this side of the House is almost certain to be contradicted on the other; but perhaps I may be allowed to quote a passage from a speech of one of the staunchest allies and supporters of the Government at that time—Lord Spencer. Speaking in another place on January 12th, 1886, Lord Spencer said—

"In 1881, the number of cases of agrarian crime was 4,439; in 1882 the number was 3,433; while in 1884 the number was only 762; but should there be a fresh outbreak of agrarian crime, I believe we should not be able to depend upon the ordinary law or ordinary juries." Lord Spencer pointed out that crime had been constantly going down; and he goes on to say that—

"At the time we left Office (i.e., in June, 1885), outrages had fallen to a very low ebb indeed. But the fact remained that it was only recently that those organizations had been broken up, and condign punishment had been meted out to the offenders."

We have had the figures in regard to Boycotting given to-night, and they show that at that time—1885—when the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was in power, and wished to renew the special clauses of the Crimes Act relating to the offence of Boycotting, the figures of crime and outrage were very much below what they are at the present moment, and Boycotting was far less extensive. [Cries of "No!" from the Home Rule Members, and "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] Therefore, the proposal of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian to re-enact part of the Crimes Act in 1885 amply justifies the Government in taking the course which they have determined to take now. I admit, however, that I would not support the Government if their case were based solely upon the tabulated agrarian outrages. I support the Ministerial policy, because I know that injured persons in Ireland dare not give evidence against those who have injured them, that jurors dare not convict, and that, if jurors dare to convict, they dare not go about their ordinary business without being attended by as many policemen as used to attend the movements of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has treated with ridicule the extracts read from the Judges' charges. I think it was hardly decent on the part of the right hon. Member to throw ridicule on the opinions of men whom he had himself raised to the Bench. We have heard what was the opinion of one Judge, who was Attorney General in the right hon. Gentleman's own Government. Why, if the opinions of that Gentleman were to be received as truthful when he was sitting on the Front Ministerial Bench, should he be treated as a liar now that he has been elevated to the Judicial Bench? I could give thousands of instances of the most cruel forms of outrage and intimidation. [Home Rule cries of "Give them!"] I will certainly do so. I have heard it denied, in the course of this debate, that Irishmen are persecuted because they refuse to join the National League. That has been distinctly laid down and reiterated over and over again by hon. Gentlemen who sit below the Gangway on the other side of the House. Now, I have seen myself—which, on the 16th of January last, was found posted on the gate of the Roman Catholic Chapel at Achonry, in the County of Sligo:—

“Notice.

“Beware of the undermentioned ‘Shoneens’ who would not become members of the Achonry branch of the National League for the year 1886.”

MR. T. M. HEALY: What is the name of the place?

MR. W. HAYES FISHER: Achonry. I may have mispronounced it; but that does not alter the fact that the notice was posted as I have described. The notice itself was followed by 60 names; and it can be well understood what would happen to the persons thus specified. What actually did happen I will tell the House. Several of them paid next day, but an apology for their past apathy was demanded. I will give now instances of the treatment of men who have been Boycotted because they had paid their rents. This is a copy of a notice posted all over the district in which Lady Kingston’s estates are situated—“Fellow-countrymen, be not deceived. Boycotting is not done away with. Strike now or never at everyone who assists Anne Kingston to recover oppressive rents, or who pays them. Boycott that disgrace to her sex, Anne Kingston, the grass widow, the hard-hearted. Boycott and rend the pig-headed representative of the Church Body. Boycott Maria O’Grady; Boycott Benson the insolent whelp. Strike at the outposts of the Castle; you know who they are.

“Boycott! Boycott! Boycott!

“Boycott! Boycott! Boycott!

“Let others, too, take warning and beware of their fate, or their turn will surely come.

“N.B.—John Coughlan, of Flemingstown, has paid his rent. Boycott him and his short horns and his dairy farms. Dairymen beware!”

Let me give the House another instance in connection with the Philipstown branch, King’s County. It is contained in a cutting from The Midland Tribune (a Nationalist organ) in January last, which says—

“The usual fortnightly meeting was held on Sunday, the Rev. J. Bergin, P.P., presided. A complaint was made that the farm at Ballyowen, surrendered by Mr. Thomas Smyth, of Kell, on account of it being rack-rented, was lately grabbed by a person named Rylands, from Rahue. It was resolved that the rule of the League relating to land-grabbing be strictly enforced, and that any member of the branch found to be in communication with any of the parties concerned will be expelled.”

Mr. W. Hayes Fisher

Let me mention the facts of the case. Smyth held a farm under Sir Edward Grogan in King’s County. Thinking the rent too high he surrendered the farm to the landlord three years ago, since which date it has been derelict. The other day Rylands took this farm. In consequence of the action of the National League, he thought it best to offer Smyth £20. A meeting of the League was held, and, acting under its shadow, Smyth demanded £140. Threatening notices were posted with the result that Rylands has given up the farm, being afraid to go near the place. [An hon. MEMBER: What was the date?] The 23rd of January, 1887. I will now give the House a still more cruel instance of Boycotting, and it relates to an individual whose name has very frequently been mentioned in this House—Father Fahy.

“A meeting of the members of the Abbey district of the Woodford branch of the National League was held on the 6th of February, 1887. Father Fahy in the chair. Michael Larkin, secretary, Abbey branch, spoke of the herding of farms in the locality, and asked if those who held the situations would give them up, and said the people knew how to treat these people, if they did not do so, and if there was any hard present for him to come forward and give it up publicly, or if not they would smelt him. Michael Coen’s wife came forward, and said they were herding a farm, and she would give it up if they promised her any support. Pat Maddox, herd to Mr. Lewis, said he was willing to give up, but that he had nine children, and if they gave him any support he did not want to work for Lewis. Father Fahy said he would give no guarantee. Martin Egan proposed a vote of thanks to Father Fahy, and in response Father Fahy said he called those herds who did not give up miserable wretches. Maddox then came up, and said he was willing to give up if they gave him out-door relief; but that he could not die by the ditch. Father Fahy said he would wash his hands of the like of him. Maddox was then groaned at. Richard Donahue, herd to Mr. Lewis, gave up to-day for fear, and he has been herding the farm for 35 years; and has no means except the work-house. This old man, Richard Donahue, came to Mr. Lewis, and told him with tears in his eyes that he would be obliged to give up herding for him, as he considered his life would not be safe if he continued in his employment after Sunday’s meeting.”

MR. T. O. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): May I be permitted to ask whether the hon. Gentleman is quoting from a newspaper report of the proceedings, or from a report supplied by a police constable?

MR. W. HAYES FISHER: I am quoting a report received from the Royal Irish Constabulary, supplied, I believe, from short-hand notes of the proceedings. [Cries of "Oh!" and laughter from the Home Rule Members.] Allow me to remind hon. Members below the Gangway opposite what was held by the Government of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian in 1881 as to the accuracy and veracity of the Constabulary Reports. I think they will find that on more than one occasion the right hon. Gentleman defended the accuracy and veracity of those members of the Royal Irish Constabulary who supplied reports of meetings to the Government. I do not propose to weary the House by reading any more instances of Boycotting. I am quite certain of this that those who read the Irish papers, and study what is going on, must be convinced that a system of terrorism and tyranny is prevalent in Ireland, which it is the first duty of Her Majesty's Government to put down by every means in its power. If hon. Members opposite refuse to join in supporting—at all events, the Boycotting clauses of this Bill, and its main provisions—I shall judge only that they feel no sympathy with the Government in the heavy duty they are called upon to perform—that they refuse from purely Party and factious purposes, apart altogether from the question of Home Rule, to give those powers to Her Majesty's Government which are essential for the restoration of law and order, and they refuse to show practical sympathy with those who are suffering in the most cruel way, in Ireland, from tyranny and despotism. Will they shut their eyes and ears to the sights and cries that come from those who are the victims of abominable crimes, outrages, and cruelties in Ireland? I say that it is our bounden duty to endeavour to restore two-thirds of Ireland to the same position of peace and prosperity that now exists in Ulster among the other third of the population. No one can deny that while the greater portion of Ulster is prosperous and happy, and is enjoying the liberties and privileges of free men, the other portion of Ireland is under a cruel despotism, and to a large extent given over to anarchy. Our main end and object is to bring about such a state of things as may enable us to paint the other two-thirds of Ireland in the same colours as we are now able to paint Ulster, and to bring about a state of things which will secure that deeds which are regarded as heinous crimes in the sight of God and in the sight of Englishmen and Scotchmen shall come also to be regarded as crimes by the main body of the Irish people.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I trust the House will extend to me its indulgence for a short time while I address it upon this question; because I do not think I should be doing my duty to those I represent if I were to give a silent vote upon the occasion of this Motion. Certainly, it is not my intention to trouble the House with more than a few remarks with regard to the present measure; and it seems to me that it will be more consistent with the position which I take up, if I meet the Motion, in the first instance, with a direct denial; because it is not the details of the measure to which I object, but it is the whole principle of coercion. My profound conviction is that this Bill is not the way to meet the evils now existing in Ireland; but the only way in which a cure can be found for them is by generously meeting the legitimate demands of the Irish people for a fair measure of self-government. I am not without a true and deep sympathy with the Irish people in their troubles and in their trials. I can honestly say that. But I have always approached this question more directly from an English point of view. It is not that I fear the worst that can be done by 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 people in Ireland, for I have not so poor an opinion of the strength of the Empire as to believe that any course the Irish people may be driven to take would seriously interfere with the maintenance of the Empire. But, at the same time, I cannot see without regret England, year after year and decade after decade, keeping up a running sore in her side, and with her small military strength, wilfully weakening herself by maintaining a state of things in Ireland which necessitates the keeping up of a considerable military force in that country. Again, I cannot see without serious apprehension thousands and tens of thousands of Irishmen leaving the shores of Ireland year after year, and going to the Colonies, and to the Colonies filled with the Imperial Government. That is one of the most serious aspects of the case from an Englishman's point of view. As I have already stated, I do not propose to deal with the details of this measure of coercion; but I may congratulate the Government on one of the features of the Bill which, as I understand it, appears to be an ingenious contrivance to enable the Government to maintain the organization of the Orangemen, whilst, at the same time, they are able to put down and crush the organization which is resorted to by the majority of the Irish people. Well, Sir, I do not find any fault with the Government because they propose to make the Bill a permanent measure. On the contrary, I am glad of it. I am glad that the Government, and those who think with them, should throw off the mask, and should no longer pretend that they have any intention of governing Ireland as a free people. But there is one provision which I miss in this proposed measure, and which I miss with considerable regret. It is this: I find in this measure no provision for the disenfranchisement of every Irish constituency, and I say that the omission of such a provision, in such a measure as this, is totally inconsistent with the scope and with the intention of the Bill. To leave to the Irish people nominally a free representation, while permanently depriving them of the rights of a free nation. To my mind, it is a shameless mockery; and to force a measure like this down the throats of the Irish people in opposition to the voices of the Representatives of the vast majority of the country, is, to my mind, the grossest insult any Government could possibly offer to any nation which had the slightest right or pretence to call itself free. Now, Sir, in the interests of my own country, I ask the Government—inasmuch as they appear to have finally made up their minds that they will govern Ireland utterly without regard to the feelings and wishes of the Irish people—I ask the Government to dismiss hon. Members below the Gangway from their attendance here, which can be of no possible benefit in the future, and which will undoubtedly be accompanied by very considerable inconvenience. The other night we were told from the opposite side of the House that the measure to be introduced was a measure dealing only with criminals; and, therefore, it was suggested that those who opposed it must be criminals, or connected with the criminal classes. That was a proposition which was very much cheered on the other side of the House; but, surely, it is a curious misapprehension. As far as I understand the law of England, and I take it that the law of Ireland can hardly be different in this respect, you do not try criminals. No man is a criminal in the eye of the law until he has been tried and convicted. You punish criminals; you try men who are accused of crime. It is a matter of the deepest concern to every honest man in the country that trial by jury shall be maintained. It is not a question affecting the criminal class, but a question affecting the freedom of the mass of the people. I have heard that considerable difference of opinion exists as to whether or not the Crimes Act of 1832 proved a success, and we have been told by hon. Members on this side of the House that that all depends on what you suppose it to have been intended for. Having regard to what it was intended for, they say that it did prove an undoubted success. Now, Sir, what did it effect? After it had been in operation for three years, according to Lord Spencer, it left the country in a worse state than that in which it found it? Was it that which the Crimes Act was intended for; because if it is the fact that it left the country in a worse condition than it found it—and, if it carried out the object for which it was intended—it must have been intended to leave Ireland in a worse state than it found it? If the intention of the present Bill is the same, I prophesy, with considerable confidence, that that expectation will be realized, and that, if ever this measure becomes law, it will leave Ireland in a vastly worse state than it finds it. We have been taunted with the fact that an alliance exists between Members of this side of the House and hon. Members below the Gangway. So far as we are all of us pursuing a policy which we believe to be demanded by justice, and to be in the interests of England, as well as in the interests of Ireland, I do not hesitate to say that it is an alliance, and I am not ashamed of it. But, except in that sense, I do not know what right any man in this House has to say that there is an alliance between the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian and any other Party in this House, except the general Liberal Party. The result of this so-called "alliance" has been shown to be a diminution of crime in Ireland, and we have been seriously warned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it is a very dangerous thing, and that we are incurring a serious responsibility; because there has been a diminution of crime in consequence of our action. I confess that that is an argument which I find very difficult to understand. I want to know in what way are the interests of this country, or in what way are the interests of Ireland, imperilled? The moment the Irish people find that there is some chance of getting justice from the English people, and from the British House of Commons—the immediate effect of that is to diminish crime and to induce them to resort to Constitutional measures for the expression of their desires. If that is the fact, if the removal of despair and the infusion of hope in the breasts of the Irish people is the result of our action, I want to know why hon. Members opposite should be alarmed, and I ask what danger is such a policy to result in? If we have done nothing else we are entitled to take credit for the fact that we have given hope to the Irish people, and the result of that hope has already been the diminution of crime. It would seem that the Government only care for a diminution of crime when it is brought about by a Coercion Act. From what they tell the House we might gather that a diminution of crime which comes from the spontaneous self-restraint of the Irish people is rather a thing to be blamed than praised. My objection to the proposed measure is this: I care not whether a case for coercion has been made out or not; but I am prepared to say that I will never vote for any measure of coercion until we have given a fair trial to the policy involved in meeting the fair demands of the Irish people. If you do that, if you give them a fair trial, and if you find crime and outrage continued in the country, then all I can say is that I will be ready to vote for any Coercion Act, however stringent—and the more stringent it is the better it will be able to meet the necessities of the case. But I do not intend to take that course until we have tried what self-government can do; because I am firmly convinced that that is the only remedy. Let us for a moment take the case of the Government. Do not they see that the worse they make out the condition of Ireland, the more they damage their own case; because the policy they propose to pursue is the very policy which has brought Ireland to the condition in which she now is? What Ireland is now she has been made by a policy of coercion, and if the only policy of the Government is to continue in the future the mistakes that have been made in the past the worse it is for their own policy, and for the course they now propose to pursue. I thank the House for the indulgence which it has accorded to me on the present occasion, and I will only say, in conclusion, that I, for one, am heartily sick of the policy of approaching the Irish people with a whip in one hand and a lump of sugar in the other. I would ask whether the experience of the last 86 years has not been enough to condemn our system of Government? If the Government are not satisfied with the experience of the past 86 years, let me ask them, as a matter of common sense, what will satisfy them? Must they go on for 1,800 years before they will become satisfied that no good can come from pursuing a policy which has so signally failed in the past? Let hon. Members seriously ask themselves what they can expect from a fresh measure of coercion, when measures of coercion in one form or another have been tried throughout the whole of the century, and have resulted in bringing about the state of things which exists at this moment in Ireland—a state of things which hon. Members on the other side have described as intolerable. Let me ask hon. Members on this side of the House to remember that undoubtedly, in the eyes of the people, when the history of the country comes to be written, it is they, and they alone, who will be held responsible for what has occurred? We have been told that the Unionists bar the way. I entirely agree they bar the way to Liberal progress and reform. They stand forward, no doubt, with honest intentions, as the champions of prejudice, class interests, and religious intolerance, and they bar the way to the reconciliation of the English and the Irish people. They bar the way to a settlement of this Irish Question which has for so long a time occupied the attention of the House, and been so disastrous in its results to the public interests. I ask hon. Members to consider whether the time has not now arrived for settling the question once and for all, and whether that settlement can possibly be arrived at by pressing forward such a measure as that which has been submitted to the House by Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. F. W. MACLEAN (Oxford, Woodstock): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help thinking that the speech which my hon. Friend the Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucestershire (Mr. Winterbotham) has addressed to the House this evening betrays a very wobbly frame of mind on the Irish Question. I should like to point out to him, and to the House, that the real question raised by this debate is whether Her Majesty's Government are to have an opportunity of bringing in measures for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland; or whether that maintenance of law and order in Ireland can only be obtained by the measure suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), which embodied the principle of Home Rule. It seems to me that in a very short time my right hon. Friend the Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucester will find himself between two stools, and I think that a juncture like this is not a time when an opportunity ought to be given, or when there is any opening for what I may call a political wobbler. Well, now, after the clear and specific statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) I think the House will arrive at the conclusion that the time has come when it must definitely make up its mind as to whether or not it will give to Her Majesty's Government power to maintain law and order in Ireland. When we reflect upon what we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman as to the opinion of the Judges in Ireland, as to the difficulty there is in inducing jurors to perform their duty, and to comply with their oaths; when we ponder upon what we have heard as to that social scourge in Ireland, the system of Boycotting—I entertain very little doubt indeed that this House will arrive at the conclusion that the time has come when the law of the Crown must be held to be paramount, and not subservient to the law of the National League. The first objection that is taken to the proposal of the Government is that remedial measures ought to be brought in before coercion. Well, Sir, subject to what I will say in a moment as to the necessity, to my mind, of preserving in the first place, law and order in Ireland, I certainly do agree to this extent with my hon. Friend the Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucester, that Her Majesty's Government, considering the large power that they have, considering the support which they have upon the Benches opposite, and the support which they will certainly get from the very serried phalanx of the Liberal Unionists on these Benches, have a great opportunity of passing remedial measures for Ireland; and I tell the Government frankly that, while I intend to support—as I do intend to support—the Bill that is before the House, I do so in the belief and in the faith that in supporting that measure I am supporting a measure which is only paving the way for the introduction of remedial measures. It is not only in relation to remedial measures in connection with the land, in the direction of giving leaseholders the benefit of the Act of 1881, in doing away with dual ownership, and I hope in giving to local bodies a discretion in relation to evictions. It is not only in that direction that I think remedies are required; but I go still further, and I express the hope that the Government's remedial measures will go so far as to give at least a very wide measure of self-government to Ireland. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), in the brilliant speech which he made to-night, stated that the position on the Irish Question taken up by Liberal Unionists last year was, that there was a middle course between coercion on the one hand, and the scheme of Home Rule on the other. He said the Liberal Unionists are now to be put to the test. The Liberal Unionists have before now been put to the test, and I think it will be found that they will come up to the mark. We still say there is a middle course; but, while we adhere to that belief, we are equally and strongly of opinion that it is no use proceeding with remedial measures until we have established something like law and order in Ire-

Mr. Neville

1d. Well, Sir, I heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian to-night that if the Government, in the first instance, brought in remedial measures for Ireland, those remedial measures would, in all probability, have received the support of myself and of his Friends. Well, Sir, perhaps I am a little doubtful upon that point; but what I venture to impress upon the House is this—what opportunity has the right hon. Gentleman and his allies below the Gangway given the Government of bringing in remedial measures? When we look back to the debates on the Address, to the debates upon the Rules of Procedure and in committee of Supply, and to the very interesting event of last Monday week—namely, the All-night Sitting, we may fairly ask does that look as if hon. Members are desirous of giving the Government an opportunity of bringing in their remedial measures? But, Sir, supposing the Government had brought in their remedial measures, how would they have been met? They would have been met at once by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and his friends and supporters with the statement that such remedial measures were quite inadequate, and that there is only one remedial measure for Ireland—namely, the institution in Dublin of a Local Parliament with an Executive responsible to that particular Parliament. I think the country has pronounced upon that question. Now, it has been said by many speakers who have preceded me that no case has been made out for coercion. I listened with attention to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. A. J. Balfour), and, personally, I have arrived at the conclusion that at any rate there is a strong prima facie case, which abundantly justifies the Government in coming to the House and asking for leave to introduce this measure. It seems to me that if hon. Gentlemen would only consult the Report of the Cowper Commission, without paying so much attention to individual points of the evidence, they would find that that Commission reported that there was at least a very strong prima facie case for the interference of the House in giving increased powers to the Government for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland. In the course of this debate

we have been told that there was, in 1862, a strong case—and a very much stronger case than the present—for the granting of exceptional powers to the Government of Ireland. That statement has been supported, not only by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, but by the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), and by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Reid), the last of whom supported his argument by the reading of various extracts from the evidence given before the Cowper Commission, and especially from the evidence of General Buller. I venture to submit to the House that that is by no means a fair way of testing the question; but that the true way to test the question is to look at the evidence as a whole. Of course, when you have a mass of evidence like this, it is quite possible to pick out fragments of it which support your case, or which go against your case, as it may be. But if any admissions are wanted that the Government are justified in the policy they are pursuing, I would refer to the speech delivered last night by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane). He admitted, in the clearest terms, that the law of the National League was supreme in Ireland. Do you want any greater admission than that—that the Government are justified in the course they are pursuing? [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh; but the hon. and learned Member for Haddington is a very strong supporter of them and of their policy, and this is what he said—

“How were the Government going to substitute for the de facto Government of Ireland, which he should like to see, the de jure Government, a Government which should discharge its duties with the good will of the Irish people?”

If the Government wanted an admission from hon. Members who support the views of hon. Members below the Gangway, in justification of the course they have adopted, they could not obtain a more candid admission than that made by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Haldane). But what is the real issue that is raised by this debate? It is whether the Government are to have an opportunity of bringing in this exceptional legislation for Ireland which they say at the present is the only way hand; or whether, on the other hand, the view of hon. Members below the Gangway is the sounder view to take of the Irish Question; whether this repressive legislation should be adopted, or whether there should be granted what is generally called Home Rule for Ireland? That, Sir, is the real issue raised upon this occasion. It is impossible, having listened to the speeches of hon. Members, not to have been struck by the recantation of views which has characterized many of them. There was a recantation made by the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries, which was very straightforward and very honourable. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that in 1882 there was a case for coercion, and he voted for it; but he was very sorry he did, and he did so in ignorance. That was a statement which was loudly cheered by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. At any rate, as between the supporters of the Home Rule policy and the Liberal Unionists, there is this, at least, of advantage upon our side—we have nothing to recant; we have not recanted in the past, and we do not intend to recant in the future. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries is not the only Member who has recanted his opinion in relation to Irish policy. There are many hon. Members who sit upon the Front Opposition Bench who very suddenly recanted their opinions last year in relation to Irish policy; they did not call it recantation, they found a softer word, something more soothing to their consciences—they called it the “finding of salvation.” “Finding of salvation!” They might just as well talk about the finding of Moses. At any rate, the last Election showed very clearly that the constituencies did not all take the view that these right hon. Gentlemen had found political salvation, but seemed rather to think that they had found something the very reverse of political salvation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian prophesied to-night that the views in favour of Home Rule are growing in the country. [Home Rule cheers.] Hon. Members cheer that prophecy; but I remember very well that in that most brilliant speech which the right hon. Gentleman made just before the Division which was so fatal to his Government, he ventured to prophesy. I remember his words very well, and I remember the action by which his words were accompanied. Standing by that Table, he pointed to the Opposition, and used this language—“The ebbing tide is with you, and the flowing tide is with us.” [Home Rule cheers.] I am glad to find, Mr. Speaker, that those impressive words made as much effect upon hon. Members below the Gangway as they made upon myself; but, Mr. Speaker, I think hon. Members below the Gangway are cheering a little too soon. The last General Election has shown conclusively that the flowing tide has been with us, and that the right hon. Gentleman and his political Friends are being carried far out to sea upon the ebbing tide. But, Mr. Speaker, why do I refer to these recantations of these apparent inconsistencies? I refer to them for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to an observation made by the right hon. Gentleman the other night. The right hon. Gentleman said—if I caught his words accurately—that no Government had ever brought in, or, at any rate, had ever hoped to pass, what is popularly called a Coercion Bill when three-sevenths of the Members of the House of Commons were opposed to that measure. But how is it that three-sevenths of the House of Commons are opposed to this measure? It is by reason of the very sudden alliance which has been formed between the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and that alliance is entirely attributable to the recantation of view, and the absolute change of Irish policy which was so suddenly adopted by the right hon. Gentleman himself. Well, Sir, the other night my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries made an attack upon the Liberal Unionists. He said the Liberal Unionists are the real fathers of this Bill. I am not in the secrets of the Leaders of the Liberal Unionists; but, so far as I am aware, I do not think there is any justification for that remark. I am, however, not going to shrink from any responsibility, if responsibility there be. If by Coercion Act, hon. Members mean an Act which is only necessary to enable Her Majesty's Government to carry on the government of Ireland, then I am satisfied that there is no Liberal Unionist who will shrink for a moment from the admission that the Liberal Unionists are responsible, and are only too proud to be responsible, for such a measure. But, Sir, it does not occur to me that the Liberal Unionists require any vindication in this House. The position and the policy of the Liberal Unionists was fully vindicated at the last General Election by the voice of the country. For what are the Government now asking? They are merely asking, as I understand, subject to an observation I will make in a moment as to some details of the measure—they are merely asking for power to maintain law and order in Ireland. What is the present condition of affairs? Can anybody doubt for a moment, after having read the evidence of the Report of the Cowper Commission, that there is not only outrage, but that there is disorder, and, in many districts, an absolute contempt for the law in Ireland? When we regard—as we must regard—the difficulty which is connected with the process of evicting in Ireland, when we think of the system of Boycotting and intimidation of jurymen, when we think of the language in use on platforms in Ireland, and what is much more to the point, when we think of the attitude which is now being assumed by the priesthood of Ireland, it does occur to me that the time has arrived when Her Majesty's Government ought to ask for powers to deal with what they consider a state of social disorder in Ireland. I am not going to trouble the House by reading any portion of the Report of the Cowper Commission. I assume that hon. Members have read that Report; I am quite sure that hon. Members below the Gangway have done so. Assuming that they have read that Report, and the portion of it which deals with the question of Boycotting and the question of combination, I am persuaded that they will have arrived at the conclusion that the Government are amply justified in the course they propose to pursue. Now, when the Government ask for these repressive powers, they are, of course, called Coercionists. An hon. Member, the other night, not only characterized the supporters of this Bill as Coercionists, but as Brummagem Straffords and bogus Castlereaghs. It seems to me that many hon. Members on this side of the House are suffering from Straffords and Castlereaghs on the brain. I am happy to say that the infection has not yet reached the Liberal Unionists, although I am bound to confess that I think my hon. Friend the Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucestershire seems to be sickening for the complaint. The term coercion is an absolute misnomer, and I ask the House to consider who are the real coercionists in this matter; to my mind, and, I think, to the mind of anyone reading dispassionately the Report of the Cowper Commission, the real coercionists in this matter are the National League. [Home Rule ironical cheers.] Hon. Members cheer me ironically; but I do not hesitate to say that any combination that will not allow peaceable citizens and law-abiding people to go about their business without interference, is something very much like coercion indeed. What does the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) say? Last night he said that if this Bill be passed the people of Ireland would be slaves under it.

MR. DILLON (East Mayo): I rise to Order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member is putting into my mouth words I never used at all. I said the people of Ireland would be slaves if they submitted to this Bill peaceably.

MR. F. W. MACLEAN: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon, if I quoted his words wrongly, I do not, for a moment, wish to misinterpret the language he used; but it does not seem to make any difference in the argument I wish to submit to the House. The hon. Gentleman admits having said that, if the people of Ireland submitted to this Bill peaceably, they would be nothing but slaves. I venture to say that, at the present moment, many of the peasantry and tenantry of Ireland who are under the coercion of the National League are in little better position than that of slaves. The hon. Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucestershire said—

"No, that cannot be; for General Buller, in his evidence, said that the National League was the salvation of the people of Ireland."

But why? No one has ventured to explain why. The reason why the peasantry and tenantry of Ireland regard the action of the National League as the salvation of Ireland is that prominent Members of the League are always going about the country and instilling into the minds of the peasantry and tenantry that, if they will only support the League, they will get their rents very much reduced, and in a short time get their land for nothing. [Mr. MAC NEILL: Hear, hear!] An hon. Gentleman cries "Hear, hear!" I am very much obliged to him for the concession. That, I think, is not the language that hon. Members below the Gangway use in this House; but the language they use and the policy they propound here is very different to the language which is used by prominent members of the National League in the mountainous districts of Kerry and Clare. The National League has induced the peasantry and the tenantry of Ireland to arrive at the conclusion that the National League is their best friend, by trading upon the worst passions and the most assailable weakness of man—the greed and cupidity of human nature. I repeat that the real struggle upon which the House is entering is, whether the law of the Queen and of the country is to prevail over the unwritten law of the National League? I know I am only making use of a well-worn platitude. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members have not heard it yet; they might, at any rate, be indulgent until they have heard the platitude. I know I only make use of a well-worn platitude when I say that the primary duty of a Government is to govern. If the Government have not the power to govern, I—and I think I speak for many Liberal Unionists—feel that such power ought to be given to them. There is an agitation, something very akin to a revolutionary agitation, going on in a very considerable portion of Ireland. A great deal has been said about the responsibility that will attach to various sections in this House if this measure be passed. I agree that there will be great responsibility upon the Government, upon their supporters, and a greater one, or, at any rate, as great a one, upon that Party in the House which is known as the Liberal Unionist; but I venture to think that a far greater responsibility will rest on the shoulders of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. For the first time during 50 years or more; for the first time during a great—and I admit it most frankly—a most eventful career—a career during which he has attained, in a great measure, the affection, if not the affection, at any rate the veneration of his countrymen—for the first time the right hon. Gentleman refuses to support Her Majesty's Government when they come to this House and say we require increased facilities for carrying on the Government of the Queen. Well, Mr. Speaker, why is this? Because he has, according to his views, his own panacea to remedy the ills of Ireland. I know there is no finality in politics; but I ask hon. and right hon. Gentlemen to bear in mind that, for the present, at any rate, the voice of the country as regards this particular remedy for these particular ills has been given against the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. [Cries of "No!"] Well, I am surprised to hear hon. Members cry "No!" How can they explain the position of the right hon. Gentleman on the Bench below me? Now, it does seem to me that the country having rejected the Home Rule policy of the right hon. Gentleman, the least we might have expected from the right hon. Gentleman would have been that he would have supported in the meantime the policy of Her Majesty's Government. Upon the Motion for leave to introduce the Bill, I do not propose to go at any length into the details of the measure; but there is one portion of the Bill to which I desire to call attention, if I may be permitted to do so, and that is that part of the Bill which deals with the change of venue, or the bringing over of prisoners charged with certain specified offences to England for trial. I am bound to say, Mr. Speaker, that it does occur to me that that is a provision of the Bill which will require the greatest and the gravest consideration. If I may respectfully urge upon Her Majesty's Government, I would certainly ask them, between this and the Committee stage of the Bill, to consider very carefully whether that portion of the Bill is to them of its essence and vital to its existence; or whether, possibly, some other scheme may not be contrived which may obviate the necessity for that which to some of us appears to be a rather detrimental part of the Bill. It is, perhaps, impertinent for me to make a suggestion; but, if I may, I would suggest the possibility of adopting the scheme which is in operation in Scotland, and thus get out of the difficulty which may arise in relation to this particular part of the Bill. However, Sir, that is a detail in reference to which I only venture to throw out a hint at the present moment, in the hope that that part of the Bill may meet with the earnest consideration of Her Majesty's Government. Well, under the circumstances I have stated, I, for my part, shall have no hesitation whatever in supporting the Government in the Motion that is now before the House. If it be, as I surmise, that the asking for these exceptional powers is only to be regarded as paving the way for those remedial measures which I have suggested—and I understand from the statements of the right hon. Gentleman opposite that it is merely as a paving of the way for remedial measures—then I urge upon the Government, with all respect, to proceed resolutely and firmly with their Bill. I am satisfied that, if they do, that bearing in mind the ulterior remedial measures which they have in view, that not only will they meet with the support of their Supporters who sit opposite, but they will certainly meet with the support of the Liberal Unionists, and that when they have to explain their position to the country, I am satisfied that they will obtain the support of the constituencies and the confidence of the country.

[Second Night.]

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Mr. Speaker, the course taken by Her Majesty's Government promises for the House of Commons a Session of strife and barrenness. I should like to ask what has happened to entirely change the policy of Her Majesty's Government since the speech made at the close of the last Session of Parliament by the then Leader of the Conservative Party and the Leader of the House. The noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) gave no indication whatever that the first efforts of the Government, upon the reassembling of Parliament, would be the introduction of a severe measure of coercion. On the other hand, we were assured that it was the intention of the Government to indulge in great deliberation in regard to the provisions which should be introduced into Parliament, and the noble Lord gave every assurance that the result of their deliberations would be that there would be a series of measures with regard to local government submitted to Parliament, and that those measures would treat equally with the four parts of the United Kingdom, that there would be similarity, and, last of all, that there would be simultaneity in regard to the measure of local government. Now, in regard to this last and long word of the noble Lord, the only simultaneity that I can discover is the circumstance that the noble Lord has just returned to this House at the identical moment that the Government has thrown overboard every pledge it gave at the close of the last Session of Parliament, and has taken up the question of the renewal of coercion towards Ireland. I wish to say in general terms that we have before us a long and severe struggle upon this question. It is no longer a struggle in which the Irish Members, or a majority of the Irish Members of the House, will be opposed to an overwhelming majority drawn from both sides of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. F. W. Maclean) who last addressed the House asked how it is that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) is no longer prepared to give his adhesion and support to the policy of coercion? My answer is that the right hon. Gentleman is not new to coercion; after an experience of 50 years, it has no charm or fascination for him. There are other Liberal Members of the House of Commons who have been induced at the call of their Leaders to listen to proposals for coercion. I was one of those unfortunate individuals who were cajoled by the statistics given as to the condition of Ireland to listen to proposals for coercion, and I looked with hope to the remedial legislation which was promised should succeed coercion. I do not hesitate to say that all those who have been for any time in this House, and who hope that the condition of Ireland will be improved by remedial legislation, must have abandoned all expectation of any permanent good arising to the country, or of any assistance being given to remedial legislation by this or any other form of coercion which may be submitted. It is very easy for a Government taking up the position the present Government has done to make out a case which shall be satisfactory to those who will only take a very limited view of the condition of society in Ireland. On the other hand, those of us who have turned our backs on coercion, and are resolved we will adhere to the policy of remedial legislation, base our position upon this consideration—that there is a condition of disaffection and discontent in Ireland which has been going on for generations; that there is in reality a civil war, although it may be altogether bloodless, in that country. A war of classes has been going on from generation to generation, and until we have terminated this struggle it will be impossible that the condition of Ireland can be such as will not afford some pretence for some short-sighted individuals to favour the policy of coercion. Now, the condition in which we find ourselves is very singular. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) is a highly respectable Member and a very able Member of this House; but only a fortnight ago he was Secretary for Scotland. He has been pitchforked into the Irish Office; he knows little or nothing of the condition of the country; he is literally unable to grapple with many of the suggestions which come from this or that side of the House; and yet we have the right hon. Gentleman, thus unarmed, presenting to us the case for coercion for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman very wisely fought shy of the old method of making out a case for coercion for Ireland. In all past cases, facts and figures of such a grave character have been given to the House, and have led many Members to support the Government in passing measures of coercion. The right hon. Gentleman indulged in anecdotes, as he called them. He gave us little information that was based on any official or tangible ground—anything that could really be examined and refuted. On the contrary, he based his case mainly on the fact that there existed in Ireland a widespread system of Boycotting. I do not deny that this very obnoxious system does largely prevail in that country, and that it is one of the few weapons that are left to the discontented Irish people in their struggle with an exacting landlord class. The misfortune of Ireland has been that throughout her history she has been in the hands of the landlord class, and that the whole population has been under the lash of that class. Parliament itself is made up of the landlord class; legislation has always gone on lines that have favoured the landlord class and inflicted perpetual injustice upon the tenant class. At last, by the legislation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, there came some mitigation of the situation; but owing to the failure of the harvests, and the depression of the prices of agricultural produce, the condition of the Irish tenantry is almost as bad as it was before 1881. Now, I maintain it is impossible to wrest from the hands of the Irish people these weapons of defence, so long as the weapons of offence and tyranny remain in the hands of the landlord class in that country. It is impossible by legislation to reach the root of the system of Boycotting. Besides, Boycotting is not altogether an Irish offence. It may vary in its forms; but it is as common in this country as in Ireland. The President of the great Wesleyan Society—a man who has had much experience of all parts of the country—has said that there does not exist in the thousands of parishes in this country the very elements of religious liberty; that there is a dominant class who interfere with the rights and privileges of those who happen to differ from them. You may go to other circles and find the same spirit, and the same bad habit prevails. What occurs in the appointment of the magistracy in this country? It is notorious that the system of Boycotting prevails in every part of the country. Boycotting is almost universal in the rural districts of England, and the towns are not free from it. I recollect that some time ago the Town Council of Bradford—one division of which town I have the honour to represent—sent up to the Lord Chancellor the names of 13 gentlemen whom they desired to be added to the borough Commission of the Peace. Amongst the 13 gentlemen there happened to be two Liberals. My brother was one of the two, and a highly respectable gentleman in Bradford was the other. The Lord Chancellor sent down the list with the two Liberals excluded—Boycotted. I do not hesitate to say that Boycotting must prevail in Ireland so long as you allow a small but powerful minority to ride roughshod over the rights and over the feelings of the people of that country. Now, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the anxiety of the Government to carry this Bill, every Liberal Member is entitled to ask for the greatest deliberation in the consideration of the Bill. If ever there was a measure in regard to which Members were entitled to confer with their constituents, this is one of that character.

Mr. Illingworth

A proposal to take away the dearest and most cherished rights of 5,000,000 of Her Majesty's subjects is one in which the great mass of the people of the United Kingdom will take a lively interest, and therefore I appeal to Her Majesty's Government not to expect too rapid progress to be made with this measure. But, Sir, there is another reason why we are entitled to deliberate long and seriously and carefully upon this great question. This question of coercion was not submitted to the constituencies at the last Election. Proposals such as those referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. F. W. Maclean) who spoke last, and by other Unionist Members, were largely commented upon; but I do not know a constituency in which proposals of coercion were seriously advocated by any candidate, Liberal or Conservative, at the last Election. I am aware that the other day, when hon. Members were challenged upon the point, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Eastern Division of Bradford (Mr. H. Byron Reed) said he really had won his election by the advocacy of coercion. The hon. Gentleman may have, in some way or other, mentioned coercion, but I am sure it was not a prominent topic in his address, and that it cannot be correctly said his election turned upon the question of coercion. But even if it were true in that solitary instance, it only proves the rule that the constituencies were not consulted at the last Election upon the renewal of a system of coercion towards Ireland. This being so, I think every Liberal Member has laid upon his shoulders the duty of conferring with his constituents with the view of learning what their mind is upon the question of coercion. We are approaching the Easter holidays, which would be a very convenient time for Members to go amongst their constituents and hold conference with them, and ascertain what is felt upon this great question. Now, I venture to predict that where the late Government, with its longer official experience, and with the power and the capacity of its Administrators, failed in carrying out coercion, right hon. Gentlemen opposite are sanguine indeed if they expect they will succeed. But we need not confine our examination to recent cases of coercion. Coercion has uniformly failed in Ireland. The experiment extending over 86 years, the experience of 86 Acts and Amendments of Acts, only shows to us that, assailed on that side, the Irish people are invulnerable. They have courage, they have heroism, they have resources, they have ingenuity; they have baffled every Administration in the past, and they will baffle every Administration in the future. It is easy to charge the Irish people with not being amenable to the ordinary laws of Great Britain. My answer is, and it is the outcome of some historic examination, that whatever virtues the Irish people have, they are their own, and they may glory in them; and whatever vices they have are of our creation and of our imposition, and we are now bearing the penalty and the cost. I venture to say that a very short time will elapse before the great majority of the people of Great Britain will condemn this proposal of the Government. They will see in it nothing but a barren effort to sustain a system which has been the curse of Ireland ever since the Union, and for centuries before. It is impossible that you can maintain your land system in that country and bring permanent peace to Ireland. But I want to put the case from another point of view. We have been reminded to-night that we have got 86 Members from Ireland sitting on this side of the House, an overwhelming majority of the Irish Members representing an overwhelming majority of the Irish people. I should like to know whether the Boycotting of these 86 Members is contemplated by the Government, as seems to have been suggested by the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope). The right hon. Gentleman, speaking at Spilsby in Lincolnshire, on the 15th of October last—I quote from The Times newspaper—said—

“He remembered a very distinguished Member of the House of Commons saying that one thing had not been tried, and that was a steady and continuous policy. Year after year a policy that combined fairness with firmness, a policy that took no account of the Irish vote, but one of governing Ireland quite irrespective of what the Irish vote might choose to do. That policy they would press forward with vigour.”

Now, if that really be the determination of Her Majesty's Government, and if the measures they are about to propose to Parliament are dictated by such a spirit as that, I do not hesitate to say that the Irish Members will be justified in proceeding to any lengths in baffling such a policy; because they are denied their Constitutional rights. What is the use of Ireland selecting her Representatives, and sending them to the House of Commons, if they are to be told by a Minister of the Crown that whatever they say or do will not be regarded when questions of Irish policy are to be submitted to Parliament? If that is the deliberate intention of the Government, all I can say is that the Irish Members will be justified in offering opposition to the very last point to this proposal for the coercion of their country. Not only so, Mr. Speaker; but I believe that the British constituencies will—when they come to understand the policy of Her Majesty's Government, when they come to understand the shilly-shallying which is going on with regard to measures of reform, and the hot haste with which measures of coercion are being pressed through this House—begin to see that Her Majesty's present Advisers are not about to produce results in Ireland which will be of any permanent benefit to the country; but that, on the other hand, they have really entered upon a policy which will delay all progressive legislation with regard to Great Britain, and will only tend to increase the alienation between the two nations. I only wish to say, in conclusion, that we are only upon a very early stage of this measure. The Bill has not yet been placed in our hands; but we know enough now of the spirit in which it has been presented, and of the hopes and fears which have compelled Her Majesty's Government to enter upon this reactionary line. I, for one, am prepared from my place in Parliament to do everything that lies in my power to delay and baffle legislation of this kind.

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the prevention and punishment of Crime in Ireland; and for other purposes relating thereto."—(Mr. Arthur Balfour.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Mr. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) said, he rose to discharge what he believed to be a responsible duty, to say, once for all, that the Party to which he had the honour to belong would resist to the utmost the Algerine code which the Government were attempting to force upon the people of Ireland. They believed that this code was unjustified by the circumstances, that it was calculated to sow dissension in Ireland between class and class, and creed and creed; that it was calculated, furthermore, to foster and nurture animosity between England and Ireland, to lower the national pride and hurt the national feelings of Irishmen, and to create discord between the people of the two countries. He would, at the outset, draw a strong distinction between Her Majesty's Government and the country which they were supposed to represent. He stated from his personal knowledge a fact for which, if untrue, he would deserve serious reprehension, that at the last General Election Her Majesty's Government had no mandate from the people of England to force coercion on Ireland. He could not but think of an incident which occurred on the very day on which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland rose to ask leave to introduce his Bill. Just as he was approaching the Table for the purpose a cheer, from below the Gangway greeted him. He did not understand that cheer. It was in recognition of the arrival of a new Member (Sir Walter Foster), who was returned by an immense majority because he professed to be opposed to coercion. He believed that they were backed up in their opposition to this measure not only by the people of Ireland, but by the sentiment of the majority of the people of England, Scotland, and Wales. The fact of the appointment of the right hon. Gentleman to his present position of Chief Secretary was the strongest argument against coercion. If Ireland was on the verge of social revolution, as had been represented—if it was in a state of rebellion and Boycotting—if things were reduced to chaos in that country, why was not an experienced statesman versed in the matter and having a knowledge of the Irish people appointed? Why was a Gentleman chosen for the post who knew less about Ireland than he himself knew about Central Asia? If that was the state of affairs in Ireland, he could not believe that the Prime Minister would have disposed of the Chief Secretaryship in the same way as he would dispose of a family living in his gift. Never in his experience had he witnessed a more pitiable spectacle than that presented by the right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench when asking leave to bring in this Bill. He was framing an indictment against a whole people to deprive them of their liberty, to send some of their Representatives—as some of their Representatives assuredly would be sent if this Bill passed—to prison, and to check public agitation, and yet he actually did not know his own case. He could not have properly digested or even read the evidence before him, for he could not tell the places or the circumstances. He did not even know the names of the Irish Judges whom he quoted. Mr. Justice Murphy was with him "Chief Justice Murphy," and agrarian outrage was "agricultural outrage." He called the charges of "the Judges' reports," and the reason was quite plain. In England the Judges never delivered political charges, and the Chief Secretary thought that the Irish Judges were a higher class of policemen making reports. He (Mr. Mac Neill) declared that if the right hon. Gentleman were placed on a school board examination as to the ordinary and political circumstances of Ireland he would be deservedly plucked. The right hon. Gentleman had been bolstered up by all the calumnious tittle-tattle of the informers and police spies, paid hacks, and backstairs secret agents of Dublin Castle. It never occurred to him to investigate the truth of his stories. He spoke of the old man of 80 years of age, who wished to be kept on the jury panel that he might do a good turn to a friend. Why, he (Mr. Mac Neill) had heard that story at least eight years ago. It was the calumnious stories of the smoke-room of the Kildare Street Club that he was forcing on the people of England; but a club story had never before been used as an indictment against a whole nation. Then they had from him the midwife's tale. That showed the weakness of the Government's case—an old wife's tale. When asked for his authority and for names and dates, the right hon. Gentleman relied on his responsibility as a Minister of the Crown. That was what they complained of. They said he was not responsible to the Irish people. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman carried on its own face its thorough and perfect condemnation. The right hon. Gentleman expected to be the master of the Irish people. He would be nothing of the kind. He would only be their gaoler. He would be merely a puppet in the hands of the permanent clerks of Dublin Castle. The statements of the Irish Judges were mere obiter dicta in no way connected with the administration of the law. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was preparing their Reports, why did he not give Judge Lawson's report of what took place at the Winter Assizes at Omagh, when Judge Lawson said the two Walkers should be found guilty of murder and nothing else? The jury there disagreed, and the Walkers were sent to Belfast to be tried safely and securely. Why did not the Attorney General give them Baron Dowse's report in Tipperary? Because this was not an investigation. This was a proposal to put the Government in power. They did not want to tell the people the real truth. They wanted to give a certain complexion for Unionist, or, rather, official ends. Why was Baron Dowse—an old friend and political supporter—omitted? That was not grateful of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. When Baron Dowse stood for Derry the Attorney General was his counsel.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I deny that I ever was his counsel at Derry or anywhere else.

MR. MAC NEILL said, he accepted the correction. The Attorney General was, however, present at a banquet to commemorate the return of Baron Dowse, for Londonderry, in 1868. The learned Baron then defeated Lord Clarendon Hamilton, and inflicted thereby one of the greatest blows ever sustained by the Tory Party in Ireland, and the present Attorney General of the Conservative Government celebrated the happy event. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said that the legitimate opposition was not in favour of coercion. What was the meaning of that? That this question of coercion—the question of the political life and death of the Irish people—was reduced to a Party question; and he said that the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench had made it so. In 1885 the then Conservative Government announced its intention not to renew the Crimes Act. The arguments then used by the Tory Party were precisely the arguments which were now being used against them. The Attorney General for Ireland had accused Lord Spencer when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland of the wilful murder of the boy Giffen, who lost his life in an Orange riot. He said that the blood of Giffen was on Lord Spencer's head.

MR. HOLMES: I never made any statement imputing murder to Lord Spencer, and I never insinuated anything of the kind.

MR. MAC NEILL: What did you say?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. MAC NEILL said, he would pass that by. He might be wrong; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman made a distinct allusion to Lord Spencer in reference to Giffen.

MR. HOLMES: Certainly.

MR. MAC NEILL: Certainly. He came now to the tremendous difficulties which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to encounter among his new friends lest he might wound their susceptibilities. He would refer to the Home Secretary, whom he would call the Home Rule Secretary. That right hon. Gentleman, now a supporter of coercion, had first got into Parliament by abusing and holding up to ridicule the administration of law in Ireland. He found in The Times of the 21st of November, 1868, the following statement:—

“Mr. Henry Matthews is elected for Dunganon and ranks as a Liberal, but his Liberalism is a cross between Toryism and Fenianism.”

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The career of the right hon. Gentleman or references of the sort which the hon. Member is now making, have nothing whatever to do with the introduction of this Bill.

MR. MAC NEILL said, he would submit to the Speaker's ruling, and would not pursue that subject further. He would now proceed to examine some of the provisions of this Bill. The abolition of trial by jury meant the entire abolition of the Constitution, and there was no evidence to justify it. It insured the determination of questions of fact by persons influenced by the Crown. Resident Magistrates who were to be substituted for a jury in certain cases were clearly subject to that influence; they held their positions at the pleasure of the Crown, and might be dismissed at any moment. They would simply be puppets administering justice with their eyes fixed on the Treasury Bench—the justice which would be dealt out by Dublin Castle. It was nothing more nor less than a blasphemous parody of justice. In 1852, Archbishop Whately, himself an Englishman, speaking of Ireland, said—

“The Lord Lieutenant's days and nights are wasted on intrigues and Party squabbles, on the management of the press and the management of stiles, on deciding what ruined gambler is to have this stipendiary magistracy, and what Repealer is to be conciliated by asking his wife and daughter to that concert.”

These were the men who were to have the lives and liberties of the Irish people at their disposal. The proposal to change the venue and bring prisoners for trial to England was a step which would receive almost universal condemnation. Such a thing was unknown in England. The reason was that jurors were competent witnesses and might give evidence on a trial in which they were sworn as jurors. It was to enable a garbled tale to be told without detection that the expedient of changing the venue was to be resorted to. The proposal to bring over Members of the Irish Bar at the expense of the Government, for the defence of prisoners, was noteworthy. Lord Castlereagh was the first person who had assailed the independence of the Bar in Ireland. He writes—

“We have good materials among the young barristers, but we cannot expect them to waste their time and to starve into the bargain. I know the difficulties, and shall respect them as much as possible in the extent of our expenditure, but I cannot help most earnestly requesting to receive £5,000 in bank notes.”

It appeared on the face of the Cornwallis Correspondence that a member of the Bar who had appeared for most of the prisoners in the State trials of that time had sold the secrets of his clients to the Crown. Again, there was to be no limitation to the Coercion Bill, and Ireland was always to be in a degraded, inferior, and abject position. Charles James Fox once said—

“I would rather see Ireland wholly separated from the Crown of England than kept in subjection by force. Unwilling subjects are little better than enemies.”

Even Pitt, if he were alive to day, would scorn the proposals of the Government, for in his speech proposing the Union he said the two countries were to go hand in hand, and that the Union was to be the consolidation of a great Empire. They knew how lamentably and miserably that expectation had failed. It was not to the interest of right hon. Gentlemen opposite to have Ireland a contented, happy, and prosperous nation, for if the Irish difficulty were removed, the Liberal Unionist defection would be at an end, and their posts and places would be gone. Lord Brougham cautioned Parliament not to undertake to cure Irish distress by anything in the shape of penal enactments. He said—

“The greatest mockery of all—the most intolerable insult—the cause of peculiar exasperation against which I chiefly caution the House, is the undertaking to cure the distress under which she (Ireland) labours by anything in the shape of new penal enactments. It is in these enactments alone that we have ever shown our liberality to Ireland. She has received penal laws from the hands of England almost as plentifully as she has received blessings from the hands of Providence. What have these laws done? Checked her turbulence, but not stifled it. The grievance remaining perpetually, the complaint can only be postponed. We may load her with chains, but in doing so we shall not better her condition. By coercion we may goad her on to fury, but by coercion we shall never break her spirit. She will rise up and break the fetters we impose, and arm herself for deadly violence with the fragments."—(Lord Brougham's Speeches, vol. iv., p. 45.)

He asked were Her Majesty's Government, for considerations of Office, going to gamble in the flesh and blood of human beings. He believed the people of England would rise in the majesty of their might and prevent such an outrage. He and his friends were entering upon that contest with light hearts and strong courage; they had the people of England at their backs and the great Liberal Party on their side, and they would emerge from the fray a victorious, a self-governed, and a free people.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid) said, that he was about to bring forward some serious charges, which, however, he thought himself justified in making, not only because he had his own important constituency at his back, but because he had unfortunately the honour at that moment to represent not only the Roman Catholic Tories of England, Scotland, and Ireland, but also the English, Irish, and Scotch Roman Catholic Unionist Liberals. He thought he should have no difficulty in demonstrating that, from his point of view, the Government had no other course open to them than to strengthen the law against law-breakers in Ireland. He should confine his remarks to three authentic documents—the Report of Mr. Knipe, one of the Members of Lord Cowper's Commission, the general Report of that Commission, and the Papal Encyclical on the Christian Constitution of States. Hon. Gentlemen opposite claimed to represent the Roman Catholic Church; but he knew that he was stating the opinion of a great number of Irish Catholics when he said that that claim was totally unfounded; but, be that as it might, it was sufficient for him (Mr. De Lisle) if he could justify his vote to his own conscience and to his constituents. In Mr. Knipe's Report he stated that he believed the purchase of their holdings by the tenants would tend to the preservation of law and order; that the tenants themselves would organize to put down outrages; and then, on the authority of the District Inspector of Castleisland, he stated that the police were perfectly powerless to enforce the law and put down outrages in that district. Well, if the police were powerless in any part of the Queen's Dominions, he maintained that they had a right to call for an improvement in the procedure of the law. Then he found in the evidence of General Buller that he was asked, "Do you think that the improved state of the country is due to the fact that the power of the League has decreased?" He replied, "No," adding that if the League could it would prevent the payment of rents. General Buller said he believed that the improvement was because the tenants were getting abatements. He (Mr. De Lisle) contended that if the League prevented men paying their rents, then it was an illegal organization, and ought to be suppressed. If the Bill proposed to suppress the League it would have his support. He would next call the attention of the House to the statistics as to the depreciation in the value of Irish agricultural produce and of live stock. He found that the value of agricultural produce was, in 1855, £63,000,000; in 1881, £46,000,000; and in 1886, £31,000,000. The value of live stock was, in 1881, £51,000,000, and it was, in 1886, only £41,000,000. How could it be supposed that any political measure like Home Rule could give comfort and prosperity to a country which was suffering from such a depreciation in the value of its produce? The remission of every farthing of rent would not enable the people in many districts of Ireland to live. If the figures produced proved anything, they proved that there were two possible courses open to them. One was that the real remedy was a certain amount of protection to agriculture; but if this country would not have recourse to a certain amount of agricultural protection in order to enable the agriculturist to live and thrive, then there is no other alternative but emigration. He could not see anything disgraceful in emigration. He saw hon. Members opposite. He did not suggest that they should emigrate; but he should like to see them encouraging their friends to go to America, or our Colonies, make fortunes there, and then come back to buy properties and become good citizens of the United Kingdom. In the language of the Report which he had referred to, this subject was touched on in the evidence of Mr. Hamilton, who said that the West of Ireland could not be improved until it was brought within reach of civilization by railways; that that, if done at all, must be done by the State, and that the best remedy would be emigration, but that the people would not emigrate. Mr. Knipe did not agree with the other Commissioners on the subject of coercion. In his view, any attempt to meet agrarian crime by coercion would not only fail to secure tranquillity, but would aggravate disorder. But later on in his Report there was a passage which proved that the Government were right, because he there advocated the establishment of a Court of Assessors to fix rents which would and should have coercive powers both on bad landlords and bad tenants. So that it was merely a question of what coercion, and by whom it should be applied. If the National League would abandon that word "National," and state itself to be what it now professed itself to be, a Poor Tenant's Protection Society, or even an Aborigines' Protection Society, then they would have no quarrel with it. It was because it called itself "National," and because of the ulterior purpose which that name seemed to imply, that all the steps which it took were suspected and required to be watched with vigilance by the Government. And more than that, the action of the Government was not only justified by the Report of Lord Cowper's Commission, but that Report showed that the Government would be deserving the severest condemnation if they did not pursue the policy represented by the present measure; a policy in which he was certain that they would have the support of the electors of the United Kingdom if they only had the courage to act on their convictions. In page 7 of that Report he found a description of that new weapon of war—Boycotting. He regretted to say that Bishop Bagshawe, the most judicious Bishop of Nottingham, had in an address delivered on St. Patrick's Day, defended Boycotting if it were judicious—as if any amount of judiciousness could make a thing which was illegal to be right. Truly a judicious Bishop! He regretted that a Bishop of his Church still gave any support to a system of which it was said in that Report of Lord Cowper's Commission, that people were more afraid of being Boycotted than they were of the decisions of Courts of Justice. That was an intolerable state of things, and no Government would deserve to last for an hour which allowed people to be more afraid of private combinations than of the Courts of Justice. Then it was said that in certain districts the law was not supreme. That no Government could allow to endure. Further on in the same Report was a description of the sufferings of Boycotted persons, whose lives were said to be made a burthen to them, as none were allowed to supply them with the necessaries of life. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) seemed to think that as only 800 persons were Boycotted, so small a number of persons whose lives were rendered miserable had no claims to the protection of the Government. That, however, he denied, nor could he conceive anything more degrading to a Government than to allow the state of things which now existed in Ireland in reference to Boycotted persons to continue. If we could not enforce the law, better give it up altogether. What was the justification which had been put forward of the system of Boycotting? It had been characterized by hon. Members opposite as an innocent trade union intended to protect Irish tenants against excessive and unjust rents, and to compel bad landlords to reduce their rents. But he would not admit this assertion, which had, in fact, been successfully controverted by a letter in The Tablet newspaper of January 8 from, perhaps, the most eminent Catholic layman in Ireland. But be that as it might, it could not be denied that some 60 agrarian murders had followed the adoption of the practice of Boycotting; and a New York paper had advocated its enforcement by dynamite, by dagger, and by poison. He might say by way of parenthesis that there was no question here at stake between Protestant and Catholic—a Catholic might well support the policy of the Bill before them without incurring the censure of the Church. While upon that point he might call the attention of hon. Members to a passage from the letter already referred to, who maintained that the result of the struggle now going on in Ireland would be to separate the Irish Church of the future from the Irish Church of the past, to join it to the Jacobinical Societies of the Continent to defeat the demand for a religious education which statesmen must needs distrust, when they saw from what corrupted sources it proceeded, to substitute a hollow for a sincere Catholicism, and to hurry a revolutionary Ireland along the same path as revolutionary France. Returning to the Report of Lord Cowper's Commission, which favoured emigration as the best resource for Ireland if Protection was rejected, it would be seen that the last page but one of the Report showed that the Government were not only justified, but were compelled to take action on the lines of the legislation they were asking the House to adopt, for they said, that such steps were necessary in several parts of the country, and that in the interests of all classes, in order to maintain law and order, which were then grievously outraged. That disposed of the allegation which was sometimes made that in proposing this legislation the Government were disregarding the Report of the Royal Commission. On the contrary, they were acting in strict conformity with the recommendation of that Commission. They had been told that it was impossible for a Catholic to vote for this Coercion Bill, but on the strength of Mr. Knipe's Report and the Report of the Royal Commission, he felt justified in giving his vote for this measure. They were told that, in the face of the opposition of the Catholic clergy of Ireland, it would be impossible for any length of time to maintain the government of England in Ireland. Well, the object of the Supporters of the Bill was to restore peace, quiet, brotherly love, good feeling, and true citizenship in Ireland. [Mr. DILLON: They never existed.] If they never existed then their object was to create them; but he denied that the assertion made by the hon. Member for East Mayo was true. He had spent some pleasant weeks in Ireland in the year 1870, when he had many opportunities of observing and conversing with the poorest classes, and found that there was then no misery, but as much peace, prosperity, and contentment in Ireland as there was in England. He now approached the last division of his speech, and in entering upon it he might say that he was not about to attack the Holy See; but he maintained that he was justified in attacking any of the Queen's subjects if they appeared to be wanting in their allegiance to Her Majesty. He asserted that the Irish Catholic Bishops and Irish Catholic priests who opposed the administration of the law owed as much duty and loyalty to the Crown of England as the humble men-servants and maid-servants who swept the dust from those seats. In his opinion, by the course which they had taken, some of the Bishops and clergy of the Catholic Church in Ireland had, tried by this principle, committed serious aberrations from their duty; but he should not think himself justified in pointing out those aberrations, unless he could also suggest the remedy. He admitted, however, that if the Catholic clergy of Ireland were for ever going to use their influence in opposition to those who sought to restore law and order in that country, the efforts of the latter would be well-nigh hopeless. Cardinal Newman had pointed out that—

"For three hundred years it has been the official rule with England to ignore the existence of the Pope, and to deal with Catholics in England, not as his children, but as sectaries of the Roman Catholic persuasion. Napoleon said to his Envoy—'Treat with the Pope as if he was master of 100,000 men.' I am entering into no theological question; I am speaking all along of mere decent secular intercourse between England and Rome. A hundred grievances would have been set right on their first uprising, had there been a frank diplomatic understanding between two Great Powers. The world's politics has its laws; and such abnormal courses as England has pursued have their Nemesis."

Well, the Nemesis which England was suffering from owing to her treatment of the Holy See, was the presence of Gentlemen opposite. As he, as an English Catholic, was going to vote in favour of this Bill, he thought that it was his duty to justify his conduct. [The hon. Member was then proceeding to quote the Papal Encyclical on the Christian Constitution of States in order to show how the Pope, if properly approached, would deem it his duty to secure the co-operation of the clergy in the maintenance of law and social peace, when—]

MR. SPEAKER, interposing, said: The relations between the Catholic clergy and the Holy See and between this country and the Pope do not appear to me to be relevant in discussing the introduction of the Crimes Bill.

MR. DE LISLE said, that in that case he would proceed to show that the conduct of the Catholic clergy in Ireland, which, by some, was thought to be a justification of the present state of things, was in truth a justification for the measure of coercion now before them. At a meeting held at Kilkenny, and reported in The Kilkenny Journal of September 29, 1886, at which more than a dozen priests were present, the Rev. Mr. Costigan spoke as follows:—

"What do you propose doing? You talk a good deal about landlordism: but what do you determine to do before you separate—[A VOICE: 'Kill the landlords!']—I would not physically kill any man—[cheers]—but there is another way of killing a man. You can make his life a second death. I hope the citizens of Kilkenny will not physically kill anyone; but I will leave them to do as they like the other way. I hope you will understand me. [‘We do.’] My opinion of the Nationalists of Kilkenny is very high. [Cheers.] I never thought that there could be such numbers as I see before me turned out at a moment's call. It was only yesterday that the notice was sent out, and you have come here in your hundreds to declare your undying hatred of landlordism—[cheers]—and to declare that while there is one drop of blood in your veins you will be true to the flag you have unfurled to-day, which means the total extinction of landlordism with all its cruelty and horror in this land. [Cheers.]"

That was the teaching of a minister of religion, and yet this gentleman had not received the censure of his Bishop, nor had his Bishop received the censure of the higher authorities of the Church. In another instance, at a meeting at which Mr. Sheehy, M.P., was present, another parish priest, the Rev. John Garry, said—

"They had come there to-day to take a look at the ruined home of one of their fellow-tenants, and declare that they believed in the Plan of Campaign. They believed that the persons who devised that Plan were almost under Divine inspiration, for there was no other means by which the people of Ireland could be saved from extermination."

He would next call attention to a speech delivered on the 31st August, 1884, at a meeting held at Crosspatrick, by the Rev. Michael Duggan. This rev. gentleman said—

"It had fallen to his lot to say a few words to them on land-grabbing and grass-grabbing. Evictions and processes of eviction were now the order of the day. Thanks to the Land League, land-grabbing had been put down to a great extent. Public opinion and the spirit of the people are entirely opposed to it; at least, the right-minded and the honest men of Ireland. What was the practice in early days? If one neighbour was breaking down, another neighbour was sure to keep a close eye on him, and would have a whisper with the bailiff and the agent. It often happened that both the agent and the bailiff were bribed, and a rack-rent was promised to the landlord to evict the tenant and give the farm to his grabbing neighbour. The bailiff, therefore, was the man they had to dread most. It was a common practice long ago to give them presents. He would not recommend any honest, upright man to be a bailiff or a local agent, because the spirit of the times was now such that any honest, upright man would not look on apathetically and see his neighbours and fellow-countrymen down-trodden and walked upon. He would not, of course, recommend them to Boycott them, because the Crimes Act was in being now; but he would tell them what they could do. They were not bound to walk with them, or to marry them; but he would tell them that they were bound in charity—to bury them."

This speech, the last sentence of which came near to an incitement to murder, was referred by a Roman Catholic gentleman, Mr. Thomas Eyre, to the head of the diocese, and then, receiving no satisfaction from him, he wrote to the late Cardinal MacCabe, the Archbishop of Dublin, who, in reply, said—

"It is very humiliating to find priests so unmindful of their sacred obligations as to use the language attributed to the one you refer to. I have no authority to interfere in the matter; but I will forward to Propaganda, with my own observations, any document you wish to place in my hands."

That was done, and the matter was referred to Archbishop Croke, who replied—

"I have just got your communication, dated 30th December, and really cannot gather from it what precisely you complain of on the part of Rev. M. Duggan, unless, indeed, it be that in common, as you say, with the speakers at the Crosspatrick meeting, he is alleged to have made some unpleasant remarks about bailiffs and Emergency men. Unfortunately, as you know, bailiffs have never been popular personages in Ireland, and I never heard anyone complaining of a speaker at a public meeting because he had denounced them, seeing that it is done every day, both in the Press and on the platform. Father Duggan made no special reference to your bailiffs, for he knew nothing of them; nor did he mention your name, for he did not know of your existence; and I do not, therefore, see what special locus standi you have in this matter. I should not hesitate to bring Father Duggan to order had he said or done anything to injure or insult you."

The moral guilt of Boycotting ceased to exist, in the opinion of Archbishop Croke, because Boycotting was practised every day. He never heard of such theological debauchery before. He had detained the House at some length, and had said some things which other Catholics said in private, but did not say in public. He had been accused and vilified by the Nationalist Press of America and Ireland because he said in public what he said in private. He said in public what he said in private because it suited his nature to do so; and if a higher justification of his nature in this particular matter were required, he need only quote from the Encyclical Letter on the Christian Constitution of States the words of Leo XIII.—namely, “Likewise it is unlawful to follow one line of duty in private and another in public.” He (Mr. De Lisle) would give his vote for the Bill, and he would do everything he could to assist its progress until it was carried triumphantly through the House. He would do so in the firm and earnest conviction that under its provisions no honest, no loyal, no law-abiding Irishman would suffer the slightest diminution of his rights and liberties; and he would do so with the fervent hope and prayer that it would be a terror and a stumbling-block to every evil-doer.

VISCOUNT KILCOURSIE (Somerset, S.), in opposing the Motion, said, that in a speech made on a former occasion (Friday last), and which had not yet been replied to, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) had asked whether they had confidence in the administration of the law by juries in Ireland, and had told them that if they had not they could not deny that the moment had come when the Government must deal with this matter, and restore to Ireland that fair administration of the law which should receive the confidence of the public generally. He (Viscount Kilcoursie) would now ask, what did the right hon. Gentleman mean by fair administration of the law? Did he mean the just administration of a fair law, or the fair administration of an unjust law? If the former, then he answered the question of the right hon. Gentleman strongly in the affirmative, but not otherwise. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Members of the Liberal Party were strongly desirous of the just administration of a fair law; but the case was different if the right hon. Gentleman, in using the words “fair administration of the law,” meant the fair administration of an unjust law. He did not know what course the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) might pursue in reference to the question under consideration; but he was very clear in his own mind of the vote he should give, if that right hon. Gentleman, great as his name was, were to bring forward a measure of coercion preceding remedial legislation. By every single word that he had uttered in that House, and by every action he had ever done in that House, the right hon. Gentleman had shown, not only that force was no remedy, but that the remedy must in every case precede force. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said the Bill was intended to protect the people of Ireland. Who were the people of Ireland whom the Bill would protect? The people of Ireland he understood to be the 5,000,000 persons who lived in that country—not a class, but every class in Ireland. But it was, according to Sir Redvers Buller, to the National League, and not to Coercion Bills, that the great majority of the people of Ireland looked for their salvation and protection. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had also said that the Bill was to break down the oppression under which the people of Ireland were suffering. If by that he meant the breaking down of the landlord oppression of which Sir Redvers Buller spoke, then he (Viscount Kilcoursie) should see some reason for the Bill. But he failed to see that the Bill offered any adequate protection to the tenants of Ireland, compared with the protection that at that moment was being offered to the landlords of Ireland. Referring to the quotation made by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, of Sir Redvers Buller’s words, to the effect that the law in Ireland looked after the rich and did not look after the poor, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that those were dangerous words to be quoted by his right hon. Friend, unless he intended to endorse them, or to differ from them; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer taunted his right hon. Friend with having been principally in power for many years, and therefore with being chiefly to blame if the law was not equal with reference to the rich and poor in Ireland. All he (Viscount Kilcourseie) had to say, as one who had been a humble follower of the right hon. Gentleman for the last quarter-of-a-century in that House, and before he entered it, was, that he should never have been his follower for a single moment if his right hon. Friend had acknowledged that the laws in Ireland were equal as between the rich and the poor. It was because the right hon. Gentleman had acknowledged that they were not equal that he had followed him—it was because during the whole course of the time he had been Prime Minister his right hon. Friend—although he had not accomplished all that he could wish—had endeavoured to alter the laws of Ireland so as to make them more and more equal between rich and poor. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had made an amusing remark with reference to the Celtic music which was so sweet in the ear of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. He (Viscount Kilcourseie) presumed the Scottish music which the Chancellor of the Exchequer heard when he was in Edinburgh was not very much to his taste; and, possibly, the English music which the right hon. Gentleman heard not long ago at Liverpool was also not particularly to his taste. But if the right hon. Gentleman were to go to Ireland, he might hear some of that Celtic music to which he had alluded, which would be still less to his taste. He would call the attention of hon. Gentlemen to several passages in the evidence given before the Royal Commission by Sir Redvers Buller, especially that in which the witness declared his belief that, in one part of the country, they could never have peace unless they created some legal equipoise, or equivalent, that would supply the want of freedom of contract which now existed between landlord and tenant. Why was it that there was a disturbance when hon. Members on the Irish Benches went down into the country? He was justified in his contention that what was passing in Sir Redvers Buller's mind was that these districts never would have been disturbed at all had there been an equipoise between the landlords and tenants. What were the forces against which the Government were contending? They were contending against forces which no Government before had ever encountered when bringing in a Coercion Bill. They were contending not only against the great majority of the Members from Ireland, but against the Archbishops and Bishops, against men of well-known standing in the Catholic Church—men beyond suspicion in their character—against the whole Liberal Party in this House, which was something, and against the whole Liberal Party outside that House, which was more. They were contending against the opinion of the whole civilized world, in America, Canada, and Australia. Even if the Coercion Bill were approved in America, Canada, and Australia, the mode in which it was brought in, before, instead of after, remedial measures, would condemn it in the opinion of every civilized human being, East, West, North, and South. It might be said that the great majority of the Irish tenants were poor, ignorant, and misled; but then they were misled by those whom they respected most. It was possible, even probable, that they might be misled by the lowest class of agitators in Ireland, persons who had no business in Ireland at all, persons who, if the late Government had its way, would not be in Ireland now. He was not going to enter into the question of Home Rule; he simply said that those men had no business to be there. But there was a class of lecturers, whom hon. Gentlemen opposite called agitators, but whom he preferred to call lecturers, composed of Members below the Gangway, Archbishops, Bishops, and priests. What were their arguments? The first strong argument which these lecturers used against the Bill was, that this was the 86th Coercion Bill since the commencement of the century, and that every one of those Bills was a failure. Nay, more; they said that the last of these Bills, which was supposed to be a success, had been proved by Lord Salisbury to be a failure. What was it Lord Salisbury said at Newport? He said—

Then they were told that—

"The provisions in the Crimes Act against Boycotting had a very small effect." "I have seen it stated," added Lord Salisbury, "that the Crimes Act diminished Boycotting. It is not true."

Would the present Crimes Bill be more successful in diminishing Boycotting? Then Lord Salisbury said that the Crimes Act "did not diminish outrage." They had in Ireland a population four-fifths of whom were Catholics, and what was the proportion of the magistrates? The great majority were Protestants, and, in spite of the fact that they were Protestants dealing with Catholics, they had to come there to obtain augmented power for the Protestants over Catholics. Next there was the case of the two men sent to Ireland, and there was a suspicion amounting to belief that Lord Carnarvon, Sir Redvers Buller, and Sir Robert Hamilton had gone to Ireland with preconceived notions in favour, to a great extent, of the class with which they were associated; but they had left that country with very different feelings. One of them remained, however, in evidence, a standing rebuke to right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He had read in the leading Sunday journal—

"Let the truth be brought home to Irishmen that England has put her foot down and the agitation for Home Rule will die away."

Put her foot down on what? On the necks of the Irish people? He could imagine nothing more calculated than that, read from an Irish pulpit, to arouse the passions of the Irish people. A more insulting and impudent paragraph he had never read. The fact that the Coercion Bill had been brought in before the remedial measures had awoken in America an amount of enthusiasm which could never die out. There had been some letters in The Times with regard to Parnellism and Crime. With regard to these letters let him say this—They might be true, and for the sake of argument, and for the sake of argument only, he would suppose now that every one of the statements was true. It ought to have been the policy of the Government not to have united the regular Opposition with those whose hands were stained with blood, if they were really so stained; it ought to have been the policy of the Government to have separated the Opposition from those of whom it was said that they were in a greater or lesser degree responsible for the crimes that had been committed. But what had the Government done? They had joined the Opposition hand in hand with those of whom some professed to believe that they were steeped in crime. Thus were joined together the Home Rulers and the anti-Coercionists of today, the Irish Members below the Gangway and the Opposition Members above it, with the exception of those Members of the Opposition who constituted a small minority. Great as was his objection to the Bill, it was as nothing to his objection to the clause for changing the venue of the trials from Dublin to London. It was a great misfortune that the view which would be taken of crime in this country in the future would not be the same that it had been in the past. Hitherto, crime had been condemned by both sides of the House because it was crime, and because it was felt that the laws were equal to all. We had not stopped to ask how a jury was constituted, and who were the members of it. We had simply asked what was the evidence, and whether a man was guilty on that evidence. With the change of venue to England, the question in the future would be not "What was the evidence?" but "Who formed the jury?" and it would be a most unfortunate circumstance that we should ever be brought to ask such a question. By that proposal the Government had carried politics into the Criminal Courts of this country. He could not be accused of being mealy-mouthed with reference to crime and outrage. He was one of the first persons to write in one of the most popular daily newspapers to condemn the language used by an hon. Member who sat below the Gangway; and in consequence he had exposed himself to no small measure of misrepresentation and obloquy. What he went through in consequence of those letters was known only to himself; but he could assure the House it was no small infliction. Under similar circumstances, he would write similar letters; but the position had now very greatly changed, for the Chief Secretary, by his language and manner in that House, had menaced the Irish Members, and the Government had menaced the Opposition by introducing a Crimes Bill at that time before attempting remedial legislation. If the Government had first attempted, by a remedial measure that was adequate, to abolish dual ownership in Ireland, and if they had then come to the House and said, "We have done our best, and we have failed," they would have a fair ground for appealing to the Opposition to support a Coercion Bill, and he would have supported them, so far as was in his power; but, by pursuing an opposite course, they had placed the hands of Opposition Members in the hands of the Irish Members below the Gangway. If, through the conduct of the Government, language were used which he disapproved, and if outrages were committed, however great his regret and that of others might be at their occurrence, they could not condemn the parties engaged in them, for the action of the Government placed both him and them in a position in which they could only shrug their shoulders, and throw the blame on the Ministry. The Bill was uncalled for; it was doomed to failure; it was un-English, and the "eternity" written upon and claimed for it would be measured by the duration of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. DALRYMPLE (Ipswich) said, that though the Government would, perhaps, best be served by the continued silence of its independent supporters, yet the country was entitled to hear what some of them had to say in support of the policy the Government had thought it their duty to inaugurate. He would bring no charge of unfairness against the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Kilcourse), neither would he follow him with quotations from Sir Redvers Buller's evidence. Taking from its context an answer of Sir Redvers Buller here, and another there—for you might make his evidence prove anything you like—you might show that Sir Redvers Buller held that Irish tenants have suffered many ills, and it cannot be denied they had. It might be shown that Sir Redvers Buller expressed an opinion that the tenants suffered under oppression, and so they did. The Government said—and he (Mr. Dalrymple) strongly supported the statement—that the oppression was that of the National League. The noble Viscount had explained, in the remarkable speech to which the House had just listened, how it was for a number of reasons he had supported the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian

(Mr. W. E. Gladstone), and he said he held with the latter, that the laws in Ireland, as they affected rich and poor, were unequal. If so, it was the obvious commentary upon that, that it was to the right hon. Gentleman and his Government that we, in a large proportion, owed the legislation of recent years; and it was strange that, holding such a sense of the inequality of the laws, he made no effort to remedy the evil. The noble Viscount, in citing the opposition to the Government measure, claimed opposition from the whole of the civilized world—a wide and general statement difficult to accept. He quoted Bishops and Archbishops; and certainly there was the charm of novelty in hearing, from the other side, the opinion of an Archbishop put forward as a convincing argument. The noble Viscount went further, and made a statement that in consequence of the action of the Government a very different view would be taken of crime in the future than had been taken in the past. The House was familiar with the allegation that violence and outrage, connected with agrarian disputes, were not crimes; but the House was scarcely prepared for the declaration from the Front Bench that hereafter, if crimes and outrages were committed, they would be met only with a shrug of the shoulders. He only regretted that the usual occupants of the Front Opposition Bench were not present, so the House could not judge by their manner if they accepted the statement of the noble Viscount. He (Mr. Dalrymple), however, trusted it was not generally shared by them. From some of the speeches delivered from the other side, it would seem that there was no cause whatever for action on the part of the Government; but by what was by courtesy called the regular Opposition—though a more irregular Opposition never existed—there was no denial of the fact that there was interference with the exercise of legal rights; that to some extent, indeed, there was a condition of anarchy and crime in Ireland; but they said—"The laws are to blame, and you would not accept our particular panacea of Home Rule." But, as he had said, the responsibility for the state of the law rested with those who made such a failure as the legislation of 1881 has been. It was a curious and extraordinary doctrine to lay down, that because the laws were said to be unjust, therefore they were not to be obeyed and enforced. He could hardly conjecture the state of things that would rise should such teaching acquire general acceptance. Last night the House had from the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) a defence of Boycotting, on the ground that it existed in England, instancing the Church of England as Boycotting those who did not belong to it, and that his brother was excluded from the magistracy of Bradford. To hear the remarks of the noble Viscount, it might be supposed that, had the Government introduced remedial legislation first, repressive legislation would have received careful consideration at the hands of the regular Opposition.

VISCOUNT KILCOURSIE: In regard to remedial legislation, what I said was if I considered it adequate.

MR. DALRYMPLE: A judicious qualification to apply to it; and probably the right hon. Gentleman the late Prime Minister would have added other qualifications. But right hon. Gentlemen opposite condemned the proposed legislation of the Government before they had an idea what it was; and it was perfectly certain they were quite prepared to condemn any legislative proposal of the Conservative Government. There had been contemptuous references to the opinions of the Judges; but hon. Members might remember with how much impressiveness the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), whom nobody expected to find consistent, had, not two years ago, in July, 1885, denounced those on that (the Ministerial) side of the House for not accepting the opinions of Judges; and it was his duty, at all events, he said, not to allow the Judges and juries of Ireland to be thrown over by the Government of the Queen. It was not, however, the Government that had thrown over the Judges now; but it was what was called the regular Opposition. He sometimes wondered what these right hon. Gentlemen would have said had the Government not brought forward some such measure as was now before the House. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would have compassed sea and land to make one proselyte against them. Who knew what stores of vituperation had been lost to the country, because the Government had taken the present step? There was no knowing what would have happened in the circumstances had not the Leader of the Party opposite and other right hon. Gentlemen become what they were now—Home Rulers, and allies of the hon. Member for Cork. The House was familiar with the prejudices caused by the word “coercion;” but he held that the word, as misrepresented on the other side of the House, was grossly misused for the purpose of prejudice, exaggeration, and mere irritation. The word “coercion” was freely used; but this was not a Bill of coercion, but of protection. There would be no coercion to men who obeyed the law, any more than the new Rule of the House would affect any Member who desired to place his knowledge, information, or even humour at the service of the House. The Rule would only affect those who transgressed the rule and principle of debate. Last summer, standing upon an eminence overlooking the town he had the honour to represent, he had some of the prominent buildings pointed out. “What is that red brick building far below?” he asked. “Oh,” said his informant, “that is the Coercion House.” That was a use of the word that conveyed the truth; but there was no Coercion House or Coercion Bill for law-abiding subjects. There was, however, coercion of the strongest kind for those who broke the law, and infringed with violence their neighbour’s rights. There had been a diminution of crime in Ireland, it was contended, and anyone who cared—and all must care—for the welfare of Ireland would rejoice if that were true; but when it was stated that, for crime, there had been substituted agitation of a Constitutional sort, that he absolutely denied. Admitting the diminution of crime, yet the condition of the country was such that un-Constitutional influences were at work preventing the exercise of public and private liberty. Again, Unionists were constantly told that the great majority of the Irish people were against them. When so much stress was laid upon the National representation in the House he sometimes doubted whether there was liberty enough to allow of a real representation of Irish opinion. The fact was sometimes overlooked that the minority against the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was a large one. The Return of the Elections for 1885 showed that, out of 575,000 electors, in round numbers only 295,000 supported the hon. Member for Cork, the remainder voting against him, or abstaining from voting, so that only a little more than half the electors were actually supporters of the hon. Member. They had had many recantations recently, such as they had from the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid) the other day, and last night the hon. Member for West Bradford recanted the support he had given to repressive legislation; and it was in reference to the latter that he recalled a statement of a mischievous character. The hon. Member said that in 1882 repressive legislation was hurried on, and the Party supported it because of the sad calamity of that year in Phoenix Park; but let the House and the country recollect that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury, Lancashire (Sir Henry James) had said, and his words made a great impression, that he saw the draft of the measure that was proposed simultaneously with the occurrence of the sad event referred to, showing that its preparation was quite apart from the murders, nor was it hurried thereby. The truth was, the hon. Member for West Bradford was one of those Members of the House never in the wrong. He supported strongly a particular policy when proposed by his own Leader, which he condemned when it was proposed by his political opponents; because meanwhile his Leader had adopted a policy of Home Rule, or some later nostrum for the pacification of Ireland. Those who opposed the measure now incurred a great responsibility. It was a matter of supreme importance. It was no mere Party demand, though he held strongly that that Party would gain most in the long run who most completely effaced itself for the common welfare at a moment of common peril to all.

Mr. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) said, it was not a frequent thing for him to intrude himself on the notice of the House; but he felt that the important nature of the proposal made to Parliament by Her Majesty's Government fully justified the humblest among Members in taking part in the debate, to state to the House, and through the House to their constituents, some reasons why he, and those with whom he acted, should oppose with all their force the measure the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. J. Balfour) desired to introduce. From speakers supporting the Government, he often heard charges made against right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of inconsistency. They were taunted with recantation, and changing their opinion and their policy; but if some of the hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House were led against their inclination to support a policy of coercion in 1881 and 1882, he held it to be no disgrace to any of them to declare that they would return to the natural policy of their Party in opposing coercion, after experience had shown them its utter and constant failure. By what means, through what influences, was the policy of the Government in 1881 and 1882 obtained, and what induced hon. Members sitting below the Gangway to support the Ministry of the day? One reason was that they had the utmost confidence in the integrity, the intention, and the determination of the Ministry of that day to apply remedial as well as coercive measures to Ireland. That faith in the intention of the Government was not misplaced. It was fully and amply justified by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone)—the policy he proposed to apply to Ireland during the Session of last year. And why were they so suspicious of the policy of the present Government; why had they so little confidence in the proposed remedial measures which it was understood were to follow the introduction of the Coercion Bill? It was perfectly fresh in the memories of hon. Gentlemen who sat in the House in the last Parliament that the Conservative Party, when occupying the Opposition Benches, were goading the Ministry of the time with all their influence, clamouring constantly for coercion; but when the Government proposed their measures of relief, then it was seen that the steam of the Conservative Party had spent itself in coercion. Delay and debate on every clause and line of the remedial legislation then introduced was the order of the day with Members of the Opposition. What reason had they to believe that the Government would recant from their ancient policy of coercion without relief? They had no evidence whatever of it. They had a description given of the Bill

by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland; and he (Mr. Broadhurst) should say it was a Bill which for its severity had never been equalled. ["No, no!"] He had yet to learn that any Ministry had ever before proposed to suspend the liberties of a nation in a permanent form. Even the worst of all previous Coercion Acts had been limited in time; but the Government proposed that for their present Bill there should be no limit whatever. What confidence could they have that the Government, having obtained the power to coerce a nation, would show equal industry and equal anxiety to produce and bring forth their measures of relief? They were told that a measure of relief to the Irish tenants for some of the oppression which now weighed upon them was to be introduced some time this week in "another place." The very fact of a measure of relief being introduced in "another place" was sufficient to at once condemn that measure. What measure of relief could they expect to emanate from the place across the way? ["Oh, oh!"] They knew that the treatment of measures of relief by the House of Lords, whenever such measures had left the portals of that House, was that all shape, all form and power for good, had usually been removed from them; and, therefore, they had no confidence whatever in that House as a place to pass measures of relief for the people. What did the Government mean by asking the House of Commons to give them every facility for passing a strong measure of repression, before they introduced into that House some evidence of their earnestness to redress the wrongs of the Irish tenants. He took down, at the time the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was speaking, some of the words in which he described what his Bill was to be when it saw the daylight. If he (Mr. Broadhurst) were correct in his notes, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to be quoting from the terms of the measure itself, and not to be generally describing it. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the Lord Lieutenant—or, at least, so he (Mr. Broadhurst) understood him—was to have the power of deciding what were dangerous associations, and then to apply to Parliament to issue regulations and control with regard to them. What were dangerous associations? The Lord Lieutenant would have to define what a dangerous association was. There were very few Lord Lieutenants that he (Mr. Broadhurst) knew anything about into whose hands he should like to trust the definition of what was a dangerous association. Why, there was not a Radical political association in the country but what was looked upon as a dangerous association by the Conservative Party.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Dangerous associations will be defined in the Bill by the purposes for which they exist.

MR. BROADHURST said, they would not be able to tell how far the power of the Lord Lieutenant was weakened, or controlled, or lessened, until the measure of the Government saw the daylight. At present, he could only discuss the Bill by the scanty information which it had pleased the Chief Secretary for Ireland to submit to the House of Commons. Now, he would remind the House that there was a dangerous association in this country in 1832, when the Dorsetshire labourers met in council to declare that 6s. per week wages paid to them by the landowners of that part of the country were insufficient to maintain themselves, their wives, and families; and that was considered to be a dangerous association. And what followed the meeting of the dangerous association? Its victims were sent by the Government of the day into penal servitude for a great number of years. He (Mr. Broadhurst) had that day the great pleasure and satisfaction of knowing that he had been for 30 years a member of what, for more than 20 years out of that time, was described as a dangerous association, and one which was controlled by the law of the land. That dangerous association had since become a part of the Constitution of the country, and to-day its members were protected by the law; but how had they won that protection? It was by persisting in the policy of carrying on agitations which were, under the old law, described as illegal and dangerous to the well-being of the community. And how did they know that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would not, in Ireland, give the same liberal interpretation as to what were dangerous associations—aye, even a much wider interpretation—to that which was given in the case of trades unions in England? And then the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland also told the House that one of the chief features of his proposed Bill was to deal with and destroy intimidation in Ireland. What was intimidation? Who was to describe and define what constituted intimidation? So far as he (Mr. Broadhurst) knew, there had never been any very clear definition of what constituted intimidation. He knew that, during the period before the trades unions of this country became lawful associations, for one man to sneeze at another was liable to be construed into an act of intimidation; and for looking at one another, for speaking to another man and woman, the wives of workmen in this country were imprisoned under the detestable law. Was it possible that the Government could expect that friends of his, who were at the heads of their respective trades unions, could agree for one moment to any such proposals as were contained in their Bill, which sought to re-establish in Ireland all the worse features of the old laws of this country, and which were passed to restrain workmen from exercising their just rights and their full liberties as citizens? What his experience of prosecutions for intimidation amounted to was this—that, in the case of disputes between capital and labour, they very frequently enabled what were called the wastrels of society to concoct cases against honest workmen, and, by persecution and prosecution, to send honesty to gaol, while laziness and worthlessness were at large. That was the net result of his experience of the law as to intimidation during its reign in this country. What were the consequences of freeing the people, of making combinations and associations of all kinds perfectly free and open? The result had been this—that whereas, previously to that measure of freedom, prosecutions were constant, since freedom had become the law prosecutions were exceedingly infrequent, and they scarcely ever heard of any of the so-called offences being committed. The most serious part of the Bill of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to his mind, however, after the proposal that all these combinations or associations between the people should be illegal, was the proposal to transfer trials of the victims into a country and among a people who had no knowledge of the sentiment, who had no knowledge of the people, and who, therefore, to the best of the belief of the Government, might be safely relied upon to find verdicts of guilty. When that part of his Bill was unfolded by the right hon. Gentleman, hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the Opposition side suggested that the cases should be sent to Aldershot for trial. But he thought the Government would be doing much better, and coming much nearer the old and ancient laws of the dark ages, if they ordered the trial to take place at the Old Bailey, a name associated with prosecutions, and prosecutions of the worst and most infamous description. Therefore, the Old Bailey was the most natural place to try Irish prisoners if they were to be brought to London at all. But he would like to ask the Government whether they imagined that London jurymen were going to constitute themselves the executioners of the victims of rack-renting landlords in Ireland? He believed the Government would find out their mistake if they attempted to pass that part of their measure into law. They would then find that they had been grievously mistaken, and that jurymen of London would repudiate being called on to do the dirty work of Dublin Castle, and to carry out oppression as instituted in Ireland. The fact was that the people of this country were heartily sick of the gory work of Irish oppression. He was there to confess that he did vote for measures of coercion under circumstances which he had previously described. But he had already stated the reason which led him so reluctantly to follow a great Minister in that policy, and had fully justified the course he and others took upon that occasion; and he, for one, at any rate, had the less cause to regret the policy to which he was then a party, since the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had inaugurated a policy of freedom and equality for the Irish nation. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane), speaking the other night of the severity of the measure introduced by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, expressed the opinion that the Government could pass the Bill as it stood. He (Mr. Broadhurst) did not think so. Its members were fall-

tion of this measure; but the Liberal Unionists were also largely responsible for it. No such measure could have been brought forward by the Government without the consent of the Leaders of the Liberal Unionists, who might be described as the Tory Members of the Conservative Party on the Opposition side of the House. Upon them rested a serious responsibility, for which the Government would call them to account. Some of the followers of the Government seemed to have a very vague and foggy notion of why they would support the Bill. If, as one of them alleged, the Irish tenantry could not earn a livelihood even were they relieved from all rent, was it not unnecessary, cowardly, and dastardly for any Government to bring in a measure of coercion? As they all knew, the severe fall in prices had caused rents to fall into arrear; evictions had followed, and outrages ensued upon evictions. Before the French Revolution, in exactly the same way agrarian outrages took place, and in every country where the peasantry were alienated from the possession of the land it was always found that until they righted themselves such deplorable occurrences would reproduce themselves. In a passage which had been frequently quoted, Sir James Caird had said that if the prices of agricultural produce in February, 1886, were continued the economical rent would disappear from the holdings of 538,000 tenants in Ireland. There had, however, since been a very considerable fall in those prices, and therefore the tenants were much worse off. The falls in prices were as follow:—Barley, which in 1886 cost 13s. 1½d. per barrel of 224lb., was this year 12s. 7½d.; beef, 52s. 6d. per cwt. in 1886, was now 46s. 3d.; pork, 41s. 3d. in 1886, 38s. In 1887 hay had fallen from 3s. 2d. per cwt. to 2s. 6d., straw from 2s. 9d. to 2s. 1d.; while butter, which had been 90s. in 1886, had through accidental circumstances risen this year to 103s. With regard to the "anecdotal" remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), and his instances of Boycotting in Ireland, he (Mr. Schwann) would like also to be allowed to give the result of his first experience of this offence. Being at one time in Fermoy, he was asked by his Loyalist friends to attend a sitting of the Court there, the inducement held out him being that he would hear a case of Boycotting, which would give him some insight into Irish character. He accordingly attended the Court, and he heard a person named Punch charged by a certain Captain St. Leger Barry—who was a magistrate—with having refused to serve him in his shop the week before. Mr. Punch was a grocer, and, as was often the case in Ireland, combined that trade with the business of liquor selling. Mr. Punch absolutely denied the statement, and summoned Captain Barry for perjury. No attempt was made at defence, but it was unnecessary to say that Captain Barry was not committed to the Assizes for perjury. The offence had been committed in Captain Barry's own Court when application for renewal of his licence was made by Mr. Punch. That was a sample of the manner in which the law was administered in Ireland, not only by the present Government, but by all Governments. They all used the engine of the law to promote their own political ends. There was in Ireland—as Sir Redvers Buller had stated—one law for the rich and another for the poor. In fact, the laws there were principally for the rich. No doubt there were cases of Boycotting in Ireland, but offences of that nature were not unknown in England, as those who were familiar with the operations of the Primrose League were aware. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes; that was a melancholy fact, and he knew no reason why hon. Gentlemen should not hear it stated, however unpleasant it might be to them. He complained that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, in giving his cases of Boycotting, had often referred to the offenders being "drunken fellows," and pointed out that the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) would experience great difficulty in converting the Captain Barry to whom he had alluded to teetotal principles. With regard to the proposal of the Government to transfer the venue of Irish trials from Ireland to England, he agreed that it would be an insult to the Irish people if it were carried out, and held that it was one which they should resent in the highest degree. It would be going back to the legislation of the middle ages, and he thought the Government had taken a most unfortunate step in introducing such a proposal in their Bill. If they would have to retract in fact, he was convinced that when the Bill came out of Committee—if it ever did come out—it would bear a very feeble resemblance to the scheme which originally went into Committee. The Government were taking a false step in bringing in a measure for coercion at the present moment. They were attempting to interfere with the legal rights of the Irish people, and this action would unquestionably be resented by the country at large. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had appealed to "liberty." Well, they were becoming accustomed to that sainted name being used in the House in support of measures which one would have thought it would have been impossible to vindicate. The closure, forsooth, had been promoted by the Government in order to foster "liberty of debate," and now coercion was proposed as a means of advancing the liberty of action of our Irish fellow-subjects. But he believed there were happier times in store for Ireland, and that no very great period would elapse before a true union would be cemented between the two peoples. He believed that the remedial measures of the Government would be small, and would be found altogether unsatisfactory. However, ere long Ireland would receive real liberty, and some Irish patriot—the hon. Member for Cork, the hon. Member for Mayo, or the mighty Davitt—would be able to raise a statue to Liberty in Ireland, and in unveiling it would be able to say, with President Cleveland—

"This is a statue of Liberty, no longer grasping in her hand the thunderbolts of terror and death, but holding aloft the light of liberty which illumines the way of man's enfranchisement."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): Sir, I think that hon. Gentlemen who spoke from the opposite Benches must have felt some inconvenience in their endeavours to discuss the provisions of a Bill which is not before the House. The hon. Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) said it seemed to him that the object of the Bill is to subject to pains and penalties all those who, like himself, had been connected with trades unions. The hon. Member admits that he voted for the Coercion Bill of 1882, and I assume that the hon. Member had at that time as much regard for trades unions as at this, and I can assure the hon. Member that he and his friends and all connected with those associations will be just as free to carry on their operations as under the Act of 1882. There seems to be a great difference of opinion whether or not the Government have made out their case for the introduction of this Bill. I wish, in the few observations I shall make to lay before the House the facts concerning which there is no dispute on either side, and I shall be perfectly ready then to leave the House, and, if necessary, the public outside, to draw their own conclusions from those facts. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) asserted that we had not substantiated the shadow of a case. But what the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members below and above the Gangway opposite forget is what last year the right hon. Gentleman, in moving the second reading of his Home Rule Bill, distinctly gave as the foundation of his measure. What was the argument that pervaded and permeated that Bill and the speeches which he made in introducing it? The right Gentleman said over and over again that the first and primary duty of any Government that came into Office was to restore social order in Ireland, and he admitted that everyone was agreed on that point. I will take just one passage from many that he used to show how clearly he laid that proposition before the House. He said—

"The Bill is proposed in order to meet the first necessity of civilized society. Social order is not broken up in Ireland, it is undermined, it is sapped, and by general and universal confession it imperatively requires to be dealt with."

He then described his remedy, which he preferred to ours because it dealt not only with symptoms, but with causes, and he concluded thus—

"We all agree upon this, that social order in Ireland imperatively requires to be dealt with; but when we come to the method, then, unfortunately, our differences come into view."—(3 Hansard, [305] 596.)

What were the proposals by which the right hon. Gentleman sought to restore social order in Ireland? He proposed to restore social order by handing over the whole of the administration of justice and of law to those who he admitted had brought the law into disrepute; and in making those proposals he and the right hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley)—who knew what they were about—made provision for the consequences of that peculiar method of restoring law and order, because in the Bill there was a special clause by which all those civilians and Judges who were connected with the administration of justice were to have special facilities and precautions taken for getting out of the country; and the right hon. Member for Newcastle himself admitted that special precautions would have to be taken with reference to the police records, because if the names of those who had assisted the police in detecting crime were known, their lives, under the new system that was to have been set up, would not have been safe there. The right hon. Gentleman gave us distinctly to understand that he would not commit or entrust the police records to the new authorities. All of us took a certain part in popular meetings during the last Elections, and I contend that of all the proposals which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian made, there was none that was found to be so repugnant to the just instincts of the working classes of this country as the proposal to hand over the whole administration of law and justice in Ireland to the enemies of both. [Cheers and Home Rule dissent.] That proposal, therefore, is dead and buried. [Cries of "No, no!"] I say it is practically dead. The hon. Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill), who opened the debate to-day, said that the Government were, without pretext, proposing an Algerian Code for the Irish people. When the present Government came into Office we were perfectly aware of the difficulty of the Irish problem; and, acting on the advice of his Colleagues, my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) undertook an arduous and thankless task, because it was admitted by hon. Members on both sides of the House that there was not one man in the House who had greater knowledge of Irish affairs, or who was more likely to be able to carry on the government of that country to a successful issue without recourse to anything beyond the ordinary powers of the law. My right hon. Friend spoke twice upon the subject this Session, and informed this House and the country that he believed it would have been possible to dispense with this measure if it had not been for the action of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. A Member of that Party well capable of representing it went over to Chicago—I mean the hon. Member for North Wexford (Mr. J. E. Redmond)—who, whenever he speaks in this House, speaks with ability on behalf of his Party. That hon. Member the other night did not dispute the quotation from his speech at Chicago, in which he laid it down as a fundamental proposition that not only was the government of Ireland by England impossible, but that it was the duty of Irishmen to make it impossible. The hon. Member for North Wexford, following up that proposition, addressed an audience in December last in a speech that was reported in The Ennis-corthy Guardian of December 11, and conveyed it to his audience as tidings of great joy. He said—

"We have every reason to congratulate ourselves to-day on what is nothing short of a most important victory for our people and our cause."

What was that victory? Why, that the hon. Member and his Friends had so conducted themselves as to render it necessary for the Government to introduce a Coercion Bill. The hon. Member said—

"When Mr. Gladstone was defeated in England last year, and when the Tories came into power, they boasted that they could govern Ireland by means of the ordinary law. . . . Home Rule was defeated at the last Election in Great Britain, and I say advisedly that if in the face of that defeat the Tories had been able to rule Ireland with the ordinary law the result would have been in England and Scotland to throw back our cause perhaps for a generation, and to give the lie direct to the prophecy of Mr. Gladstone. . . . We have been able to force the Government to give up the ordinary law and fall back once more on coercion. . . . I believe that the day they propose a Coercion Act, that moment shall be their death-knell, and will herald Mr. Gladstone's opportunity to power once more."

[Cheers.] Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite who cheer that sentiment are annoyed with the Liberal Unionists because they are at one with us. Is not that speech an explanation of why they act with us? That agitation in Ireland was not carried on for the benefit of the poor tenants, but that the Government which might discharge the primary duty of maintaining social order might be torn to pieces by the right hon. Member. . . . might be abt his Government which was emphatically repudiated by the country six months before.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): I am sure the noble Lord would not wish to misrepresent me. I would ask him—Did I not express in that speech my appreciation of the conduct of the people in preserving social order, and did I not say that the triumph of our policy lay in the fact of the utter absence of lawlessness and crime?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I did not say that the hon. Member incited to crime and outrage.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: I am sorry to interrupt the noble Lord again. What I understood him to say was that I had congratulated the people on an important victory, that victory being that we had conducted ourselves so as to render a Coercion Bill necessary.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Yes; and the agitation was managed so cleverly as that there should not appear to be an increase of outrages. [Laughter.] Those who laugh will understand why the Government do not rest their measure entirely on the amount of crime included in the statistics. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian the other day said that no case was ever presented to the House on such unsatisfactory and meagre statistics of crime; and he proceeded to draw an elaborate analysis between the amount of crime perpetrated last year in connection with agrarian offences and the amount committed this year. He complained, and perhaps with some justice, that the figures had been substantiated to the House by which he could draw a comparison off-hand between the two years—that he had been compelled to do so himself, and the result of his calculation was that there was an increase of agrarian crime, independent of threatening letters, of only six offences in the past year over the preceding year. Now, I have looked into the matter, and I am afraid that in his calculation he has fallen into a serious blunder. He has over-estimated the number of threatening letters in 1886, and under-estimated those in 1885; and the result is this—that the number of offences, other than threatening letters, in 1885 was 489, and in 1886 it was 607. It will be generally found that of the offences connected with agrarian outrages about 50 per cent can be taken to represent threatening letters. The agrarian offences in the past year were 1,025. Since 1869 there are only four years in which agrarian outrages have been greater in number than they were in 1886—namely, the years 1870, 1880, 1881, and 1882. In every single one of those years the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was in Office; in every one of those years he either demanded from Parliament, or had in operation, a stringent Coercion Bill. But he says you must rely on criminal statistics, and that this House has never assented to a Coercion Bill unless it has full and satisfactory statistics before it. Now, the one year in which the amount of agrarian crime was smallest in the whole annals of Ireland was 1867. There were then 87 agrarian offences, of which 32 were threatening letters; and, therefore, if there was a year in which it would have been impossible to obtain the assent of Parliament to a Coercion Bill it was that year. In that year the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian came down and demanded the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, the greatest interference that can be made with the Constitutional liberty of the subject; and he carried the Bill through all its stages in a single Sitting.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): Was not that in connection with the Fenian rising?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Yes; it was in connection with Fenianism; but does the hon. Member tell me that Fenianism is dead now? No one will dispute that the Land League and the National League are the same; their organization is the same; their leaders are practically the same, except that a certain number were who were associated with the Land League were compelled to leave the country when the Crimes Act was in operation. The right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) has changed his opinions; but he has left a valuable record of the statements of fact he made as Home Secretary, and of the reasons he gave why the Government, of which he was a Member, were bound to consider and to take action on them. On the 9th of March, 1881, in Committee on the Peace Preservation Bill, the right hon. Member for Derby said—

Lord George Hamilton

"I do not accept the view of hon. Gentlemen opposite, because they say that there is no Fenianism now. My case is that the present movement is nothing else than Fenianism. We have evidence abundant and complete that it is nothing but Fenianism under another name. Its objects are precisely those of the Fenian conspiracy. The reason why we adopt summary jurisdiction without reference to juries in Ireland is that we consider, in the present state of Ireland, summary jurisdiction should be exercised, as it was under the Act of 1870, without the alternative of trial by jury, as under the Act of 1876."—(3 Hansard, [259] 676-7.)

On the third reading of the Bill on the 11th of March, 1881, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"Am I right or wrong in saying that this Land League organization is really Fenian and Fenian in its character? I say exactly what I believe about the matter. It is perfectly true, as the hon. Member stated, that the Fenian organization endeavoured in former times to attack the English Government by open force; but, having found that that course could not be successful, it is my firm conviction that exactly the same object has been, and is being, prosecuted by other and more indirect methods. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) said that the Land League had three objects in view—first, to paralyze the Government; secondly, to obstruct Parliament; and, thirdly, to supersede the action of the law. But if they had accomplished these objects, they would have done all that the Fenian organization contemplated—they would have overthrown the Constitution as much as if they had attacked it successfully by open force."

And in the same speech the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I speak of the hon. Member for Tipperary. I have no right to say that he has any connection with the Fenian organization. I do not know it, and I cannot prove it; but his language in Ireland was precisely that which was used by the Fenian organization. We have been told that the Land League is a vigorous movement for Constitutional purposes. If that were so, I should strongly condemn any man or any Government that would interfere with it. But is that so? When we see men seeking the support of arms to assist their purposes, and find members of the Land League in communication with Communism in Paris, and Fenianism in America, then, I say, the maxim applies—'Noscitur ex sociis.' Can anyone be blind to these facts? I did not intend to detain the House so long; but when the hon. Member asks us why it was that the Liberal Party came to the conclusion that these measures were necessary, and necessary, too, to press them forward through the House of Commons by means which I regret as much as any man can do, I say it was because they were convinced that the state of things in Ireland was not for the welfare of the country, and I may add because the Liberal Party never has had, and never will have, anything in common with Communism or with Fenianism."—(3 Hansard, [259] 842-3-4.)

Not only are these the avowed objects of the National League, but the very argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle has been that the League is likely to obtain its object, and therefore we had better give way at once. I do not say that Fenianism occupies now the same position that it did formerly, but it is a factor which has to be taken into consideration. It is asserted that the object of this measure is not to restore social order so much as to enable landlords to exact impossible rents. That statement is accepted, if I may judge by the silence with which it is received. I do not wish to go at length into the Land Question. I have always said that the agitation in Ireland was agrarian and not political, and if you can eliminate the agrarian element from it agitation will succumb. This is the only agitation which has lasted, and it is because it is associated with the Land Question. When remedial proposals are made it is essential that we should understand what are the difficulties of the Land Question in Ireland. They do not arise from defects of the law, as far as occupying tenants are concerned, because the law is more favourable to them than it is in any other country in the world. But they arise from the physical and economical conditions which surround the agriculture of Ireland. There are two sides to the Land Question in Ireland, and we in this House only get one of them. In the hilly districts there is much moor and barren land under cultivation; and in the valleys and other parts there is as rich grazing and pasture land as is to be found in any country in the world. It is on the barren soil of the mountainous districts that you have a prolific and congested population. The object of the Land League in the Plan of Campaign has been to utilize the indigence of the tenants in the poor districts, to force the tenants in the richer districts not to pay the rents they otherwise could pay, and, having thus amalgamated the interests of those who live on the rich lands with the interests of those who live on the poor and barren lands, to utilize the Land Question as a lever to raise a political agitation, and in obtaining national independence. Therefore, when any proposal is made to deal satisfactorily with the Land Question, hon. Gentlemen below the Gallery naturally object, because it is a factor of a fulcrum by which we can overthrow the Union. We are asked why we do not deal with the Land Question first. In answer I will quote a sentence from page 7 of the Report of the Royal Commission—

"The people are more afraid of Boycotting, which depends for its success on the probability of outrage, than they are of the judgments of the Courts of law. This unwritten law in some districts is supreme."

Will anyone dispute that? Turning to page 8 I find it asserted—

"The decision of that Court (the Land Court) is absolutely binding on the landlord, but public opinion in many parts of the country does not recognize any binding effect of such a decision on the tenant, who, if dissatisfied, may join a combination for the purpose of obtaining a still further reduction."

So long as that is the state of affairs, it is useless to set about amending the law in Ireland until the Government has secured that the law, whatever it is, shall have more attention paid to it than at present. That is the reason why we were compelled to introduce this measure first. It is asserted that there are landlords in Ireland who will endeavour to make use of the powers which the Bill confers for the purpose of evicting their tenants. There may be bad landlords who may attempt to utilize a stringent law. The Government, therefore, propose to introduce immediately into the House of Lords a Bill which will render it almost impossible that any increased facilities for landlords acting harshly towards tenants can be claimed under this Bill. We further propose, later on, to introduce a larger measure for the purpose, if possible, of settling the Land Question. It is sometimes assumed that landlords and all connected with them uphold the existing system in Ireland. I, myself, have never been enamoured of the existing system. It may be described in a sentence. You have 35 tenants to one landlord. In discussing the system the tendency is to cultivate popularity rather than a sense of justice. A demand is made in certain quarters to reduce the rents fixed by the Land Courts because prices have fallen. Yes; but will you propose to raise reduced rents if prices should rise? [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] The hon. Member who says "No" is not guided by a sense of justice; and so long as you have 35 tenants to one landlord there is, to my mind, a very serious obstacle to the smooth working of the land system in Ireland. I believe that the system of large estates in England has worked well for agriculture, although, possibly, it has not produced very good results to the owners. But a system of large estates, to my mind, can only work well when the holdings are of such a size that the landlords can make the permanent improvements. In Ireland many holdings are so small that it is impossible for the landlords to do that. This is one of the great difficulties of the problem. That which is of advantage to the single holding is not unfrequently detrimental to the whole estate. Then there is unnecessary friction between landlords and tenants, and this is not for the public good. Therefore, I have always held that it was for us, as the only practical conclusion, to devise some system by which the present system of land tenure should be put an end to. This result may be desired by the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends, but it is obstructed by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. I am sorry to introduce anything of a personal character into this debate, but a practice has arisen amongst certain hon. Members which I think is contrary to the practice of the House—and almost an abuse of its forms—of making attacks on individuals without giving notice. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) the other night attacked different landowners, and among them myself and my family. He said—

"It was believed that the Hamiltons were anxious to have a Coercion Act because without such an Act they could not levy their rents. They were regarded by their own tenants and by the Ulster farmers as rack-renters."

The hon. Member went on to speak of what he regarded as the unhappy relations between the Duke of Abercorn and his tenants, and to wish for some means by which this unfortunate state of affairs could be put an end to. The hon. Member for East Mayo was distressed, not for the first time, at the relations between the Duke of Abercorn and his tenants, and he objected not because the relations were bad, but because they were so good. [An hon. MEMBER: Prove it.] I am going to prove it. Before the Redistribution Act of 1885 was passed North Tyrone constituted a separate constituency, and the tenants of the Duke of Abercorn formed a large proportion of the voters in that constituency. On behalf of these rack-rented and down-trodden tenants first appeared the present hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). Another distinguished Member of that Party took his place—the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon)—who then made exactly the same statement as he had made in the House of Commons, and all these tenants, so far as they knew, voted against him. These Gentlemen spoke in ignorance of the condition of these tenants. They were all well-to-do, independent men. At the Election in 1886 fresh tactics were resorted to. It was no use starting a full-blown Nationalist, and so a hybrid article was produced in the shape of a gentleman whose one claim to the recommendation of the tenants was that he had been a Sub-Commissioner, and in the course of his duty had somewhat favoured the tenants.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I wish to know whether an attack on Judges in this House is in Order? Whether the noble Lord is in Order in saying a Judge of the Land Court was in favour of the tenants?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not gather that the noble Lord makes any reflection on a Judge of the Superior Court. The Sub-Commissioner is not a Judge of a Superior Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask whether it was allowable to attack a Judge of an inferior Court in this way?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am not making any attack; I am merely stating what is a fact—that Mr. Wylie was recommended as an Assistant Commissioner who had been a friend to the tenants. But the rack-rented, down-trodden tenantry supported the brother of their landlord. But why was this charge made? It is simply ridiculous to say that my brother or my family want a Coercion Bill to assist them in obtaining their rents. There is no property in the North of Ireland in which tenant-right is higher in value. This charge was made in order to hold up to public obloquy those whose public duty it is to support this Bill by suggesting that they are actuated by personal motives. The hon. Member for East Mayo told us in plain language what he intended to do, and in so doing he furnished the strongest personal argument that could be advanced in support of this Bill. He informed us that he intended to promote the Plan of Campaign, and that, if he was put in prison, upon the Chief Secretary would rest the responsibility for any outrages that ensued. Can any Government tolerate such action, by which the laws are defied, and when Judges attempt to enforce their jurisdiction their messengers are maltreated? The hon. Member asked how he could be expected to take any interest in Imperial affairs when his country was going to ruin. The part in which it is going to ruin is that in which his authority is supreme. Strong unconscious testimony has been given by an hon. Gentleman opposite below the Gangway as to the situation resulting from the repudiation of contracts. The hon. Member for North Donegal said that tens of thousands of writs of merchants and shopkeepers were rotting for want of service. [Cries of "Why?"] Do you suppose that repudiation of contracts can be confined to contracts made with landlords? The reason given for the statement was that so many police were engaged in the assistance of the landlords. That is exactly my point. When you teach the people to repudiate their obligations to the landlords you will find they will repudiate their obligations to other people. Hon. Members of the House have little idea of the kind of terror under which hundreds of people in Ireland had now come. They have no notion of the sort of tyranny exercised by some of these Land League Courts. The Central Land League has set certain forces in operation throughout the country, and now in many cases it finds it cannot control those forces. In the answer to Question No. 18,592, there is a reference to a case in which the hon. and learned Member for West Donegal (Mr. O'Hea) appeared as counsel for one of the parties to the suit. The case is stated in these terms in the answer—

"A farmer let a forge to three men, smiths, on these terms—they were to make a money payment and to shoe his horses. This occurred at Owens, a place within a few miles of the City of Cork. The man was Boycotted and the smiths refused to work for him, and no smith would work for him, although he was a member of the Land League himself. He was then obliged to send his horses into Cork to be shod. Then he brought a process against the smiths for breach of contract, and the damage done to him by being obliged to send his horses into Cork. In the case he told us how he came to be Boycotted.

He said there was a property in the Court of Chancery and a receiver was appointed, and the receiver put up the grazing of some of the land to let, and there were four proposals sent in for the grazing by four members of the Ovens Land League. One was put in by the cousin of this man, and thereupon his brother Leaguers got him Boycotted, and they refused to allow any one to speak to him, and the plaintiff in the case before me was Boycotted because he spoke to his cousin who was Boycotted."

In this case the hon. Member for West Donegal appeared to protest in the strongest manner against the tyranny of the local League. This shows that a local institution has been set up which cannot be restrained. Hon. Members can have no case against the Government when the Government asks for power in certain localities to put down local associations which make so abominable a misuse of their power. In another case a tenant paid his rent but asked for a writ of eviction, offering to defray all the legal expenses, "Because," he said, "if it is known that my rent is paid my life will be in the greatest danger." To show how iniquitous this system of intimidation is, I may mention another case, reported in United Ireland, where a branch of the Land League in the County of Tipperary passed a resolution to the effect that they would retain their present Poor Law Guardians in office if they pledged themselves that in future when the interests of the League were involved they would be guided by the decision of a majority of the branch. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian endeavoured the other night to draw a distinction between the National League and the Land League, and he asserted that the difference between the two was that the Land League had advocated the payment of no rent, whereas the National League merely advocated a reduction of rent; and the right hon. Gentleman laid great emphasis upon this distinction as justifying him in giving a support to the National League, contrary to the action which he took in regard to the suppression of the Land League. But I will remind the right hon. Gentleman that the hon. Members for Cork and East Mayo were not put in prison for issuing the "No-Rent" manifesto. That manifesto was issued afterwards; but that which in the opinion of the late Prime Minister justified him in putting those hon. Members in prison was, that they stood between the people of Ireland and the beneficial legislation which he had passed, and that they did so by advocating the doctrines of public plunder. The object of the Plan of Campaign is to substitute for rents which the tenants have covenanted to pay, or which the Land Courts have settled that they should pay, such rents as they may agree upon themselves. What is the operation of this grievous and bad system? We cannot have a better illustration of it than what occurred in the case of Lord Lansdowne's tenants. Lord Lansdowne has two properties, one in Kerry and the other in Queen's County. The conditions of these two properties are the reverse of one another. On one estate the tenants are very poor and the holdings small, while on the other the holdings are large and the tenants may be described as country gentlemen. On the first-named estate great reductions of rent were made, whereupon the tenants on the other estate refused to pay the rents unless the same reduction was made in their case. Lord Lansdowne very properly refused to grant this demand, and among the tenants who allowed themselves to be evicted was one gentleman who owned racehorses, and who had been a magistrate. All that the Government contends for is that the conditions which surround the contract between landlord and tenant shall be even. I think I have shown that there is a system of intimidation and terrorism existing in certain parts of Ireland which threatens to engulf social order throughout Ireland unless it be stopped. As to the administration of justice, I heard the hon. Member for East Mayo ask how he could expect a fair trial if the jury was composed of his political opponents. But how could he expect a fair trial if the jury was composed of his political adherents? We are taking measures by which we hope to be able, to a certain extent, to maintain the jury system, and, at all events, to insure that decisions shall be given in accordance with the evidence tendered in the Courts of Law. We are told that the proposed legislation will fail. We are told that we are unwise to bring in this measure, and we are also told that, since the Union, 87 Coercion Acts have been passed. But the reason why so many Coercion Acts have been allowed to lapse between the

are 1800 and 1887 is that, in most instances, they were passed for a temporary purpose, and that, having done their work, they were allowed to lapse. Hitherto it has been the practice of the Opposition, when an appeal is made to them to enable the Government to carry out law and order, to respond to that appeal. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian based his refusal to respond to the present appeal upon one precedent alone, and I will ask hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to look carefully at that precedent. It is that of the action of Lord John Russell in 1846, who refused to grant the powers which the Government of the day asked for, and who came into Office in consequence. Within a few months Lord John Russell and his Colleagues asked for and passed exactly the same measure which they refused to pass the year before.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is what the Tories did last year.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: In the second year they passed another similar Act; in the third year they suspended the Habeas Corpus Act; and, lastly, they put on their trial and convicted a considerable number of the Irish Members through whose co-operation they obtained Office. We are told that we want this Bill in order to abolish all personal and Constitutional liberty in Ireland. Sir, we ask for these powers because we believe we had a mandate at the last Election. We were put into Office in order that we might maintain the union between the two countries. The present attack upon the Union is subtle and insidious. It is hoped that social order and the authority of the law may be engulfed in the agitation which is now going on, so that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian may ultimately be able to appeal to the country and to say that Ireland is so demoralized that there is no hope or help except by repealing the Union. One hon. Gentleman to-day said that our only object in bringing in this Bill was to retain Office; he said that was the sole motive which led us to refuse to allow them a separate Parliament in Ireland. If the hon. Gentleman had looked into the composition of this House, he would have discovered that, if any single thing could give the Tory Party an absolute majority in this House, it would be the adoption of the measure of last year. If we were actuated by those personal motives which are attributed to us, we ought to take action exactly the reverse of that which we are taking. Our object is not to take away Constitutional liberty from the Irish people, but to restore it to them. We have associated with this measure others which are remedial in their operation, and we hope, with these materials, to renovate and restore social order in Ireland and from that foundation work out the prosperity of Ireland and the unity of the Empire.

MR. COLERIDGE (Sheffield, Attercliffe) said, the claim of the Tories and of the Unionists, when they went to the country at the last General Election, was that they intended to deal with all parts of the United Kingdom with fairness, impartiality, and equality; but now the Government had disregarded all those promises and pledges, and come to the House with a measure deliberately prepared for the purpose of depriving one portion of the United Kingdom of those liberties which the other portions enjoy, and which the Government dare not take from them. And, further than this, they proposed not only to deprive the present inhabitants of Ireland, but their sons and grandsons for generations yet to come into the world, of those advantages and liberties which they dared not propose to deprive the inhabitants of the other portions of the United Kingdom. That was a strong order to ask the House to consent to, and he thought a proposal of that sort ought to have been supported by better arguments than the miserably weak and contemptible tu quoque which had been laid before the House. There were many Liberals in House now-a-days who were too young to be tarred with the coercion brush; and it was no argument to tell them the Liberal Party, or some Liberal Leaders, had in other days—happily past and gone—and under other circumstances, advocated and carried out measures of coercion. That, Sir, was no argument at all to hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, for the spirit which animated them and the spirit which animated Tories and Coercionists was wholly different. The principle which animated Liberalism was the principle of growth and progress, whilst the principle of Toryism was a principle which stood still. He should be glad to see those Liberals who formerly advocated coercion coming forward with candour, acknowledging their past errors, and saying—"We are not going to go wrong again as we did in the past." When they were asked to grant this extreme measure of coercion for Ireland, it should first be proved that it was necessary; but when they asked for means for an examination of the crimes upon which the Government founded the necessity of their Bill, they were told that the Government did not stand upon the number of crimes committed, and that that was not the point upon which the demand for coercion was to be argued out. A wretched little list, however, of what he might call slightly exaggerated Primrose League cases was produced, mostly from quarters which were open to considerable and reasonable suspicion; and then they were favoured with remarks of Irish Judges. But for Englishmen to understand the value of the remarks quoted from the charges of Irish Judges, it was necessary that they should first of all understand the difference between the data upon which English and Irish Judges founded their charges. English Judges charging English Grand Juries did so upon the authority of the list of crimes before them in the calendar, and of the depositions which they had before them, giving full particulars of all those crimes; but the charges of Irish Judges were, he understood, not based upon a similar state of facts, but upon the hearsay statements of Irish officials, placed before them under the seal of secrecy and confidence. It was upon such flimsy pretexts as those that the House was asked to deprive the Irish people of their liberties. When it was proposed to deprive a people of their liberties, the country would naturally like to know what was the motive power which was forcing on this measure of coercion, and he had no hesitation in saying that the motive power was the landlords, who had found it difficult to collect their rents, and who hoped to make use of these coercive proposals to carry out their own purposes, and to extract higher rents from their tenants. He opposed any measure of coercion, and he confessed he had no belief in the remedial legislation which they were told was to follow. Last Session they were told by the Government that they admitted that there was a case for inquiry, that an inquiry should, therefore, be made, and if the allegations made by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) turned out upon inquiry to be true, nothing should stay the hands of the Government in applying a remedy. He did not speak without authority on the matter. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), after denying the accuracy of the statements made by the hon. Member for Cork, went on to say—

"I quite agree that, if the hon. Member for Cork had proved his case, Parliament ought to interfere to maintain the tenants in their holdings, and that neither the season of the year nor our own labours ought to excuse us from dealing with the subject."

But in the face of that statement what did the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary do? He denied the fall in prices, and he opposed the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork, which, he characterized as "an act of gross injustice and confiscation to the landlords of Ireland." But it having been proved by their Commission of Inquiry that the statements made by the hon. Member for Cork were true, and his proposals just, the Government now tell the House that they proposed to deal with the subject in a Bill about which the House knows nothing, and in "another place" about which they knew too much. But if the Government were in earnest in proposing that remedial legislation, what would become of the assertion that the proposals of the hon. Member for Cork would inflict gross injustice upon the landlords? Could it be believed that they were in earnest, and that they intended to pass a remedial measure carrying into effect the ideas of the hon. Member for Cork? The answer appeared to him to be found in the fact that there never had been a single suggestion made for remedying, for improving, the condition under which Irish land was held by the tenants that had not been invariably either maimed, mutilated, or rejected totally by the other House to which it was now proposed to give the initiative in the Government legislation. They threw out the Bill framed upon the Report of the Devon Commission—

a landlord Commission—in 1813. A similar Bill was introduced in 1853 and rejected, and a well-known Tory statesman then said it was notorious that the House of Lords would pass no such measure of reform of the Land Laws, and that the Government who introduced such a measure and pretended that they were going to pass it, was guilty of an imposture and a sham, and he (Mr. Coleridge) had now no hesitation in saying that to tell the country now that the other House was going to pass the remedial measures foreshadowed for Ireland was an imposture and a sham. There was, however, one Liberal, or so-called Liberal, who had found salvation in that "other place." The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain), to the surprise and horror of his former associates, had expressed his faith in the other House passing a satisfactory remedial measure for Ireland. Well, faith had been falsely and irreverently defined as trying to believe what you know to be untrue; and he (Mr. Coleridge) thought that at the present time that definition might, without injustice, be applied to the faith held by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. The right hon. Gentleman believes that a good and thorough remedial measure is going to pass that "other place," when he knows very well that it is not—when he knows it to be untrue. The right hon. Gentleman must be a different person to the Mr. Joseph Chamberlain who made a speech some time ago, in which he said of that "other place"—

"They have mangled or postponed, or thrown out from the first to last, from the time of the Union to the present day, every Bill which was intended to secure to the Irish tenant his fair interest in the land which he tilled, and to give him some guarantee for the product of his industry and his thrift."

It was now said that the law, just or unjust, must be maintained before any remedial measure could be carried out; but that was said originally in our contest with our American Colonists, and with what results? Lord Mansfield thus explained his position in the House of Lords, while admitting that the impolicy of the taxes imposed in 1767 had been the cause of the trouble and confusion which he then deplored—

"Proceed then, my Lords, with spirit and fairness. When you shall have established your authority it will then be time to show your lenity."

The Government of those days entered upon a contest in which they were defeated. He (Mr. Coleridge) never disguised from himself the fact that it was practically possible to govern a country by a policy of "Thorough." They might make a desert around them and call it peace, and might produce a temporary and sullen tranquillity; but to carry out that policy there must be no faltering. They might depend upon it, that if the effects were to be produced in Ireland which were produced by the old Cromwellians—if those effects were to be reproduced in the 19th century, hon. Members opposite and the Government must devote themselves to the work with the same merciless spirit, thoroughness, brutality, and indifference to bodily suffering and liberty which distinguished the Cromwellian statesmen and soldiers. The effects produced by Cromwell could not be produced unless they should display again the temper and spirit of Cromwell. Well, he asked, had the Government fully considered the matter? Had they resolved to treat the Irish people consistently and continuously with the same sternness as the Cromwellians did? What were they going to do, for instance, with those tenants who defended their homes and refused to leave their farms, or if, after having been turned out and driven from them, crept back again? In the Cromwellian days they could be sold into slavery or hung. That was the real policy of "Thorough," and it was carrying such a policy to its only logical conclusion; but were the Government of to-day prepared to carry out their policy of "Thorough" to the same conclusion? Were hon. Members prepared to see this Bill carried out to the same logical conclusion? It should be remembered that in Cromwell's days England had to deal with a country ruined by faction, and far less powerful and civilized than it was now. To-day not only was Ireland better educated and more civilized, but there was a large Irish Party in the House of Commons, and a large number of supporters in the British Colonies, in America, and in England. Moreover, the Government, besides dealing with the Irish Party, would have to deal with the vast majority of the masses of the English people. There was a curious old book which he came across the other day, and the writer found fault with the Cromwellians because they were not "Thorough" enough. He said—"If they have a dram of rebellious blood in them, you cannot believe that the Irish will be driven like geese by the mere wagging of a hat upon a stick." Therefore he was confident that they had now happily come to a time when the policy of "Thorough" could no longer, by any possibility, be carried into effect. In the Cromwellian days the Government went to the extremity of taking away the discontented people from Ireland and replacing them by people of an English race; but even that extreme and detestable policy failed, for the sons of the Englishmen who were sent over to replace the banished Irish people became the strongest opponents of the tyrannical Teutonic rule. They had now, however, come to a time when men could not be banished and others substituted, although, if they could, past experience did not encourage a trial of the experiment; and he believed the Government would find that in proposing this Coercion Bill they were forging a weapon which would break in their own hands; it would prove to be a mere cardboard weapon, like their Paper Union. Irish Members in that House had been sneered at on the ground that they were representing, not their constituents in Ireland, but people in other countries; but if he were an Irishman, he should consider it one of the most glorious boasts of the Irish race that, spread over the world, in whatever country they might be, they changed the sky and not their home, and that the pulse of Irish nationality beat as high at the extremities as at the heart itself. If the Government were to carry this measure out to its logical consequences there must be no parleying with their General Bullers or Captain Plunketts; there must be no County Court Judges exercising discretionary powers; there must be no prisoners carried to gaol escorted by cheering crowds and consoled by applauding Archbishops. The Government must pursue the policy they had begun to the bitter end. They must be stern, merciless, pitiless. What a helpless, hopeless policy! They had allowed the landlords to mount the box, and the landlords must drive the coach of the Government over any roads, through any mire. When all was done the Government would find Ireland in a state of ferment and exasperation. That was a policy which he should oppose with all his energy, because it was the policy of an impotent, a resourceless, and a class-ridden Government.

[Third Night.]

He therefore hoped the Motion would be agreed to.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday 27th April.
